We never said that parents and guardians cannot care for their children's moral health. What we did say was, and we say it once for all, that parents cannot suppress obscenity without some law to do it by. This law, of course, should be local, for with such matters the general government can hav no constitutional business. Without this law boys of fifteen to twenty could easily procure the vilest literature that type could print. A father cannot keep his boy under his eye every minute, and there are always scoundrels ready to make a dollar by the most disreputable methods. With the writings of social radicals the law should hav nothing to do, unless the books are intentionally made lascivious with an eye to the profits accruing from their sale. As we hav said many times, the English language is rich enough in decent words to express all the ideas that writers are likely to hav, and the benefits of virtue can be set forth in language that will not excite the very passions that the pamphleteer pretends to desire to see subdued.

What we want now is for Mr. Walker to come down to the point and say whether he is in favor of allowing the vilest literature to be published unrestrained by any statute, state or municipal.

Parsonages Must Pay Taxes.

Judge Vann, of Syracuse, has decided that buildings used as parsonages, even though on the plot of ground surrounding a church, must be assessed and taxed.

The matter came up in the case of the people on the relation of Edmund G. Hutchinson and others as trustees of the First Congregational church of Phœnix, N. Y., against James Collison and others, assessors of the same village. The writ was issued to review an assessment upou certain real property known as "the parsonage." The relators are the trustees of the Congregational church which owns a parcel of land in the village of Phœnix, 132 feet wide on Bridge street and 150 feet deep on Jefferson street. At the time the assessment in question was made there stood upon the lot fronting on Bridge street a brick church used by the society exclusivly for public worship, and also fronting upon the same street and separated from the church by a narrow space, a wooden building used by said association for a parsonage and occupied by the parson. The pastor receives an annual salary, the parsonage being furnished for his use by the society. Upon the rear of the lot are sheds for horses and a barn. The greater portion of the entire parcel of this land is covered by the church. The parsonage was assessed upon the assessment roll of the village of Phœnix for this year at the sum of $1,600, against the protest of the relators, who, feeling aggrieved by their action, instituted this proceeding to review and correct the alleged error.

The judge held that the statute limits the exemption to a building actually used for public worship, and does not include a building the income or use of which is devoted to the support of the minister. The parsonage is not exempt from taxation, and the assessors simply did their duty in assessing it. The proper mode of assessing such property, he said, is to deduct the value of the part actually occupied by the corporation from the value of the whole estate, and the society should be assessed upon the value of the rest thus ascertained.

THE Rev. T. T. Munger, in the September Century, advocates the study "in our colleges and high schools of the Bible as a classic, and of the Christian religion as a fact, by scientific methods and subject to courteous criticism." Beyond the fact that a great number of people believe in the Christian religion, there are no facts connected with the system of Christianity except human and negativ facts.

Letters from Friends.

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please tell Jno. Prescott Guild that it is my desire to shake hands with him at Pittsburgh on his Dream, as published in your paper under date of September 29th.

Yours respectfully, L. B. SILVER.

SOUTH LOWELL, ALA., Sept. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed a quotation from a sermon by the Rev. James M. Gray, rector of the Reformed Episcopal church, Boston, Mass., taken from the Boston Herald. Mr. Gray said: "If he had to choose between the spiritual teachings of the church of Rome, and the teachings of the so-called 'Liberalism' of this day, he would prefer the former. . . . It would be a sad thing if the ship of state were saved from the rock of papacy, only to be stranded at length on the shoals of Infidelity." This shows which way the orthodox church will go when the trial comes. Mr. Gray would rather hav Romanism prevail than Liberalism. With him slavery is preferred to liberty. With him science seems to be inferior to the church. We prefer knowledge to faith, and if we ever wish to enjoy it, we must educate and make laws to protect us in this our natural right, for the church is against us. J. K. DEARTH.

BALTIMORE, MD., Sept. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After a long illness, both father and mother, aged respectivly eighty-three and ninety-two years, hav passed out into the unknown; and to the holy horror of our Christian friends, they both died without the aid of the clergy, but with the full assurance that, if there was a hereafter, they had done nothing for which they would be ashamed to face an honest God. My very religious relativs, brother and sister, insisted upon their minister conducting the funeral services. His remarks must hav been very consoling to them, for their mother and father had died out of the church, so he could not promis they would meet again. I do not include myself in the list, for, by reading your most ungodly paper, and books of the same stamp, I, with my little family, father, son, Ho—I was about to say Holy Ghost, but there is not a phantom in the sky that is worth a finger-snap in comparison—so I will say wife, expect to toast our shins with the old folks. Well, from what we hav read in the "Holy Queer," the devil is the best of the lot, and is not given over to the bad habit of having wild spells and raising hell as the other fellow does; he appears to be docil, and obeys orders to the letter. Such people can be better trusted than one who gets mad with himself and, as it were, cuts off his nose to spite his face. F. A. EVERITT.

HANNIBAL, Mo., Oct. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In view of the approaching annual Congress of the American Secular Union, it is to be hoped that twelve years of fruitless labor may hav opened the eyes of our leaders to the following facts:

1. That it is folly to attempt to build up a political party in opposition to the prevailing religious beliefs of the country.

2. That the fallacy of orthodox religion must be clearly demonstrated and recognized by the masses before any great political reform can be accomplished.

3. That, notwithstanding its absurdities, the masses still accept the Bible because they believe it to be the source of moral law, hence the first step toward eradicating their false religion is to show them by precept and example that reason, not theology, is the basis of morality, and hence no Liberal society should retain members who persist in immoral conduct.

4. That superstition is the mother of creeds and should be discountenanced no matter in what garb she presents herself, and that all believers in ghosts are her devotees.

5. That all Liberals who are so much afraid of being called il-Liberal, or of losing their popularity with certain classes, that they dare not take a stand against such monstrous evils as free love and Anarchy, had better be dropped for the good of the cause.

6. That the term "Liberal," as used in this country, includes all classes of Freethinkers, Spiritualistic and Materialistic, good and bad, and that they are no more "birds of a feather" than Catholics and Protestants, or Campbellites and Presbyterians, and hence cannot be "flocked together" in one organization; but that the only Liberal organizations from which good results may be expected are those in which persons of like views associate themselvs together for the promotion of what they regard as the best method of overcoming immorality and superstition.

These organizations will differ from each other on some points, but each will hav a vitality and aggressiv enthusiasm of its own; and each will in its own way aid in the great work of liberating the masses from the thralldom of priestcraft, and the complete rescue of the state from the clutch of the church. A. R. AYRES.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Sept. 23, 1888.

J. VAN DENBURGH, ESQ., Dear Sir: "A boy bought a fiddle having but one string." Judging from the tenor of your article, "Some Thoughts on Evolution," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 15th inst., I presume you were that fortunate boy, for I must admit that you hav played a "new tune never played before." I suppose you feel that Webster is the Alpha and Omega of all knowledge. Turn to the word "fact." He says: "A thing supposed or asserted to be done." You ask, "What is life?" Take a microscope and look in a drop of water suspended on a straw. You ask, "When did it begin?" I will answer you—it did not begin; it always existed; it livs through fire and frost and wind and sea. It cannot be destroyed; therefore it never had a beginning. It needed no "creator" to "breathe it into a few forms or into one." Let Herbert Spencer speak: "Every kind of being is conceived as a product of modification wrought by insensible gradations on a pre-existing kind of being; and this holds as fully of the supposed commencement of organic life as of all subsequent development of organic life."

Now, in regard to the literary merit of your article there is no question, but it seems to me that when you assumed to dally with the "survival of the fittest," you got the wrong sow by the ear, for you seem to confound the word "fittest," which means, the best adapted for the occasion or purpose, with the word "worthy." Now, as we generally use the latter word, we mean that which entitles one to a reward, or thing, or place. As we use the word "fittest," we generally mean expedient, regardless of real worth, merit, justice, or desert. Certain advantages constitute the fitness for the survival of a thing. It is not limited to animals alone, but extends to all things under the sun. Thus, as Darwin explains, the thick, heavy fur enabled an animal to survive in the polar regions, while the ones having light fur could survive only under a tropical sun, and according to a law of nature those animals transmitted those advantages to their offspring, and these advantages grew stronger and more prominent, regardless of justice or desert. Thus, in the wolf, of which you speak, Mr. Darwin clearly shows that the advantage is for such an animal that has "good claws, strong teeth, supple limbs, and vigorous muscles." He shows that the color of the polar bear enables him to lie in wait for his prey unobserved, because of no contrast between his own color and that of the snow. We perceive that by the same law the intelligence of man compares favorably with abilities peculiar to other animals, and this intelligence, and it only, enables him to survive, and this advantage is superior to all others. Hoping you will receive this in the same kindness in which it is offered, believe me your friend,

JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

COALTON, KY., Oct. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will exclaim, as poor old Simeon did when he saw the alleged-to-be son of God, "Mine eyes hav seen thy salvation, Lord!"—or, in other words, I hav heard a Liberal lecture in east Kentucky, and, too, in the church-ridden town of Ashland. Mr. W. S. Bell, the fearless bearer of the torch of reason, gave us three lectures. His subjects were "Liberty and Morality," "Reason and Superstition," and "The Gods." I did not get to hear him on the first subject, but had the pleasure of hearing him on the second subject at Ironton, O., on September 30th, at Apollo Hall. In this lecture the speaker used many good and forcible illustrations. He showed us how superstition had bowed men down under its heavy weight; the heathen, of course, suffered most from its galling curse, but civilized nations had much to do to free themselvs of its chains, even now in the light of the nineteenth century. He said thoughts similar to this started him to investigate the fallacies of the Christian religion. Every church thinks it is right; every Christian thinks his church is the only one out of the many that is absolutely right—others might be partially right, but mostly wrong. He thought that the diversity of opinions growing out of this God-given book showed at least to him that some of the churches were mistaken, possibly all might be. In his lecture on "The Gods," at Ashland, he used one illustration that set me to thinking—one, did I say? ah! many, but one in particular. He said he was once talking to a minister who said something about God speaking to Moses. Mr. Bell said he asked if he understood him to say that God spake to Moses as man speaks to man. Minister: "Of course." "Well, then, he, God, must hav a mouth, and if he has a mouth, must hav teeth; if he has teeth, a tongue; if a tongue, it must follow that he has lungs and digestiv organs like man, and all that would imply growth, decay, and death. Consequently, God must be dead."

The friends of the cause will hav to thank Messrs. Richard Carr, John Cobs, and Powers for the generosity and energy which they possess at all times in the cause of Freethought. Just how much good we hav accomplished it is hard to tell, but we hope it will be like bread cast upon the waters, and be seen many days hence. We think we will be able to get Mr. Bell to visit us again some time this winter.

S. P. HERRON, P.M.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Sept. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I found in your paper the following passage:

The Freethought journals are peculiar in this: No matter how devoted a Christian a man may be, if he offer an article in defense of his own opinion or in direct opposition to those advocated by the paper, it will be given a conspicuous place in its columns. It must be confessed that the Infidel editors are the only men in the country who hav the courage of their opinions, and prove it by allowing complete freedom of thought and utterance (May 14, 1887, "Tales Told Out of School," Rev. Dr. Jones's Report).

I will send you an article. I am a firm believer in the Bible. I hav studied it for sixteen years, but not continuously. Less than one month ago I commenced to read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am bitterly opposed to the unity of church and state. If any can answer the questions I submit better than the Bible, I would be glad to hear from them:

Who created man? Gen. i, 27. Who was man like? Gen. i, 26. What rank did he hold? Heb. ii, 6, 7. For what purpose was man created? Isa. xliii, 7. Has this purpose been carried out? Rom. iii, 23. What is the result of sin? Rom. vi, 23. Is God willing that any should perish? 2 Pet. iii, 9. Do the wicked desire to know God? Ps. x, 4. Does God take pleasure in the death of the wicked? Ezek. xxxiii, 11. How great is God's love toward the world? John iii, 16. How may the wicked find favor with God? Isa. lv, 7. What must man do to be saved? Acts xvi, 31. Does God regard all men alike? Rom. ii, 11. To whom will the Lord look? Isa. lxvi, 2. Does God countenance wrong in anyone? Col. iii, 25. Does God recognize a good deed in anyone? Eph. vi, 8. Does he exercise his power over us in either case? Gen. iv, 7. Are God's ways equal? Ezek. xviii, 25–27. What does our savior say about the road to destruction? Matt. vii, 13. What about the road to life? Matt. vii, 14. How are we to enter the strait gate? Luke xiii, 24. If we are striving, what must we do? Mark viii, 34; Luke ix, 23. What must we hav if we would please God? Heb. xi, 6. What else must we do if we would enter into life? Matt. xix, 17. What is the first and great commandment? Mark xii, 30. If we do this can we love the world? 1 John ii, 15. What comfort has the Christian in this life? Phil. iv, 7. Can the world understand this? 1 John iii, 1. What promis has the Christian of the hereafter? 1 Cor. iii, 9. Who is invited to hav this reward? Rev. xxii, 17. What character must we possess if we would hav the reward? Isa. i, 19. STEUBENVILLE, O., Oct. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I notice a tendency among Freethinkers to favor Cleveland's election over Harrison's, principally on the ground of Harrison's religious views. I do not think the personality of the candidates ought to count for much. But, Who do they represent? ought to be the question. We all know the Democratic party always did toady to the Catholic priesthood, and Cleveland has publicly shown his tendency to do so, and as the Catholic church is the strongest enemy we hav to fight as Secularists, it seems strange to me that Secularists should hav the least tendency to support Cleveland or his party, but rather should support the party that held the Union together, the only party to vote for with any hope of defeating the party of the Catholic hierarchy. I inclose the article I had published in our local paper, and if you think it suitable for the columns of your paper, should be pleased to hav you publish it at once, before the election. The political text-book I quote is Paine's "Rights of Man."

Yours truly, J. DOWNES.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to giv my views of the present situation of the two parties, if you will allow me space in the Herald. When looking over an old political text-book I came across the following: "What are the present governments of Europe? Do not its own inhabitants say it is a market where every man has his price, and where corruption is common traffic at the expense of a deluded people?"

When we think of the foul corruption that fills our Senate with millionaires or their tools, and our House of Representativs with silver kings, and think of the bribery and deception that is brought into play at our elections down to the lowest office, one is almost ready to believe that republicanism is a failure; when we see a party that got into power by the great fraud of suppressing the vote of the majority, boldly asking to be kept in power as the friends of the people by bawling, "Tariff for Revenue only" (while they are wasting and stealing millions), to take the people's attention from the outrageous crimes of the party against freedom and their country, a party that favored war and rebellion to keep in slavery the working classes, posturing as the friends of the workingman, the party that always pandered to the whisky interest, accusing their opponents of being the friends of free whisky, it is disgusting. And they know their only object in refusing to touch the federal tax on whisky and tobacco (especially whisky), was because it favored the whisky trust and compelled the government to go to millions of expense for spies and collectors to keep up the whisky monopoly, whereas to take off the federal tax would leave the states free to tax the liquid devil as much as they pleased, even to crush the sale of it as a beverage altogether. Will the people be deceived by the specious pleas of this party that has always pandered to the lowest instincts of the people? I hope not. The Republican leaders hav not acted wisely. Why did they not throw Cleveland's letter in his teeth, and tell him we are in favor now, as we were in 1884, of revising the tariff, but we want and will hav a full vote of the people and a fair count, settled at once and forever; then we will revise the tariff to the wants of the country as expressed by a majority of the whole people? I am satisfied to-day that nine-tenths of the Republicans are in favor of revising the tariff, but how small a matter that is to sapping the very foundation of republican government by suppressing the voice of the majority! What use is there in having any election if the voice of the majority is to be hushed by corruption and bribery, and if that fails by the club and the shotgun? If this thing is to go on, farewell, liberty—a few more decades will witness the downfall of the most glorious republic the world ever saw. J. D.

DAVISON STATION, MICH., Sept. 21, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The neighborhood that I reside in is run by Christian influence. There are people here that do not believe in the old dogmas, but through fear of not being looked up to, or in other words, not being respected or visited by church people, they pretend to swallow the popular Christian dose, and their lips are sealed and their brains are put in the Christian box. All Liberal literature is expelled from the house or read on the sly, and with blanched faces they follow their leader, Custom.

I hope that there is not one reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER that does this. In order to advance enlightenment we must speak our honest thoughts at all times and in all places when it is proper. I hav a big time often, and it does me good to see divine men—men that are inspired—men walking God's way proclaiming his word—come to me with prepared questions, and then to see their under jaw drop. There is one living in my neighborhood that thought he would convince me of the truth of his doctrin, and he came unto me and opened his mouth and spake, saying: "There are people here on earth you do not wish to hav fellowship with. You would not be seen in their company; would hav nothing to do with them in any way, shape, or manner in this world. Now, you say that you do not know whether there is a heaven or not, but that if there is God cannot afford to damn one soul to misery, and according to your belief they must all be saved. Consequently you will hav to be in their company. What hav you to say now?" I answered and said unto him: "I supposed that, you being an inspired preacher, your questions also are inspired. The first question I will ask you is, What is the soul?" Rev.: "It is the spirit of God in man." "Very well. That being the case, there is nothing of a person after death that livs but the soul." Rev.: "No, sir." "The soul, being the spirit of God, is a part of God. God is good—is perfect, kind, loving, impartial; consequently the soul the instant it leaves the body becomes God, or a part, and then how is God going to punish a part of himself?" Rev.: "Hold; you are going too far. Do you not know that man is a free moral agent; that he knows right from wrong; that he is accountable for his acts; that he doing an unlawful deed here on earth should be punished?" "Yes, sir; to a certain extent. He ought to be confined, not punished, for he is not to blame in all cases. For do you know that men can become weak, their health impaired, so that the children that they produce are weak physically and mentally? They grow up to be men and women—that is, in form, but as to their heads, while the organs are all there, some of them hav not growth. They did not hav nourishment enough from that weak body for all to develop. The result is, they hav no control over their actions. Their desires and wishes generally are for money and the first step is theft, the next murder. Now, sir, who is to blame for this?" Rev.: "It is their parents." "Now, sir, where is your free moral agency in all men? Who would God be justified in punishing, these deformed unfortunates or their parents? He never wrote one word in his guide about the laws of health or rearing of children, saying only, Be fruitful and multiply on the earth or in other words, Beget all the children you can; which the cause of two thirds of our criminals. Do not ever again step into the pulpit and preach a burning, endless hell and a heaven filled with joy, for there are some of your congregation that will look upon you as a natural deformity. There will be hate and revenge as long as the doctrin you preach is preached, for knowledge and the freedom of thought form the only lever that is capable of raising the human family out of the rut it is in.

S. VANSOHAICK.

NORTH BENTON, O., Sept. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see by a notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the Secular Union designs next year to commence proceedings against the managers of Girard College for violating the intent and meaning of the will of Stephen Girard, the greatest philanthropist of America. The will forbids all preachers from entering on the grounds, and forbids theology's being taught to the children. By some mysterious exercise of will—or the Christians will say, God's will—the control of the College has passed into the hands of theology and is fitted to its interests, in express violation of the intent of the terms of the will. The court decided long ago the validity of the will. When the time comes round to need funds to enforce the terms of the will, call on me and I will be among the faithful to cause theology to cease its robbery. The history of the religion of the world that I am familiar with, and my observation for over fifty years of churches and individuals that belong to churches, hav convinced me that theology has had a demoralizing effect rather than a moral effect. The churches of North Benton, or some of the members that belong to them, from the highest to the lowest, hav been guilty of all the crimes known to the laws of the land. I will state a few facts that came under my observation. There was a quite Liberal-minded old gentleman living here, by the name of J. Ranals. He was afflicted with a cancer, and knew his time was short. One of the deacons took him to his own house and wrote his will, inserting a clause in the will that gave $800 to the Presbyterian church, and took him home. After Ranals got home he sent for Simeon Card, county justice of the peace, and told him the deacon made that will—he now wanted to make one to suit himself. He did so, and left out the clause of $800 for the Presbyterian church. He died a few days ago. The deacon failed to probate his will. Another case—a prominent member of the church got out of humor at a doctor by the name of Conrad and shot him dead. While in jail waiting court he hanged himself rather than face the music. Another prominent member in good standing in church circles, subscribing $50 a year to the church, burnt his buildings to get the insurance and served a term in the Ohio penitentiary. Another class of church-members confederated together to set up a job of conspiracy, employed hoodlums to execute the job, and perjured themselvs and committed subornation of perjury. I might add to the above, but it is not necessary. The above occurred under my own observation. With the history of the church, and what I hav observed, in my judgment it is no wonder the churchmen conceive it necessary to dump their sins on Jesus once or twice a week. They claim it is right to do anything if calculated to further God's cause.

Within find $2 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can't do without it. The cartoons are the first looked at. Keep them up, by all means.

CHESTER BEDELL.

WILKESBARRE, PA., Oct. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not picked up one of my TRUTH SEEKERS for the last two months that was not filled with one or more articles against the doctrins of protection to American manufactures, and in favor of the crackbrain nonsense of advising us as Americans to encourage British trade, in order to break up the trusts and punish our "protected monopolies," as these wise statesmen call them, as if to do so would improve the prospects of the laboring man. These persons are anxious to bring about the same state of affairs in the near future that we hav always had under low tariff. When we started this government we put the tariff-question boot on the other foot and made the British trader pay for the use of our markets, and as soon as the British manufacturer could do so he bought up agents in this country to work for his interest, and has been doing so ever since, as he can find fools enough for a few dollars to plead his cause under the plea of cheap goods. What in the name of common sense do we want cheap goods for if somebody else is to derive all the benefit from their sale, while the American has nothing left to do? The man who argues that way does not know what a curse he is placing upon this country, and, I care not who he may be, he lacks experience of the workings of trade and wages who does it. If he would but look back to the causes which led to the separation of the Colonies he would find that from 1764 to 1784 we were sending from twenty to thirty millions of money out of the country, and our exports in grain, etc., were but six to nine millions, and that while the British had us by the throats we were obliged to pay from one hundred and fifty to two hundred per cent on the cost of all manufactured imports.

When the shoe was placed upon the other foot our manufactures began to revive, and hav always been in a flourishing condition whenever we hav had a good tariff, and invariably the reverse under a low one, or from its immediate effects.

The second war of 1812 and 1814 was mainly because the old mother was getting jealous of our growth and prosperity, and attempted the second time to whip us, for the express purpose of gaining our markets for her exports. She failed again, and has been doing with gold and sophistical societies like the Cobden Club what she has about concluded can be accomplished in no other way, and while she applauds the wise statesmanship of our Democrats in public she hides her head under the ample folds of her cotton gown and laughs at us for the poor fools we are. In 1816 the Democrats, taking their name from the Jacobin clubs of France, changed from Republican to Democrat, and repealed our good tariff to suit this free trade idea, and down went our manufactures and out of America went our money. Then, after the mischief was done, a revulsion was brought about and another good tariff enacted in 1824. Then the South, with J. C. Calhoun at the head of the nullifiers, fought until the tariff of 1833 was made as a compromise or a war of secession, and from that time until 1842 we had the most damnable times America ever saw. Cows selling at sheriff's sale at from $2 to $5 a head; butter worth six cents a pound; eggs, lots of them, at five cents per dozen, such prices as would shame any old chicken to lay eggs for now. And these were what our present free trade and low price Democrats call such glorious times for the farmers, and want to get again, but, my free trade tigers, you who are howling so lustily for the farmers, can you see it? I don't.

One thing more is a striking fact. In 1840 the people began to petition Congress for an increase of the tariff, and during the session of 1842 the petitions in the House, if attached so as to make one roll, it was said, were twenty miles in length. Now, I want to ask any candid man, no matter to what party he may belong, has he heard anything from one quarter where Congress has been petitioned for a reduction of the present tariff? Not a word; not a single petition. We don't ask Congress to lower the duties, and we, as Americans, never hav asked it. The cry of tariff reform never was anything but a political dodge and a claptrap. The country never was as prosperous as now. Trades of all classes are prospering, and, while we hav some evils, such as sugar and other trusts, which should be legislated out of existence, and while we are decidedly too free at making citizens out of a lot of ignorant foreigners, who swarm into us as the Huns did upon the Roman nation, it is not the way to right these wrongs by prostrating our trades and having these same foreigners to suck out the life-blood of the American nation. The remedy proposed by the free trader is much worse than the disease. We want and must hav protection to American manufactures, as a principle as well as a policy, and the man who can't see that every kind of trade should be equally provided for is a poor protectionist and a worse politician.

As was their usual custom, as soon as the Democratic party got the power, by talking then, just as they now do, about their tariff doctrin—yes, claiming to be better tariff men than the Whigs—they repealed the 1842 tariff for lower duties until, in 1857, we had a regular panic. And now, in the face of all our past experiences, these Democrats are moving heaven and earth to repeal our tariff and ruin all our prosperity, so as to hav the cry of the sheriff heard in every city, town, and hamlet of our prosperous land. Away with such nonsensical sophistries. American labor must and shall be maintained.

J. R. PERRY.

COALTON, KY., Aug. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My observations hav proved to me that man generally loves that which seems to him either good, beautiful, or loving, and that he does not love anything that is not perceived, by the appropriate senses of his nature, to be such. And I do not think that man can hav a genuin love unless it comes by personal acquaintance and association. The child that never saw its father will not love him at first sight more readily than he will any other man. The child's love for its mother and the mother's love for her child is the strongest love earthly mortals know anything about, love for Jehovah notwithstanding. The mother who has had her child taken from her for years so that she cannot recognize it, would not more readily fall in love with it than with any other child. Therefore I claim that all man's love comes to him through acquaintance, association, and personal knowledge of the object loved. I do not think man can love a person whom he has not seen. Therefore I think the love Christians claim they hav for Jehovah is an unnatural love, since he is the unknowable and unknown. Notwithstanding, thousands hav proclaimed their love for him whom they hav never seen and with whom they hav no acquaintance. Since his ways are not our ways, and since his ways are past finding out, what do they know of him? Some Christians claim a personal knowledge of their God through the works of nature, yet nature exhibits many imperfections and deformities, in both the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Can it be that a perfect God is the author of so much imperfection?

We see according to Ex. xx, 19, 20, that fear caused the Israelites to worship, rather than voluntary love. They worshiped the golden calf in the absence of Moses, but on his return with threats and wrath he caused them to return to their old worship. Christians should observe that Aaron had much less trouble to get the Israelites to worship the golden calf than Moses had to make them worship his God; nevertheless, they were God's chosen people. If fear was the cause of the Israelites' worship of Jehovah, and if fear is the cause of the Christians' worship of to-day, I would like to ask how much fear is necessary to cause one man to love another and how much is necessary to cause man to love his God? How can fear and love mingle together? There is nothing in common between them, but the very opposit, since that which we love we do not fear, and that which we fear we do not love. Longfellow has aptly written:

> Love, like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought—
> Love givs itself, but is not bought.

And it is useless to try to love or to force yourself to love one whom you do not love. The worship of idols has always been through superstitious fear, and not through any sense of love or veneration. We can scarcely suppose that the heathens in their ignorant worship could see anything in a pile of wood or brass to excite their admiration or love. Fear must hav driven them to worship their wooden god. And fear has driven the Christian to worship an unknown and unknowable and an imaginary God, and the Christian's worship is not one whit better than the heathen's, since it comes through images and imagination, and not through sight or personal acquaintance, or association with the object loved—alleged to be loved—and worshiped. If the fear of Jehovah and the fear of hell hav driven anyone to get upon his knees to worship his imaginary God, let him get all the consolation he can out of it, since the desire to act differently still constitutes him a sinner. I draw the analogy from Matthew's report of Christ's Sermon on the Mount: "If a man look upon a woman," etc. The desire is made equal to the act. If any man, then, has joined the church simply to escape the torture of hell; in fact, if he has lived truthful, sober, honest, and chaste, at the same time desiring to liv differently, he will get no reward. Faith, too, which the Christian puts so much confidence in as an article of saving power, when forced upon the mind, as it often is, contrary to reason, upon the same ground should hav no reward. Nothing but the genuin, unsolicited faith and love will be worthy of reward. And this is consistent, since man in his selfishness would not force anyone to love him against his will.

It seems very strange how indifferent this God of ours can be to the wants and needs of his followers, since they hav paid tribute, worshiped, and tried to love him. He will not answer a prayer or giv a direct answer to a question asked. Surely man has for the last eighteen hundred years been asking amiss.

So much stress has been put on the Ten Commandments and the love we should hav for this God of the Bible that it makes one want to show the Christian how inconsistent he is. The ministry are always trying to show man that he should not be malicious or revengeful. But what about this God, who says he will visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, even to the third and fourth generation of them that hate him? Is not that something like a revengeful nature, even stronger than the worst of men entertain? How does that sentence compare with this one: "But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you?" Does it not seem by fair comparison that he wants man to be something better than himself? Again he said: "If ye love them which love you, what reward hav ye? Do not even the publicans the same?" He might hav added, Do not the Gods the same? And, "Be ye perfect, even as your father in heaven is perfect."

"Visit the iniquities of your enemies upon their children, even to the third and fourth generation of them that hate you." "War to the knife and the knife to the hilt!" How does this most hellish doctrin appear, dressed in its sable garments, before the court of an unbiased mind? If one should tell me he had seen a child suffering for ten long years from the day of its birth to the day of its death, ought I to suppose that it was because of some crime the father had committed, especially if my own knowledge proved to me that the father was then enjoying and always did enjoy good health? I suppose my duty would lead me to suppose it was the child's grandfather's crimes being paid in pain by the child; while it might be that its grandfather was in hell at the same time paying the same debt. It seems that this Bible God sees the mote in man's eye, while the beam is found in his own. He tells man in the Ten Commandments: "Thou shalt not kill." But in Ex. iv, 24, we see he must hav had on his war-paint: "And it came to pass by the way in the inn that the Lord met him and sought to kill him." If I had stood in Moses's shoes about that time I would hav quoted: "Thou shalt not kill." But we find him in Exodus not only making the attempt, but killing the first-born of the Egyptians and wantonly slaying even the dumb beast. See Ex. xii, 29, 30: He sees the mote in man's eye, but the beam is in his own. If he set an example, should man follow it? I think not, since the best impulses come from man, and furnish altogether better examples.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Castaway Chicks.

Three little chicks, at close of day,
Left mother hen and roamed away;
Two cosily nestled inside of a shoe,
With one on the outside to scan the view.

As the tide came in and carried the shoe
Over the waves like a small canoe,
The chickens, oh! the poor little things,
Wished themselvs back under mother's wings.

But the waves were high, and all were drowned;
The three little chickens were never found;
So may their fate be a lesson, I pray,
To all other chickens who run away.

Charlie's Story.

The family pledge hung on the wall,
And on it you could see
The names of mamma, Mary Jane,
And Charlie—that is me.

We didn't dare to ask papa
To write upon it too,
So left a space for him to fill;
'Twas all we dared to do.

He saw the pledge as soon as he Came in the door that night;
And when we saw him reading it,
It put us in a fright.

He didn't say a word to us
About the pledge at all,
But oft I saw him look at it
While hanging on the wall.

And every night when he came home,
He stopped and read it through,
We all kept still about those words,
Although we knew them true.

Four weeks had passed, and then one night
When pa came home to tea,
He took the pledge down from its nail,
And then he turned to me:

"Go get the pen and ink, my boy,
And let me fill that space.
It looks so bare," he slowly said,
A queer look on his face.

And then mamma sat down and cried
(She said it was for joy),
And Mary Jane she cried some, too,
I didn't—I'm a boy.

But papa says he did not drink
Since that first night when we
Had hung that pledge upon the wall
Where he our names could see.

And ever since that space was filled,
Mamma just said to-night,
Though dark may be our little room,
One corner now is light.

Children's Questions.

Children ask a great many questions, sometimes wise and other times silly or puzzling. They are always to be answered, however, in one way or another. Never turn away a child with a "Don't bother me!" a "Go away!" or "Don't ask so many questions!" The child must ask questions, must inquire, and all its little queries should be kindly, lovingly, and truly answered. It has come upon an untried world, where everything is new and strange. It needs information. It is the great requisit to life, to happiness, to peace and joy. Explain, tell it all it desires to know; tell it with patience, with kindness, with absolute earnestness.

By and by it will come to parent or guardian and wish to know how it came to be a living, breathing, thinking child. Then is the important hour. Be brave and true, and impart frankly all the knowledge it seeks. It has a right to all the physiological and hygienic information relativ to its own being. The parent who withholds that information and kind guidance, leaving the child to acquire these special facts later on from some doubtful or harmful source, is not doing his or her best by the offspring of which they are the source.

How much sorrow and pain in after life might be averted by a little useful knowledge in childhood. Sickness and suffering, humiliation and despair, are abroad in the land everywhere for want of scientific instruction relating to the temple of the human body. Let the children's inquiries be attended to; let their minds be trained to a proper understanding of human existence; let the ideal of noble life be made real by correct and proper training under the broad beams of the sun of truth and honesty, and they will grow to be men and women of which all may be proud.

Correspondence.

MONROVIA, CAL., Oct. 1, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Our little truth seeker, a boy of four years, is not old enough to write you and ask you hard questions. He gets his information by personal interviews with those willing to answer, and he seldom finds a victim that he cannot puzzle.

We hav jotted down in the memory a few questions he has asked from time to time. Here are some of them. They may serve to please older children:

"Papa, if dogs are not folks, what makes 'em kiss little boys?"

"Mamma, how can snakes walk without legs?"

"Papa, why don't ladies get shaved?"

"Mamma, can baby spiders catch flies?"

"Papa, if I fall in the water will it make me dead?"

"Mamma, what makes the sun go down in the mountains when it gets night?"

"Papa, do butterflies make butter?"

"Mamma, how can flies look around without any neck?"

Yours very respectfully,
W. A. CHESS.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Oct. 7, E.M. 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is some time since I wrote the Children's Corner, so I will write again, and tell you how we are getting along in this part of the "Lord's vineyard." Pa bought little sister and myself a most beautiful piano for a Christmas present, and we hav lots of music and are jolly. I take music lessons and like to play on the piano very much, and so we hav now a nice little orchestra of two violins, cornet, and piano, all of our own family.

Father received a letter from Brother Casey and wife, of Seneca, S. C., of whom, no doubt, you hav heard through THE TRUTH SEEKER. They hav had to part with their only cow to enable them to purchase food. I wish to say to the children of the Corner that I hav started a dime fund to enable Brother Casey and wife to purchase another cow. They are very old people and helpless, and living in a Christian community. They receive no sympathy from the cold-hearted Christians. I hope the children of the Corner, as well as their parents, will contribute the small amount of a dime. I will send the amount contributed, along with the names of the donors, to Mr. Casey, also to the Children's Corner, Lucifer, Ironclad Age. Let us all try to help the old couple to purchase a cow, which will be a great help to them. Contributors will please send contributions to Miss Sadie E Thorpe, Ballston Spa, Saratoga county, N. Y.

Yours for humanity and truth,
SADIE E. THORPE.

[We trust Sadie will gather dimes enough to buy not only a cow for our aged friends, but enough food to keep her fat and handsome.—ED. C. C.]

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

The story of the Cape Cod youth who spent a week in finding ten cents on the street in Boston has brought the "Listener" another story of a Cape Cod boy, who must hav been a relativ of that one. He happened to be visiting in Boston awhile ago, on the Fourth of July, and went out on the Common to see the sights. He returned in an hour or two, looking rather rueful. "What's the matter, Silas?" he was asked. "Gosh all hemlock!" he exclaimed, "this is the most extravagant place I ever see." "What has happened?' "Wal, you know that quarter of a dollar you giv me this morning?" "Yes. Well?" "Spent it, by hokey, all but twenty-three cents, slapdash, for molasses cakes!"

Mamie had noticed that the ducks and chickens did not stay much together. Not knowing that the ducks preferred the pond to the barnyard, she one day said: "Auntie, I think the chickens treat the duckies real bad. I b'lieve they just won't 'sociate with them because they've got big feet and such ugly noses. I wouldn't treat my friends that way just because they don't look pretty."

The five-year-old B—— child likes to tell stories with a moral. "Now," said she to a small boy, "I once knew a little fellow who told a lie to his mother when he ate what made him sick and said he didn't; so he died, and I bought a cascade for him and put flowers on it. Now, if you tell naughty stories, you'll die and go to heaven, just as that bad boy did!"

At a summer resort the other day a bright little four-year-old child amused the company by his continual cute questions and answers. One of his questions is worthy of repeating. Looking out of the window into a rain-storm, little Willie inquired: "Mamma, where does all the rain come from?" "From the heavens." "And do people drink all that water?" continued the little fellow. "Yes," was the reply. "Well," rejoined the small wit, "I should think it would be very unhealthy to drink, there are so many dead people up there."

Science Column.

A Lovely Wild Rose.

A wild rose! What a rich pink color, and what beautiful leaves it has, too! And how common it is! But, do you know, my dear, that this sweet flower, growing in swamps, meadows, and along the hedges, with five lovely silken petals, or leaves, fastened on the calyx—which means the urn-shaped outside covering of the flower—is the real mother of all the great, deep-colored, double, fragrant, and many-hued roses in all the wide, wide world?

It is—yes, just the mamma of all the roses everywhere.

It gets its name from the Latin word rosa, and its family name is rosaceæ.

Now let us talk about it a little. Peach, plum, cherry, almond, strawberry, and blackberry blossoms, as well as some others, belong to the same family. How can you tell the flowers of this family? Why, by observing the way they are made. All that you find fashioned after the pattern of the little wild rose are of that family.

It has many stamens—these are those parts of the flower where the pollen is prepared.

And what is pollen, you ask? But I like to hav you ask questions as we go along. Well, pollen is the dust that is used in forming new plants, and it is received by the pistils, and there is no albumen in its seeds.

I knew you would want to know what albumen is. It is a substance that resembles the white of an egg. There are nearly two hundred species of the rose family, but the best botanists admit only about thirty in good standing. The leaves, stems, and calyx of some kinds are aromatic, like the sweetbrier rose, which, if you brush it with your clothing even, as you pass, emits a delightful fragrance. This kind is called eglantine, sometimes, or the poet's flower.

There are many varieties, many colors, among roses, and all are attractiv. By your bright eyes, I am sure you can tell what the rose is often called.

The queen of flowers!

That's it. But it has many enemies that try to destroy its beauty and eat its pretty leaves. There is a slug that injures it, and also a little bug that eats only its pretty buds; then there are little green lice, whose other name is aphides, that creep all over its leaves and stems and devour their juices. Tobacco smoke, or tobacco water, will put an end to them. Strong soap-suds, or white hellebore, either, will kill the other insects, except the bugs, which must be picked off carefully. The leaves of the rose are used for medicin, and rose water is manufactured from them. Oil, or otto, of roses is very expensiv, but one drop of it keeps fragrant a long time.

Wild roses bloom from May to July and August, and sometimes later. I remember once finding one in bloom one windy, stormy day late in October by a country roadside. I plucked it and brought it home. Its petals were wet with the rain, but it seemed as if smiling through tears. Here are the lines its beauty and sweetness inspired:

TO A WILD ROSE IN OCTOBER.

O dear little wild rose,
So fragil and light;
In the cold and the storm
Still blooming so bright!

Though above and around
Are death and decay,
Sweet perfume thou breathest
Through life's little day.

So cheerily onward
May we also go,
Through storm and through sunshine,
And rough winds that blow;

E'er scenting with fragrance
Life's pages sober,
As sweet as the rose that Bloomed in October.

QUESTIONS.—What is the name of the mother of roses? What is petal? a calyx? a stamen? pollen? pistil? What is albumen? What is rose derived from? What is its family name? What other flowers belong to this family? How many species of the rose? Tell what you know of the sweet brier. What is the rose often called? Tell about its enemies. How may they be destroyed? What are the uses of the rose? When do wild roses bloom? Can you repeat the poem?

A SMALL boy of this town having been partcularly unpleasant all day, his mother said as he was going to bed: "When you say your prayers, Georgie, ask God to make you a better boy. You hav been very naughty to-day." Georgie obeyed, and just before the usual Amen said: "And, please God, make me a good boy," and then, after a pause, added with great solemnity: "Nevertheless, not my will, O Lord, but thine be done!"

Paine Vindicated!

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems,

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

The Man With the Badge-pin Gets Married.

From San Francisco Freethought.

AT FIFTEEN.

The school is done, and the winter sped;
The schoolmarm and I, we drift apart,
And Romance I. lies cold and dead
On the fresh green grave of a broken heart.
Go plant the willow and cypress tree,
Hang up the handsled out of reach;
I will get the parson to measure me,
And take my size for a funeral speech.

AT EIGHTEEN.

Mustache and whiskers are sprouting now,
I'm taller than then by half a head;
But oh! for surcease of an aching brow,
And the glare of a city painted red.
For I'm out sometimes with the other boys,
And come in, like Solomon, "filled with dew,"
I awake the morn with a merry noise
And the gentle murmur of my bazoo.

AT TWENTY-ONE.

I'm hardly the whale that I thought to be
In the first faint flush of my third decade;
The elderly matrons say "boy" to me,
My eternal fortune has not been made.
But I think on marriage and family
(Measles and cradles and trundlebeds),
Hold other folks' youngsters upon my knee,
And damp little babies with tow-white heads.

AT TWENTY-SEVEN.

I sneer at the follies of long-gone years,
At the callow youth and the sweet sixteen,
At the heartstrings torn, and the bitter tears,
At the hand unpressed and the blush unseen.
With the outstretched ear of a rareripe mind
I list to the lovers that laugh or sigh,
I've a cynical smile of a freezing kind
For the tender grace of the days gone by.

—G. E. Macdonald Several Years Ago.

EPILOG.

Alas for the youth and his high conceit,
And his strident yawp which he deemed so good,
The ground is uncertain beneath his feet,
And he howls ere yet he has left the wood.
Behold, he is born of the female sort,
And she filleth the day of his youth with pain;
His adolescence she cutteth short,
And gathers him under her wing again.

—The Same, To-day.

Non Mutamur.

We are very slightly changed
From the semi-apes who ranged Prehistoric India;
Whoso drew the longest bow
Ran his brother down, you know,
As we run men down to-day.

Then the first of all his race
Met the mammoth face to face,
On the lake or in the cave;
Stole the steadiest canoe,
Ate the quarry others slew,
Died, and took the finest grave.

When they scratched the reindeer bone,
Some one made the sketch his own,
Filched it from the artist; then,
Even in those early days,
Won a simple viceroy's praise
Through the toil of other men.

Who shall doubt the secret hid
'Neath the Cheops pyramid
Was that the contractor did
Cheops out of several millions?
Or that Joseph's sudden rise
To comptroler of supplies
Was a fraud of monstrous size
On Pharaoh's swart civilians?

—St. James Gazette.

Sentiment.

From the London Secular Review.

America never had any ballads, so we must not expect her to hav the instinct to utilize the following:

A few days ago, in Green Lawn Cemetery, Ontario, the remains of a murderer, Charles Morgan, who was executed in the penitentiary in that place, were about to be interred. Scarcely had the undertaker removed the lid exposing the features of the dead criminal when Nell Lewery, Morgan's late mistress, threw herself on the coffin, sobbed hysterically, and cried: "My poor Charlie! They hav murdered you! Oh, how could they do it?" She kissed the lips of the dead man passionately, and stroked and smoothed his hair and brow, and finally, with her lady companion, knelt in prayer.

Only a mistress—and only a murderer! Ah, my friends, the real essentials of good and evil in man and woman lie far down in the soul's recesses; and an intelligence that could judge all hearts would care little for such terms as "wife" or "mistress," and little for such as "philanthropist" or "murderer." The motivs of man are too subtle to be weighed in the rough scales of the law or measured by the standard of public opinion. This "murderer" must hav had noble and loveable traits, or no woman would hav so kissed his dead lips in passionate sorrow. This "mistress" must hav possessed the loftiest and tenderest attributes of wife, or she would not thus hav felt impelled to kneel by the coffin of shame and kiss the brow of infamy. Edith, the mistress, wept over the body of Harold at Hastings; but Harold was a king. Magdalene, the mistress, wept over Jesus at Calvary; but Jesus was a martyr. Nell Lewery wept over Charles Morgan at Green Lawn, and Morgan was only an undistinguished murderer. We hav Edith of England and Magdalene of Palestine; but this woman of America is the noblest heroin of the three. And she is dismissed into oblivion with a newspaper paragraph of under a dozen lines!

The Printers of the Wicked Bible in Court of High Commission.

From the Bookworm.

On May 8, 1632, Richard Barker and Martin Lucas, the printers, were summoned before the Court of High Commission for having in the edition of the Bible printed by them in the previous year made grievous errors and used very bad paper. The bishop of London (William Laud) "shewed that this would undoe the trade, and was a most dishonorable thing; that they of the Church of Rome are soe carefull, that not a word or letter is to be found amisse in their Ladie's Psalter and other superstitious bookes; and that we should not (sic) be so carefull in printeing the sacred Scriptures, and that they in Holland, at Amsterdam, had gott up an English presse, and had printed the Bible in better paper, and with a better letter, and can undersell us 18d in a bible." The unhappy printers tried to excuse themselvs through their advocates, and offered submission and amendment, but the court refused to listen. The case therefore came on again on June 14th, when the printers moved the court to pass by the errors as being faults of the workmen; but the royal advocate required a legal defense and the regular hearing of the cause, when Laud "would hav the Church sett upright in her reputacian, that we are as carefull in printeing the Bible as they are of their Jesus' psalter, and whereas the Printers say this is stirred up by the malice of one man against them; the Bishop saith he stirred not till the Bible was sould into his house, bought by his footman; and he saith the printeing is soe bad and the paper too, that, if it be not mended shortlie, they wilbe put downe by those of Amsterdam and their trade spoyled, and the two grossest errors, vizt., 'shalt commit adultery,' and 'great asse': for 'shalt not commit adultery,' and 'greatnesse.'

"THE ARCH BISHOP of Canterbury (Abbot) saith, that the Printers that print for his Matie hav a very profitable place, and therefore should be more carefull. I knew the tyme when greater care was had about printeing, the Bibles especiallie, good compisetors and the best correctors were gotten being grave and learned men, and the paper and letter rare and faire every way of the best; but now the paper is naught, the composers boyes, and the correctors unlearned. There is a former and he makes the benefit, and careth for nothing about it. They heertofore spent their whole time in printeing, but these looke to gaine, gaine, gaine, nothing els; if it be good to bribe, to giv hundreds, thousands, what to do? not to benefitt the people, but to make a game, then they are to be commended: Well, let them look to it: and let the cause proceed, saith the Arch-Bishop, LONDON. There was a great deale to doo betweene you of this Citty and those of Cambridge heertofore about the priviledge of printeing the Bible and Psalmes which they of Cambridge claymed; then the Bible was exactlie printed, now you hav forced the Cambridg printer to an agreement, now noe Bible is right printed." (Rawlinson MS., printed Camden Society, N.S. 39.) This case was ultimately remitted to the Star Chamber, where the printers were fined £500 and the edition of one thousand erroneous copies were ordered to be burnt.

Too Much Law.

From the Sun.

Mayor Hewitt said what was very true when he thus replied to Governor Cornell's notion that more legislation on the electric light wires is required:

So far from there being any deficiency of law on the subject in this city, I think we are suffering at present from too much of it.

We are suffering from too much law all around. Cranky philosophers and whimsical philanthropists are all the time spying out what seems to them objectionable practices on the part of their neighbors in the management of their business, the pursuit of their pleasures, the disciplining of their households, and the general conduct of their life and affairs. Accordingly, they rush to Albany and induce the rural legislators to pass laws which make the meddlers substantially moral censors of the community, and regulators of its manner of life.

It is the old Puritan spirit revived, or rather continued, for it has never died out. It is the same meddlesome disposition which two hundred years ago led to the passage of laws in Connecticut to punish people for not going to church, and for traveling on Sunday, and which, in Massachusetts, regulated the length of the sleeves of women's gowns, and discountenanced dancing. It is the same spirit which to-day induces the village gossip to watch and criticise purchases from the butcher's wagon, and to count the frequency of visits and the number of letters received.

Yet New York is a great cosmopolitan town of 1,500,000 people, four-fifths of whom are of foreign birth or parentage, and therefore in their heredity, associations, tastes, habits, and views of life widely separated from the intermeddlers and busybodies who undertake to forcibly prescribe and regulate what they shall do and what they shall refrain from doing. They cannot understand why pleasures and recreations which to them hav seemed a matter of course, and in which their fathers and grandfathers indulged without thought of harm, should be interfered with and forbidden by law. It is all a mystery to them.

But they find that the legislature every year passes new laws to restrain them, and under which they are lugged off to the police station as criminals, though they hav been accustomed to regard themselvs as very respectable and law-abiding citizens who attend to their own affairs and meddle with those of nobody else. They know the blue-coated policemen, but the public necessity and the public functions of the moral censors they cannot make out, while the boards of health and the building bureau, with their inspectors and detectivs measuring and nosing around, they marvel at as incomprehensible features of a strange civilization.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

News of the Week.

THE Austrian empress, an admirer of the Freethinking poet Heine, had subscribed toward a monument for him, but is now compelled by her husband to withdraw her subscription because of Heine's "insults" to empire and religion.

FRANCE has Boulangist riots.

THE national government now costs $250,000,000 a year.

CATHOLICS claim to hav 163 000,000 of that faith in Europe.

A CORNER in wheat in Chicago is causing a rise in the price of bread.

THE government continues to insist on the extirpation of polygamy in Utah.

YELLOW fever cases to date, over 3,500; deaths, about 325. The disease is abating.

FEMALE registration in Boston, 25,149; total vote last year, 51,741; women voted last year, 900.

THE largest railway accident of the week was at Mud Run, Pa., where over sixty lives were lost.

GERMAN conservativs arrested Professor Geffcken for "revealing state secrets" by publishing the diary of the dead liberal emperor.

WHENEVER a young rowdy of city gangs is hanged, the populace read greedily and half-admiringly the details of the low brute's prison life, last days, etc.

THE Chicago street-car strike was attended with riots and bloodshed. It has closed with the obtaining by the strikers of most of their demands.

THERE is a sad class of young roughs growing up in the large cities. Often when some one gives the newsboys an excursion they fight and riot like madmen.

THE commonly admitted charge that the presidential candidates recently contributed money to secure their election causes inquiry whether they did not violate Acts of 1883.

THE Sacred Congregation of Rites at Rome publishes to the world the important decree that images for the veneration of the faithful may be made of a new sort of papier-maché.

A SENSATION is caused by Dr. Mackenzie's book presenting his side of the quarrel in which he and the German doctors are charging each other with having caused Frederick's death.

THE greed and bloodthirstiness of the heads of European nations is such that even the peaceful and unaggressiv little republic of Switzerland feels obliged to arm against their rapacity.

MCQUADE, a New York boodle alderman, was released from the penitentiary on technical grounds. Although there is the fullest evidence against the other aldermen, money and influence seem to prevent their trial.

DR. HIGBEE, the head of the department of public instruction for Pennsylvania, decided that the Pittsburgh public school directors violated the law in renting a public school building to Catholic priests for a sectarian school.

THE Anglican bishops at their conference decided that great care was necessary in dealing with "minds disquieted by scientific discovery," urging the clergy to be very cautious on dogmatic points, and rather to treat of the central thought of Christ as the source of religious life.

ON the 12th Leo received William II. with pomp, and they commenced bargaining for reciprocal aid in keeping the people in oppression and ignorance. The emperor announced his desire to maintain a strongly conservativ policy in politics, social questions, and religion, and the pope responded that Germany would gain much if the Catholic church were given greater advantages in it.

BALAAM IN TROUBLE.

And the ass saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and the ass turned aside out of the way, and went into the field; and Balaam smote the ass, to turn her into the way.—Num. xxii, 23.

Odds and Ends.

"WHY are you always so blue, Scribbler?" "Because," said the author, "I'm so seldom red."

OLD lady (to street gamin): "You don't chew tobacco, do you, little boy?" Little boy: "No-m, but I kin giv yer a cigaret."

"THE Empty Vessel," is the name of a new hymn. It must hav been the state of the contribution-box which suggested it.

OUR ancestors had clocks put on the outside of churches that they might not be late in getting to service. We put the clocks inside the churches lest we be late in getting out.

PROFESSOR: "Gretchen, please take the cat out of the room. I cannot hav it making such a noise while I am at work. Where is it?" Gretchen: "Why, professor, you are sitting on it!"

MINISTER: "I understood that you do not believe that a person is sufficiently punished on the earth for his misdeeds?" Neighbor: "Oh, yes, I do now; but I didn't until I heard you preach!"

"Do you see that man across the street? He's an English lord." "Why, he looks just like an average citizen." "Yes. It beats all how the tailors and barbers can improve a man's natural appearance."

NEXT to the small boy on the front seat at a baseball game, the most remarkable case of absorption we ever saw was that of a cat which stepped on some floating sawdust in a mill-pond with the impression that it was solid.

MISS GOTHAM (to Mr. Wabash, recently returned from abroad): "I suppose you were at court while in London, Mr. Wabash?" Mr. Wabash (uneasily): "Well—er—yes, Miss Gotham; but only once, and then I got off with a merely nominal fine."

LOUISIANA postmaster (who is assisted in his duties by his young bride): "Why, Mary, what are all these postal cards doing here? They should hav gone in the last mail." Young bride (who was a Massachusetts schoolmistress): "Oh, I hav just put them aside until I should hav time to correct the spelling."

"THE great objection I hav to the house," said the new tenant, "is that I can always hear vague murmuring caused by the people talking next door." "Well, ma'am," said the agent, "we can hav the walls made thicker for you." "Thicker!" she exclaimed; "why, then I couldn't hear a thing!"

JIM WEBSTER: "What preacher's gwinter baptize dat baby?" Sam Johnsing: "Parson Whangdoodle Baxter." "How much does he git?" "$2." "You oughter git Parson Bledsoe. He'll do hit for $1." "Hub, what sorter baptism can yer git for $1?" "If yer has got yer doubts about hits effercacy you can hab de chile baptized twice for de money what you pays Parson Whangdoodle Baxter."

"WHY do you ask for ten cents?" demanded a citizen of a tramp in City Hall park. "Most of you fellows only ask for a penny." "Yes, sir," politely responded the tramp, "and if they are repulsed their case is hopeless. With me, I can offer bargains—slaughter prices. In this case I am willing to make a dead reduction of five cents, thus enabling you, my dear sir, to come to the assistance of a deserving but despairing fellow-being, with the pleasant feeling that you are not only doing good, but doing it at fifty cents on the dollar."

WORSE THAN THE INQUISITION.

Visitor (to convict): "Do they treat you kindly here, my friend?"

Convict (cautiously): "They do on the surface, sir; but there is an underlying current of torture practiced compared with which the old Spanish Inquisition would rank as a Sixth ward picnic."

Visitor: "You don't say so! They giv you papers."

Convict (still more cautiously): "Sir, this paper is Deacon Shepard's Mail and Express."

"LIFE is short!" the preacher cried
From the pulpit up on high.
Jameson heard, and softly sighed:
"True! ah, true! And so am I."

"Life is real!" the preacher said.
Jameson nodded. Vain regrets!
Bowed in patience he his head,
"So," he sighed, "are all my debts."

"Life is earnest!" next he heard.
Cold sweat oozed through all his pores.
"Yes," he whispered, "that's the word,
So are all my creditors."

THERE was an old preacher once who told some boys of the Bible lesson he was to read in the morning. The boys, finding the place, glued together the connecting passages. The next morning he read on the bottom of the page: "When Noah was one hundred and forty he took unto himself a wife, who was [turning the leaf] one hundred and forty cubits long, forty cubits wide, built of gopher wood, covered with pitch inside and out." He was naturally puzzled at this. He read again, verified it, and then said: "My friends, this is the first time I ever met this in the Bible, but I accept it as an evidence of the assertion that we are fearfully and wonderfully made.'

THE librarian of a Kansas Sunday-school was called upon by the minister in charge of the flock. "Brother Hanks," said the preacher, "I hav heard some little complaint in regard to some books you recently added to our library." "I am sorry to hear it, Brother Fisher, for I am sure that I hav exercised my best judgment in all my selections. Of what especial book has complaint been made?' "Of a volume called 'Nana,' written by some fellow named Zola." "Just hold on a minute," said the librarian, "and let us examin the objectionable work." He produced the book. The minister took it. The librarian waited nearly an hour, but the minister did not look up. "Brother Fisher," the librarian called. The minister did not respond. "Brother Fisher," called the librarian, leaning over and shaking the preacher. "Yes, what is it, brother?" "The book, what do you think of it?" 'Oh, ah, yes, the book. I'll tell you what we'll do, Brother Hanks. We'll put some other book in the library and keep this one for ourselves?"

Gems of Thought.

BUDDHISM and its daughter creed Christianity can flourish only in a sickly soil. Christianity developed its first germs in the carcass of the decaying Roman empire, and still retains its firmest hold upon the degenerate nations of southern Europe; while the manlier races of the north resisted its propaganda to the last, and were the first to free themselvs from its despotism—just as Buddhism has been expelled from the homes of the Aryan races and relegated to the moral pesthouses of the south Mongol empires, for in Japan its influence is confined to the observance of a few traditional ceremonies. Disease, crushing misfortune, mental derangement, whatever disqualifies a man for the healthy business of life, qualifies him for the reception of antinatural dogmas. —Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Secret of the East.

THE inhabitants of conquered nations, the children of misfortune, men of weak but sanguin imagination, would from preference attach themselvs to the sacerdotal religions; because the interest of the ruling priests dictated to them that very doctrin of equality in slavery, of the renunciation of temporal enjoyments, of rewards in heaven reserved for blind submission, for sufferings, for mortifications inflicted voluntarily, or endured without repining; that doctrin so attractiv, so consolatory to oppressed humanity!——Condorcet.

PRECEDENT is the plea for these tomfooleries; but the age has arrived when we are to estimate precedents by their antiquity. The older the precedent the greater is the presumption that it is absurd, ridiculous, or pernicious. If our barbarous, ignorant, superstitious, and priest-ridden ancestors made fools of themselvs, is that any reason why we should follow their example? There must be an end to stupid precedents at one time or another. They are not eternal, and we are just as capable of destroying them now as our successors can be.—Gilbert Vale's Beacon.

IT seems to me that a "supernatural" religion—that is to say, a religion that is claimed to hav been divinely founded and to be authenticated by miracle, is much easier to establish among an ignorant people than any other—and the more ignorant the people, the easier such a religion could be established. The reason for this is plain. All ignorant tribes, all savage men, believe in the miraculous, in the supernatural. The conception of uniformity, of what may be called the eternal consistency of nature, is an idea far above their comprehension. They are forced to think in accordance with their minds, and as a consequence they account for all phenomena by the acts of superior beings—that is to say, by the supernatural. In other words, that religion having most in common with the savage, having most that was satisfactory to his mind, or to his lack of mind, would stand the best chance of success.—Ingersoll.

NATIONS will know that they cannot become conquerors without losing their freedom; that perpetual confederations are the only means of maintaining their independence; that their object should be security, and not power. By degrees commercial prejudices will die away; a false mercantil interest will lose the terrible power of imbruing the earth with blood, and of ruining nations under the idea of enriching them. As the people of different countries will at last be drawn into closer intimacy, by the principles of economics and morality, as each, for its own advantage, will invite foreigners to an equal participation of the benefits which it may hav derived either from nature or its own industry, all the causes which produce, envenom, and perpetuate national animosities will one by one disappear, and will no more furnish to warlike insanity either fuel or pretext.—Condorcet.

IT is said by those who know Europe generally that there are more thefts committed and punished annually in England than in all the other nations put together. If this be so, there must be a cause or causes for such depravity in our common people. May not one be the deficiency of justice and morality in our national government, manifested in our oppressiv conduct to subjects, and unjust wars on our neighbors? View the long-persisted-in, unjust, monopolizing treatment of Ireland, at length acknowledged! View the plundering government exercised by our merchants in the Indies; the confiscating war made upon the American colonies; and, to say nothing of those upon France and Spain, view the late war upon Holland, which was seen by impartial Europe in no other light than that of a war of rapine and pillage; the hopes of an immense and easy prey being its only apparent, and probably its true and real motiv and encouragement. Justice is as strictly due between neighbor nations, as between neighbor citizens. A highwayman is as much a robber when he plunders in a gang, as when single; and a nation that makes an unjust war is only a great gang. After employing your people in robbing the Dutch, is it strange that, being put out of that employ by peace, they still continue robbing, and rob one another?—Benj. Franklin.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

THE CONTEST BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND SKEPTICISM.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE are over forty thousand children receiving Catholic education in the parochial schools, asylums, colleges, etc., of Brooklyn.

A HANDSOME offer has been made to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, says the World, by a foreign manager to deliver forty lectures in Europe next spring.

MACON, Ga., Times: "Perhaps marriage is a failure, but the wisest man of the old times could never be made to see it in that light. We hav reference to Solomon."

THE population of this country will soon reach hundreds of millions, and, says an exchange, will present problems calling for the exercise of the highest statesmanship and the elevation of politics into a far-reaching science.

IT is said that when General Grant was in Japan the Japanese premier, Prince Kung, desiring to compliment the general by telling him he was born to command, tried it in English with this result: "Sire, brave general, you vas made to order."

GENERAL BOOTH, of the Salvation Army, netted about $15,000 two years ago in England by a week of self-denial and prayer on the part of his followers. Being somewhat in need of ready cash, he has decided to try the same dodge again this year.

THE Churchman (P. E.) says: "The decadence of Wesleyanism in Great Britain, in common with that of nearly all the other sects, which has been chronicled for several years, is continuing with a steady progression. The leakage of the last year which the Wesleyan conference has had under review is said to amount to no fewer than forty thousand members, and this, allowing for the annual increase in population, represents in reality a far larger falling off."

"PLEASE don't swear," is printed on a card stuck up over the ticket-hole in the window of one of the Sixth avenue elevated stations. It reminds the passengers of the sign on an organ in a Western church: "Please don't shoot the organist; he is doing the best he can."

IT is reported that the "Rev. C. A. Johnson," whoever he may be, announces that as a result of much study he decides that "in just thirty-two years from now the electricity stored in the earth will come in contact with the heated matter inside and blow the whole world up."

THE Boston school committee has substituted Anderson's New General History for Swinton's History as a text-book in the schools. "This," says the Catholic Union and Times, "is a victory for the Catholics, who opposed Swinton's History because of its lying statements about the sale of indulgences."

CREMATION is illegal in France, and bodies hav to be taken to Italy to be burnt. M. Morin, dying recently in Paris, left instructions that his body should be sent to Milan to be burnt. This was done, and the cost of the incineration was but fifteen shillings. The Italian custom house, however, levied $70 import duty on the body when it came into the country, and the same amount export duty when the ashes were taken back to France.

A RETIRED jeweler of St. Louis has been giving away the tricks of his trade. He is reported as saying that there is as much profit in the repairing department of watchmaking as there is in plumbing. For instance, a mainspring costs about eight cents, and it takes half an hour to set it in a watch. The average charge is $1.50.

ALEXANDER DOYLE has finished a sketch model of the bronze statue to Horace Greeley, which is to be erected by the printers of the country, on the east side of City Hall park, facing Printing House square. The sculptor has depicted Mr. Greeley seated bareheaded in an armchair, under which lies a pile of books. The arm drops at full length by the side of the chair, and in the hand is a newspaper. The statue will be heroic in size.

THE excavations at Pompeii carried on for the amusement and instruction of Emperor William of Germany were the most remarkable archæological achievements since Mr. Pickwick discovered the famous stone bearing the strangest hieroglyphics ever brought to light. The kaiser's wonderful good fortune in obtaining ancient bronzes, vases, jars, etc., wherever he looked for them shows one of the striking advantages of a monarchical form of government. In a democratic country even a visiting emperor would hav to take his chances with the crowd if he wanted to indulge in scientific explorations.

How Sam Jones converted an Infidel is thus told by himself: Down here in a beautiful town south of us an Infidel—and about as good a one as you will find—came to me and said: "Mr. Jones, I am an Infidel. I don't believe the Bible; but you hav got something that I hav not got, and I wish I had it. I don't know what it is." I said: "I will prescribe for you and cure you if you take my medicin." He said: "I will do it." I said: "To-night when I get through preaching come up to the altar and say, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'" He says: "But I——" I say: "Shut your mouth; your trouble has been your mouth, and if I could keep that shut twenty-four hours I will get you on the road to God." Sure enough, that night he came and knelt at the altar, and after the service I said to him: "When you go home read a chapter from the Bible and hav family prayers." "But I——" says he. "Shut your mouth," said I; "your mouth has gotten you nearly to hell, and if I can keep it shut forty-eight hours I will cure you." He got his Bible that night and prayed. The next morning he came back. I told him when the door of the church opened for him to go up and join. "I—I——" he began. I said: "Shut your mouth, but do as I tell you." That afternoon he walked up to the font and joined the church. I put a padlock on each corner of his mouth and one in the middle, and kept his mouth shut forty-eight hours. He then said: "I believe in God and the Bible, and here is my hand to lead a Christian life." Many people think if their views are not right they cannot be Christians. God never said: "Giv me your head;" and if you giv God your heart your head will come straight as natural as life. An Infidel is an Infidel because he will not take the medicin that will cure Infidelity. We will add: The story is probably a lie, but it will illustrate the idea of the church. Shut your mouth, shut your eyes, giv your brains an anesthetic and you can get Christianity!

Communications.

Life's Day.

Death is said to be the great mystery, but life is a greater one.

We know that death is the dissolution and decay of organized matter; but the vital principle, the esse of all living organisms, ever eludes the scientist's grasp. It is a something, if an entity at all, which is beyond human ken. The manifestations of life are as varied as the face of animated nature can make them. Look where we will, its phenomena are ever before us.

As to the origin of life we are ignorant. Although, when traced backward, the fountain of life, like the origin of historical events, ends in uncertainty, yet the stream of time has left certain way-marks, or inscriptions, in the solid rocks, which shed a friendly luster on the mysterious past.

Science has tunneled the mountains, plowed the trackless seas, elucidated abstruse mathematical problems, penetrated stellar space, chained the lightning's flash, subdued the mechanical powers; but when it attempts to analyze the living principle which has accomplished it all, an utter failure is the result.

The alembic of chemistry distills the purest essences and drugs; heat, coke, lime, and other ingredients eliminate the metals of trade and commerce from their nativ ores; the buzz of machinery—cog to wheel, belt to pinion—weaves the purple and fine linen for the crowned heads of earth, but the nature of life—of man—the master spirit, is as deeply involved in mystery as the bottom of the fathomless deep. And this applies no less to the worm squirming at our feet than to the "lord of creation."

Life grades itself into animal and vegetable forms of development.

An animal is a living being whose life is sustained by nutriment assimilated by a muscular cavity or stomach.

There are processes in the vast realms of the universe which evince a display of order akin to intelligence, such as the adaptation of chemicals to unite in certain proportions, the spontaneous formation of regularly shaped crystals, and the ceaseless whirl of planets in their orbits, but in which we detect none of the attributes of a living, sentient being.

Science has learned something of the how of life's commonest operations, but the why of a thought is veiled in impenetrable mystery. From the squirming, radial earth-worm composed only of muscular rings, to the ponderous elephant, we observe modifications of the wonderful power, life.

As to when or how life first appeared on earth we are profoundly ignorant. The evidences with which we are acquainted tend to show that the lowest forms of life were first evolved; and from the inherent power pervading these low and simple forms, higher and more complicated organisms grew or were produced.

Life may be defined to be the capacity to enjoy pleasure and suffer pain; and these attributes pertain to all forms of existence.

It has been asserted that only man reasons—that the lower orders of beings possess only sensation and instinct. But the facts at our command do not warrant the assertion. The spider is a mechanical reasoner; so is the beaver.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to draw the line between those animals possessing only sensation and those possessing instinct—or, to carry the parallel farther, it is equally difficult to determin at what point or in what animal sensation ceases and instinct begins, or where instinct disappears and reason assumes the sway.

Reason is the co-worker with intelligence. But here we are at sea again, for we do not know where in the scale of existence intelligence begins. Indeed, we find something close akin to intelligence in plants.

In chemical action we will only refer to the formation of oxides—thus: There are four known oxides of antimony, the multiples or divisions of each of which bear the same ratio to each other.

Crystallization is another operation in inanimate nature closely resembling intelligence. True, these are said to be the results of the operation of natural law. When ipecac or lobelia is taken into the stomach a violent reversal of the usual order takes place. This is the operation of a natural law on living organism.

The original condition of matter no doubt was chaotic. From chaos order was evolved by and through the inherent properties of matter.

Millions of years—in fact, time out of mind—was necessary for these changes to take place. These changes of form in matter are no more completed today than they were a million of years ago.

When the ceaseless swish of the waters had lashed the rock-bound shore for myriads of ages, the chemical properties of the saline liquid deposited the lowest form of life it held in solution.

In the archean time the earth was a dreary waste, but the ceaseless powers were at work then as to-day.

Did we not know that all limestone is composed of vegetable and organic remains, we would conclude that there was no life in the Azoic.

Animalcular beings, which hav left no trace of their existence, may hav been the original protozoan germ of all life.

Graphite, a vegetable product, has been found in the Azoic rocks near Ticonderoga, N. Y., which is regarded as evidence of the oldest vegetation yet found.

The radiates of the Paleozoic comprise the lowest form of life now known to hav existed in the earlier ages.

In some of the microscopic protozoans the stomach was not a permanent cavity, being extemporized out of the mass of tissue only when food came in contact with the body. The radiates consist of little else than a mouth and a stomach, the latter being arranged radiately around the former. As in an orange or a flower, the parts are arranged radiately about an axis or common center. Radiate animals are similar in structure to plants which are also radiates.

Besides the radiates, there are other species of such extreme simplicity as to be devoid of even a mouth and a stomach, which may be considered as systemless animals. Sponges, microscopic protozoans, minute rhizopods, and polycystines are of the same class.

More wonderful still is the parasitical gregarinida infesting the bodies of cockroaches and earth-worms, consisting of a single cell containing a central vesicle, and where the only signs of life are contraction and expansion. However, the bathybius protomœba, consisting of a mass of albuminous jelly possessing neither the characteristics of plants or animals, are considered the simplest living organic structures known.

Some of the most beautiful forms in nature are found in the crinoids and asteroida of the radiate family.

Crinoids and corals appear to hav been the connecting link between the animal and vegetable kingdoms—the grading of one into the other; or, in other words, they were shades of development in animal life toward flower life.

They had the semblance of flowers—in fact, were flower-animals, being typical of the flowers of the vegetable kingdom ages before the flowers appeared.

Numberless species may hav existed and perished while life existed only in the waters. Of mollusks, cephalopods—snails—exhibited the tendency toward land animals.

Trilobites were their contemporaries, and the first articulates.

The Devonian age next held sway. Life in the waters assumed ponderous forms and complicated structures. Land insects, plants, and vertebrates appeared. Land animals were doubtless evolved by some marine animals becoming amphibians—cephalopods, for instance.

The evolution of ferns, pines, and lepidodendra from leafless seaweeds, marked an epoch of great progress in the development of plant life, as did also the introduction of land vertebrates.

When, in floating adown the stream of time toward the present, we reach the Carboniferous, the advance becomes grand, the floating islands, jungles, and forests containing about nine hundred species of plants, some of which bore nut-like fruit. This plant life was mostly flowerless—mostly tree-ferns.

There was an increase in land articulates, such as myriapods (or centipedes), insects, and scorpions. The progress in vertebrates was from water vertebrates to amphibious reptils. The first land snail appeared in the Carboniferous. Trilobites were displaced by other crustaceans, like our modern shrimps. These articulates were the precursors of the reptils which appeared soon afterward. They may hav been the connecting link between Silurian and amphibian life.

The first traces of reptilians are found in the Carboniferous horizon. The reptilian type advanced to enaliosaurs, or swimming reptils, which are the highest species of animal yet found in the Carboniferous rocks.

The Paleozoic closed before the appearance of birds and mammiferous animals, and with few vertebrates except fishes, which were distinguished by the unequally lobed tail. The first mammals were marsupalia—pouched animals. These were ushered in with the Mesozoic, which was also the zenith of reptilian greatness. The wonderful pterodactyl now made its advent. It was nature's first bird effort.

In the tertiary of the Cenozoic mammalia appeared to dispute the mastery, as fishes and reptils had done before. Mammals of many types may hav been produced by cross-breeding of different species. The fruit of such a union would, of course, be a hybrid at first, but eventually would become a distinct species itself. Hybrids do not now propagate their kind; however, they may hav done so in the past.

The number of species of animals now in existence is estimated at about a quarter of a million; and it is safe to say that the number of extinct species existing in a fossil state exceed that number many times. These fossils are found not only at great depths below the surface of the earth, but also in the Alps and Pyrenees at the hight of six thousand to eight thousand feet; and in the Andes and Himalayas at the hight of from sixteen thousand to twenty thousand feet.

Of the hundreds and thousands of species of animals and plants existing in the fossils of the recent past—the tertiary—of the Cenozoic—not one is identical with any animal or plant now living.

Thus one vast routine of change has marked the development and evolution of life on the globe. This change has all the time been tending toward an increase of brain-power—"cephalization," as Dana expresses it. Mammalia seems to be the crowning sheaf—the keystone—in the grand arch in the vast temples of animated nature.

The domination of species during the geological epochs of the past may be referred to fishes in the Paleozoic, reptils in the Mesozoic, and mammals in Cenozoic and present. To summarize: the lower forms of the Paleozoic gave way to more advanced organisms of the Mesozoic; and these in their turn hav been superseded by the complicated structures of the Cenozoic.

Fishes are capable of motion parallel with a horizontal position; their powers of locomotion are produced by a pair of anterior and a pair of posterior fins; in some reptils and quadrupeds the fins hav grown into anterior and posterior limbs; and man—the animal endowed with reason in addition to instinct—has learned to balance himself in an erect posture by the use of his developed anterior and posterior fins—arms and legs.

As to how one species became extinct and a new one was formed, we are ignorant. Evolution, environment, or hybridization, offers the only solution to the problem.

We can only judge of the present by comparing it with the past. Thus, among the pachyderms was the paleotherium, varying in size from that of a hog to that of a horse, and having the characteristics of the rhinoceros, taper, and horse. Also the anoplatherium, varying in dimensions from those of a hare to those of a pony, and being an intermediate link between a horse and a rhinoceros, as well as between the hog, camel, and hippopotamus. In all the orders are found species possessing characteristics of other species. Thus flying squirrels link animals and birds together; bats are another instance connecting birds and quadrupeds.

All orders of existence are linked together by the life-germ—a phenomenon common to all. As in the physical universe there is physical or mechanical force or law, so in animated nature there is life, force, or organic law.

In the vegetable kingdom there exists likewise organic law, but its operations are more purely chemical in their nature.

Some animals, as the mastodon and the horse, do not appear to hav been restricted by geographical boundaries; on the contrary, their fossil remains are found in nearly every country of the globe. The fossils of some species requiring the conditions of the torrid zone for a habitat are found in temperate regions, and even amid the arctics. This is an evidence of the vast physical changes which the crust of the earth has undergone.

These changes with their consequent oscillations and periods of elevation and subsidence to which the surface of the earth has been subjected, would necessarily affect the conditions necessary to the existence of all life then prevalent. It is agreed on all hands that the great mountain ranges of the globe were uplifted during the tertiary epoch of the Cenozoic. Thus, before the upheaval of the Rocky mountains, the Gulf of Mexico covered a great part of the territory of the Southern states, penetrating as far as the source of the Missouri.

All this, no doubt, took place during a period of earthquake commotion. About this time, or later, occurred the glacial or drift period, which produced other and additional changes in the earth's physical aspect.

This drift period is regarded as the last great geological change which has taken place on the surface of our planet. Some authorities are of the opinion that the erosion of the rock gorge in the Niagara river commenced about the close of the drift epoch at the present site of Queenstown on Lake Ontario, from which place it has receded seven miles. According to the best data obtainable, it is estimated that the time required for this recession has not been less than thirty-five thousand years. Taking the Mosaic cosmogony into account, this erosion began within twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand years before the appearance of man.

Suffice it to say that the record of the rocks shows that there has been a continual progress in the condition of our planet; that its surface has gradually become fitted for the existence of the forms of vegetable and animal life which hav appeared in each epoch.

Plants advanced from seaweeds to ferns, club-mosses, and gigantic endogens, such as palms, corn, etc., to the true timber trees of the recent and present time.

Of animals, radiata and articulata existed for ages as the only life of the waters; then vertebrata—fishes—sported in the liquid element; after these came reptils—amphibians—which were connected with fishes by an insensible gradation. From reptils the advance was to birds and mammals, each of which were at first represented by the lowest forms of their class; and each of which disputed for the mastery till man, the highest representativ of all classes, appeared to assert his sway.

According to the opinions of the most eminent scientists—anatomists as well as geologists—all organic beings were tending to the human form from the beginning. In the language of Agassiz: "Man is the end toward which all the animal creation has tended from the first appearance of the first Paleozoic fishes."

We hav now imperfectly traced life from its incipient germ-cell to the crowning pinnacle of the dome.

Our task, although a pleasant one, is only begun. We hav briefly hinted at the conditions of man's origin; his purpose on earth and final destiny now loom up in view. From the dawn we hav reached the noon-day; now what of the evening and the night?

To the lower animals we now bid a formal adieu; to man, his environment and his immediate ancestors, we will pay our respects. While we discuss the problem of human life, we will not essay to dogmatize where we do not know.

While the writer does not propose to discuss the pros and cons of the Darwinian theory, yet it is silly to overlook or ignore the striking structural resemblances between man and the man-like apes. The writer does not consider it derogatory to man's dignity to assert that he "evoluted" from the lower animals; neither does such a hypothesis detract in the least from the sublime grandeur of the reign and progress of natural law; rather does it enhance and add additional luster to the incomprehensibility of those operations and processes which so universally command our admiration, if not our awe and reverence.

One or two pertinent inquiries we cannot omit. If, as the Darwinians declare, man descended from the monkey, why is it that all the monkeys did not "evolute" into the human or manly form? And why is it that no manlike apes hav become men within the historic period? If such a transition has taken place, why not again?

On the other hand, suppose, for instance, that man be deprived of the power of speech—of word signs of ideas—for one hundred years, and try to contemplate, if you can, the consequences.

Does not the power to convey his thoughts and desires to his fellows constitute man's chief supremacy over the grades of being below him?

As to how language originated we can only conjecture. Doubtless it at first comprised only a few guttural sounds. Our ancestors may not hav been gregarious. The cave-dwellers evidently were not nomadic. Their wants were few, and were shared in common with the beasts of the jungle. On the wild animals of the forest and plain they were, in part, dependent for subsistence, and from them they may hav gathered the rudiments of speech. A common form of speech and a community of interests shaped the formation of tribes and governments. The original ferm of government was patriarchal, or parental, as well as tribal. Tribes were consolidated by conquest—a nation was the result.

The intercourse of nations has produced civilization, and civilization is pregnant with vast possibilities.

Although we are to-day almost overshadowed by the blaze of civilization, yet we are by no means free from the superstitions of the past. They cling to our civilization as does the shadow to the substance. Before the era of science men's ideas were very crude. Priests, whose bread and butter depended on their influence over the masses, had been their sole preceptors. The earth was supposed to be flat, and if flat of course it had four corners.

All the phenomena of nature were supposed to be the work of invisible beings or gods; of course, the number of these gods was legion.

Men observed that all animated nature, while exhibiting the activ functions of life, was at the same time undergoing the transition of decay and death. Their children as well as animals would sicken and die, but was that the end? In their dreams they would see their loved ones again. Hope sprang up that the dead would liv again. The priests clutched at the idea. They began to teach that the physical man faded insensibly into an ethereal, spiritual man, and that this spiritual existence constituted a higher form of life invisible to the physical senses.

This theory was probably only an improvement on the doctrin of metempsychosis.

It required an indefinable realm somewhere for the sojourn of spirits after the death of the body, with conditions of happiness or misery commensurate with the belief or faith of the individual while inhabiting "the tenement of clay."

It is a beautiful thought that we are to clasp hands with loved ones beyond the confines of pain and tears.

But, unfortunately, there are sad defects in this cheerful view—this lovely child of hope. No scientist in his laboratory, or chemist with his crucible, has ever caged a soul separate and apart from the body. Outside of a human brain there is no mentality, no volition, no love. There are many strange mental phenomena exhibited under the names of mesmerism, Spiritualism, and kindred themes, but as to a satisfactory knowledge of a future life, there is none.

The great effort of the church and Spiritualists for ages has been to distinguish spirit from matter. The measure of success attending the effort has been a miserable failure. The zeal and persistency with which the assertion of the existence of a spirit-world has been promulgated is worthy of a pure and noble feeling in the human mind.

The doctrin of a future state presupposes that there is a repository of souls somewhere, as of grain in a bin, from which the demand is supplied. But when, or at what stage of development, the fetus becomes a living soul—a separate, distinct entity—no power on earth can determin.

The problem of life still remains unsolved, the visions of dreamers to the contrary notwithstanding. With all the aid of numerous so-called revelations, and all the vagaries of their expounders, the mystery of death has never been solved.

Whether death ends all, or is an open door to "a land fairer than day," is utterly unknown, unknown!

The German Roman Catholics.

Correspondence of the Independent.

The spirit and the demands of the Roman Catholic Congress recently held in Freiburg, in Baden, again emphasize the fact that the Catholics of Germany are determined to push to the utmost the moral victory they gained in the establishment of a modus vivendi between Berlin and the Vatican as the official close of the Kulturkampf. Legally, the Catholic church does not even yet stand as favored in Prussia as she did before the beginning of the long contest. Only in exceptional cases hav the brethren of the various orders been permitted to resume their work. But among these are not the Jesuits. The congress, without mentioning any particular societies, demanded the return of all the orders and permission for them to labor without let or hindrance. Equally determined, also, were they in demanding that the state giv up its monopoly in the control of the schools, and giv to the church in a measure this supervision and direction.

But the chief business of the congress was to discuss and formulate its demand for the restoration of the temporal power of the pope. It labored hard and vigorously to create public sentiment in favor of this re-establishment. The special occasion for the vehemence of the measure was the recent publication of a new code of laws by the Italian government, in which the agitations that hav for several years past, and especially in connection with the recent papal jubilee, been carried out under the very eaves of the Quirinal, are declared crimes against the state. The Italian government, under the leadership of the Minister-President Crispi, has been enacting laws that strongly remind one, in spirit and aim, of the famous May laws of Prussia of 1873. In the new code, section 101 declares that "whoever commits an act with the intention of thereby causing the state or any part of the state to come under a foreign power, or tries to destroy the unity of the state, will be punished by imprisonment." Section 173 declares that "Any public servant of religion who in the performance of his official duties, publicly criticises or abuses the affairs or the laws of the state, will be punished by an imprisonment of one year, and by the payment of a fine of one thousand francs." Section 176 says: "Any public servant of religion who, in the performance of his duties, or in the abuse of his office, is guilty of any other offense will be punished as prescribed for that offense, increased by further punishment from one-sixth to one-third in measure."

Of course these and similar paragraphs aim at putting an effectual quietus on the whole restoration movement. It is the government's answer to the wild enthusiasm and unrestrained aggressivness of the jubilee addresses. This, too, is the way in which the Catholics themselvs look upon the matter, and explains why the Freiburg congress put this measure so prominently into the foreground.

The aggressiv spirit that appears in the action of the congress is typical of the position taken by Catholic leaders throughout. It is confidently claimed that Catholic scholarship has successfully undermined the claims of Protestantism, not only doctrinally, as was attempted by Möhler's "Symbolik," nor only historically, as Janssen and his school attempt, but also in the practical sphere of the social problems and public life. The Germania, the leading Catholic periodical of Germany, givs the following summary of this new wisdom. It says:

That which the shameless monk of Wittemberg inaugurated three hundred and fifty years ago is no longer looked upon as a reformation. No; it was a rushing into a bottomless pit. It is the most flagrant, the most radical, the most wicked revolution which the world has ever seen. It was a revolution in the churchly, the religious, the moral, the political, the social, the economic, the learned, the historical worlds. The foundation of the so-called Evangelical church has long since been understood by intelligent men. According to these, Protestantism is nothing but a mere rejection of all and everything that is supernatural; it explains everything on the basis of the law of nature, of natural development; and not even the smallest nook is left open for the God of revelation. Its foundations are the purest godlessness and religious nihilism; and on such a foundation only hate and empty words, only decay and destruction, in time and eternity, can be built.

Were these words the ravings of some obscure sheet, they might pass unnoticed; but coming from the accredited organ of German Roman Catholicism, they are certainly significant.

Every effort is made to instill self-confidence and aggressivness into the masses. The revived Catholicism of the day is becoming more and more pronounced in its Ultramontanistic tendencies. The milder type, which prevailed in the earlier decades, particularly in Wütemberg, has been crowded to the wall, and the Roman feature of the church brought into greater prominence. No better testimony of the new Roman Catholicism of the day in Germany could be given than the wonderful pilgrim-bands that hav all summer long been crowding to the shrine of the four great sacred relics now exposed at Aix la Chapelle. These are: first, the garment worn by the Virgin Mary when she gave birth to Christ; secondly, the swaddling clothes worn by the savior immediately after his birth; thirdly, the cloth upon which the headless body of John the Baptist lay; and, fourthly, the vesture worn by the savior when hanging on the cross. The officials of the church hav declared these relics "genuin" and worthy objects of adoration. When a neighboring pastor, Thümmel, in a public address, declared that this adoration was a sacrilege (Gotteslasterung), the officials of Sollingen, where the address was delivered, closed the meeting amid loud tumult and uproar.

Unfortunately the Protestants of Germany do not present a solid front over against the aggressions of Rome. They are divided in regard to method and manner, but a unit on the necessity of the work. The Evangelischer Bund, however, already numbers forty thousand members, and, as is officially declared, fights Rome "with word and pen." The society is especially strong in the country along the Rhine where a Protestant minority is living among a Catholic majority.

To Mr. McArthur.

I am glad of a promis of "peace." No one detests war and all manner of wranglings more than I do, and yet I seem destined to provoke disturbances. Probably because I cannot be "all things to all men," and hav pronounced opinions of my own and express them somewhat bluntly, though not intentionally in unkindness.

I hardly think it right to call Bouton a "liar," but he did deceive and act a falsehood, and so did all his coadjutors. Still, I must say his book is useful as a proof of the easiness with which people are humbugged, even in a radical Liberal town; and as this is only one more among countless instances of the fraud and trickery of mediums, it is natural for me to suspect a majority, if not all of them, when their performances are outside of all known laws of nature. I grant many are honest and sincere, but I think, with Hermann the magician, that there are no real ghosts, and also that there is no independent slate-writing. If Mr. Arthur, or some other "and more competent Spiritualist," can bring proof of these two things, I will gladly stand on "my own platform" and wait for them.

Life is a grand and glorious boon. I am by no means tired of it, and if I am to hav a few million years more of it, I shall be exceedingly glad to know it, and, in the mean time, will "work for the good that is nighest." ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

The Good Effect of The Truth Seeker.

Prof. D. C. Seymour in San Francisco Freethought.

While here [Montesano, Wash. Terr.] we met Mrs. G. D. McLane, who, until two years ago, was a shouting Methodist, good and strong. Her husband, being a Radical, borrowed THE TRUTH SEEKER to read, but kept it hid away so as not to offend his wife. However, she found it and read it, all unbeknown to him, and got converted to the religion of humanity, and sent and subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER out of her own earnings, saying to her spouse, "We will not borrow our paper nor put our light under a bushel." Mrs. McLane is a whole four-horse team in our cause.

Why, Oh, Why?

From the Amer can.

If parochial schools are as advantageous for a country as the Roman Catholic church claims, why hav they done so little for the province of Quebec, where the priesthood and ignorance hav joined hands to degrade a people and debauch politics? Race and religious prejudice hold that province in such dark bondage that the enlightened portion of its people see no hope for the future except through annexation to the United States, which has no relish for such a solution of a vexatious problem. Judged by what it has done for the French of Canada, the never-ending struggle of the church of Rome to get its hands on the school funds of this republic must be regarded as a sinister plot against its education and progress.

The American Secular Union.

R. B. WESTBROOK, President.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary, - 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago.
OTTO WETTSTEIN, Treas., - - - - - - Rochelle, Ill.
E. B. FOOTE, JR., Chair. Ex. Com., 120 Lexington Ave., New York.
MRS. M. A. FREEMAN, Chair. Fin. Com., 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago.

R. B. Westbrook, LL.D.

It is a bright October morn which finds the secretary wending his way through the Quaker City to greet the recently elected successor of Colonel Ingersoll, Courtlandt Palmer, and S. P. Putnam. Arrived at his elegant home, a cheery-looking domestic shows me to the parlor, while Mrs. Westbrook makes me feel at ease with the cordial welcome so characteristic of the refined and intellectual women of America, and when to this is added a remarkable degree of beauty, grace, and fine bearing, you can form a slight conception of the "first [Liberal] lady in the land." I learned later that Mrs. Westbrook was a graduate of the Women's Medical College, but limits her practice to the doctor, whose fine form, as he descends the stairs, attests her skill in keeping her patient in prime condition.

A hearty hand-shake—a real grip of friendship and cordiality—betokening earnestness and sincerity, at once places the new president high in my esteem, and, as he leads me to the sitting-room, where we engage in conversation, I am impressed with the following picture of the president of the American Secular Union: Tall, well-proportioned, of distingué appearance, gray locks covering like a plume a massiv, well-posed head affording ample proof why Dr. Westbrook left that "pent up" Presbyterian ministry; his blue-gray eyes keen, kindly, and penetrating, a clean-shaven face revealing a firm, though pleasant, mouth and a chin denoting energy and decision. In form and feature Dr. Westbrook betokens mental vigor, physical energy, and great nervous activity, and while his appearance is that of the student and scholar, he also possesses the carriage of a soldier.

R. B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.D., was born in Pike county, Pa., in 1820, and his family are noted as pioneers of freedom, his ancestors having fled from Holland in 1620 for the sake of religious liberty, and settled on the manor lands of the patroon Van Rensselaer.

The father of our subject, Col. John Westbrook, took part in the War of 1812, was distinguished for his commanding presence, perfect knowledge of military tactics, and daring horsemanship—the latter being an accomplishment for which his worthy son is also remarkable, as the privileged visitor to the Philadelphia Riding Academy will freely admit. Colonel John was in 1833 elected to the Pennsylvania legislature, when James Buchanan and Thaddeus Stevens were also members of that body, and in 1840 was sent to Congress as Pike county's first representativ. Colonel Westbrook became an intimate friend and associate of President Martin Van Buren, and through his influence with the administration secured the appointment of the first female postmistress. As a further indication of the far-seeing characteristics of the Westbrooks was the Pike county Congressman's championship of an appropriation to enable Professor Morse to vindicate his telegraphic system at a time when the most prominent politicians and statesmen of that day treated the whole subject with ridicule and contempt. Through his benevolent disposition, Colonel Westbrook found it exceedingly hard to refuse appeals for pecuniary aid when called upon by friends, and through this means was cheated and deceived by those from whom better things were expected. From this fact he died a poor man, but left his children a rich legacy in mental vigor, high-souled honor, and unquestioned integrity.

R. B. Westbrook's early educational advantages were limited to the common district school and the old Delaware academy, and he was expected to make himself generally useful about the farm, the barn, and the wood-pile. He taught a common district school and "boarded around" before he was seventeen, and soon after taught in the Delaware and Milford academies. He turned his attention to theology and was admitted to the New Jersey Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1852, he withdrew from that denomination and joined the Presbyterian church, with the full consent and commendation of his former associates. While pastor of the Presbyterian church of Burlington, N. J., in 1853, Princeton College conferred on him the degree of A.M. In 1854 R. B. Westbrook was appointed secretary of the American Sunday-school Union, a post he held for seven years, and upon his resignation the board of managers passed resolutions acknowledging that the work of that institution had "never in its whole history been administered with more marked ability, or with more decided and signal success, than during the period that Dr. Westbrook has been entrusted with its executiv control," and they bore unanimous testimony to the "ability, energy, and large measure of success which has marked his labors in the service of the society."

When Dr. Westbrook retired from that important trust he decided that, whatever others might do, he could not be a successful investigator and advocate of truth while dependent upon those to whom he might preach for daily bread, and refused several calls to important churches. He then entered the law department of the New York City University, and received in due course the degree of LL.B. Pressing ahead of his class he was before graduation in 1863, admitted (after a rigid examination of several hours under the judges of the supreme court) to the New York bar, and in 1869 was admitted as attorney and counselor in the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington, D. C., although his practice was chiefly in the supreme court of New York.

Through the persuasion of friends he was induced to invest in Pennsylvania coal-lands in the Clearfield region, and afterward purchased five thousand acres of coal-land in Cambria county, Pa. To develop and improve these lands it became necessary to abandon his law practice, as the work was done under his personal supervision. Here his Pike county boyhood experience came into play. The "nativs" were astonished to find an ex-clergyman and lawyer who knew how to drive oxen, mules, and horses, and understood all about lumber and saw-mills. Six years ago he sold these lands fully developed, and retired to his Philadelphia residence to more deligently pursue his studies in ecclesiastical history and polemical theology. In 1864 Dr. Westbrook was suspended by his presbytery for "abandoning the ministry and engaging in a secular profession," since which time he maintained a position of ecclesiastical independence.

In 1870 Dr. Westbrook published a work on "Marriage and Divorce;" in 1882 another on "The Bible: Whence and What?" and, four years ago, a third on "Man: Whence and Whither?" His books, published by Lippincott, hav been very favorably noticed by the press generally and extensivly circulated, and are able defenses of the essential principles of morality while dissenting from prevalent theological dogmas. The Wagner Free Institute of Science conferred on Dr. Westbrook the honorary degree of LL.D., and the noble founder, before his death, insisted on his becoming its treasurer and trustee.

Dr. Westbrook is best known to the Liberals of America for his gallant fight, single-handed and alone, against the violation of the will of Stephen Girard by the trustees of the institution bearing his name, having given a series of lectures in the City Institute of Philadelphia on that topic, paying all the expenses, and, more recently, published a work entitled, "Girard's Will and Girard College Theology," which is the clearest exposition of the whole subject ever given.

That Dr. Westbrook steps out from a high social position, which his wealth and talents assure him, to attack this gigantic injustice, is a source of annoyance and wonderment to his conservativ associates, but is the grandest indication that he, in common with the Westbrook family, possesses a love for liberty and firmly resists all tyranny. With Dr. Westbrook this whole fight is purely a matter of conscience, he believing that the daily violation of the will of the founder of Girard College is not adapted to promote that for which this noble charity was founded—"the purest principles of morality."

Possessing executiv experience, splendid ability, intellectual and physical vigor, Dr. R. B. Westbrook seems in every particular preëminently adapted to meet the requirements of the Congress, and, as our standard-bearer, make a splendid record this year for Secularization of the state. E. A. STEVENS

It Makes Men Hypocrits.

From the World.

In view of the wide divergence of opinion on the question of Prohibition and the various shades of judgment held by honest temperance men who do not support the extreme notions of anti-liquor fanatics, the matured opinion of such a man as Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll is of great interest. He has viewed the liquor question carefully from all standpoints, and to a World reporter thus analyzed the perplexing problem. Colonel Ingersoll is a "temperance man" in the just sense of the phrase, but has no sympathy with the blatant fanatics who are professional Prohibitionists. He said:

"It has been decided by many courts in various states that the traffic in liquor can be regulated—that it is a police question. It has been decided by the courts in Iowa that its manufacture and sale can be prohibited, and not only so, but that a distillery or a brewery may be declared a nuisance and may legally be abated, and these decisions hav been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. Consequently, it has been settled by the highest tribunal that states hav the power either to regulate or to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, and not only so, but that states hav the power to destroy breweries and distilleries without making any compensation to owners.

"So it has always been considered within the power of the state to license the selling of intoxicating liquors. In other words, this question is one that the states can decide for themselvs. It is not and it should not be, in my judgment, a federal question. It is something with which the United States has nothing to do. It belongs to the states, and where a majority of the people are in favor of Prohibition, and pass laws to that effect, there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that interferes with such action. The remaining question, then, is not a question of power, but a question of policy, and at the threshold of this question is another: Can prohibitory laws be enforced? There are to-day in Kansas—a Prohibition state—more saloons, that is to say, more places in which liquor is sold, than there are in Georgia, a state without Prohibition legislation. There are more in Nebraska, according to the population—more in Iowa, according to the population—than in many of the states in which there is the old license system. You will find that the United States has granted more licenses to wholesale and retail dealers in these Prohibition states—according to the population—than in many others in which Prohibition has not been adopted.

"What do you think of the prohibitory movement on general principles?"

"The trouble is that when a few zealous men, intending to reform the world, endeavor to enforce unpopular laws, they are compelled to resort to detectivs—to a system of espionage. For the purpose of preventing the sale of liquors somebody has to watch. Eyes and ears must become acquainted with keyholes. Every neighbor suspects every other. A man with a bottle or a demijohn is followed. Those who drink get behind doors, in cellars and garrets. Hypocrisy becomes substantially universal. Old-fashioned sociability becomes impossible. Hundreds of people become suddenly afflicted with a variety of diseases, for the cure of which alcohol in some form is supposed to be indispensable. Malaria becomes general, and it is perfectly astonishing how long a few pieces of bark will last, and how often the liquor can be renewed without absorbing the medical qualities of the bark. The state becomes a paradise for patent medicin—the medicin being poor whisky with a scientific name. Physicians become popular in proportion that liquor of some kind figures in the prescription. Then in the towns clubs are formed, the principal object being to establish a saloon, and in many instances the drug-store becomes a favorit resort, especially on Sundays.

"There is, however, another side to this question. It is this: Nothing in this world is more important than personal liberty. Many people are in favor of blotting out the sun to prevent the growth of weeds. This is the mistake of all prohibitory fanaticism."

"What is true temperance, Colonel Ingersoll?"

"Men hav used stimulants for many thousand years, and as much is used to-day in various forms as in any other period of the world's history. They are used with more prudence now than ever before, for the reason that the average man is more intelligent now than ever before. Intelligence has much to do with temperance. The barbarian rushes to the extreme, for the reason that but little, comparativly, depends on his personal conduct or personal habits. Now, the struggle for life is so sharp, competition is so severe, that few men can succeed who carry a useless burden. The business men of our country are compelled to lead temperate lives, otherwise their credit is gone. Men of wealth, men of intelligence, do not wish to employ intemperate physicians. They are not willing to trust their health or their lives with a physician who is under the influence of liquor. The same is true with business men in regard to their legal interests. They insist on having sober attorneys—they want the counsel of a sober man. So in every department. On the railways it is absolutely essential that the engineer, that the conductor, the train despatcher, and every other employee, in whose hands are the lives of men, should be temperate. The consequence is that under the law of the survival of the fittest the intemperate are slowly but surely going to the wall—they are slowly but surely being driven out of employments of trust and importance. No man, if he knows it, will employ an intemperate coachman, an intemperate butler. As we rise in the scale of civilization we continually demand better and better service. We are continually insisting upon better habits, upon a higher standard of integrity, of fidelity. These are the causes, in my judgment, that are working together in the direction of true temperance."

"Do you believe the people can be made to do without a stimulant?"

"The history of the world shows that all men who hav advanced one step beyond utter barbarism hav used some kind of stimulant. Man has sought for it in every direction. Every savage loves it. Everything has been tried. Opium has been used by many hundreds of millions. Hasheesh has filled countless brains with chaotic dreams, and everywhere that civilization has gone the blood of the grape has been used. Nothing is easier now than to obtain liquor. In one bushel of corn there are at least five gallons—four can be easily extracted. All starch, all sugar, can be changed almost instantly into alcohol. Every grain that grows has in it the intoxicating principle, and, as a matter of fact, nearly all of the corn, wheat, sugar, and starch that man eats is changed into alcohol in his stomach. Whether man can be compelled to do without a stimulant is a question that I am unable to answer. Of one thing we are certain: He has never yet been compelled to do without a stimulant. The tendency, I think, of modern times is toward a milder stimulant than distilled spirits. Whisky and brandies are too strong—wine and beer occupy the middle ground. As I hav often said, wine is a fireside, whisky a conflagration.

"It seems to me that it would be far better if the Prohibitionists would turn their attention to distilled spirits. If they were willing to compromise, the probability is that they would hav public opinion on their side. If they would say: 'You may hav all the beer and all the wine and cider you wish, and you can drink them when and where you desire, but the sale of distilled spirits shall be prohibited,' it is possible that this could be carried out in good faith in many if not in most of the states—possibly in all. We all know that the effect of wine, even when taken in excess, is nothing near as disastrous as the effect of distilled spirits. Why not take the middle ground? The wine-drinkers of the old country are not drunkards. They hav been drinking wine for many generations. It is drank by men, women, and children. It adds to the sociability of the family. It does not separate the husband from the rest—it keeps them all together, and in that view is rather a benefit than an injury. Good wine can be raised here as cheaply as in any other part of the world. In nearly every part of our country the grape grows and good wine can be made. If our people had a taste for wine they would lose the taste for stronger drink, and they would be disgusted with the surroundings of the stronger drink. The same can be said in favor of beer. As long as the Prohibitionists make no distinction between wine and whisky, between beer and brandy, just so long they will be regarded by most people as fanatics.

"The Prohibitionists cannot expect to make this question a federal one. The United States has no jurisdiction of this subject. Congress can pass no laws affecting this question that could hav any force except in such parts of our country as are not within the jurisdiction of states. It is a question for the states and not for the federal government. The Prohibitionists are simply throwing away their votes. Let us suppose that we had a Prohibition Congress and a Prohibition president—what steps could be taken to do away with drinking in the city of New York?—what steps could be taken in any state of this Union?—what could by any possibility be done?

"A few years ago the Prohibitionists demanded above all things that the tax be taken from distilled spirits, claiming at that time that such a tax made the government a partner in vice. Now, when the Republican party proposes under certain circumstances to remove that tax, the Prohibitionists denounce the movement as one in favor of intemperance. We hav also been told that the tax on whisky should be kept for the reason that it increases the price, and that an increased price tends to make a temperate people; that if the tax is taken off the price will fall and the whole country start on the downward road to destruction. Is it possible that human nature stands on such slippery ground? Is it possible that our civilization to-day rests upon the price of alcohol, and that, should the price be reduced, we would all go down together? For one, I cannot entertain such a humiliating and disgraceful view of human nature. I believe that man is destined to grow greater, grander, and nobler. I believe that no matter what the cost of alcohol may be, life will grow too valuable to be thrown away. Men hold life according to its value. Men as a rule only throw away their lives when they are not worth keeping. When life becomes worth living it will be carefully preserved and will be hoarded to the last grain of sand that falls through the glass of time."

"What is the reason for so much intemperance?"

"When many people are failures, when they are distanced in the race, when they fall behind, when they giv up, when they lose ambition, when they finally become convinced that they are worthless, then they are in danger of becoming intemperate, precisely as they are in danger of becoming dishonest. In other words, having failed in the race of life on the highway, they endeavor to reach the goal by going cross-lots, by crawling through the grass. Disguise this matter as we may, all people are not successes, all people hav not the brain or the muscle or the moral stamina necessary to succeed. Some fall in one way, some in another—some in the net of strong drink, some in the web of circumstance, and others in a thousand ways, and the world cannot grow better unless the unworthy fail. The law is the survival of the fittest—that is to say, the destruction of the unfit. There is no scheme of morals, no scheme of government, no scheme of charity, that can reverse this law. If it could be reversed, then the result would be the survival of the unfittest, the speedy end of which would be extinction of the human race."

"Temperance men say it is wise in so far as possible to remove temptation from our fellow-men."

"Let us look at this in regard to other matters. How can we do away with larceny? We cannot remove property. We cannot destroy the money of the world to keep people from stealing some of it. In other words, we cannot afford to make the world valueless to prevent larceny. All strength by which temptation is resisted must come from the inside. Virtue does not depend upon the obstacles to be overcome—virtue depends upon what is inside of the man. A man is not honest because the safe of the bank is perfectly secure. On the honest man the condition of the safe has no effect. We will never succeed in raising great and splendid people by keeping them out of temptation. Great people withstand temptation. Great people hav what might be called moral muscle, moral force. They are poised within themselvs. They understand their relations to the world. The best possible foundation for honesty is the intellectual perception that dishonesty can under no circumstances be a good investment—that larceny is not only wicked, but foolish—not only criminal, but stupid—that crimes are committed only by fools.

"On every hand there is what is called temptation. Every man has the opportunity, so called, of doing wrong. Every man in this country has the opportunity of drinking too much, has the opportunity of acquiring the opium habit, has the opportunity of taking morphine every day—in other words, has the opportunity of destroying himself. How are they to be prevented? Most of them are prevented—at least in a reasonable degree—and they are prevented by their intelligence, by their surroundings, by their education, by their objects and aims in life—by the people they love, by the people who love them.

"No one will deny the evils of intemperance, and it is hardly to be wondered at that people who regard only one side—who think of the impoverished and wretched, of wives and children in want, of desolate homes—become the advocates of absolute Prohibition. At the same time, there is a philosophic side, and the question is whether more good cannot be done by moral influence, by example, by education, by the gradual civilization of our fellow-men, than in any other possible way. The greatest things are accomplished by indirection. In this way the idea of force, of slavery, is avoided. The person influenced does not feel that he has been trampled upon, does not regard himself as a victim—he feels rather as a pupil, as one who receives a benefit, whose mind has been enlarged, whose life has been enriched—whereas the direct way of 'Thou shalt not' produces an antagonism—in other words, produces the natural result of 'I will.'

"By removing one temptation you add strength to others. By depriving a man of one stimulant, as a rule, you drive him to another, and the other may be far worse than the one from which he has been driven. We hav hundreds of laws making certain things misdemeanors which are naturally right—as, for instance, the laws against smuggling. Thousands of people, honest in most directions, delight in outwitting the government—derive absolute pleasure from getting in a few clothes and shawls without the payment of duty. Thousands of people buy things in Europe for which they pay more than they would for the same things in America, and then exercise their ingenuity in slipping them through the custom house.

"A law to hav real force must spring from the nature of things, and the justice of this law must be generally perceived, otherwise it will be evaded.

"The temperance people themselvs are playing into the hands of the very party that would refuse to count their votes. Allow the Democrats to remain in power, allow the Democrats to be controled by the South, and a large majority in this country might be in favor of temperance legislation and yet the votes would remain uncounted. The party of reform has a great interest in honest elections, and honest elections must first be obtained as the foundation of reform. The Prohibitionists can take their choice between these parties.

"Mr. Fisk knows that he cannot be elected president—knows that it is impossible for him to carry any state in the Union. He also knows that in nearly every state in this Union—probably in all—a majority of the people believe in stimulants. Why not work with this great and enlightened majority? Why rush to your extreme for the purpose not only of making yourself useless but hurtful?

"No man in the world is more opposed to intemperance than I am. No man in the world feels more keenly the evils and the agony produced by the crime of drunkenness. And yet I would not be willing to sacrifice liberty, individuality, and the glory and greatness of individual freedom to do away with all the evils of intemperance. In other words, I believe that slavery, oppression, and suppression would crowd humanity into a thousand deformities, the result of which would be a thousand times more disastrous to the well-being of man. I do not believe in the slave virtues, in the monotony of tyranny, in the respectability produced by force. I admire the men who hav grown in the atmosphere of liberty, who hav the pose of independence, the virtues of strength, of heroism, and in whose hearts is the magnanimity, the tenderness, and the courage born of victory."

Oil On the Troubled Waters.

Charles Watts in Secular Thought.

There can be no reasonable doubt as to the success of the convention of the American Secular Union just concluded in Pittsburgh. So far as our experience goes, it was one of the best ever held in the States. There was a large attendance of delegates, men and women, who came with the intention of doing real work, and it is pleasing to record that their intentions were fully realized. The official reports of what had been done during the past year were exceedingly cheerful, while the resolves as to the future measures were full of promis and bright hopes. Hereafter we shall notice in these columns some of the conclusions arrived at and point out what appears to us to be their advantage to the Secular cause. At present we desire to notify our readers that the character of the Congress clearly indicated the progress of the Freethought movement. The Union now bids fair to resume its former prestige, and if the program decided upon by the convention is faithfully adhered to the organization will once more be a powerful factor in Liberalizing thought on the American continent. Of its avowed enemies we hav no fear; knowing what to expect, we prepare accordingly. In the work of its real friends we hav every confidence, and we trust the time is past when sham friendship will be made the cover for reprehensible depreciation of the efforts of the earnest toilers and supporters of the Union.

Some of the speaking was remarkably good. For instance, the lecture of Dr. Juliet H. Severance on "Dangers to American Liberty" was a masterpiece of sound reasoning and argumentativ presentation, and Mrs. Mattie A. Freeman dressed in choice and brilliant language her valuable thoughts upon the associations of "Cross and Crown." Our friend J. H. Burnham gave practical information upon "Organization," and S. P. Putnam once more dilated in a graphic manner upon the glories of "The American Republic." We were pleased to see that hard work on the Pacific coast had not impaired our poetical co-worker, either physically or mentally. We hav never known Mr. Putnam to look more healthy than he does at present, while as a speaker he has greatly improved in his unique style. Among the topics for discussion by the various delegates, were the following: 1. What are the best means to further the agitation for taxation of church property? 2. How shall we prevent sectarian institutions from receiving public funds? The speeches were brief and to the point and indicated much thought and appropriate information upon the part of the different speakers. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., of New York, is a most valuable acquisition where sound ability and intellectual discrimination are required. He evidences in his mental work the essence of true greatness, which consists of modesty and adaptability. The two principal officers elected for the year were Judge R. B. Westbrook, of Philadelphia, as president, and E. A. Stevens, as secretary.

Too much praise cannot be given to the Pittsburgh friends for their hard and noble work in making the arrangements for the convention, and providing for the expenses thereof, which amounted to nearly $500. The large hall was beautifully decorated and everything done to make one and all present comfortable. Harry Hoover and Roman Staley were activ throughout and well merited the personal thanks given them by the various delegates for their untiring energies. We trust that the results of the convention, upon the whole, will satisfy them somewhat for their persistent labor, which to them, no doubt, was a "labor of love."

Personally we enjoyed the convention greatly. It afforded us an opportunity of meeting friends from east and west, north and south, and thus becoming acquainted with those who take an activ interest in our movement. The genial Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was, of course, on hand. E. M. Macdonald is a gentleman whose society is always pleasant to us; quiet and unassuming, but full of rich common sense, and always ready to do what he deems right to promote the happiness and welfare of all. To know him thoroughly is to appreciate his many good qualities, which are frequently hidden from the ordinary observer by his great diffidence, or perhaps it should be designated modesty. Mrs. Watts attended the convention and gave a dramatic reading. During our stay in Pittsburgh we were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Abel, whose kindness we shall long remember. Their one desire was to promote our comfort and increase our pleasure, and they succeeded admirably. The Secularists of Pittsburgh ought to be proud of having among them such an excellent family as Mr. and Mrs. Abel and their charming daughters undoubtedly are.

Material Exactness and Spiritual Mistakes.

Before admitting the Mosaic cosmogony to be infallible, let us consider some of the problems connected therewith and see wherein they accord with common sense, coupled with the idea of a supreme intelligence which was and is the author and giver of all material and spiritual blessings, and whose attributes are justice, mercy, and love.

Orthodoxy teaches that Jehovah, in the beginning, created and ordained all that we behold or of which we can conceive in perfect order, harmony, and exactness; that its teachings are conformable to all that is complete and perfect within the comprehension of man. And however false this may be outside the pale of material phenomena, it certainly remains true and inviolate when viewed within the realms of harmony and order by which all matter is governed and controled.

For instance, the action and influence which bodies exercise upon one another in our planetary system—an order so inexorably correct and exact that the astronomer of to-day can foretell the second of time at which an eclipse will occur a thousand or a million years hence; the geologist can giv the date and circumstances environing the existence of prehistoric animal life; the botanist can determin the period of by-gone fauna and flora, and the archæologist can thrust aside the veil of antiquity, uncertainty, and ignorance surrounding the primeval life of rock and earth and write the hidden history of the past. The seasons come and go with a regularity that is majestic, bringing or taking with them the life and death of vegetation. Our planetary system performs its orbits while the ceaseless ages roll, never increasing or diminishing its volume of matter or adding to or shortening the time of its revolutions.

The dawn of time or of history witnessed a no more perfect system of coöperativ cause and effect than that with which we are surrounded to-day, and the conclusion is positiv that the ordainer of the material world made no mistakes.

The Mosaic cosmogony, without apology for or intimation from whence it came, springs a power into the arena of time and space, which it evolves into an architect of a universe and all contained therein. We hav no disposition herein to discuss the merits or demerits of this creativ progeny, except as they relate to its sublimest conception—man.

Although not first in the order of creation, man is undoubtedly the most central figure of it. It was upon him that this God lavished the richest treasures of his wisdom and benevolence; fashioned him in his own likeness; endowed him with reason; gave him dominion over all other creatures; imbued him with an immortal soul—then scrutinized the work of his genius and pronounced it perfect.

The subsequent story of man is too childish to be repeated. Suffice it to say that out of reason came rebellion, out of dominion, subordination, and out of perfection, imperfection.

Is such an order as this compatible with the same intelligence that designed and controls the material world? Why should matter be made to assume indestructibility, and man's soul—the only eternal thing about him—be destroyed? Would or should not the same immutable laws that preserve matter in all its assimilations keep man's soul inviolate? One of two things must be true; either man is destitute of the soul-organism, or, if possessing it, it cannot be destroyed. If God endowed him with it, he placed within him an element of his eternal self, and could no more destroy it than he could annihilate his own being.

If man's immortality be God-given, it must not only be preserved because of its being the highest element of the creation, but also because it is correlativ with the existence of the eternal spirit from whence it sprung. And though Constantine, with the sword of absolute power in one hand and his transcribed cross of credulity in the other, might seek to compel mankind to say that his God had the same right to destroy as to create, the inhumanity and injustice of such action has been combated and condemned by the grand and noble seekers after truth who hav kept alive the progress of the ages.

Why should inorganic matter be created with such elaborate particularity and adaptation to eternal imperishability, and the highest element of organic matter be doomed to everlasting torture? Does this creator care more for matter than mind, more for unconscious dust than animated life? If so, in all candor, let me ask if it would not hav been infinitly better had the human race been left entirely outside the creativ plan. Did you ever contemplate the heartless atrocity of such an order? Can you find in the world of matter a single fact that does not contradict and put it to shame? No. In the material world there is not the slightest defect. Cause and effect, force and matter, gravitation and attraction, motion and inertia, all combine to form a harmonious whole, from which not a single factor can be lost without destruction to all others. If God, in his infinit wisdom, could ordain such perfection in matter, how much more is he able to care for and preserve the mind which he made dominant over all? Christ is made to say, "What does it profit a man though he gains the whole world, yet loses his soul?" and the orthodox church has never been able to approximate to the real value of one, while the great hobby of their "distracted" efforts is the great concern manifested by the soul's giver and creator. The throne of the great Jehovah trembles lest some soul be lost. Destructible immortality! Rubbish! Contrast the maker of the material world with the maker of the spiritual world and the story of the creation and subsequent fall of man is put to shame.

Paine has said, "It is better not to believe in the existence of a God than to believe of him unjustly;" a saying so trite and true that it appeals with great force to the candid, sober sense of this generation.

But whatever else may be thought worthy of the barbaric account of Jehovah, as contained in the Bible, it assuredly cannot be true that the intelligence capable of producing such wonderful harmony within the realms of matter, could hav created man immortal and at the same time created an influence to be exercised upon him that should be more potent for evil than its creator for good—infinit toils and snares prepared for a wayward child.

Let this thought pass into night—fit associate for other kindred ideas which humanity has outgrown and discarded, and in its place substitute the eternal truth that man's first and highest duty is to his fellow-man; that our deeds of right and truth are the blocks with which we buried our Babels of greatness and glory, and for the pinched and withered thoughts of deity we will hav the comforting thought that we hav made the world better by having lived in it.

C. S. Glasco.

Greek Against Roman.

From the San Francisco Freethought.

Last week we received an inquiry from a subscriber who desired to know which was the older, the Roman or the Greek Catholic church. We answered the question according to the best light we enjoyed and then referred it to the bishop of the Greek church in this city, Brother Vladimir. The following is the reply. It is addressed "To His Honor Mr. G. E. Macdonald," and says:

C. Pahugucko, 20 Sepemb, 1888yr.

Dear Sir: In answer to your question concerning the comparativ antiquity of the Greek and Roman churches, I will present the true historical facts as opposed to the theological theory of the Roman-popish priests. Behold:

1. The first ecumenical council of the apostles (as you may see from the fifteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles) was not held in Rome, but in Jerusalem.

2. The first bishop, successor of Jesus Christ, was Jacob of Jerusalem. He was also president of the apostolic council, and his last words upon circumcision and the Jewish rites decided the question; all the apostles and St. Peter obeyed him.

3. All of the apostles wrote their gospels and epistles in the Greek or Hebrew language. Even the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans was written in Greek.

4. Three centuries of early Christianity knew no Latin Bible, all scripture being written in Greek, except a little in Hebrew.

5. The apostles, preaching in the Roman empire, spoke in the Greek language. St. Peter, after departing from the church of Jerusalem, was bishop of the Greek town of Antioch. During seven years afterward he preached and lived much in Egypt, with his disciple Marcus [Mark?], and both founded theological schools in Alexandria.

6. Only at the end of his life was St. Peter dragged to Rome to meet the death of a martyr.

7. Neither was St. Paul a bishop of Rome, but, like St. Peter, near the end of his life he was brought to Rome for trial and painful death. Church history does not know precisely who, during the first century, founded a Christian Church in Rome. Peter and Paul found there an organized church, because many Christians of Palestine fled from persecuting Jews to the capital of the world, and, preaching the gospel, founded a church. In that time of fervent Christian zeal all Christians were missionaries.

8. All the twelve apostles and the disciples of Christ founded churches in the East, and Paul, Peter, Andrew, and Marcus in the West, but no one of them was the founder of a church in Rome. We hav St. Jacob of Jerusalem, St. Peter of Antioch and Alexandria, St. John of Ephesus, Sts. Paul, Luke, Timothy, Titus, and many others, founders of our churches in the East; and recent orthodox bishops of Greece, Russia, Servia, Turkey, Bulgaria, Montenegro, Roumania, Egypt, parts of Asia, Japan, and America, are true and uninterrupted successors of the apostolic founders of their respectiv churches; but no one knows from whom the first bishop of Rome received consecration. Doubtful tradition says that Clement, the second bishop of Rome, was consecrated by the hand of St. Peter. Nobody from the apostles, for a long time, lived at Rome; and for this reason, the mere tradition of the Romish church is unworthy the name of historical truth.

The church of Rome fell into many errors, became apostate from the faith of the true apostolic church, and in later days has invented doctrins too monstrous for the human conscience, as witness the dogma of the infallibility of the pope, a heresy that givs to a single man the power of God in church affairs. The errors of the Roman church sprung up because the Western community of Christians never had the apostolic tradition in the true sense of the word. The center of true Christian conscience was with the Eastern Catholic church.

Behold, the first ecumenical council was held in Greece, at Nicea, and there was no pope of Rome. Other ecumenical councils hav been held in Greece, without the presence of popes, but with the holy ghost, who, we hold, livs only in the true orthodox church of our savior and apostles, and who alone makes decisions on religious questions infallible.

Now our true Catholic orthodox church governs by four patriarchs east of Jerusalem—Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople—and the holy synods of Russia, Greece, Athens, Servia, Bulgaria, and Montenegro. We hav many orthodox potentates, the emperor of Russia, and kings and dukes. They are all sons of the orthodox church and obedient to her laws and customs.

Different countries and potentates belong to our church, with about one hundred million believers, but the unity and autarchy in orthodox churches are perfect, because the power to govern rests not with man, who is sinful, but with the holy ghost in the councils, who there makes decisions, in matters of salvation, that are infallible, as in the councils of the apostles. The head of our church is Christ; we hav no pope, no emperor as lawgiver in faith except the savior.

In that unfortunate affair, the apostasy of the popish church from the orthodox faith, the best and most impartial judge is the history of the church. That is the true basis for a rightful decision of the question. If any church keep without corruption the apostolic faith and the constitution of the seven ecumenical councils, that church has divine right to excommunicate all sects and communities if they become apostates from the order of apostolic institutions.

As long ago as the ninth century the papal community began to rapidly apostatize from the apostolic ideal in governing church affairs. Church councils at length lost due power, and the pope of Rome became the despotic governor in all spiritual affairs of the Western Christian communities. Among the good popes there were heretics, anathematized by ecumenical councils, and sinners in faith and morality. The Western church, up to the time of the Reformation, was the obedient servant of the popes, and committed errors with them both in faith and morality. (1) By order of the pope and Emperor Charles the Great, in the orthodox creed, filioque (and from the son) was introduced against ecumenical law, and is still recognized by the pope. (2) "Purgatory" was invented by the popes. (3) Indulgences were also invented. (4) The apostolic institution of the fast on Friday was transferred to Saturday. (5) All clergymen were prohibited from marrying. (6) The pope became secular sovereign and murderer of the guilty and innocent alike. (7) The pope approved the profligacy of his friends the Jesuits. (8) Invented the "immaculate conception." (9) The latest dogma of papal infallibility, etc.

Such teachings are unknown to the apostolic orthodox church. You may thus see clearly that the popes and their subservient communities are apostates to the ancient Catholic faith.

Historical facts must teach you that the Eastern orthodox church was the mother of the Western. The pope of Rome, proud, overbearing, and wealthy, showed to Eastern Christianity the daughter's intention to rebel against the law of the mother. In such a case every mother has the right to banish the impenitent daughter from her house, but all mankind agree that the daughter cannot excommunicate the mother if the latter be in the right before God and man. The Romish organization has been excommunicated by the orthodox church because it was seen that the antichristian spirit was ruling the papal hierarchy. And the true church was not mistaken, for after excommunication, in the tenth century, and during many hundred years, the abuses of the popes covered Europe and nearly all parts of the world with blood and dissension.

In my missionary work in Japan, and traveling in India and different parts, East and West, I myself experienced that domineering and persecuting spirit of the Roman-popish clergy. For one example: In the Island of Ceylon, south of India, I called at a large Portuguese Jesuit institution, and asked the privilege of seeing it. The chief of that institution in Colombo was very rude in his conversation with me, saying, "You are a rebel against the pope." He berated me much and showed me nothing. I answered him: "History says that the popish church is daughter of the Eastern orthodox church, and a rightful mother cannot be a rebel against her daughter, if she banish her for disobedience; but all nations agree that the unruly daughter is a rebel against her mother, and may be punished if she will not make herself poor in spirit, and penitent."

Eastern patriarchs, in a letter to the pope (1844), called him the first protestant against the authority of divine law as held by the orthodox church, and predicted that popish errors, current at the time, must disappear like the widespread Arianism in the fourth century, and that the unchangeable apostolic truth of the orthodox church must fill all the world with joyful unity of faith and morality. There must be one true church of the Christians, and all communities at variance with her in dogma and canon of morality are excommunicated by her, and cannot be called churches but sects, no matter how large they are.

You will now understand how the Greek church is mother of all other churches, and had divine right to excommunicate disobedient Christians like the pope and his clergy. I hav the honor to be,

Your obedient servant, VLADIMIR,
Bishop of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands.

Homespun Farm.

I was talking politics last summer with the keeper of a country store, when he pointed out a farmer who was coming down the hill with a load of produce, and said: "There's a man who follows out your theory a great deal farther than you do. Just you get acquainted with him and see how it works on Homespun Farm."

Then, as the farmer drove up, he said: "You're pretty late to-day, Uncle Eben, and I don't see how I can afford to take any more peas or squashes while I've so much on hand, unless you want something out of the store."

"You know my principles," said Uncle Eben, a tall, gaunt man of about fifty: "Never buy abroad what you can make at home, I say; and we're making all we want just now. That stuff is fresh enough to keep till to-morrow, and it's fresh enough to carry over to Blaineville, if you won't pay cash."

After a little bargaining the storekeeper made an offer, which was accepted with evident reluctance. "Look here, Uncle Eben," said he, as he counted out the money, "you havn't told me yet what made you so late. Nobody sick, I hope?"

"The old clock's stopped again and I havn't the time to take it to pieces this week."

"You ought to buy a new clock or a cheap watch."

"'Gainst my principles, as you ought to know."

"Well, here's a man that knows all about clocks like yours, and I guess he'll fix it so it won't stop again in a hurry."

"Can't afford to pay for work as I can do myself somehow."

"There's no need to pay anything," said I. "I don't do it as a business. I hav nothing particular on hand to-day, and I would like nothing better than to ride out with you and look at your clock. I shall take nothing for it but the ride and my dinner."

As we rode up the hill together he complained of the heat, and as he saw me look at his thick heavy woolen shirt and coat, he said: "Well, homespun is pretty warm on a day like this. But all that wool was cut off my own sheep and wove by my wife and daughters. We make all the profits there is to be made on our clothes, and that's a great deal better than letting our employment be taken away from us by nigger-drivers down South and millionaires in Rhode Island. 'A home market for home labor,' that's my principle. You see I've been a protectionist ever since I first read the New York Tribune forty years ago, and I always vote the straight Republican ticket. We all know that we ought to do our own manufacturing at home and not let any outsider get the job. That's good doctrin for us as a nation, and it's just as good doctrin for us as a family, too. Our clothing is all made in the house, as I said; our food is all grown on the farm, except salt, and that don't cost much. I mend and make the furniture and woodenware and hardware winters, and my boy Josh he makes all our boots and shoes out of our own hides. You see I follow the true American system: 'Diversify industry and liv independent.' Now there's a pair of boots Josh made for me winter before last. Just look at them! Why, they wear like iron!"

"No doubt of that," said I. "Do you ever hav corns?"

"Well, yes; I hav a few. You ain't a corn-doctor?"

I disclaimed the compliment and pondered over the problem whether any profession would be more lucrativ if such boots were to come into general use.

"Yes, sir," he resumed, "the only way to wealth is for us to export just as much as we can and import as little. We must keep the balance of trade in our favor, say all our statesmen. Now I run my farm on just that plan—sell all I can get to market and buy nothing I can raise or do without. That givs me a surplus of my own in the Blaineville bank."

"Do you raise your own wheat?"

"Generally; though it looks this year as if we might hav to get along on rye and Indian."

"How about tea and coffee?"

"Raspberry leaves and succory root taste just as good and are a great deal wholesomer."

"And sugar?"

"Comes out of my own wood-lot. So does all our fuel."

I was still asking questions, when we stopped in front of a house which was sadly in need of paint and had several windows boarded up. As I jumped out I heard a shrill voice say: "There, ma! That stove-back father made last night has burnt through already. I told you it would. He's got to buy castings or do his own cooking."

"Well, well, Jane!" said another woman. "Guess we can get through somehow with the crane and spit and brick oven, as grandma did."

The voices ceased as I entered the parlor and saw a rag carpet, a few chairs and tables kept from falling to pieces by strips of unpainted lumber, and two pictures in the gaudiest possible colors and clumsiest possible frames. The pigments, as I afterward found, had been given to the girls by an aunt who came every summer for a fortnight's visit and brought the family their yearly supply of pins, needles, thread, tape, etc. In a corner stood the old clock; and I was taking off the face, when I heard a voice which had not reached my ears before, say: "Oh, dear! nothing on the table but fried pork, and I can't stay in the room with this thick dress on."

She was promptly hushed, and I was shown into the kitchen, where I met the family. The mother's life had, apparently, been almost crushed out by the pressure of the father's principles; the son looked as if he had never dared to think for himself; but the two girls, whom I had already heard complaining, were evidently in chronic rebellion. As we sat around the dining-table, they kept apologizing for the salt pork, for the necessity of serving it in the frying-pan, for the total lack of white flour, even to make pastry, for the wooden plates, and for the clumsy knives and forks. The elder girl, a short, black-eyed damsel, who looked as if she would never see thirty again, even dared to say, as the raspberry tea was poured out into rusty tin cups, that she couldn't see why her father would not trade off his maple sugar for store sugar, pound to pound, and take the balance in such tea and coffee as would be fit to drink. They certainly were very undutiful; but their dresses were uncomfortably thick for such a room on such a day, and the poor girls seemed painfully conscious of the destitution in which they lived. Their father pretended not to notice what they said, but hurried off with Josh as soon as he could, after telling me that the stage from Blaineville would take me back. The girls, who I now saw wore moccasins, followed me as I went back to the clock; and the elder said: "I suppose you think we're too hard on father; but you don't know how hard it is for us. You see how we look, and how the house looks, and everything in it. We never see a new book, nor a magazine, nor even a paper; for father says he can do his own thinking, and he won't pay anyone to think for him. Maria and I never go anywhere, even to church; for we havn't time to make cloaks or bonnets fit to be seen in. It's all we can do to keep ourselvs dressed for staying at home, in that horrid homespun. Nobody ever comes to see us, for father has quarreled with all the neighbors. He tells the Democrats that they are trying to make our people slaves to the British, and those Republicans who hav turned Prohibitionists, that they are traitors, and the Blaine and Harrison Republicans that they hav no business to preach what they won't practice. Of course, they tell him that he's only making his principles ridiculous, and his family miserable. To be sure he's making money, but he might make just as much and let us liv as other people do. For instance, if he would let me buy what things I want to make up, Maria and I could keep all the family properly dressed, and take in work enough to pay for all we bought. Mother could make more money, sending eggs and butter to Blaineville, than weaving cloth. Josh had better do cobbling for the neighbors, and let all our boots and shoes be bought with what he would earn. Father's wages as a carpenter would more than supply all he makes for us, and then we could hav the things we want. The neighbors hav told him again and again that he'd better giv up trying to raise his own wool and wheat, and go into milk and butter, eggs and poultry. I've tried to make him see it, but it's no use. I've figured it all out to him again and again, but he always says he don't care for figures and statistics; all he wants to know about is principles. The worst of it is that the next election is going to be carried according to his principles, so he says, and then all the farmers will hav to put them into practice. How the women are going to stand it, I don't know. Oh! I only wish I was a man! Wouldn't I go on the stump, and let people know how such principles work? And I do really wish you'd put something about it in some New York paper. It would never reach our neighbors, and they know all about us already. If every voter knew what mischief father's principles are doing, I am sure they would get voted down so badly that he would hav to giv them up."

While she ran on I finished repairing the clock, and had set it once more in motion when the stage stopped in front of the house, in reply to a signal that had been set up.

"Tell Uncle Eben," shouted the driver as I got in, "that the cashier of the Blaineville bank has gone off with all the money. Guess he's in Canada by this time."

I heard a shriek as we drove off. The driver and passengers moralized coolly about the folly of putting money into bank when it was needed to make the family comfortable. It was generally agreed that the farm had been very badly managed and was running down rapidly. None of us questioned the correctness of Uncle Eben's political principles, however; and I am still trying to find out how it happens that they are so bad for him and his family, and yet so good for him and you and me and all the rest of us as a nation. It really is wonderful to see a system which would ruin any family that tried it make all our families prosperous. Of course the Republicans hav the right theory; but yet, when it is tried on a scale small enough to let its mode of action be clearly understood, it certainly does lead to queer results. A REPUBLICAN BEFORE THE WAR.

Our London Letter.

Last week the new Surrey chapel and schools were formally opened by that distinguished believer in the efficacy of prayer and water, C. H. Spurgeon, and if the report of his speech on that occasion is correct, and is a fair sample of his ordinary effusions, I can only consider that the members of his congregation are very sparsely furnished with brains. He expressed his opinion that ranting was a most desirable thing, and a great deal more of it is required than is now current. He can certainly supply a fair amount of the article himself. In the course of his remarks he stated that speaking some time ago to a gentleman who said, "Well, I am not a Christian; I am what is called an Agnostic," he replied, "That is Greek, is it not?" and was told such was the case, whereupon he rejoined, "Well, that word in Latin is 'ignoramus.'" No doubt this was considered a very smart thing to say, and as he told his hearers that the word "Agnostic" did really mean that those who professed Agnosticism did not know anything, no doubt they set him down as a marvel of learning. Probably there was no one present who knew any different, and so the silly lie will be retailed as a very telling point against the more enlightened, who are willing to admit their ignorance of that of which they know nothing.

Another equally shining light named Hugh Price Hughes, who has advertised himself pretty freely of late, is in great distress of mind over the educational question. He is mightily afraid of purely secular education, and pleads that as Atheists are not in the majority they hav no right to ask such a thing. As he belongs to a sect which is not in the majority, I wonder how he would like his principles applied to himself? On the other hand, he does not want the Established church creeds taught, but only the Bible to be read every day, though he states in his letter that the only basis of morals in this country for the last thousand years has been Christianity. He must be a very poor student of English history, past or present, not to see that such is the best argument against extending the basis any farther. As he can muster a fair congregation and not a good salary, probably he looks no farther than that, and considers that the morality that ministers to his wants is quite good enough. If a sound basis of morality in its true sense were established, things would not be quite so flourishing for him.

It is the morality thus advocated that permits such a man as Balfour to send a troop of soldiers to evict Irish tenants from their miserable holdings and cast them into the road, careless of the result, and at the same time giv a speech at the church congress on "The Needs of Human Nature and Their Supply in Christianity," and encourages a Warren to slaughter naked Africans, deliver lectures on the Holy Land, and preside at Christian policemen's prayer-meetings, and then set on these same Christian policemen to attack defenseless citizens for holding public open-air meetings, while he shows his incapacity or disinclination in repressing crime or discovering criminals.

Theoretical Christianity may be a fine theory, but practical Christianity, as it is seen in its daily work and influence, is, as it always has been, one of the greatest curses that ever befell humanity. J. D.

Sonnet to Satan.

Hail, Satan, of the crumpled horns and tail—
Not meaning that the tail is crumpled, no—
The cloven foot they tell of in this vale,
And frightful mien that rattles Christians so!
Hail, king of sheol, where the "burning lake"
Throws up its waves of flaming brimstone dread,
Where all "damned souls," in awful pain and ache,
Are tossed about and toasted very red!
Ah, Satan, I don't think you're half so black
As pious parsons paint and try to prove;
Barring that job on Job, I fail to track
To thee one act of cussedness, by Jove!
While Jahveh's record, starting with the flood,
Is one wild course of savagery and blood! SI SLOKUM.

A Christian Country in Fact.

We are just now hearing a good deal of spread-eagle oratory from the campaign speakers of both and all parties about this being a great and glorious and free country—a country of equal rights, of unrestricted liberty, where one man is as good as another, and no better, and all are sovereigns. We are told that our government is our servant, that our officials and judges are our employees, put in place to fulfill the will of the people, and bound, therefore, by our constitutions and laws.

It is all a lie! The United States is under the thumb of the Christian church.

About this time, just before the election of state and national officers, a great many newly-qualified men are preparing to exercise the privilege of an "American sovereign," and to that end those of European birth must take out naturalization papers. In two instances that hav come to our knowledge, though in one we hav not learned the details, these papers hav been refused because the applicant is an Atheist.

The first case is that of Moses Stern, of Philadelphia. Two or three weeks ago, the Associated Press related that Mr. Stern had applied to the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia for his final papers, having taken out the first in due time, and in regular shape. He was asked by the court to state his religion, and he answered that he had none. Thereupon the judge said that he should refuse the papers, as "there are Infidels enough in the country now." These facts were brought to the attention of the secretary of the American Secular Union when he came East after the Pittsburgh Congress, and on his return West Mr. Stevens stopped at Philadelphia to inquire into the matter. The constitution of Pennsylvania declares that "no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience," and with this declaration before him it was not seen how Philadelphia's judge could refuse a man citizenship because of his lack of religious belief.

Moses Stern was found by Mr. Stevens Sunday night, the 14th, listening to Charles Watts. Mr. Stern is a Russian Jew by birth, and an Infidel by virtue of intellect. Mr. Stevens presented the facts in Stern's case to a Philadelphia lawyer, himself an Infidel, and was at once told that nothing could be done. Not only, said this lawyer, is an Atheist disfranchised in Pennsylvania, but no Atheist can legally follow the professions of law or medicin, or hold official position. This was a statement of such an outrageous nature that the Union's secretary could scarcely credit it, and he took Stern once more to the Court of Common Pleas, and stated his case to the udge. Here is a man, he said, who has his first papers. He has taken up government land in the West, he is practically a citizen, but should he wish to go to any country where passports are required, of what country can he claim to be a citizen? In his first papers he has renounced his allegiance to Russia, and now Pennsylvania will not let him become an American subject. He is a man without a country. In his previous application he was not asked to affirm, and he was not aware that an affirmation was permitted. He has proof of his residence in the country to meet the legal requirements, he has complied with all the conditions, and asks to be made a citizen. Judge Wilson inquired of Stern, "Hav you conscientious scruples against swearing?" Stern replied, No. He was ready to comply with all the forms of law. The judge refused to accept him, holding that an Infidel cannot "swear." Mr. Stevens asked the judge to point out the law supporting such ruling, and Judge Wilson said it was a practice of the courts. No Infidel, therefore, need apply to Pennsylvania's courts for citizenship, even though he be willing to go through the senseless mummery of taking an oath.

Knowledge of the other case comes through the High School Record, of Troy, N. Y., in this paragraph:

"We thought once that Troy was free from religiously inclined idiots of the Boonton, N. J., stamp; but the fact that Judge Fursman, of this city, according to the Evening Standard of July 20th, would not naturalize a man because he differed with him in his religious views, proves that we were mistaken. And this is a free country!"

If there is a Secular Union in Troy, or any man of intelligence who loves liberty and equal rights, this case will be investigated. In this city, a year or so ago, a man was refused his papers by the clerk of the court because he was an Infidel, but the disfranchisment created such a stir that the papers had to be issued. There is positivly no law in this state to uphold the Christian authorities, and a little effort will force the Troy judge to eat his words.

Here we hav two instances of a church and state union, and though both are without law to support them, they are facts which should arouse the people to a realizing sense of the insecurity of their rights. When citizenship can be withheld merely because a man is not in accord with the religious belief of a judge, we certainly are under religious domination to an extent unbearably alarming. Right in Carpenter's Hall, where was signed the Declaration of Independence affirming that all men are created equal, now sits a judge who tramples upon that instrument, and declares that only Christians were meant. Possibly Judge Wilson would hav naturalized Thomas Paine, but he certainly would hav excluded Thomas Jefferson from the rights of citizenship in the republic he helped to found. The United States is a Christian but not yet a civilized country.

Another Church Lie.

In the Presbyterian of September 15th appears a communication from a fellow signing "Lake George," headed, "Mr. Ingersoll on Exhibition." It purports to be an account of Colonel Ingersoll declining to be introduced to a "distinguished clergyman," at a summer resort, and charges Colonel Ingersoll with using a variety of bad language. The story is going the rounds of the religious press, and no doubt many ignorant Christians will believe it.

The story is, however, a church lie. The only truthful thing in it is that Colonel Ingersoll did decline to permit Joe Cook (the "distinguished clergyman") to be presented to him. The rest of the yarn is a romance by the correspondent, inspired, perhaps, by Cook himself. The correct version of the incident is that Cook had been trying to meet Colonel Ingersoll, and succeeded at last in getting some one to offer to introduce him. When the two approached Colonel Ingersoll, the latter said that he did not desire to know Mr. Cook. Thereupon Joseph bellowed out that as Colonel Ingersoll had been so badly defeated by Mr. Gladstone, he probably felt sore toward the Christians. The colonel stopped long enough to say that that was not the reason, but that he declined to know Mr. Cook because that individual was a liar, and then walked away, leaving the "distinguished clergyman" very much embarrassed. One witness of the meeting reports that the colonel added, "and a coward." That is all there was to the incident. Neither party uttered an oath, and no further conversation ensued. The "very flood of blasphemy," the "oaths that frightened ladies to fly out of the porch," the "demoniac rage," the "profanity that gushed forth as if perdition had broken its flood gates," existed only in the mind of the lying religious correspondent.

When the Christians cannot report a simple incident like this without the grossest lying, what hope is there for anyone to know what really has occurred in the world when there were none but Christians to record it?

It Does Indeed Add to the Seriousness of the Issue.

Again has THE TRUTH SEEKER made the Galveston News pious, and the church ought to vote us a large reward. This time we did it with the figures of the Chicago tax exemption of church property, and the News at once finds in the wickedness which would tax these edifices a problem difficult of solution by the Henry George folks. "Are the single tax reformers," it asks, "prepared to tax church property?" and it continues:

"If they exempt church property in land values the exemption will be worth more and will be felt as a greater burden, and will be a dreadful stimulus to the increase of ecclesiastical landowning apart from the exact needs of churches for sites, from which the state with exceptional respect for natural right has thus far kept its taxing hands. If the single-tax people do not exempt church property they may expect to find an issue of some practical importance in front of them, and Dr. McGlynn may be able to advise his associates whether the stringent action of his church in his case did not hav something to show of prevision on the part of a sagacious pontiff and vigilant cardinals regarding the raising of such an issue. People do not much consider the amount of the untaxed church property, but a list recently compiled for the New York TRUTH SEEKER from the records, giving lot and block, shows an aggregate value of $3,504,000 in the west division of Chicago. It is, of course, a list of improved as well as unimproved property. But it is enough to indicate the magnitude of the practical question which would come up under an exclusiv land value tax system."

The single tax reformers can fight their own battles in defense of their system of political economy, but we can assure the News that they would tax the churches. Both Henry George and Dr. McGlynn hav so publicly stated, and the latter has further written that he is in favor of all of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Indeed, the very core of the new theory of taxation is to so tax land values that land shall not be kept idle or held for speculativ purposes. Church land is the idlest of all ecclesiastical property. It is used but one-seventh of the time, and for no useful purpose then. Untaxed, it is held for speculation, and there are many churches in the country, and especially in this city, built by the money obtained from the sale of land acquired when it could be had for a song, but which has since advanced in price hundreds of dollars per foot. This shows that under any system of taxation the exemption of church property is a huge injustice. The growth of the community has built these churches, which hav never returned one dollar to pay the expense of protecting them.

Whether taxes are levied on land values, or on the value of improvements on land, church exemption is unfair, unjust, and un-American. And the objection of the News to the new scheme, that it would necessarily hav to tax churches, is in our opinion the strongest point in its favor.

One More Instance.

Marlboro, Mass., is having the experience with the Roman Catholic church which all towns will hav sooner or later where the Catholics are sufficiently numerous. Marlboro is an old town, and, for two hundred years, was typically American. A generation ago shoemaking was introduced, the shoe shop brought an influx of cheap foreign labor, mostly French and Irish Catholic, and now two-thirds of the population is under the control of the priests.

A few months ago Stillman Pratt was publishing in his paper a French column, the editor of which said things offensiv to the French priest, and the paper was anathematized and boycotted from the altar. Mr. Pratt has lived for thirty years in the town, and during this time he has "studiously refrained from antagonizing the Catholic church," and has had "none but the kindest feelings toward his brethren of the Catholic faith." Now his charity has turned to gall, and his forbearance to a desire for vengeance. Such is the force of touching a man's pocket.

But there is a wider significance to this fight between the Protestants and Catholics, precipitated by the boycott on Mr. Pratt. Since the Baltimore council the French priests hav built in Marlboro a large parochial school, and hav compelled all the French Catholics to withdraw their children from the public schools. The Irish priests are to follow suit. And for years the town government and the school board hav both been in the hands of the church, to do with as she pleased. The Americans hav been asleep, the merchants not daring to protest, and the newspapers keeping quiet for fear of losing patronage. But at last the fight is on, and the time-serving obsequiousness of the people will shield them no longer. Unless they are content to let the priests control their papers as well as their town government and schools, they must stand up and vote and work against the church.

Perhaps a few hundred cases like this will awaken the people of this country to the danger of longer contributing to the support of Romanism. Tax all ecclesiastical property and schools, refuse to giv a penny to any religious institution, and Rome will be shorn of two-thirds of her power. Continue the present policy, and Rome may rule this country within fifty years—aye, within the next generation.

Two Letters.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Buffalo was recently to celebrate its thirty-sixth anniversary, and its president wrote to both candidates for the presidency asking their views with regard to the work of such associations. Mr. Cleveland gushingly wrote:

"Dear Sir: I gladly comply with your request, and tender the expression of my appreciation of the beneficent mission of the Young Men's Christian Association so rapidly multiplying throughout our land. We are a busy nation. The impetuous rush and enterprise of our people to a casual observer would seem to yield no place to the consideration and fostering of the influences which radiate from these institutions, but to those who know how well our daily life is grounded upon Christian principles it is a matter of no surprise that Young Men's Christian Associations challenge our attention and care. It seems to me that nothing is more essential to our continued welfare and prosperity as a people than the preservation of our faith in the usefulness of such organizations. Yours very truly, GROVER CLEVELAND."

Mr. Harrison reluctantly said:

"My Dear Sir: Your letter of September 8th has been received, and I think I should adhere to my former determination. If there were any occasion for an expression upon the subject it would be cheerfully and heartily given, but to make an occasion does not seem to me to be appropriate. The organization is too well known to need any such support or advertisment. Such a letter would appear to be rather in aid of myself than of the organization, and I hav too much respect for it to seem to use it in that way.

"Very truly yours, BENJAMIN HARRISON."

The joke is that the first letter was written by a gentleman who is practically an Infidel, and the second by a gentleman who is a practical and practicing Presbyterian. When Mr. Cleveland was governor of this state—and presumably now—he used to talk in private strongly against Christianity. Mr. Harrison has always been an activ Christian worker.

Politics compels people to do things which appear strange when viewed through the spectacles of principle. Mr. Cleveland caters to the churches; Mr. Harrison doesn't want religion in his politics! Verily, verily, vote-getting is an abstruse science.

The "W. C. T. U." Convention.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union held its fifteenth annual convention in this city last week. Frances Willard presided, and a good many other notable females took part in the program.

The part of the Union's work which givs it interest and significance to Liberals is the fact that the women want to vote simply to put down rum and put up Jesus Christ in the legislation of the country. No one will hav any objection to the first sentiment, but a good many will strongly object to the latter. Frances Willard herself, the leader by strength of character, and president by election, does not want the ballot for any other purpose, being too good a Christian to believe that woman has the same rights as a man. The delegates at this convention represented about two hundred thousand members of the Union, which constitutes a force of no mean power. The Union has a board of evangelistic work, and the chairwoman of that board started this convention going by leading in prayer. Then "Nearer, My God, to Thee" was sung; another prayer offered, after which the singers rendered "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," then reading from the Bible, and more prayers and singing of religious songs. Then the Prohibition party was indorsed.

The same evening that these women held their first public session, the Manhattan Liberal Club convened as usual, and as it happened, the lecture of the evening was on prohibition of the liquor traffic. The speaker was a prohibitionist of the Christian variety, and he made the usual arguments for his cause. In the discussion which followed, a remark was made which may well set the Infidel prohibitionists to thinking. Dr. Lambert has been for years one of the strongest advocates of legislation against liquor in New York. In season and out of season he has denounced alcohol, thundered against its use in beverages, and declaimed against the people who sell it. Of course he agreed with the lecturer, and was, in fact, selected to reply to the opponents of prohibition. Stating his political position, he said in substance: "I shall vote the Prohibition ticket, and I am not throwing away my vote, because I shall count as one opposed to the liquor traffic, and that satisfies me. But if I thought the Prohibition party would win, I should vote against it. It is altogether too pious. Too much God and religion, too much Sunday and Bible, in the party for me to desire it to win."

We recommend these words to the consideration of those Liberals who do not stop to reflect upon the result of the success of the Prohibitionists standing on their present God-in-the-Constitution platform. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the biggest religious political party in the country, and though its members hav now no votes, their influence is vast, and the years are probably not many before they will be at the polls voting for Jesus and their favorit minister.

Another thing these women hav tacked on to their beneficent reform movement, and that is a committee on "the suppression of impure literature." This is the chaste expression for obscenity. One would think that ladies who can stand the impurity of the Bible might well leave the suppression of dirtier works to Comstock, the self-appointed moral scavenger of the country. Just what the ladies mean by impure literature we do not know authoritativly, but one acquainted with their usual standards—leaving out, for the present, the Bible—can easily guess that any argument opposed to their work or to their religion would be stamped upon with all the combined force of their dainty feet, and execrated with all the volume of their soft voices. We can admire the enthusiasm of these women and applaud whatever good work they may do, but it occurs to us that if they once get into power the lot of the heretical mortal will be hard indeed, and the paths of the male half of creation exceedingly narrow and stony.

The success of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union party of Prohibition means the success of the ministers and a theocratic government. What that is we hav only to study the history of this country to know too well.

It Was and It Wasn't.

There are usually two sides to a dispute, and the following is no exception:

"FALL RIVER, Sept. 28, 1888.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I write to you concerning an argument I hav had about the original states. I base my claim on an article I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER entitled, 'The Meanness and Hypocrisy of Philadelphia.' After reading your article I stated that Rhode Island was not one of the original states in the formation of this government. The opposition claims that Rhode Island was one of the original states, because it was allowed to come in by adopting the Constitution. My claim is that there were only eleven original states, and all others, whether they were admitted by act of Congress, or by adopting the Constitution, were not original states. As Rhode Island did not take any act or part in the first election of a president, I don't think it could be an original state. We finally left the discussion to some of the prominent lawyers of this place, but they gave it up. We then left it to the New York Sun, and it evaded the question by saying that, of the thirteen states, Rhode Island was one. We now appeal to you for your decision, which will be final. I hope you will answer as soon as possible, and oblige

"A CONSTANT READER OF THE TRUTH SEEKER."

Rhode Island was one of the original colonies, established in this order: Virginia, 1606; Plymouth, 1620; Massachusetts, 1628; New Hampshire, 1629; Maryland, 1632; Connecticut, 1635; Rhode Island, 1636; New York, 1662; North and South Carolina, 1663; New Jersey, 1664; Pennsylvania, 1681; Delaware, 1682. In 1692 the colony of Plymouth was united to that of Massachusetts, and in 1732 the last of the original colonies, Georgia, was established.

After the Revolution Articles of Confederation were adopted (1781) and in 1787 Congress called upon the states to send delegates to a convention at Philadelphia for the purpose of revising these Articles. The convention submitted our Constitution, which is essentially different from the Articles, and this Constitution was almost at once ratified by nine states, which number insured its adoption. George Washington was elected president in 1788, took the oath of office in 1789, but Rhode Island had no part in his election, not coming into the new Union till May 29, 1790. But as one of the original state governments to which the Constitution was submitted, she is entitled to the place historians unanimously accord her among the thirteen. She was very activ in the Revolution, and in some particulars ahead of Massachusetts in showing independence of Great Britain. As we look at it, the "original" states were those in existence prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and Rhode Island certainly meets this requirement. New York did not adopt this instrument for several months, and Rhode Island's delay of a few more months did not impair her standing in the Union.

A Thanksgiving Service.

The Youngstown, O., Telegram reports the holding of a thanksgiving service at that place in one of the churches by the survivors of a railroad collision in which a great many were killed or wounded. The meeting was opened with the Lord's Prayer and the hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

The Rev. Mr. Anderson, who conducted the service, "showed that he realized how close the call had been, and how miraculously the lives of the survivors had been saved." He "did not believe that the Lord planned the wreck, but he permitted it. The Lord, in his own omnipotent knowledge and his own beneficent reasons, permitted it, perhaps as a warning or punishment to those whose selfishness had caused it. He drew from the horrors of the calamity the lesson of the nearness of death to life, and urged the necessity of always being prepared to meet death, no matter in what form or at what time it might come. The wreck had brought the survivors nearer to God, had closened the eternal bond between the children and the father."

We are now waiting for a report of the meeting at which the wounded and the friends of the killed thanked God for the occurrence.

Meaning Business.

The following letter explains itself:

"Oct. 20, 1888.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I will be one of not less than ten to contribute $100 each toward a fund for testing the question as to whether the provisions of the will of the late Stephen Girard are, or are not, being carried out.

"It seems to me that there are not only ten, but many times that number of persons in this country who could and would contribute that amount toward arresting the further perversion of those provisions, and the making of that institution, as it now is, a nursery for the church, against the well-known and clearly expressed wishes of the benevolent founder of that college. AGNOSTIOUS."

Although the writer of the foregoing desires to remain unknown to the public, we can personally testify to his responsibility. There ought to be nine other wealthy Freethinkers in this country who will do as much as he, and a thousand dollars will start the movement to convert the Christians of Pennsylvania to the gospel of honesty.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON's address is Monte Vista, Colorado. He will lecture anywhere he is called.

PROF. W. S. BELL, of Chicago, is now arranging for lectures in Kansas and Texas in November, after the election is over.

MR. CHARLES WATTS has arranged for a month's Sunday lecture course each in Salt Lake City and Denver, during January and February of 1889. Going and returning, and on week-day nights during those months, he is at liberty to fill engagements in other places, and is desirous of securing them. People living between Denver and Toronto will do well to secure him either on his outward or return journey. Liberals in Utah and Colorado can engage him for week-day evenings. Address him at 282 Sumach street, Toronto, Ont.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM is on his way to his home in San Francisco, lecturing as he goes, and has appointments as follows:

Wahoo, Neb.....	Oct. 23-25	Davenport, W. T.	Nov. 17-19
Denver, Col.....	" 28	Sprague, W. T.....	" 20, 21
Ogden, Utah.....	" 30, 31	Pasco, W. T.....	" 22, 23
M'nt'n Home, Ida.	Nov. 2	Portland, Ore.....	" 25, 26
Boise City, Ida.....	" 3, 4	Vancouver, W. T.	" 27, 28
Emmetts, Ida.....	" 5, 6	No. Yamhill, Ore...	" 29, 30
Pendleton, Ore.....	" 8, 9	Scappoose, Ore....	Dec. 2

Spokane F'ls, W. T.	" 14-16	Silverton, Ore.....	" 15, 16

Parties desiring his presence in their towns should address him as above.

Letters from Friends.

RED OAK, MO., Sept. 23, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just had three lectures by J. E. Remsburg. Mr. Remsburg is a fine speaker. He gave better satisfaction among the Christians than Mr. Reynolds did last winter. He was not quite so rough on them, but I tell you he gave them some stinging facts in "False Claims" and "Bible Morals." And also, in "Sabbath Breaking" he just knocked Sunday clear out of socket.

We organized a League and elected Dr. Taylor, of Phelps, Mo., for chairman. We also elected a secretary and treasurer, but I do not remember their names just now. We hav not called a meeting yet, but I think we can start in with about fifteen or twenty members. We are going to hav Mr. Remsburg or some other lecturers here this winter. We will hav a meeting before long and organize solid for business.

S. P. WOOD.

CARIBOU, ME., Aug. 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: After an absence of some four months, I now beg the privilege of returning to the TRUTH SEEKER family to take my proper place in the old chimney corner, and also resume my place around the TRUTH SEEKER table, which is always well supplied with good, hearty, and substantial intellectual food. If I had not borrowed it from time to time of my neighbor W. T. Ashby, I should hav been by this time almost intellectually starved. But as I hav managed it, I am not yet very hungry, nor shall I be before I get it, if you mail it to me at once. Please date it back to August 4th, as I want that copy containing Mr. Palmer's picture. I want to read Mr. Peck's "God and the Bible," too. I can't let such literature as that pass unnoticed. We are taking four papers, but would rather hav THE TRUTH SEEKER than the whole of them. That stands preëminent with me above any other one paper. It is hard dragging to do without it.

With wishes for your prosperity, H. H. GILMAN.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Sept. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I think we should not trust either the Democrat or Republican parties with the interests of this republic again, as they hav held the reins of this government long enough, and hav both shown themselvs inimical to its true interests. I say to the people, let us nominate a man that is true and will run this government according to the Constitution of the United States. Let us call a party of every shade of opinion and try and nominate the very best we hav in this country—one entirely unconnected with the government at present would be best—any good man except R. G. Ingersoll. Call this new party the Constitutional party, as this will be something we hav not heard for a long time, and something that our much beloved country is dying for. If you should know any one of the different party candidates that will answer the purpose herein stated, please make it known through your valuable and broad-circulating paper THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A TRUE REPUBLICAN.

CREAMERY, MONT., Oct. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Some weeks ago, in a "Letter from Friends," I cticed a verse of a hymu which ran something as follows:

What joy will fill the ransomed souls
When they in glory dwell,
To see the sinner as he rolls
In quenchless flames of hell!

The writer claimed the hymn in question was written by Dr. Watts. We were making hay at the time, and, having a very devout Presbyterian working for me, I read the verse to him. We hav had many discussions on religion, and he always kept his temper, but here was the last feather. It afforded us some fun. Although a very strait-laced old fellow, he immediately began betting away up into the thousands that I could not produce that hymn, or anything like it, "for," said he, "it is altogether foreign to their teaching." It was a "parody, scandal, a lie," and all that. Now, I wish to ask you to help me to produce this hymn, or any other akin to it. I promised him that he had not heard the last of it.

Yours respectfully, F. LATUS.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Oct. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading in your paper the words of Don Piatt about Anthony Comstock, and find them, as Hamlet would say, "Slander, sir!" If I were to tell you that I was once called a dude, I feel confident that you would intuitivly perceive this to be a slander. I was called a dude because I believed in "British free trade." Don Piatt calls the sainted Anthony an Anarchist, for no apparent reason whatever. This is a worse slander on the sainted Anthony than the other was on me. Don Piatt, proceeding to specify the crimes of the sainted Anthony, puts at the head of them that he seeks the aid of law. Is it usual for Anarchists to seek the aid of law? Now, this is not an incidental remark of Mr. Piatt's, but runs through the whole of his complaint against St. Anthony and his disciples. His "feeling for them would be one of mingled disgust and pity, but for the mischief and irritation they cause through the control of the law-making power." I never heard anyone say before that Anarchists hav, or could possibly hav, the control of the law-making power. "St. Anthony's first achievement was getting a law through Congress." Who ever heard of an Anarchist wishing any law to go through Congress, unless it was a law to repeal a law? "The pernicious author of the measure was given an office." How very like an Anarchist! "Neither the czar of Russia, nor the Iron Duke of Germany, dare attempt what this man Comstock has accomplished in the United States." Then the two most despotic rulers Mr. Piatt could think of are more like Anarchists than this man Comstock. In another place Mr. Piatt mentions the shirt of Nemesis. I am willing to attribute this mistake to the printer, otherwise St. Anthony might hav a crow to pluck with Mr. Piatt. For Nemesis was a female, and to talk about her shirt would evidently be highly improper. But that's a trifle. What stirs my British blood is to hear St. Anthony slandered by being called an Anarchist. I must certainly defend him, and his particular friend, Don Bombastes Cook, who went through the country proclaiming that he had a pen made out of the sidewalk where some Chicago policemen got killed in a street fight in which they were the aggressors, and wrote with it in nearly every album he could find, "May God hav mercy on the souls of the Anarchists; and may the courts not hav mercy on their bodies." That such typical representativs of law and order should be called Anarchists is intolerable to the Saxon love of justice. As Eliza Cook says of the true-born Englishman:

There's a heart which beats for all below,
The weak and the wronged to defend;
And it strikes as soon for a trampled foe
As it does for a soul-bound friend.

Never shall St. Anthony be called an Anarchist while I can plead his cause. Please giv my vindication of him room.

C. L. JAMES.

COALING, ALA., Sept. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It may be some benefit to you to know how Freethought is doing here, and what I am doing to dissemminate it. I hav hunted up everyone that has a tendency that way, and given such reading as I hav. I hav received a great many papers from Liberals, which I distribute over this county and the adjoining ones. I am pretty sure to send you a good list of subscribers this fall and winter. I hav gone into this with all the vim I am capable of. There are seven churches in a radius of four miles, and I liv in the country, too. It is unpopular to advocate Infidelity, yet I am making some progress. There is one church within half a mile of me. I think I hav about neutralized it. I keep a reward of $100 for any Christian that will let a snake of my choosing bite him without his being hurt by it. I will giv you a list of Infidels and those leaning that way. I think I ought to hav lots of cheap, terse tracts, like "Come to Jesus," and Bennett's "Prayer to the Devil." I love all Liberals, and the Macdonalds and J. D. Shaw most, Heston alongside.

I wish you would insert a notice in your paper to raise a lecture fund South. I tell you Infidelity is unheard of in lots of places; so much so that I excite curiosity. Some say I am crazy; others, that I don't believe, only want to argue. If I had just a little help I could do much. I want you after a while to let me know if you hav received any additions from my field of labor.

H. J. WARD.

ELBA, O., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Southern Ohio does not seem to be a good field for Liberal lecturers, judging by the number of lectures delivered here. The reason, probably, is the lack of enthusiasm among Secularists and people of Liberal views, for I think there are many people in this part of the state who are far from orthodox believers. I know there are comparativly many in this county, but beyond this my acquaintance is limited. Be it remembered that there is one community among these rugged hills that believes in doing something as well as thinking for themselvs.

The Rev. Mr. Zollars, president of Hiram College, who lectured here last summer, and who told us Liberal lecturers would not and dare not debate with Christians, has learned a lesson, if he did not know it before, and he will probably be more cautious hereafter in what he tells an audience in this community.

Mr. Charles Watts gave us three lectures this week. We had a high opinion of his abilities before he came, and he more than met our expectations. Christians told us they would hav a man to meet Mr. Watts in debate and we urged them to do so, but their man failed to appear.

Those who pretend to be debaters had probably heard of him before, and concluded that discretion is the better part of valor.

Whenever you hear Christians clamoring for debate, talk of Watts to them, and they will begin to hedge at once.

Our lectures were a success, and all Liberal-minded people were well pleased with them. The ultra-orthodox here, as elsewhere, are not yet prepared to accept Secularism, but agitation slowly brings the desired result. W. J. DUTTON.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Sept. 28, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Christians are ever ready to persecute new ideas, and if there ever was a full-fledged Christian mossback, "Deck" Houston, of Concordia, who is a candidate for state attorney of Cloud county, Kan., is one. While canvassing for books there last winter, I called on Mrs. Houston and she referred me to him, so I called on him and introduced the same works I had introduced to her, which she seemed very favorably impressed with. They were nothing more nor less than Prof. O. S. Fowler's "Science of Life, or Sexual Science," and Mrs. Annie Besant's "Law of Population." He said he did not know what he would hav done if he had been there when I introduced such books as they. After telling him how happy I was that he was not there, I told him my experience as an agent was, when I found a man and his wife both at home, I generally took a chair and sat down between them and introduced the books, and had never met with any serious difficulty. I also told him that my experience as an agent was that I never met more than two or three old-fogies like him in a town the size of Concordia—population about five thousand, and none quite as bad. It would be dangerous in these Comstockian times to clothe such persons as he is with any such power.

My idea on the tariff is this. I am in favor of tariff for revenue only. My objection to a protectiv tariff is this, it protects the wrong parties, the manufacturers, instead of the laborers, and makes them wholly dependent on the former for such favors as they see fit to giv without any compulsion on their part. And to know how grudgingly they part with any of the advantages of the protectiv system you need only call in your experience, which tells you it becomes necessary for the laborers to organize for their own protection against the very class that is protected in order to prevent themselvs from becoming their serfs and slaves. The cry used to be, Protect our manufacturer and build up home industry, which at the present day would not catch a single labor vote, so the cry is, Protect the laborer. Is it not clearly to be seen that it is a bait thrown out to catch suckers? The capitalists vote for their interest; the common people vote according to their prejudices or preconceived opinions. If the laborer got the full benefit of protection, which is an average of forty-seven per cent, it would be different. Generally speaking, it takes all their income to keep them. We fail to see where protection is even a benefit, then, because if they pay a tax of the above sum on everything they buy, it is simply taking it out of one pocket and putting it in the other, and therefore is nothing more than a delusion and a snare.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

HUDSON, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Pittsburgh press notices of the recent annual Congress of the American Secular Union hav brought forth a storm of "righteous indignation" from Liberals everywhere.

The privilege of a newspaper to register public opinion or editorial prejudice is an inalienable right, but misrepresentation of facts and falsifying of statements is an insult and an injury to the public. "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," is evidently not included in the ethics of the "Christian" morality which endeavored to find legal suppression for our "exercise of the right of free speech" after misrepresenting our usage of it. We "exercise the right of free speech" in exorcising falsehood, and the principles of Liberalism do not license lies either ancient or modern. However, the Pittsburgh public and the Pittsburgh press are under the jurisdiction of an ultra-fanatical "Law and Order" Society who hav interfered with personal privilege to such an extent that it is a dangerous misdemeanor (on local authority) to drink milk on Sunday in that afflicted town, and whose objections to the "feast of reason and flow of soul" so abundant at Lafayette Hall were at least consistent. That the official Congress of the American Secular Union should be arraigned as a question of Atheism vs. Theology is irrelevant. Whatever the beliefs or disbeliefs of its members, it is a Secular organization, as its name indicates, whose basis is a resistance to the wrongs and injustices corrupting our national laws, and a substitution of Secular morality, justice, and equal rights to all humanity. "Christian" morality is the narrowest prejudice we hav to educate. Our Secular Union, our Liberal movement, are protests against that bigoted label to a broad principle. Morality is not to be limited by any religious codes of the past, by any religious laws of to-day, but is liable to "break out," like genius or small-pox, in most unaccountable places. Morality has broken out in the American Secular Union, notwithstanding the "shot-gun quarantine" of early Christianity, and the Comstock quarantine of later times.

Inviolate Christian morality, especially its Pittsburgh representativs, should be warned that this is not a national case of varioloid, but an early stage of the virulent type.

This type of morality became epidemic during the Revolutionary days of our country; it framed the Declaration of Independence; it again broke out in the cause of abolition of slavery; it dictated the Fifteenth Amendment; it has preceded all the great reforms of the world, and the germs are still activ in the great system of human reasoning.

MARY A. WORSWICK.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Oct. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Of all the Liberal lecturers in the field, can not some visit us occasionally? For the free enjoyment of life, for the business interests of the Freethinking class, for the general welfare of this beautiful land of the living, and for the social happiness derived from the remarks and teachings of the expounders of facts and truths, cannot the twelfth Congress manage in some way to send a lecture among us? And this is not the only section that is in need of truth-speakers. There are many Liberal sheep here, but without a shepherd. Southern California is a large field for the work of a good organizer and lecturer, but the weeds hav about taken it for the want of cultivation. The churches control almost everything. It is here just about as Remsburg says: "That vice is most prevalent in those countries most loyal to the church." The city claims more than forty churches, and that many hundred saloons and dens of vice. Our widely, and I might say justly, advertised Los Angeles is going to the dogs. It is getting rotten, and we must hav some one to purify us—Washburn, Remsburg, Peck, Shaw, or any of the other shining lights of Freethought who can produce facts and figures. Although business is brisk compared with most other cities of three times our population, yet it is dull to what it has been. Everything here is organized except the Liberals. We must hav an organization. I was only last night that a Democrat band led a campaign club through the streets; a block behind came a Republican club following a band, both clubs shouting the name of their respectiv candidates, and both bands filling the air with sweet and lively music; when, to my surprise, five or six blocks behind came the Salvation Army band with Sarah, Hagar, Leah, and Rachel beating their tambourines, led by an old, worn-out bass drum, and followed by a crowd of as tough, sleepy-looking, ignorant cranks as the slums of any thoroughly Christianized city could produce, and all proclaiming Christ as king. This is a republic yet, and it is to be hoped she will continue so, and we want a real, live, born American citizen as our leader, and not the bones of an illegitimate foreigner who died eighteen hundred years ago for a king Why, it was only last Sunday that the ministers offered a resolution in most, if not all, of the churches in the city, after which it was handed to the city council, the contents of it being to the effect that the office of chief of police be declared vacant, simply because the chief used his brain instead of allowing ministers to use it for him. The chief was so harassed by these agents of Christ that he resigned the office, to the regret of many good citizens, rather than be dictated to by people who delight in making humanity miserable for the sake, they say, of a reward hereafter. Pasadena, a town of about ten thousand inhabitants only a few miles distant, is even worse than Los Angeles. It is a beautiful place, the flower-garden of the West, but it is gone, I am afraid beyond redemption—dead, dead, dead. Christ is in possession; business is at a standstill; the streets are almost deserted except on Sundays. The large Raymond Hotel and many other tourist resorts of less notoriety located here hav, so it is reported, refused to open up this season unless certain laws which were enacted by these lambs of superstition are repealed. We hav had any number of murders and rape cases lately, with insanity, suicides, etc., and no doubt will continue to hav as long as these vultures of superstition flap their wings over the eyes and blow their breath in the faces of our inhabitants. We want a few good lectures right from the shoulder. I think a speaker could do well in southern California this winter. One or two nights will avail but little. Mr. Reynolds complained of Los Angeles being a hard town, and other lecturers will do the same thing unless they come prepared to remain some time and effect an organization. Rome was not built in a day. Will some of our Liberal orators take notice of this and deliver this section from the curse now overhanging it? FRED S. LUCE.

KANAWHA FALLS, W. VA., Oct. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Prof. W. S. Bell lectured at this place on the evening of the 2d inst.—subject, "Reason and Superstition"—and at Coal Valley, a mining town of some two thousand inhabitants, last night—subject, "Liberty and Morality." Lectures of this character are a new thing in this section. Few, if any, among those who heard Mr. Bell had ever before heard a Liberal lecture. There were no suitable buildings here except the school-house and the church. A majority of the trustees of the school-house signified their willingness to allow the use of it for our purpose, but the board of education of the district, having heard that we wanted the house, passed an order restricting the trustees from granting such permission. The trustees, however, would probably hav let us hav the house anyway, but as the church was larger and better adapted to our purpose, and as a minister was to reply to Professor Bell, the person who had nominal and quasi charge of it allowed its use for the occasion. Mr. Bell delivered his lecture, and the minister replied as best he could. He was no match for a man of Mr. Bell's intellectual caliber, and did not succeed in refuting any of the points made by the lecturer. When the reverend gentleman got through Professor Bell briefly but effectivly reviewed the arguments advanced by his opponent, and literally cut the ground from under his feet. A spicy bit of cross-questioning was then indulged in between the lecturer and the reverend gentleman, in which the latter was assisted by some of the orthodox brethren and sisters, who seemed to realize that their champion needed their help to extricate himself from the net into which he had walked. The orthodox people lost their temper, and the Liberals held their peace, feeling confident that their man was able to take care of himself. Professor Bell had a number of Liberal books which he offered to sell to any who might desire them, but he was debarred the privilege of doing so by the person who had charge of the house. The lecture at Coal Valley was a success. Mr. J. W. Montgomery, the owner of the Opera House, threw open the doors of the large and commodious building, and the people came out in respectable numbers to hear the lecture. Many of them took away with them not only the impression made by the lecture but printed copies of it and other Liberal literature. Professor Bell is not particularly eloquent in speech, but he uses some sledge-hammer logic. He avoids the use of technical terms, and generally succeeds in making himself understood by all. He intersperses his lectures with some tid-bits of humor, which serve not only to hold the interest of the audience, but also to point a moral and impress an argument. If we were disposed to criticise, we would only suggest that in dealing with orthodox people it is not best to be too abrupt with them—to demolish their idols too ruthlessly. We as Liberals and lecturers must show the people that we are their friends and that their beliefs are the result of their training; that we believe they are honest and sincere in them, but that they are none the less in error on this account. Professor Bell left on the west-bound train early this morning, so as to reach Pittsburgh in time for the opening of the annual session of the Secular Union. J. C. WATKINS.

FREETHOUGHT IN AUSTRALIA.

AUSTRALIA, Sept. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Many of your Liberal readers in the States will be pleased to know that the great principles of Universal Mental Liberty are meeting with ready acceptance in this antipodean land. We hav inherited too much of the British phlegm to progress as rapidly as yourselvs, and our public advocates hav much to contend with from the bigoted obtuseness and uncharitable thickheadedness of professing Christians. People in Australia are divided into two parties in matters politic, and two or three hundred in matters religious. The political parties are the Imperialist and Republican ones. The latter is in a minority in all the colonies except Queensland, where a government has been elected on purely republican principles. In the southern colonies all the various governments are Imperialist, and hav recently voted an annual tribute to Great Britain of £30,000 per annum apiece for the purpose of helping to maintain the already vast British navy. Thus nearly all Australia has committed the act to avoid which your Revolutionary heroes shed their blood. It is in vain for us Radicals to point out that "taxation without representation is tyranny," as the vast bulk of the population are English by birth and their national feeling is concentrated in Great Britain. However, the day of our independence is coming fast. Practically we are independent now, as the British governors as a rule perform nothing but social duties and keep up snobocracy. Although there is now a white population of three million persons in Australia, I regret to say that we hav but one Freethought organ. This, however, is a real live journal, run by a real lively Freethinker, Mr. Symes, of Melbourne. It has been in existence four years, and has a large circulation. There are four really good republican journals, which are known as the Bulletin (Sydney), the Boomerang (Brisbane), the Australian Radical, and the Australian Democrat, all of which are good national journals. Of course, at Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, and Brisbane there are flourishing Freethought societies, and several of the more important gold-fields hav Secular Unions, which are rapidly becoming powers in the land. Mr. Joseph Symes and Mr. T. Walker—who is a member of the New South Wales legislature—may be looked upon as the leaders of the anti-theological party. Mr. Symes recently created much excitement by the publication of a pamphlet called, "Phallic Worship," wherein he proved not only that Christianity was a phallacy, but that it owed its origin to ancient sex-worship. The paper created a great furore among the bigots, who denounced it as blasphemous and obscene. Mr. Symes was also prosecuted at Melbourne for lecturing in public—on a wharf—but scored a moral victory over his opponents every time. I am sorry to say, however, that a personal difference exists between Messrs. Walker and Symes, which is something of a source of weakness. Besides these two eminent Freethought advocates, we hav several Bible-smashers of strong caliber. There are Messrs. Wallace Nelson, W. W. Collins, I. Selby, and Charles Bright. I recently had the privilege of hearing a three nights' debate between Messrs. W. Nelson and Charles Watt, a prominent gospel-slugger in the golden city of Gympie. There were large and attentiv audiences each night, and the evangelist was totally defeated. The subjects were: for the first two nights, "Christianity is True and Moral," and for the third night, "Christianity—An Organized Hypocrisy." In the first Mr. Watt took the affirmativ, but utterly failed to maintain his position. On the third evening Mr. Nelson took the affirmativ and proved his position from the actions of his opponents. Mr. Nelson read aloud from Mark's gospel: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." "And this shall be a sign to follow them that believe, they shall handle serpents and they shall do them no hurt, and shall drink deadly things and shall not suffer thereby." Then Mr. Nelson offered Mr. Watt a bottle of arsenic, which he invited him to drink. Mr. Watt had more common sense than Christianity and so refused, thereby proving the contention of our advocate. When Mr. Watt's time for reply arrived, he tested Mr. Nelson's sincerity by a document worded like a bull of excommunication, which he challenged him to sign. To Mr. Watt's great chagrin, he complied at once. The debate was a very good one, and it is to be printed in book form for circulation. Mr. W. W. Collins is well known in Freethought circles for his brilliant oratory and sensible, well-written articles and pamphlets. Mr. Selby is also a good, earnest worker. But I hav never seen or heard Mr. Bright, so will pronounce no opinion. Altogether the cause of mental liberty is progressing well, and we may all look forward to the not far distant time when all distinctions of creed, rank, and nationality shall be abolished and Australia become a republic mighty and great in her freedom and an antipodean paradise of Universal Mental Liberty. F. C. VOSPER.

HEPPNER, ORE., Sept. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It seems that after all the pains I hav taken to make plain the state of my feelings toward unbelievers, some hav misunderstood me. My friend, Mr. Ward, must hav been in a bad humor when he wrote his last letter, or he would not hav accused me of sneering at Infidels. It would ill become me to sneer at those with whom I hav but lately been identified. I hav none other than a feeling of friendliness for all who are honestly and earnestly seeking after the truth, but, alas, how often do we allow our prejudices to so warp our intellects as to render us unfit for estimating facts!

One other matter I wish to mention, while an opportunity is presented. My husband and I, having, to some extent, played the part of the prodigal son, are not at present blessed with much of this world's goods, and I cannot afford to hire some one to do my work while I write for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Consequently, I am not as prompt in my replies as I otherwise might be.

If Mr. Ward will read my letter again, he will find that I did not refer him to Lev. xviii, 24, 25; xx, 23, in order to justify the slaying of the Midianites, but instead of that, told him to search the scriptures. The following are some of the places where this is mentioned: Josh. xxii, 17; Ps. cvi, 28, 29; Hos. ix, 10; Rev. ii, 14. The Midianites may hav been an industrious people, but considering the pastoral age in which they lived, the amount of live stock brought back by the Israelites does not prove that they were. With respect to the offerings of gold, although presented by the officers, their oblation was out of that which every man had gotten (Num. xxxi, 50, 53). Neither is it necessary to suppose from the number of women-children mentioned in the text that the Midianites were an o'er-virtuous people. They would hav been indeed vile and degraded to the lowest degree if they had not protected the innocency of childhood. With regard to the statement that we hav no account other than that they were peaceable, see Judges vi, 1-6. However, these are minor points. The question is, whether or not the Israelites made war against the Midianites arbitrarily. It should be remembered in connection with this that the Israelites had suffered severely in the loss of a large part o their congregation as the result of the plague, before they took vengeance on the Midianites.

As for Noah being a drunkard, I deny the charge. It is true the Bible tells us that Noah got drunk once, but there is no evidence either in or out of the Bible that he ever got drunk again. If all the drunkards on the face of the earth had only followed Noah's example and stopped at the first debauch, what a paradise, comparativly speaking, this world might be!

Mr. Ward wants to know where the heathen got his ideas of heaven and hell, but this is a question which I would like to hav him answer. In view of the fact that the Israelites were not the only descendants of Noah, it would not be very difficult to suppose that the heathen nations had preserved a few grains of truth while corrupting the religion of their ancestors. Herbert Spencer says that "religion everywhere present, as a weft running through the warp of human history, expresses some eternal fact" (First Principles). Observation and induction show that finite man is endowed with a functional power to lay hold on the infinit and a life to come. And is this the end? The existence of any functional power implies the existence of a corresponding fact. Thus the power of seeing implies the existence of light, that of hearing the existence of sound. The discursiv power of the mind implies the existence of reason and of logical relations of thought. The intuitiv faculty implies the existence of truths that lie apart from the region and domain of sense. And so the religious instinct in man presumes and implies the existence of those truths to which it relates; and this is only another evidence of the truth of Bible doctrin—that it rests not on fiction but on facts. To say that there hav been savage tribes without the religious idea does not disprove this statement. A light may be obscured. The power of reasoning may be lost. The power of seeing is inherent and so also that of hearing, yet both may be entirely lost. There hav been individuals who denied the existence of what we call cause, or power of one object over another, but this does not prove the non-existence of cause as a primitiv and intuitiv truth.

Before leaving this subject I wish to point to an inconsistency that seems to hav been overlooked. Our religious opponents assert that the Hebrews borrowed their religion from the heathen, and while claiming that the Old Testament does not contain the doctrin of a future life, will declare that the heathen had his ideas on this subject. Is it likely, if the Hebrews did borrow their religion, that they would hav overlooked so important a subject as this?

Those who hold that man is fully able to civilize himself without the aid of inspiration would fain point to the civilization of Greece and Rome as proofs. But if this theory be true, then the wonder is that these should be the exceptions instead of the rule. And however much there may be to admire in the art, science, and philosophy of the ancient Greeks and Romans, there will not be much difference of opinions among the more enlightened of to-day as to the propriety of worshiping one God instead of thirty thousand, including the powers of nature.

The Greeks were especially angry with one of their philosophers because he taught that the sun is not a god. Then, too, if the world has ever been wise enough to take care of itself unaided, men in all ages hav not thought so, for eminent among the noted lawgivers of the world are those, Solon included, who claimed to hav communication with heaven. The philosopher Socrates was attended by a "divine voice," and was a firm believer in oracles. The latter were consulted before every important undertaking. But the question arises, Whence came their civilization? The historian tells us that Greece lay open to the East, and that she originally drew her inspiration from thence. It was customary for scholars in those days to travel in the East in search of knowledge. It should be remembered this was not the first republic known to the world. That grander republic, the U. S. of Israel, flourished hundreds of years before the balmy days of Athens. The Jewish commonwealth was the first republic of which we hav any definit knowledge. It was founded about 1450 B.C. It will be at once admitted that the Mosaic laws were not perfect, with respect to which see Heb. viii, 6, 7, but, such as they were, they were far in advance of the spirit of the age to which they were given. Taking everything into consideration, the Mosaic laws are worthy of the highest praise. No such ideas of liberty, equality, and fraternity were commonly known among the wisest of the heathen nations as were promulgated in this little republic of Palestine. The so-called republics of Greece and Rome were, in the main, mere aristocracies and tyrannies. Some features of the Mosaic legislation hav never been surpassed. Even the laws regarding slavery were far in advance of those in modern times. The slave was protected against excessiv and undue punishment, the maidservant's honor was protected by the best means then known, and our modern slavetrader would hav been severely dealt with.

It has been asked of what account the Bible has been to mankind, but he who reads in a candid and unbiased frame of mind the history of the Jews and their influence on earth's nations, needs no other answer. Their religion has molded the faith of the most progressiv and civilized nations. Wherever the God of the Bible has been seen and sought after, humanity has been gradually rising. In Abraham's seed hav the nations of the earth been blessed. From their royal family descended him who is called Wonderful, the ideal of a pure life, and the grandest character in all history. MRS. H. A. RITCHEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Baby Janet.

'Twas in a crowded horse-car, and I
Was tired—half sick and sad;
It really seemed there wasn't very much
To make anybody glad.

Just then, a little cooing note,
Softly sweet and very low,
Seemed, in swift answer to my thought,
To shyly say: "It isn't so!"

I raised my eyes, and opposit
A face from shadows free—
A winsome, blue-eyed baby girl,
Sat gravely watching me.

At once she smiled a gleeful smile,
And she looked exceeding wise,
As she winked and blinked, and smiled again,
With lips and twinkling eyes.

I quite forgot that I was tired,
Or sick, or sad, or sorry;
With that sweet face right opposit
How could one ever worry?

I smiled myself. Who is this child?
This fairy I hav met?
I asked of one near by, who said:
"Why, that is Baby Janet!"

Dear Baby Janet! May the life,
To thee untrod and new,
With length of days and happy hours,
Be full of joy to you.

With sunny smiles to meet and greet
Life's travelers on their way;
A mission this that breaks the mist
Of many a cloudy day.

May this be thine: to chase away
The cares that life doth make;
Till from the dust of pain and grief
Sweet flowers of hope awake.

And may these rainbow blossoms bright,
With dew of truth o'erwet,
Entwine with love the onward way
Of blue-eyed Baby Janet. S. H. W.

"To Sweeten It."

The baby eats his bread and milk,
And laughs out loud in glee,
For every other time he dips
His spoon it is for me.
"To eat it all yourself," he says,
"It isn't nice a bit—
You hav to giv somebody else
A taste to sweeten it!"

A little miser sits alone;
His scowl is sad to see.
Wants all the playthings, shares his own
With nobody—not he!
Sullen and sad the little lad
Will all day sighing sit;
He'd "better giv somebody else
A taste—to sweeten it!"

—Wide Awake.

Home.

A man can build a mansion
And furnish it throughout;
A man can build a palace,
With lofty walls and stout;
A man can build a temple,
With high and spacious dome;
But no man in the world can build
That precious thing called Home.

So 'tis a happy faculty
Of women far and wide,
To turn a cot or palace
Into something else beside,
Where brothers, sons, and husband tired,
With willing footsteps come,
A place of rest, where love abounds,
A perfect kingdom—Home.

Correspondence.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Oct. 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to try and write a letter to the Corner, as I hav never written before. I liv in the country and go about a mile to school, and I study geography, arithmetic, reading, spelling, grammar. I hav not lived here longer than three months. Papa bought a horse and buggy, and rides in to work every morning. I would like to find this letter printed in the Corner.

Yours truly, IDA MAY ALLAN.

P.S.—Papa gets THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, and likes it. I read the Corner.

SILVERTON, COL., Oct. 9, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would like to say a few words in THE TRUTH SEEKER in behalf of Grandpa Hacker. I sent him fifty cents, for which he sent me one volume of his Pleasure Boat, and some "Lectures and Rhymes," all of which I am very much pleased with. I don't think any of our Freethought friends can get more truth and good advice for their money than to send for a volume or two of the Pleasure Boat. My parents take the Boston Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am very much interested in the Children's Corner, but hav never written before. I am twelve years old and hav never been out of Colorado. Hope you will excuse poor writing.

BERTHA FISHER.

AKRON, O., Oct. 15, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Brother Jaques has kindly been lending me his TRUTH SEEKER, as I am too poor to subscribe for it, but although I hav a large family and small wages, I want to help Brother Hacker fifty cents. Please forward with my kind regards, and I must wish your dear self all the joy this world affords for your kindness to the poor. REUBEN HACKETT.

[The money has been forwarded, and hereafter any sums for "Father Hacker" may be sent direct by the donors to his address, J. Hacker, Berlin, N. J.—ED. C. C.]

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Little Flo Sanborn, censured by her mother for some small mischief she had been engaged in, sat "thinking it over" for some time, and finally said in a complaining tone: "Everything I do is laid to me."

A little boy inquired: "Mamma, is God a man?" "No, my dear," was the reply. "Is he a monkey?" "Certainly not." "Did you ever see God?" "No." "Did papa ever see him?" "No." "Did anybody ever see him?" "No." "Well, it is just as I thought—there isn't any God at all."

"Johnny," said a fond mother, "hav you said your prayers?" "Yes'm." "Hav you prayed for papa?" "Yes'm." "And mamma?" "Yes'm." "And brother Willie?" "No'm." "Aren't you going to pray for brother Willie?" "Y-yes'm—but, mamma, what's the use of wasting the Lord's time?"

"Ma sent me for her ring," said a youngster to a clerk in M. S. Smith & Co's jewelry store. "She left it here to get mended." "What kind of a ring was it, sonny?" asked the clerk. "Why, it was a kind of a —why, you know them things folks hav on the backs of their necks sometimes—car—car——" "Oh, yes, a carbuncle. It's done."

Father (whom Bobby has induced to take him): "Now, Bobby, I don't quite understand this. If the man who throws the ball fails to hit the club after three trials, does that put the umpire out?" Bobby: "Pa, do you remember why you sent me to bed last night at 7 o'clock?" Father: "Why, n-no." Bobby: "It was for asking foolish questions."

A minister was questioning his Sunday-school about the story of Eutychus, the young man who, while listening to the preaching of the apostle Paul, fell asleep, and, falling down, was taken up dead. "What," said the preacher, "do we learn from this solemn event?" Then the reply from a little girl came pat and prompt: "Please, sir, ministers should learn not to preach too long sermons." That little girl's head was level.

The story the other day about the pious little boy who tried to walk on the water in the bath-tub recalls another of an equally pious little girl. She was eight years old, and lived in the country. She had started one day rather late for school with another little girl about her own age. On their way they caught a glimpse of a clock dial through an open door; it lacked five minutes of 9 o'clock. "Oh, dear!" exclaimed the pious little girl, "it's five minutes to 9 o'clock, and we'll be late to school." "I'm afraid we will." "Jennie," said the pious little girl, impressivly, "I'll tell you what we must do; we'll kneel right down here and pray that we won't be late!" "H'm!" said the other, "I guess we'd better skin right along and pray as we go!" They "skun" and got there.

Timber.

There are several kinds of wood in use for building and ornamental purposes, known under the general head of timber. Most of the wood in common use is tough, fibrous, solid, and endures a long, long time. Hence there are tables, chairs, and other articles of furniture still in being, as good as when first made, while the fingers that fashioned them and the people who owned them hav long ago crumbled into dust, and in many cases no one knows the place of their graves. So timber is more enduring than man. Take oak, for instance, growing slowly and to great hight; it is used in the building of great ships and other vessels, and, although soaking in water, it is not harmed. It is found nativ in our own country, and is used for many purposes. In olden times oak was much more generally used than at present, because then it was plentiful, now it is growing scarce.

Mahogany is a very handsome wood and darker than oak in color. It grows in the West Indies and in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh is said to hav been the first to make use of mahogany, taking it to make repairs on his ships at Trinidad. An English sea captain took occasion to bring some of the rich-looking wood to England as a gift to his family. His brother endeavored to use it in building a house, but the carpenters denounced it as too hard to work. The old captain then had a box made of it, and some light pieces of furniture. After this it was brought into more general use, and recently it has become quite fashionable, its rich, dark color making it especially pleasing.

Black walnut is a dark and prettily veined wood, extensivly used by the cabinet-maker in household furnishing.

Rosewood is among the handsomest and most costly wood. It has a soft, rosy color of different shades, and is found most plentifully in South America.

Perhaps ebony is as expensiv as any wood. It is found in Madagascar and Ceylon, and in adjacent countries. Pretty boxes, canes, and ornaments are made from it, and it is much admired for its fine fiber and the polish of which it is susceptible.

Away off in China we get a kind of reed-like wood called bamboo. It is strong and durable, and is made into chairs, carriages, fences, baskets, wheelbarrows, and the like; it is also utilized for sails and rigging of vessels, as it is a sort of cane in its growth.

Cedar, camphor, sandal, and some other woods, are very fragrant, retaining their fragrance for an almost incredible time. In fact, I am not sure they ever lose their odor. The first two are used in making boxes and chests to hold furs and woolens. No moths, or insects of any kind, can enter a chest of cedar or camphor and liv long. Sandalwood is fragrant only in the center, or heart of the tree; this is yellow in color, while the outer layers are white, and hav no scent. It grows in Ceylon and on the coast of Coromandel. Cedar and camphor hav medicinal qualities. The first is found in our own and in northern countries, while camphor belongs to southern latitudes.

Pine is very common, and used for almost everything where wood is required, but there are several varieties. The pine is a handsome tree and has abundant green foliage all the year round in the shape of long, slender needles.

California has several beautiful varieties of wood of various colors and of different degrees of strength. The redwood is a beautiful variety.

Boxwood grows along the Mediterranean shores, and is highly esteemed for fine carving. Wood engravings are cut from blocks made of this kind of wood. So when you see the wood-cut engravings in newspapers and books, you may know that this wood is used in making them.

There are many other kinds of wood, as maple, which is soft and pretty. There are two kinds of maple—white and yellow. It has spots, dots, and curves that are much admired. There is a kind called "bird's-eye maple," because the little dots in it resemble a bird's eye. Then there are the elm, beech, chestnut, linden, cherry, ash, fir, which is called deal, spruce, and many other kinds of which you hav read, or are otherwise familiar with.

It would be a good exercise for you to take a tree with which you are acquainted, and write up all that you know or may learn about it. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is timber? What of its enduring properties? Where is oak found, and what is it principally used for? Tell what you know of mahogany. Who first made use of it? What of black walnut? rosewood? ebony? Where is bamboo found? How is it used? What of cedar? camphor? What of these woods in relation to moths and other insects? Tell what you know of sandalwood. What of pine wood?—boxwood? What of the woods of California? Name some of the varieties of wood in common use. With what kinds are you most familiar? Will you not write an essay on some kinds of timber that you are acquainted with for the Children's Corner?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Poetry.

When Jim Was Dead.

From the Atlanta Constitution.

"Hit sarved him right," the nabors sed,
An' 'bused him for the life he'd led,
An' him a lying thar at rest
With not a rose upon his breast;
Ah! menny cruel words they sed
When Jim was dead.

"Jes' killed hisself." "Too mean ter liv."
They didn't hav one word ter giv
Of comfort as they hovered near
An' gazed on Jim a-lying there!
"Thar ain't no use to talk," they sed,
"He's better dead."

But suddenly the room grew still,
While the white sunshine seemed to fill
The dark place with a gleam of life,
An' o'er the dead she bent—Jim's wife!
An' with her lips close, close to his,
As though he knew an' felt the kiss,
She sobbed—a touching sight ter see—
"Ah! Jim was always good ter me!"

I tell you when that cum ter light,
It kinder set the dead man right;
An' round the weepin' woman they
Throwed kindly arms o' love that day.
And mingled with her own they shed
The tenderest tears—when Jim was dead.

The Suppressor of Vice.

"Pa, what's the name of the society that Anthony Comstock runs?"

"The Society for the Suppression of Vice, my son."

"Is he the head suppressor, pa?"

"Officially no, practically yes—he is the great working Pooh Bah of the society, my son."

"Does he suppress vice, pa?"

"My son, does the bear suppress wild honey, preventing it from overrunning the country? Does the wild hog suppress the acorn, preventing the earth from becoming one vast oak forest? Does the truthful fisherman who catches in two hours seventy-nine 'speckled beauties,' averaging nine pounds apiece, suppress that variety of fish, preventing our ponds and brooks from becoming solid masses thereof? Does the iron-throated goat suppress the tomato can, which otherwise would bury us under a mountain of rusty tin? Does the fair maid suppress ice-cream, which, but for her, would glacierize the civilized world? Do other varieties suppress a variety of others, or how? Yes, my son, of course Anthony Comstock suppresses vice—mountains of it, oceans of it, that is, he did, before the mountains were reduced by him to molehills, and the oceans to mere puddles of vice!"

"Huh! I guess there are some pretty high molehills and deep puddles of vice now, pa."

"My son, I feel you are disinclined to recognize Anthony Comstock as the one great suppressor of vice par eminence! Remember, my son, that vice is as old as the hills, as multifarious as thought, and, until the advent of A. C., filled the world as now virtue fills it—as the meat of the egg the shell. Then bear in mind that the redoubtable suppressor of vice is not as old as it, though as ugly as sin, nothing near as multifarious, and does not half-way begin to fill the earth, swell as he may with self-importance. Think of these things, my son, and truthfully and generously acknowledge A. C. to be the Great Pooh Bah Suppressor of Vice, unequaled, unparalleled, and unmitigated! What can you expect in a few short years? Giv the man a chance. Giv him time—time enough—and he will be in at the death of vice; will bury it, my son, as deep as hell is from heaven! Because you see a few straggling specimens of vice cropping out here and there, which A. C. has not had time to stamp out, don't, don't, my son, affect to believe that he is not the amount of tar on a stick he claims to be."

"No, pa; but there's lots of vice lying around loose, I tell you. You don't know how much, because you are so virtuous."

"My son, you are pessimistic to a fault. It seems to me impossible, after A. C.'s raids on newspapers, photographic establishments, pumpkin-seed guessing emporiums, etc., that hydra-headed vice in large quantities and seven-league boots can be lying around loose in this virtuous metropolis—impossible! My son, you look through pessimistic lens darkly."

"Perhaps I do, pa. But don't Anthony Comstock put fellers up to vice and then snake 'em in?"

"Ah, my son, he may do so; but that is one of the beauties of the good work of suppressing vice and crime. Even our finest police in the world thus gloriously stoop to conquer vice and crime! They beg saloon-keepers to sell them whisky after hours on pretense of colic and then arrest the villains! It is glorious, my son, glorious because in a glorious cause, the end—the arrest of those they seduced by false pretense—justifying the means! A. C. may, probably does, work on this line, and if he does, so much the more is he covered with glory!"

"I don't see it, pa."

"Of course you don't see it, my son. You can't see that, as all is fair in love and war, so all is fair in the suppression of vice and crime. Better that vice and crime should be created—if by the suppressors thereof—than not be discovered at all. Better that ninety-nine innocent men should be sent to prison than one guilty one should escape. Think of how gratified is the majesty of the law when a copper brings in a saloonkeeper whom he has seduced into selling him whisky by a downright lie—ah, how majestic is the law's majesty then, my son!"

"Yes, pa. Does Anthony go for quisby books?"

"Anything and everything quisby, my son, and by ways that are quisby if no others are open, as he should, of course."

"Why doesn't he go for the Holy Queer then, pa? That's an awful quisby book, ain't it?"

"Why don't A. C. go for the Holy Queer? You astonish me, my son! Through my spinal column and epigastric region you send a shock of three thousand volts and one thousand six hundred ohms, more or less! Don't you know that the Holy Queer, quisby as it really is, is a holy tome? That, though born on earth, it was conceived in heaven, and so the Holy of Holies? Go for the Holy Queer! Never say those words again, my son. Remember that to the holy all things from the holy source, be they never so indecent, are holy, and not to be 'gone for.' Go for the Holy Queer!—who, Anthony Comstock? Great Scott! Oh!—ah!—ouch! Retire, my son. You hav opened up a gushing well of fourth-proof anguish of soul within my corporeal being, and alone must I endeavor to tank it. Go!" SI SLOKUM.

Helen Gardener and Her "Men, Women, and Gods."

Charles Watts in Secular Thought.

America is noted for female publicists, who figure conspicuously both on the platform and in the press. A few years ago this state of things was almost entirely unknown, and any suggestion that it was probable for it to exist would hav been received with a good deal of incredulity, and not a little ridicule. To-day, however, it is not only an accomplished fact, but one which is everywhere received as the most natural state of things possible. Women now play a most important part in the advocacy of every cause, social, moral, political, and religious. This, no doubt, is a move in the right direction, and an indication of that progress which marks the history of the past, and points unmistakably to the future. True it is that woman, under proper conditions, is the great agent of civilization, transmitting light to her fellows with a warmth of tint which man is incapable of displaying. With him genius may be brilliant, like the sunbeam as it glitters when reflected in the block of ice, but with her it is the summer ray as seen playing upon the bed of roses in the dawn of a summer morning.

Foremost amongst the women of to-day stands Helen Gardener. Less known, perhaps, than some of her compeers, in consequence largely of the field in which she has chosen to labor, in depth of intellect, combined with an earnest love of her fellows and a genial, loving, happy disposition, she has no superior. She is a Freethinker of the Ingersoll type, brilliant in wit, polished in diction, gentle in manners, kind in her dealings with others, being ever ready to help the needy and oppressed. Priestcraft has no bitterer enemy, dogmatic theology no more vigorous opponent, and humanity no firmer friend than the author of "Men, Women, and Gods." Her command of strong, terse English is great, and she uses it often with powerful effect in demolishing the fallacies of an opponent, and yet personally she has not an unkind word to say of her severest antagonist. She is by birth, training, and education an accomplished lady, and by her personal character a sterling woman. In her home she is gentle, kind, and affectionate; in the social circle cheerful, amiable, and open-hearted; and in public brilliant, cultured, and firm. She has very positiv views regarding human rights—both for men and women—but her object is always an unselfish desire to benefit others. Her sarcasm is keen, but it is always polished and never vulgar. We, who know her intimately, are in a position to speak of her many excellent traits of character, and we hav no hesitation in saying that there are few women like her on this vast continent. Her pen is a powerful one, and it has always been employed on the side of truth and virtue, and in the cause of justice and freedom. She claims rights for all regardless of color, race, birth, creed, or sex. The great doctrin of human brotherhood and sisterhood has in her one of its ablest exponents.

The work of Miss Gardener entitled, "Men, Women, and Gods," is a very able one, and has had deservedly a large circulation. It should be in the hands of every Freethinker who desires to possess a storehouse of biblical and historical research. We do not intend here to giv anything like a review of the book, for that, to do it full justice, would occupy more space than we hav at our command. Moreover, we trust that most of our readers hav already procured a copy, and carefully studied its contents. It consists of three lectures, but each lecture is a small volume in itself, and the whole together will furnish a day's most excellent and valuable reading. The book, as is common in these days, takes its title from the first discourse, and in this lecture are discussed, as few can discuss them, some of the most momentous questions of human life—questions on which the welfare of the race depends. Miss Gardener is alive to the interests and well-being of her own sex. They should—she holds—be able to eat of the tree of knowledge without fear of consequences, and she thinks the world would be the better for their so doing. In our opinion, those who do not agree with her upon this point hav much to learn, and probably a good deal to unlearn. Woman has been too long the slave of man, and the shackles by which she has been bound are theological dogmas. Imaginativ in her nature, her imagination, which should hav been the means of her elevation, has been fed with the idle, pueril tales of gods and demons; and in consequence she has sunken into the darkness of superstition, when she should hav risen into the bright light of intellectual truth. But, happily, this state of things is fast passing away, thanks to such noble women as Miss Helen Gardener.

The second discourse is on that worn-out dogma of an almost obsolete faith, "Vicarious Atonement," and most mercilessly is it dealt with. Not only is the fallacy on which it is based clearly demonstrated, but the most pernicious consequences of the doctrin and its allied dogmas are fully and graphically set forth. Miss Gardener is evidently an uncompromising foe of orthodox theology, not on speculativ grounds so much as on those of a practical nature. She sees the mischief it has done in the world; and love for her fellow-creatures stimulates her into energetic action in an endeavor to overthrow this Juggernaut of superstition.

The last lecture—which to our thinking is the best—is entitled, "Historical Facts and Theological Fictions." In this is shown, in a thoroughly exhaustiv manner, the independence of morality of all theological speculations, the unscientific character of Christian faith, and the fallacy of the claim that progress is the result of Christianity.

This is really one of the books of the age. It is rich in thought and redundant in great and lasting truths. A veritable Minerva is its author, and, what is more to the purpose, her wisdom is always well balanced. She has a strong poetic temperament, but it is not a wild Pegasus, but a steed always kept under full control by reason. She has done good work, young as she is in years, and we may, therefore, expect much more from her pen in the future. Long may Miss Gardener liv, and by the purity of her life and the brilliancy of her intellect may she continue to shed a luster and a halo of ethical and mental glory upon the human race.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Gems of Thought.

By divine right the clergy owe nothing to the state. If they contribute to its needs, it is through pure condescension. They sojourn in the state solely to be protected, respected, remunerated; they do the state honor enough by honoring it with their presence, aiding it with their prayers, enlightening it with their wisdom, and relieving it of its money-bags.—Voltaire.

THE church has always been willing to swap off treasures in heaven for cash down.—Ingersoll.

PIRATERIE, as the French call it, or privateering, is the universal bent of the English nation, at home and abroad, wherever settled. No less than seven hundred privateers were, it is said, commissioned in the last war! These were fitted out by merchants, to prey upon other merchants, who had never done them any injury. Is there probably any one of those privateering merchants of London, who were so ready to rob the merchants of Amsterdam, that would not as readily plunder another London merchant, of the next street, if he could do it with the same impunity? The avidity, the alieni appetens, is the same; it is the fear alone of the gallows that makes the difference. How then can a nation, which among the honestest of its people, has so many thieves by inclination, and whose government encouraged and commissioned no less than seven hundred gangs of robbers; how can such a nation hav the face to condemn the crime in individuals, and hang up twenty of them in a morning! It naturally puts one in mind of a Newgate anecdote. One of the prisoners complained, that in the night somebody had taken his buckles out of his shoes. "What the devil!" says another, "hav we then thieves amongst us? It must not be suffered. Let us search out the rogue, and pump him to death."—Benjamin Franklin.

THE world is covered with forts to protect Christians from Christians, and every sea is covered with iron monsters ready to blow Christian brains into eternal froth. Millions upon millions are annually expended in the effort to construct still more deadly and terrible engins of death. Industry is crippled, honest toil is robbed, and even beggary is taxed to defray the expenses of Christian warfare.—Ingersoll.

THE essence of the Christian religion is the cen ter dogma of Buddhism—the doctrin of the worthlessness of terrestrial life.—Schopenhauer.

ALL joy is what I call pagan. Everything in the world that tends to make men happy is moral.—Ingersoll.

THOUGHT fond man
Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills,
That one incessant struggle render life,
One scene of toil, of suffering, and of fate;
Vice in his high career would stand appalled,
And heedless, rambling Impulse learn to think;
The conscious heart of Charity would warm,
And her wide wish, Benevolence dilate;
The social tear would rise, the social sigh;
And into clear perfection, gradual bliss,
Refining still, the social passions work.
—Thomson.

I HAD rather be poor, with a little sympathy in my heart, than to be rich as all the mines of earth and not hav that little flower of pity in my breast. I do not see how a man can hav hundreds of millions and pass every day people that hav not enough to eat. I do not understand it.—Ingersoll.

THE neglect of cleanliness avenges itself in diseases which no prayer can avert; during the most filthful and prayerful period of the Middle Ages, seven out of ten city dwellers were subject to scrofula of that especially malignant form that attacks the glands and the arteries as well as the skin. Medical nostrums and clerical hocus-pocus of the ordinary sort were, indeed, so notoriously unavailing against that virulent affection that thousands of sufferers took long journeys to try the efficacy of a king's touch, as recorded in the still current term of a sovereign remedy.—Professor Oswald in The Bible of Nature.

ONE scientist in control of Madrid could hav prevented the plague. In such cases, cleanliness is far better than "godliness;" science is superior to superstition; drainage much better than divinity; therapeutics more excellent than theology. Goodness is not enough—intelligence is necessary. Faith is not sufficient, creeds are helpless, and prayers fruitless.—Ingersoll.

IF God is the author of all, it is he who created the devil; if the devil is wicked, if he strives to counteract the projects of the divinity, it is the divinity who has allowed the overthrow of his projects, or who has not had sufficient authority to prevent the devil from exercising his power.—D'Holbach.

WHY was not the serpent kept out of the garden? Why did not the Lord God take him by the tail and snap his head off? Why did he not put Adam and Eve on their guard about this serpent? They, of course, were not acquainted in the neighborhood, and knew nothing about the serpent's reputation.—Ingersoll.

BALAAM WAXETH HOT.

And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she thrust herself unto the wall, and crushed Balaam's foot against the wall: and he smote her again.—Num. xxii, 25.

Odds and Ends.

THE STORY OF THE PURITANS.—THE BLUE LAWS.

Although not mentioned on the ship's list, history recognizes the fact that there was one passenger on the saintly Mayflower whose name was Human Nature. Although the austere voyagers only wanted spiritual passengers, this very earthly personage insisted upon sharing the tour; and even the Puritans could not exclude the unwelcome traveler.

Upon arrival in the New World this Human Nature, as is always the case, asserted itself; and under its effects even the Puritan occasionally fell from grace.

Where man transgresses there you must hav laws; consequently the elders, unable to find any existing statutes in their new home, had to frame a code which would cover the offenses committed from time to time among them.

Eight civil service deacons, who stood respectivly 98, 93, 94, 97, 91, 98, 99, and 99 in biliousness, were ordered "to devyse dyvers stryngent enactments, wherebye the doings of cyrtaine loose people myghte bee broughte toe a shorte stoppe;" and the Solons, after due deliberation, produced a code which the world has since called Blue Laws. On submitting these laws to their fellow-neighbors, even the framers showed that they considered the statutes fearfully stringent—perhaps too much so—for they recommended homeopathic doses at first; and even went so far as to acknowledge that before using them for human beings it might be well to first experiment on animals.

This recommeudation was acted on, and as under the infliction dogs went mad, cats had fits, and hens began to lay soft-shell eggs, it was thought prudent to revise the statutes, and issue a new edition.

The next question which arose was: Where were the laws to be copyrighted? As there was not any House of Representativs at that time, and consequently no librarian of Congress, the Puritans were in a quandary as to how the code could be protected. Finally Sojourner-Far-From-Glory suggested that a copy of the book be sent to the village librarian, New Haven, accompanied by the customary fee, and a request that he would specially copyright the capital letters, which were the important points in all works of those days.

Ten months after, the book was returned with a letter to this effect:

TOO THE COMITEY OF ATE,
bostone, Rod island.

SURZ: We don't kopyright no delirium Trimmens in this orfice, and don't yu fourgit it. Them statoos which yu call Blu lors ain't fit for humons, and gug Brown tole me if He shud use em in a Konedykutt kort, he'd be blowd ski-hy with dienamite. Yourn Respectful,
JIM NEDDY,
Lybraryone, N. H.

Copyright being out of the question, the Puritans decided to patent their laws, and as the fee for this was large, Mr. Neddy gracefully waived his objections, and consented to protect the book.

The first delinquent to suffer under the new code, was a little girl, aged five, who was caught in the act of playing with a gaudy toy, and her parents were fined 16s., under the provisions of Sec. VIII:

Any mayl or Female chylde, found waystynge Hys or her tyme wythe a toye—bee itte Rockynge Hoss, doll, or monkye wythe Pinkke Tayl—shall paye toe ye Commonwealthe ye summe of sixteen (16s.) Yorke shyllinges.

The next miscreant punished was a man who removed his overcoat on Sunday, which Sec. III forbade in these words:

Bee itt knowne that noe manne nor woman shall fix, adjuste, or arrange Hys or her clothes, after they hav duly arrayed themselvs Sundaye, inne Ye Mornynge. When they gette frome bedde, they maye donne such raymente as they require for ye Lord's Day; butte any subsequent Prinkynge, removal, or takynge-onne of kotes, wrappes, or mufflers, fyxinge of back hair or Banges will be considered as worke, and a fyne attached thereto. Exception is mayd to galoshes or gums, whych maye bee put onne or shedde, at dyscretione.

As all food intended for Sunday consumption was cooked on Saturday, it was afterward thought that to be consistent Sunday dressing also ought to be attended to the day before, in which case each man would simply rise from bed on the Sabbath morn, and hav no occasion to expend labor on his person other than washing his face and combing his hair or wig.

Many strange incidents attended the introduction of these laws, clearly showing that the time was ripe for just such a correctiv. Deacon Increase Mather, one of the most rigorous of the sect, but who was fearfully absent-minded, arose one morning, and taking his knickerbockers plunged a leg into the right compartment, when—horrors!—the meeting-house bell began to toll, recalling to his forgetful mind the fact that it was Sunday. There was a predicament indeed! One limb was already enveloped, but the other was out in the world. What was he to do? He had been among those who had contended that dressing on Sunday was work and consequently among the acts forbidden by the Blue Laws.

After due cogitation he extracted himself from the dilemma in the only way left—he fainted away, upon seeing which the outside elder, forgetting everything for the moment but the one touch of nature which makes us all brothers, rushed in and carried Increase to bed.

"Brother," said Increase, from beneath the coverlid, "we hav now both transgressed the law—I by clothing myself, and you by carrying me to this cot—but we will not inform one upon the other. We will keep mum on account of the legal penalties and atone in other ways for the sins this day committed. Go you to the meeting-house and let me miss my customary observances, inasmuch as I did not clothe myself when the days were secular."

To detail the Blue Law penalties for social sins would make the blood of the reader grow cold. Suffice it to say, many a man's lips caused him to grow round-shouldered at the stocks.

"Dovey, may I kiss you?"

Signs of dissent, properly interpreted by young man.

"Thanks, sweetness, but let me first see if the code will permit." (Examins Blue Laws.) "Of a truth—no. What would Dovey do if Lovey were sent to the stocks?"

"Dovey go too, and feed her little birdie on doughnuts and hard cider."

To embrace one's sweetheart then was a capital offense.

(N. B.—So it is now.)—Wallace Peck in Time.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 44. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, November 3, 1888. { 28 LAFAYETTE PL. { $3.00 per year.

A FEW EXAMPLES OF DIVINE BENEFICENCE.

Notes and Clippings.

It is said that the Sioux chiefs now in Washington are great smokers of cigarets and that they invariably inhale the smoke. Thus in the not very remote future all vexatious Indian questions may disappear for lack of Indians.

The United States Supreme Court has decided that the Prohibitory Liquor law of Iowa is constitutional. One of the chief points made by the defense was that in prohibiting the manufacture of spirituous and malt liquors for sale outside the state the law violated the federal Constitution by interfering with interstate commerce. The Supreme Court holds otherwise, however.

The Christian at Work prints a list of sensational topics announced by American preachers, and says they compare favorably with dime-novel titles. Here are a few of the sermon titles: "Boycotting the Dead," "The Great Oil," "Straight From the Shoulder," "Hell, and the People who are Going There," "Taken by the Throat," "Use Your Eyes," "Off Goes the Roof," "Up Comes the Man."

The pope received the Neapolitan pilgrims last week and made an address to them. After condemning the Italian government and stating that the hatred of all foes of the Papal see was concentrated in Rome, the pope said: "In this city they do not hesitate to confirm by new insults, even on solemn occasions, the usurpation and violence which are within the remembrance of the whole world, degrading Rome to the simple position of the capital of the kingdom, while God predestined it to be the see of the vicar of Christ; and it shall ever remain the capital of the Catholic world." Mr. Pecci appears to be unhappy over something.

The Browning Society of Boston has begun its fall campaign with vigor. The World reports the suggestion that the Concord Philosophers and the Hub Browningites form an offensiv and defensiv alliance to chase the Whatness of the Whither into the strongholds of Philistinism this winter, and rout the Nonsense of the Never from its present well-fortified position. The scheme has met with much favor in Boston, and a great crusade against the opponents of Culture is promised.

The Wesleyan Christian Advocate says: "The New York Christian Advocate charges Zion's Herald, under its new management, with the violation of the rules of 'refined Christian journalism,' and the latter replies, charging the Advocate with 'delighting to assume to be, par excellence, the censor of the Methodist press, to play the oracle upon all questions, and with intolerant and hypersensitiv officialism toward the merest approach to friendly criticism.' Brethren, you are wasting time and space that might more hopelessly be given to abusing the South in this presidential crisis."

Magistrate (to Uncle Rastus): "This policeman, Uncle Rastus, says he caught you stealing chickens last night." Uncle Rastus: "Yes, sah, an' I tole de gemman when he 'rested me dat de minister was comin' ter dinner de nex' day, an' I hadn't a scrap ob meat in de house. Yo' see, sah, it was a matter of religyun wif me. It wouldn't do ter disappint one ob de Lawd's elect." Magistrate: "And what did the policeman say?" Uncle Rastus: "He said 'Rats,' sah. Now, yer honah, dat man hain't got 'nuff respec' fo' de relijus side ob life ter be ev'n 'motely connected wif de majesty ob de law."

Sarah Bernhardt has given the New York Herald her views upon marriage, "the result of wide observation and considerable experience," as the Herald puts it. She wrote: "The possibility of divorce makes the association of man and woman formed by marriage more agreeable, inasmuch as it equalizes their rights. Forced slavery no longer existing, the necessity for revolting against it is a thing of the past. Mutual concessions can now be made without causing a sense of humiliation on either side, for these concessions hav now become voluntary. The knowledge which husband and wife now hav that each can regain his or her liberty, if married life is no longer supportable, just givs an amorous turn to reconciliations after domestic quarrels, and allows a poetic veil to be thrown over monsieur's slippers and madam's pot-au-feu." The Herald calls these "words of wisdom."

The following circular is being distributed throughout Shelby county, Ala., by the author, who is a hard-shell Baptist preacher and pastor of several churches: "Prepare, all of ye, for the end is at hand. I hav read it in the stars, and angels hav come to me in my dreams and told me the glad tidings. The world will come to an end on Monday, November 5th, in the year of our Lord 1888. Prepare, all of ye, for that great day. God has hastened the day, because of the wicked generation of men called politicians. They are all falsifiers and blasphemers, and shall be burnt in lakes of liquid fire, because they fear not God and are given to works of iniquity. Rivers of boiling water will burn the Prohibitionist, and a sea of fire and brimstone will open and swallow all Democrats and Republicans. Prepare, all of ye, and remember the day is at hand. Obedith Bates, the Lord's prophet." The relativs of Bates will hav him confined in an insane asylum.

Says the Sunday Mercury: At the meeting of the board of apportionment on Friday, in the course of the consideration of the city budget, the item of $30,000 for the Metropolitan Museum of Art came up for action. The amount asked for was larger than that appropriated a year ago, and when the time came to vote on it Mayor Hewitt interposed: "I will vote for that if the museum is to be opened on Sundays, and not without." The mayor's views on this subject, which he proposes to enforce with the authority of his office, are those of the vast majority of our citizens. They are right and essential to the well-being of the community. The bigotry that would compel people who work six days a week to remain without the enjoyment of facilities for instruction on the seventh day is happily a thing of the past, except among a few of puritanical views, who hav a perfect right to square their own conduct by their narrow rule, but hav no right whatever to impose their opinions as law upon their fellow-citizens. The trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art hav been too much influenced by this spirit of intolerance. But if the people are to pay for the maintenance of the establishment, the people must hav their say as to their opportunity to enjoy it.

The Time Lock of Our Ancestors.

"Don't be so hard on yourself, Nellie. I am sure it can be no great wrong you hav done. Girls like you are too apt to be morbid. No doubt we all do it, whatever it is. I'm sure I shall not blame you when you tell me. Perhaps I shall say you are quite right—that is, if there is any right and wrong to it, and provided I know which is which after I hear the whole story—as most likely I will not. Right——"

And here the elder woman smiled a little satirically, and looked out of the window with a far-away gaze, as if she were retraveling through vast spaces of time and experience far beyond anything her friend could comprehend.

The evening shadows had gathered, and cast, as they will, a spell of gravity and exchange of confidences over the two.

Presently the older woman began speaking again: "Do you know, Nell, I was always a little surprised that Lord Byron, of all people, should hav put it that way:

> "I know the right, and I approve it too;
> Condemn the wrong—and yet the wrong pursue.

"'The right'—why, it is like a woman to say that. As if there were but one 'right,' and it were dressed in purple and fine linen, and seated on a throne in sight of the assembled multitude! 'The right,' indeed! Yes, it rounds like a woman—and a very young woman at that, Nellie."

The girl looked with large, troubled, passionate eyes at her friend, and then broke out into hot, indignant words—words that would hav offended many a woman; but Florence Campbell only laughed, a light, queer little peal; tipped her chair a trifle farther back, put her daintily slippered feet on the satin cushion of the low window-seat, and looked at her friend, through the gathering darkness, from under half-closed eyelids.

Presently—this woman was always deliberate in her conversation; long silences were a part of her power in interesting and keeping the full attention of her listeners—presently she said:

"Of course you think so. Why shouldn't you? So did I—once. And do you know, Nellie, that sort of sentiment dies hard—very hard—in a woman. At your age—" Florence Campbell always spoke as if she were very old, although to look at her one would say that she was not twenty-eight.

These delicately formed Dresden-china women often carry their age with such an easy grace—it sits upon them so lightly—in spite of ill-health, mental storms, and moral defeats, that while their more robust sisters grow haggard and worn, and hard of feature and tone, under weights less terrible and with feelings less intense, they keep their grace and gentleness of tone in the teeth of every blast.

"At your age, dear, I would hav scorned a woman who talked as I do now; and more than that, I would hav suspected her, as you do not suspect me, of being a very dangerous and not unlikely a very bad person indeed—simply from choice. While you—you generous little soul—think that I am better than I talk."

She laughed again, and shifted her position as if she were not wholly comfortable under the troubled gaze of the great eyes she knew were fastened upon her.

"You think I am better than my opinions. I know exactly what you tell yourself about me when you are having it out with yourself upstairs. Oh, I know! You excuse me for saying this on the theory that it was not deliberate—was an oversight. You account for that by the belief that I am not well—my nerves are shaken. You are perfectly certain that I am all right, no matter what I do, or say, or think." She took her little friend's soft hand as it twisted nervously a ribbon in her lap, and held the back of it against her cheek, as she often did. "But just suppose it were some one else—some other woman, Nellie, you would suspect her (no doubt quite unfairly) of all the crimes in the statute-books. Oh, I know, I know, child! I did—at your age—and, sad to relate, I had no Florence Campbell to soften my judgments on even one of my sex."

She had grown serious as she talked, and her voice almost trembled. The instant she recognized this herself, she laughed again, and said gayly:

"Oh, I was a very severe judge—once—I do assure you, though you may not think so now." She dropped her voice to a tone of mocking solemnity, not uncommon with her, and added: "If you won't tell on me, I'll make a little confession to you, dear;" and she took both of the girl's hands firmly in her own and waited until the promis was given.

"I wouldn't hav it get out for the world, but the fact is, Nell, I sometimes strongly suspect that, at your age, I was—a most unmitigated, self-righteous little prig."

Nellie's hands gave a disappointed little jerk; but her friend held them firmly, laughed gayly at her discomfiture—for she recognized fully that the girl was attuned to tragedy—buried her face in them for an instant, and then deliberately kissed in turn each pink little palm—not omitting her own. Then she dropped those of her friend, and leaned back against her cushions and sighed.

Nellie was puzzled and annoyed. She was on the verge of tears.

"Florence, darling," she said presently, "if I did not know you to be the best woman in the world, I shouldn't know what to make of your dark hints, and of—and of you. You are always a riddle to me—a beautiful riddle, with a good answer, if only I could guess it. You talk like a fiend, sometimes, and you act like—an angel, always."

"Giv me up. You can't guess me. Fact is, I havn't got any answer," laughed Florence.

But the girl went steadily on without seeming to hear her: "Do you know, there are times when I wonder if it would be possible to be insane and vicious, mentally and verbally, as it were, and perfectly sane and exaltedly good morally."

Florence Campbell threw herself back on her cushions and laughed gayly, albeit a trifle hysterically. "Photograph taken by an experienced artist!" she exclaimed. "You've hit me! Oh, you've hit me, Nell." Then sitting suddenly bolt-upright, she looked the girl searchingly in the face, and said slowly: "Do you know, Nellie, that I am sometimes tempted to tell the truth? About myself, I mean—and to you. Never on any other subject, nor to anybody else, of course," she added dryly, in comedy tones, strangely contrasting with the almost tragic accents as she went on. "But I can't. 'The truth!' Why, it is like the right; I'm sure I don't know what it is; and it has been so long—oh, so cruelly long—since I told it, by word or action, that I hav lost its very likeness from my mind. I hav told lies and acted lies so long——" Her friend's eyes grew indignant and she began to protest, but Florence ran on: "I hav evaded facts—not only to others, but to myself, until—until I'd hav to swear out a search-warrant and hav it served on my mental belongings to find out myself what I do think or feel or want on any given subject."

It was characteristic of the woman to use this flippant method of expression, even in her most intense moments.

"I change so, Nell; sometimes suddenly—all in a flash."

There was a long silence. Then she began again, quite seriously:

"There is a theory, you know, that we inherit traits and conditions from our remote ancestors as well as from our immediate ones. I sometimes fancy that they descend to some people with a Time Lock attachment. A child is born"—she held out her hands as if a baby lay on them—"he is like his mother, we will say, gentle, sweet, kind, truthful, for years—let us say seven. Suddenly the Time Lock turns, and the traits of his father (modified, of course, by the acquired habits of seven years) show themselvs strongly—take possession, in fact. Another seven years, and the priggishness of a great-uncle, the stinginess of an aunt, or the dullness, in books, of a rural grandfather. Then, in keeping with the next two turns of the Lock, he falls in love with every new face he sees, marries early and indulges himself recklessly in a large family. He is an exemplary husband and father, as men go, an ideal business man, and a general favorit in society."

She was running on now as if her words had the whip-hand of her.

"Everybody remarks upon the favorable change since his stupid, priggish college days. All this time, through every change, he has been honorable and upright in his dealings with his fellows. Suddenly the Time Lock of a Thievish Ancestor is turned on; he finds temptation too strong for even that greatly underestimated power—the force of habit of a lifetime—and the trust funds in his keeping disappear with him to Canada. Everybody is surprised, shocked, pained—and he, no doubt, more so than anyone else. Emotional insanity is offered as a possible explanation by the charitable; long-headed, calculating, intentional rascality, by the severe or self-righteous. And he? Well, he is wholly unable to account for it at all. He knows that he had not lived all these years as a conscious, self-controled thief. He knows that the temptations of his past life had never before taken that particular form. He knows that the impulse was sudden, blinding, overwhelming; but he does not know why and how. It was like an awful dream. He seemed to be powerless to overcome it. The Time Lock had turned without his knowledge, and in spite of himself. The unknown, unheard-of Thievish Ancestor took possession, as it were, through force of superior strength and ability—and then it was his hour. The hereditary shadow on the dial had come around to him. The great-uncle's hour was past. He, no doubt, was 'turned on' to some other dazed automaton—in Maine or Texas—who had fallen heir to a drop too much of his blood, and she, poor thing, if it happened to be a girl this time, forthwith proceeded to fall in love with her friend's husband—seeing he was the only man at hand at the time; while the Thievish Ancestor left—in shame and contrition—a small but light-fingered boy in Georgia, to keep his engagement with our respectable, highly honored, and heretofore highly honorable man of affairs in Wall street. The Time Lock of heredity had been set for this hour, and the machinery of circumstances oiled the wheels and silently moved the dial."

There was absolute silence when Florence Campbell's voice ceased. The heavy curtains made the shadows in the struggling moonlight deep and solemn. Two great eyes looked out into the darkness and a shudder passed over her frame. She thought her little friend had fallen asleep, she lay so still and quiet on the rug at her feet. Florence sighed, and thought how quickly youth forgot its troubles and how lightly Care sat on her throne. Then suddenly a passionate sobbing broke the silence, and two arms, covered with lace and jewels, flung themselvs around the older woman's knees.

"O my God! Florence; O my God! is there no way to stop the wheels? Must they go blindly on? Can we never know who or what we will be tomorrow? It is awful, Florence, awful; and—it—is true! O God! it is true!"

Florence Campbell had been very serious when she stopped her little harang. There had been a quality in her voice which, while it was not wholly new to her friend, would hav been unknown to many who thought they knew her well. To them she was a beautiful, fashionable, rather light woman, with a gay nature, who either did not know, or did not care to investigate too closely, the career of her husband, to whom she was devotedly attached.

She had been quite serious, I say, when she stopped her little philosophical speculation; but she was greatly surprised at the storm she had raised in the breast of her little friend.

Florence bent down quickly, and putting her arms about the girl tried to raise her up; but she only sobbed the harder, and clung to her friend's knees as a desperate, frightened creature might cling to its only refuge.

"Why, Nellie, little kitten," said the older woman, using a term of endearment common with her in talking with the girl—"why, Nellie, little kitten, what in the world is the matter? Did I scare the life out of you with my Time Locks and my gruesome ancestors?" and she tried to laugh a little; but the sound of her voice was not altogether pleasant to the ear. "I'll ring for a light. I had no business to talk such stuff to you when you were blue and in the dark too. I guess, Nell, that the Time Lock of my remote ancestor, who was a fool, must hav been turned on me shortly after sundown to-day, don't you think?" And this time her laugh lacked the note of bitterness it had held before.

She ran on, still caressing the weeping girl at her feet:

"Yes, undoubtedly, my Remote Ancestor—the fool—has now moved in. Do you think you can stand seven years of him, kitten, if you liv with me that long? But you won't. You'll go and marry some horrid man, and I shall be so jealous that my hair will curl at sight of him."

But the girl would not laugh. She refused to be cheered, nor would she hav a light. She raised herself until her head rested on her friend's bosom, and clung to her, sobbing as if her heart would break. Florence stroked her hair and sat silent for a while, wondering just what had so shaken the child. She knew full well that it was not what she had hinted of the darkness and her gruesome story. Presently Nellie drew her friend's face down, and whispered between her sobs:

"Darling, I must hav had some dreadful ancestor, a wicked—wicked woman. I——"

Florence Campbell shrieked with laughter. She felt relieved of—she did not know what. She had blamed herself for even unconsciously touching the secret spring of sorrow in the girl's heart. It was a strange sight, the two women clinging to each other, the one sobbing, the other laughing, each trying in vain to check the other.

At last Nellie said, still almost in a whisper: "But, Florence, you do not know. You do not understand. You are too good to know. It is you who will scorn and hate me when I tell you. O Florence, Florence, I can never dare to tell you!"

Her friend, still laughing, made little ejaculations of satirical import as the girl grew more and more hysterical.

"O thou wicked wretch!" laughed she. "No doubt you've killed your man, as they say out West. Oh, dear—oh, dear! Nell, this is really quite delicious! Did it step on a bug? Or was it a great big spider? And does it think it ought to be hanged for the crime?" A peal of laughter from the one, a shudder from the other, was the only reply to these efforts to break the force of the girl's self-reproach. Florence clinched her small fist in mock heroics, and began again:

"Your crimes hav found you out! And mine—mine—has been the avenging hand! Really, this is too good, kitten. I shall tell, let me see—I shall tell—Tom!"

The girl was on her feet in a flash.

"Not that! not that, Florence! Anything but that! I will tell you myself first—he shall not!"

Florence grew suddenly silent and grave. The girl slipped down at her knees again, and clasping her hand, went hoarsely on:

"O Florence, darling, I did not mean to wrong you! Truly, truly, I did not—and I do not believe he did—not at—first. We—oh, it was——" She sank on the floor, at the feet of her astonished friend, and with upstretched arms in the darkness whispered: "Florence, Florence—O my God! I cannot tell you! I must go away! I must go away!"

The older woman did not touch the outstretched hands and they sank to the floor, and on them rested a tear-stained, wretched face.

A moment later Tom Campbell entered the room. To eyes unaccustomed to the darkness nothing was visible. He did not see his wife, who arose as he entered, and stood with bated breath over the form of the girl on the floor.

"By Jove!" he muttered, "this room is as dark as Egypt, and then some—wonder where Florence is. Those damned servants ought to be shot! Whole house like a confounded coal-pit! Didn't expect me for hours yet, I suppose! That's no reason for living like a lot of damned bats! 'Fraid of musketoes, I suppose. Where are those matches? Florence! She's evidently gone out—or to bed. Wonder where her little 'kitten' is? Umm—wonder how much longer Florence means to keep her here? Don't see how the thing's going to go on much longer this way, with a girl with a conscience like that. Perfectly abnormal! Perfectly ridiculous! Umm—no more tact than——"

Nellie moaned aloud. Florence had held her breath, hoping he would go. He had almost reached the door leading to the hall, after his vain search for matches.

"Hello! what was that?" said Campbell, turning again into the room.

His wife knew that escape was not now possible. "Nothing, Tom," she said, in a voice that trembled a little. "Go upstairs. I will come up soon."

"Why, hello, Florence, that you? What are you sitting here in the dark for, all alone? Why didn't you speak to me when I came in? What did you let me——"

Nellie sat up, and in doing so overturned a chair. Tom's eyes had grown accustomed to the darkness. He saw the two women outlined before him, and he saw that Nellie had been on the floor, and that his wife stood over her.

"What's the matter?" he demanded. "What's up?"

He came toward them. Nellie sprang to her feet, with flashing eyes and outstretched, imploring hands to wave him back. She was about to rush into a painful explanation. Florence stepped toward her, put both arms about her, and drew her onto the cushioned window-seat at their side. She knew she must cover the girl's agitation from her husband, and somehow gain time to think.

"Sit down, dear," she said, softly. "Sit down here by me. You hav been asleep. He frightened you coming in so suddenly. You hav been dreaming; you talked in your sleep—but it was all nonsense—about an ancestor, whom you blamed very bitterly."

The girl began to speak impulsivly, but Florence checked her.

"Yes, I know. You told me. It was all the greatest stuff. But the part that was true—I doubt if she was to blame. I think, from all I know of—of her, and of the gentleman you mentioned, the one she—seemed to care for—that—oh, no, kitten! I am sure she was not to blame."

Nellie was trembling violently, clinging to her friend in shame and remorse. Tom stood perfectly quiet in the deeper darkness, back from the window, with a smile on his cheerful face and a puzzled light in his handsome eyes.

"Go upstairs, Tom," said Florence again, this time in a steadier tone. "Nellie's head aches; you waked her up too suddenly. We don't want more light—do we, Nellie? Not just now. We hav quite light enough for the present. I assure you we are better off just now in the dark. You would think so yourself if you could see us as we see ourselvs. We are quite battered and out at elbow, I assure you, and not at all fit for fastidious masculin eyes."

She was pulling herself up well. "To-morrow we will spruce up our bangs, put on fresh gowns, and not know ourselvs for the wretches we are to-night. Until then, Sir Knight, no masculin eye shall rest upon our dilapidation. Go!"

Tom Campbell had seen his wife in this mood before. He went.

All the way upstairs he wondered what had happened. "Never could make women out anyway," he muttered; "least of all, Florence. Women are a queer lot. More you liv with 'em, more you don't know what they'll do next. Wonder what in thunder's up. 'Kitten' never said a word; but I'm damned if I didn't hear her groan! Guess the little goose feels kind of—queer—with me and the old lady both present. Wonder—whew!—wonder how much I said aloud, and how much they heard when I first went in! Confounded habit, talking aloud to myself! Got to stop it, old boy; must be done—get you into trouble yet!"

Then he turned off the gas, and was sleeping as peacefully as an infant before the two women below stairs had parted for the night.

When Tom left the room, Nellie began to sob again, and Florence stroked her hair with her icy hands and waited for the girl to speak—or grow calm. And for herself—she hardly knew what she waited for in herself; but she felt that she needed time.

After a long silence she said, quite gently: "Nellie, little girl, we will go upstairs now; you will go to bed. If you ever feel like it, after you take time to think it over, and your nerves are quiet—if you ever feel like it, you may tell me just what trick your troublesome ancestor has tried to play you; but I want to say now, dear, don't feel that you must tell me, nor that I do not know perfectly well that my little kitten is all right, ancestors or no ancestors, and that we, together, can somehow find the combination to that Time Lock that so distresses you, and turn it off again. Meantime, little girl, no one shall harm you. You shall be let alone; you are all right! Be sure of that. I am. Now, good-night;" and she kissed the still sobbing girl on the forehead and hands, in spite of her protests and self-accusations.

Suddenly Nellie sank on her knees again, and grasped Florence's dress as she had turned to go:

"O Florence! O Florence! are you human? How can you? You are not like other women! O my God! if I could only be like you; but you frighten me! You are so calm. How cold your hands are! oh——"

"Are they? I did not notice. Oh, well, no matter; it is an old trick of theirs, you know."

Florence Campbell's voice was very steady now. Her words were slow and deliberate—they sounded as if she was very tired; and her step, as she climbed the stairs, had lost its spring and lightness.

The next morning Nellie's breakfast was carried to her room, with a message from Florence not to get up until she came to her at their usual hour for reading together.

About noon, as the girl lay thinking for the hundredth time that she must get up and face life again—that she must somehow stop this blinding headache, and go away—that she must die—Florence swept into the room, trailing her soft, long gown behind her, and gently closed the door. She had put on a gay pink tea-gown, with masses of white lace and smart little bows in unexpected places.

"Feel better, dear?" she asked, gayly. "Griggs told me your head ached, and that you had not slept well. I confess I did not either—not very. Tom and I talked rather late; you know he sails for Liverpool at noon. Sure enough, you didn't know. Well, no matter. The vessel is just about sailing now. Yes, it is rather sudden. We talked so much of it last night that it seems quite an old story to me to-day, though. You know he was to go in two weeks, anyway. It seemed best to go earlier, so I helped him pack, and saw him to the steamer two hours ago. You know a man don't hav to take anything but a tooth-brush and a smoking-cap. We thought it would be best for his health to go at once. Tom has not seemed quite himself of late." She did not look at her friend as she talked, and her white face was turned from the light. She talked so fast, it seemed as if she had rehearsed and was repeating a part with a desire to hav it over as soon as might be. "His Traveling Ancestor, the one who wants change—change—change in all things, has had hold of him of late. I'm sure you hav noticed how restless he was."

The girl sat up and listened with wide eyes and flushed cheeks. She had known many unexpected and unexplained things to be done in the house of this friend, who had given her a home and a warm welcome a year before, when she had left school, an orphan and homeless. But this sudden departure she had not heard even mentioned before. She thought she understood it.

"O Florence! Florence!" she cried, passionately. "It is my fault! I hav separated you! I hav brought sorrow to you! You, who are so good, so good; and I—oh, how can you be so kind to me? Hate me! Hate me! Thrust me from your house, and tell the world I tried to steal your husband! Tell that I am vile and wicked! Tell—and now I hav sent him away from you, who love him—whom he loves! Why do you not blame me? Why do never blame anyone? Why——"

There was a pause; the girl sobbed bitterly, while the older woman seemed afraid to trust her voice. After a while in a tired, solemn voice, Nellie went on:

"Do you think you can believe a word I say, Florence? Is there any use for me to tell you the truth?"

Her friend nodded slowly, looking her steadily in the eyes. Her lips were tightly drawn together, and her hands were cold and trembling.

"Then, Florence, I will tell you, truly—truly—truly, as I hope for——" She was going to say "your forgivness," but it seemed too cruel to ask for that just now. "I did not understand, not at first, either him or myself. I thought he was like you"—she felt Florence shudder—"and loved me, as he said, as you did. I was so glad and proud, until—until—O Florence! how can I tell you that I let him beg me to go away with him! After I understood what he meant, my heart did leap, even in its utter self-abasement and wretchedness. I let him beg me twice, and kiss me, after I understood! It must hav been my fault; he said it was"—Florence took her friend's hand in hers—"and he said that no one else had ever taken his thoughts away from you."

The girl thought she saw the drawn lips before her curl; but she must free her whole heart now, and lay bare her very soul.

"He said that he had always been true to you, Florence, even in thought, until I—O Florence! I must be worse than anyone on earth. I—he said——"

Florence Campbell sprang to her feet. "Yes, I know, I know!" she exclaimed, breathlessly, "and you believed him! Poor little fool! Women do. Sometimes a second time, but not a third time, dear—not a third time! Do not blame yourself any more." She stopped, then hurried on as one will do when danger threatens from within. "If it had not been you, it would, it might—my God! it might hav been worse! Some poor girl——"

She stopped again as if choking. The two women looked at each other; the younger one gave a long, shuddering moan, and buried her face in her hands.

Presently Florence said slowly: "All ancestors were not thieves. Some were simply fickle, and light, and faithless."

Nellie raised a face full of passionate suffering: "Florence! Florence! how can you excuse either of us? How can——"

Suddenly, with a great sob, Florence Campbell threw herself into the girl's outstretched arms, and with a wail of utter desolation cried: "Hush, Nellie, hush! Never speak of it again, never! Only love me, love me—love me! I need it so! And no one—no one in all the world has ever loved me truly!"

It was the only time Nellie ever saw Florence Campbell lose her self-control. H. H. GARDENER.

Judge Duffy's Opinion of Church Societies.

From the Herald of October 15th.

When Officer Burlando, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, applied to Justice Duffy yesterday for the commitment of three young men, the "Little Judge" flared up and exclaimed:

I'll do nothing of the kind until the father and mother hav been arrested. A child can't take a bite off an apple or crack a peanut in the street nowadays without being pounced upon by you men. It's simply a matter of business with you—high salaries for the officers. We got along a —— sight better before such societies were in existence, and I'm going to Albany this winter and see if I can't hav them all abolished. They are a nuisance and an abuse.

The Writers Whom Saladin Likes.

From the London Secular Review.

There are some excellent Freethought writers in America. We like the unaffected but effectiv style of E. M. Macdonald of THE TRUTH SEEKER. J. E. Remsburg writes well, as also Messrs. Washburn, Putnam, and many others, among whom are conspicuous the writers who sign themselvs respectivly "McArthur" and "Antichrist," the very sort of men we should like to contribute to our own columns if they could spare the time. Then there is "Alastor" of Secular Thought, anent whose identity we are in utter ignorance, but who is undoubtedly gifted with the literary faculty. There are, further, efficient writers on Freethought, the Independent Pulpit, the Ironclad Age, and several others of the Freethought journals of America.

Religious Emotion.

From the London Tattler.

I read in a daily that "the religious emotions of the Neapolitans are very much excited just now; the police content themselvs with preventing fights and disturbances."

The mob in the Naples street
Are in need of a cooling lotion,
For they fight, and quarrel, and cheat,
Because of "religious emotion."

A man nearly kills his wife,
But of evil he has no notion;
He drags her along by her hair,
In his fervent "religious emotion."

Why should the Whitechapel crimes
Be the cause of so much commotion?
Maybe murder goes with the times,
And 'tis only "religious emotion."

Swearing at Their Gods.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

When very sick, an Ainu man (the women may not pray at all) will call upon the fire-goddess, who is reckoned a great purifier, thus: "Abe kamui, Yekoingara wa en-kore" (O fire-goddess, condescend to look upon me). Upon the approach of death, the master will lie close to the fire on his own side of the hearth, partly for the sake of the warmth, but probably in a measure for any possible benefit to be gained from propinquity to the realm of the fire-goddess. Then the village chief and elders, and the sick man's friends, all come to see him; the men to pray and "drink to the gods," while the women weep and wail in rather a noisy fashion, since they are denied the comforts of religion. There are times when the patience of the praying men becomes exhausted, if no favorable answer is given to their petitions. Mr. Batchelor tells of one death-scene which he witnessed when two men were praying to the goddess of fire and another toward the sun rising through the eastern window; while a fourth was looking toward the northeast corner of the hut (which corresponds in a measure to the latrine of Japanese houses) and swearing most vehemently at all the gods, something after this fashion: "You fools! why don't you pay some attention to us? Can't you see this man is in great danger? Here we've been praying and praying for him, and yet he doesn't get well. What's the matter? Are you deaf? Can't you hear us?"

The Secretary's Eastern Trip.

After the incidents and labors which the Pittsburgh Congress necessarily entailed, it was something of a sweet relief to find myself journeying toward the City of Brotherly Love to pay my respects to the president-elect of the American Secular Union and perfect our plans for the future. The doctor was not at home on my arrival, so I pressed forward to New York anxious to meet ex-Treasurer Eckhard, and very much regret his being so suddenly called out of town—almost immediately after my arrival—which made my visit of comparativly little avail, though full of pleasant memories.

Next morning I greeted THE TRUTH SEEKER people and occupied the sanctum jointly with the jovial "'Gene" for several hours while unraveling my own and other hieroglyphics relativ to the much-to-be-corrected Roll of Honor. If there are any more errors, please credit them to the umpire.

Thursday evening our late president, Mr. Putnam, Editor Macdonald, and the writer were charmingly entertained by the lovely lares and penates and only divinities of Colonel Ingersoll's household—his fascinating daughters—of whose grace, beauty, and accomplishments so much has been written which falls short of the reality that it would be obtrusiv on my part to attempt it. But here comes the beaming countenance of the intellectual luminary of the nineteenth century—the central sun around which all the greatest of our day can only hope to become feeble satellites; whose grouping of words with the force of logic forms a new era in English literature, and whose imitators will be legion for centuries—he who takes the harp of humanity and plays a symphony which touches a tender chord throughout the civilized world, and, to which, spell-bound, all eagerly listen; whose logic, like diamond-pointed drills, is rending the "rock of ages," and before the thunderbolts of whom all orthodoxy trembles.

We are soon listening to the colonel's sparkling conversation on the candidates, the tariff, and Chicago, while bon mots explode as involuntarily as corks fly up from champagne bottles. We had the pleasure of meeting Captain and Mrs. Baker, Col. Tom Ochiltree, the brilliant Texan Congressman, and others.

Friday evening found us at the Mecca of Liberalism in the East—the Manhattan Liberal Club—which the reports of the "man with the badge-pin" hav made famous, and which were possibly enjoyed by those a thousand miles away with more relish than some of the participants. Here we meet the Drs. Foote, ever to the fore in the struggle for freedom; T. B. Wakeman, our scientific sage; Thomas Moneghan, a generous friend of Freethought; E. W. Chamberlain, the thorn in the side of St. Anthony; the redoubtable Captain Clark, and my Socialistic friend Oppenheimer. Mr. Putnam was the lecturer of the evening, receiving a hearty welcome from his old-time associates, and giving them in return a rousing discourse on "The Reign of the People."

At the invitation of Dr. Foote, Saturday afternoon found Mr. Putnam and the writer whirling over the New Haven railway, through the charming suburban towns, to Larchmont Manor, the doctor's summer elysium.

We alight to inspect another handsome residence that the doctor is erecting at a cost of many thousands, and pass on to his home, built on the highest promontory overlooking the sound. Sitting on his ample veranda we view the sun's declining rays reflecting on the water's glittering sheen, while the golden-tinged October foliage makes a strong contrast with the moss-covered rocks which mark the convulsiv throbs of our planet in the past. It is a scene of restful beauty that we shall hope to remember for a lifetime. Here art has assisted nature, and the combination produces a picture such as only a Byron or Shelley can fitly describe, or a Brown or DeHaas feebly reproduce on canvas. Mrs. Hall, the doctor's sister, was the agreeable hostess of the occasion, as his mother was in too feeble health to appear.

During the night the "windows of the heavens were opened," and we were rather expecting a repetition of the ark experience, but the storm-clouds passed off, and, after an early breakfast, the coachman pulled up a spanking team, one of which is named Sam, after Mr. Putnam, whom the doctor vouched for as a steady, reliable animal. He regretted having had to part with his companion, named Bob, in honor of Robt. G. Ingersoll. We were driven over the Larchmont paradise, past the yacht club's elegant house, among whose members are Jay Gould, Flagler, E K. Collins, and other nabobs of commerce and finance. A rapid drive through a charming country road brought us to the doctor's son Hubert's residence, where we were introduced to the latest edition of E. B. Foote, a charming little golden-haired granddaughter. We step into a newly constructed mansion of the doctor's here, skirting New Rochelle park, which is the model for his new house at Larchmont also. After a drive through another beauty spot, New Rochelle park, we make our pilgrimage to the shrine of all Freethinker's devotions, the monument erected to the memory of that great apostle of freedom—the lode-star of liberty—the immortal Thomas Paine. With feelings akin to sadness we look on this meager recognition of the author-hero of the Revolution, and sadly contemplate that even this is not a public testimonial, but placed here by a brave little band of Freethinkers, prominent among whom was Dr. Foote. Nothing in this ungrateful, bigoted community evidences their admiration for Thomas Paine—not a street nor avenue is named after him. But we rejoice that while New Rochelle may not appreciate Thomas Paine, the greatest and best people of our time delight to do honor to his memory. Picking up a relic from the inclosure, we are driven from this sacred spot to the station, and soon bid adieu to our stalwart Freethought host, Dr. Foote.

Mr. Putnam pushes forward to Newark, N. J., where he speaks in the afternoon, while I follow on a later train which givs me only time enough to say a few words on the practical work of the organization, shake hands with Mr. Black, the president, renew my acquaintance with Miss Booth, of Boonton, and under the pilotage of my earnest friend and co-worker, Mr. Holmes, reach the train en route for Philadelphia.

Philadelphia friends hav grandly borne the brunt of the battle for many long years, and the Friendship League is enshrined in the hearts of earnest workers. Directing my steps from the depot to their place of meeting, I found Mr. Watts well under way with his lecture, and an overflowing house, into which I was piloted with some difficulty by Secretary Longford. In the audience I discovered Dr. and Mrs. Westbrook, with whom I hav already made your readers acquainted. The president of the Philadelphia society seems a gentleman well qualified to maintain so important a post, and I was welcomed by many of the foremost workers, whose names I cannot now recollect.

E. A. STEVENS,
Secretary American Secular Union.

A Card from J. E. Remsburg.

Twelve days after the Secular Congress convened I received a report of its proceedings. While congratulating the Union upon its choice for president, I desire also to extend my sincere thanks to the twenty-two delegates who deemed me worthy of their suffrages. I appreciate the compliment more highly than if I had been an aspirant for the office and solicited their votes. Had I been called to the presidency, I should reluctantly yet submissivly hav obeyed the mandate, and to the best of my ability performed its duties. But I know Dr. Westbrook, and I hav tried to know myself, and with no simulated modesty I frankly confess that the one selected is by nature and education the better equipped for the position. Had I attended the Congress, I should, not as a mere act of courtesy to Dr. Westbrook but as a conscientious performance of my duty, hav voted with those who voted against me.

Some weeks previous to the time of holding the Congress, I received this interrogatory: "Will you accept the presidency of the American Secular Union if you are elected?" To this question I replied as follows: "You ask me if I will accept the presidency of the Union if elected. The same question was asked me at the Cassadaga Congress when Colonel Ingersoll was elected, and received a negativ answer. I believed then and still believe that in my independent way I can accomplish more for the cause. There are other Liberals who are better qualified for the position than I am. There are doubtless others who aspire to it, and I do not desire to be in their way. The organization, however, must not be suffered to die, and if no other person can be found to accept the office, I will try to perform its duties if elected." I did not desire the office, did not solicit a vote for it, and, aside from the above, did nothing either directly or indirectly to obtain it.

My work, for the most part, has been outside and independent of any organization. It is largely iconoclastic in its nature, while that of the Secular Union is to a great extent political. Yet from the date of its formation in Philadelphia in 1876 to the present time this organization has had my heartiest sympathy. It is the noblest and the worthiest political organization that this country has ever had. It merits the support of all who favor the elimination of ecclesiastical authority from our national and state governments. It is a needed organization, and never was it more needed than at the present time when cunning Catholicism and arrogant Protestantism are each redoubling their efforts to gain absolute control of our republic.

It is true that, so far as state Secularization is concerned, comparativly little has been accomplished. Not one of the Nine Demands has, save in a few isolated cases, been conceded. But let us remember that the contest, so far as numbers and ways and means are concerned, has, as yet, been an unequal contest. On the one side a handful of officials with a paltry $1,000 at their command; on the other, eighty thousand priests with $800,000,000 worth of untaxed wealth and an annual income of $100,000,000.

During the past year President Putnam and Secretary Stevens hav been the recipients of some unfriendly criticisms. These may hav been deserved. Be this as it may, I am entitled to credit for none of them. From my lips, neither in public nor in private, has escaped a word of condemnation. I hav felt that even if they were not doing just the best that might be done, they were yet honestly and courageously doing the best they could. I, for one, feel indebted to the retiring president, Samuel P. Putnam, for his labors in behalf of Freethought, and especially for his three years of toil in connection with the American Secular Union. Our literature has been enriched by his pen, and the cause of mental liberty has been promoted by his services in the field. I believe that a more devoted, unselfish, self-sacrificing Secularist than E. A. Stevens does not liv. For the Liberal cause he has unflinchingly endured privation and obloquy. In the person of his competitor, Harry Hoover, Freethought has one of its best and bravest champions. Had he been elected he would hav filled with honor the position to which he aspired, and the earnest efforts of his friends to place him there prove that those who know him best are most cognizant of the fact. But Mr. Stevens has been reëlected. Sustain him as he deserves, and the affairs of the office will not suffer in his hands.

In Dr. Westbrook, E. A. Stevens, Otto Wettstein, Dr. Foote, and Mrs. Freeman, the Union has a splendid corps of officers. Let us stand by them. If they make mistakes, let us exercise a little charity. Let us realize the impossibility of securing other than fallible men and women for these positions. Let us try to realize also that we, who serve in the ranks, are not infallible. Our officials may err, and while we may pass an honest verdict upon their acts, this verdict may not always be a just one. Let us put away all petty differences and jealousies. Let us cease pointing out the specks of rust upon the armor of our comrades, and present a united front to the common enemy.

J. E. REMSBURG.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

I took the 6 P.M. train on Friday, September 14th, from Walla Walla, with the assurance of the railroad officials that I should reach Ogden, Utah, by 11 A.M. on Sunday, at very latest. I was advertised to lecture at Ogden, Sunday afternoon and evening. My ticket was over the Union Pacific Railway from Pendleton to Pocatello. The greater part of the road is over a dreary sand desert. The dust is really fearful. You are suffocated with the windows and ventilators closed, choked with the dense smoke and sand if they are opened; even when all are closed the dust and dirt sifts in so that everything is thickly covered—clothes, eyes, hair, teeth, nostrils are filled, while perspiration adorns your face with rivulets of mud. For thirty-six hours no real effort was made to clean the cars; the route is one of continuous misery, tedious delays, dirt, and discomfort, while the frequent collisions of freight trains giv emphatic evidence of the utter lack of administrativ ability on the part of the management. Unless driven by direst necessity—no other route being possible—avoid as you would yellow fever or leprosy this division of the Union Pacific Railway.

I did not reach Ogden till 11:30 A.M. on Monday. After some inquiry I found the home of the noble old veteran John A. Jost, who gave me a hospitable reception. The friends were very greatly disappointed at my non-arrival to lecture there on Sunday. I took the train at 4 P.M. for Deweyville, was dumped with a large trunk and two heavy grips in the midst of a sagebrush prairie, no station, not even a shed or platform. I walked three-quarters of a mile in the pouring rain to the ranch of the one only Liberal in the township, only to find no arrangements made for lecture. Next morning I returned to Ogden, some disgusted but not discouraged. After a pleasant visit at good Brother Jost's I started for Hooper, Utah, September 20th. I was met at the station by Edward F. Munn, a brave, devoted worker for Liberalism. Hooper is only a railway flag station; there is no village, it is simply a farming neighborhood. Friend Munn's ranch is some six miles away, on the shores of Great Salt Lake. Brother Munn, having been a devout member of the church for thirty years, initiated into all its mysteries and miseries, has written some able and effectiv articles on Mormonism. When he left the church and renounced its practices he did so at the risk of his life, for at that time the church taught "blood atonement," and destroying angels were in vogue. Brother Munn has suffered much from overt as well as underhand persecution, but with indomitable courage held his own, and won some honest and intelligent ones from the delusions of this horrid theocracy. Once let Utah obtain statehood, and his only safety would be in instant flight, regardless of loss of all he now possesses.

The school-house was crowded with Mormons, who listened most attentivly to the lecture on "What Liberalism Teaches." The sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER were eagerly taken. The tithing system keeps most of the Mormons very poor, yet I had quite a sale of small pamphlets.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Sept. 23.—This is a splendid city, with long, wide, magnificent streets, 132 feet wide. The streets are laid out at right angles. The city is situated at the foot of a spur of the Wasatch mountains, the northern limits extending on to the "bench" or upland which unites with the mountain. It is the county seat, and capital of the territory—the Zion of the Saints. The city is divided into twenty-one wards, each of which has its bishop, elders, teachers, deacons, etc., and each ward has its own regular Sunday-morning meetings. The teachers visit every family during the week, and make personal inquiries of each member (children are baptized at eight years of age). All the females are especially asked if they are in full subjection to the husband or father, if they hav any cause of complaint against their bishop or any officer of the church, if they hav paid full tithes, etc. Anything of import—the least indication of disaffection the teacher discovers—is at once reported to the bishop. The bishop and his two counselors form an inquisition before whom all malcontents or refractory members are summoned and disciplined.

Every Sunday afternoon all are expected to assemble at the Tabernacle, when the sacrament of the Lord's supper is administered.

The Tabernacle is an immense building, 250 feet from east to west and 150 feet wide, egg-shaped, its roof shingled; it is an immense, but, from the exterior, not at all an imposing structure. The roof is supported by forty-six columns of cut sandstone; the spaces between form large doors, and over the doors windows, these doors and windows constituting the walls. From the pillars springs the roof in one unbroken arch, forming the largest self-sustaining roof in the United States, with the exception of the Grand Central depot at New York. The ceiling of the roof is sixty-five feet above the floor. At one end of this mammoth egg-shaped building is the organ, the second largest in America. There is a gallery all around save at the organ end.

Within the gallery, which is only opened on special occasions, they can seat eight thousand persons. It is a very cold, stormy Sunday afternoon if the congregation does not reach five thousand.

I looked over the immense congregation. With the exception of about six or seven hundred visitors who came from curiosity, there were very few Americans. The great mass were of the very lowest type of Europeans—low caste English and Scandinavians. The editor of the Deseret News, the church newspaper, did the preaching on this occasion. It was a regular Seventh Day Adventist sermon, only the preacher used the term Revelations where the Adventists would hav used Testimonies. The burden of his sermon was obedience to the church authorities, faithful payment of tithes, denunciation of the government for sending saints to the pen—they always speak of the penitentiary as the pen—for living their religion, i.e., practicing polygamy, and that it was far better to be deprived of liberty, aye, to lose life itself now, and thus be sure of eternal life, than to deny the faith, save life now, only to lose it eternally. The sermon seemed to be gaged as to length so as to terminate as soon as the deacons had finished handing round the drink. I am told they pass blessed water instead of wine. It would be quite an item of expense to giv even a sip of wine to some five thousand communicants.

The Temple is on the same block with the Tabernacle, and all is inclosed with a twelve-foot adobé wall. The Temple is a most imposing structure, and can be seen for miles before reaching the city, although it is not yet nearly completed. The dimensions of the foundations are 186x99. It is built of white granit from Little Cottonwood cañon. It was commenced Feb. 14, 1853. Its estimated cost is $10,000,000. No work is being done on it at present.

Among the most prominent and important business enterprises is the Z. C. M. I., mystic letters much in use, interpreted to mean, "Zion's Coöperativ Mercantil Institution," known throughout the territory as the "Coöp." The institution is owned by leading wealthy officers of the Mormon church, and has branches in nearly every settlement in Utah. All the faithful saints are expected to do their trading with the Z. C. M. I.

The lecture was delivered at the Opera House, a very handsome building, magnificently fitted up. I doubt if there is a handsomer, better equipped theater of its size outside of New York city. It is owned and under the management of gentiles. The Salt Lake City Theater is much larger, but bears no comparison for elegance and comfort with the Opera House. Every real improvement has to be inaugurated and sustained by the gentiles. The audience fairly filled the parquet and dress circle. The lecture was well received. C. B. REYNOLDS.

The "Twa" Preachers.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Last week, at about the same time, I received two letters from two preachers—that is, they were preachers. One has become "champion" of Christianity; the other is an ex-reverend. One of the letters is written, the other printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Oct. 6, 1888, page 629—sing!

The brace of preachers I am now considering imagin that if they fill a page with accusations against me somehow it answers what I hav said. Both charge me with the "mercenary" spirit. Personally, I care little about epithets flung at me—got used to them long ago. Both charge me with falsehood, one saying I am guilty of "reckless disregard of truth;" the other—who is not quite out of the church—says I tell "a deliberate lie." Neither of them made the least attempt to prove his charge against this meek and lowly Infidel. One says he has not been within a hundred miles of the other. I thought by his letter of October 6th that he had been much nearer. It is a striking proof of the consensus of the incompetent.

The ex-reverend says of me in his refined, ex-Christian way: "The odor of the skunk has permeated him." Dr. Lyman Beecher, who viciously hurled that brilliant sentence at all Infidels who were teasing him to debate, can now look down from his mansion of bliss with sweet satisfaction as he reflects that his pet expression still livs. If "reformed" clergymen write and talk like those ministers who are yet in the pulpit, "in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity," the question is pertinent: Are they reflecting honor on the Freethought cause?

The ex-reverend boldly accuses me of "lachrymal whining." I might own up to the whining, but lachrymal—never! That is too much. I am willing to meet an opponent half-way. Did our brother sit before a mirror when he wrote his "reply?" It is a notable fact that westward he took his way through Kansas, cursing the climate as he went, landing on the Pacific, yet not pacified, but grievously sore under his imagined ill-treatment from some coast Liberals. I do not hear our cheery Putnam complaining of small pay, while the ex-reverend has found more fault about money and about people and about climate than all other lecturers put together. No wonder a Liberal remarked to me this summer that he did not like to read his articles because they gave him the "blues;" but Putnam's fill him with joy.

No, I am not in partnership with Braden; nor is he my "dear friend and teacher;" nor hav I "become the mere tool of such a thing as Clark Braden." And this is the gentleman that talks about "reckless disregard of truth!" "It takes a Jamieson to run after Braden." Never ran after him in my life. I am ready to meet him in debate, and any other preacher, whenever and wherever Liberals wish to hav me. I hav stood by our banner of free speech and free debate—this is my offense. And because I do this you may call it "associating" with Braden, "traveling together," etc. I never traveled a mile with him, never offered to travel with him, and never expect to.

The next charge against me is on the money question. Both the "champion" and the ex-reverend declare that I am "mercenary." The same thing was said of Paine, and is said of Ingersoll. I am in pretty good company when not associating with the clergy. Both of my ministerial monitors assert, without hesitation, that I lecture and debate for money. This is true—the only truth I hav found in their allegations. Now, show me the lecturer or preacher that does not. There is a great deal of humbug and sickly nonsense on this money question smuggled in from Christianity. I confess I hav never found a way to travel over this country, giv lectures, and hold debates without pay. As a general rule I hav received from Liberals good pay for lectures and debates, and hope for a continuance of these "divine blessings," so that I may be able to cancel every debt I owe—Jesus won't do it—and hav a surplus in the treasury.

The little wife and myself came West and took government land so that in our old age we could hav something for a rainy day. It is a mean, mercenary thing to do! My expectation is that by lecturing winters and farming summers we will free ourselvs from debt and become more self-reliant and independent in the evening of life.

I receive cordial greeting from Liberals everywhere I go—justice-loving Liberals who do not expect a man to spend his life battling popular mind-enslaving superstitions for a mere pittance to pay his fare to the next station. The Liberals that I meet do insist that the worker in any department of labor, mental or physical, should be well paid; and many of them pay more than their income warrants. But they rejoice that they are free, and want to help make others free. The very rich, with few exceptions, are not openly avowed Freethinkers.

Remember that the "Baptist clergyman," referred to in "Tales Told Out of School," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 4, 1887, "positivly" declared that "Ingersoll does not really believe what he teaches, and only lectures against the church and Christianity to make money." That is the preacher of it. When will people hav done denouncing their brethren for money-making, when everybody knows that it is just what they want to do themselvs? Does not the ex-reverend lecture for money? He says that neither Braden nor myself "would advocate or defend any cause only for the money they obtain by so doing." Nothing "reckless" about that? It shows how little he knows about what I hav done. He furnishes no proof, and none even is attempted. Nearly all my life has been one continual sacrifice for this cause of Freethought; yet I hav not complained as much of bad usage in the whole twenty-nine years of public speaking as one ex-preacher does on a single trip. I entered the Liberal lecture-field in 1859, when the meaning of self-sacrifice for a cause was fully understood; when a man had to battle against superstition with one hand and for a mere subsistence with the other, and no Ingersoll stood ready to pay the sacrifice. I hav faced the armed and howling mob, and by it been warned that I would proceed in the exercise of free speech at the peril of my life—but the free speech went on. When I can't hav it life can go out! It is precisely the same principles I am now maintaining. I do not think I will shirk my duty now, even if I never hav a call to address another Liberal society. I know it is unpopular—in some quarters—to debate with a bad Christian. Yet I believe I hav with me in this fight the great body of Freethinkers if they would but speak out. But if not one Liberal stands by me I propose to contend for what I think is right.

The next ten years were much better for a Freethought advocate—that is, he was not obliged to accept more kicks than coppers.

The last ten hav been bright ones, although, with the exception of Ingersoll, no lecturer has made a fortune out of Freethought talk, and there is not much danger that any of us will become Jay Goulds in the ten years to come; for it is a fact, and a humiliating one, that Freethinkers, as a body, do not work at it much. A few earnest, enthusiastic Liberals, here and there, still bear the burden of supporting lecturers and subscribing for our journals. There are Liberals in nearly every town in the United States. What are they doing? What sacrifice are they making for our cause? Two or three earnest men and women in every town where there are Liberals could, if they would, do as nobly as a few Freethinkers are doing, revolutionize their neighborhoods by Liberal literature and lectures.

He says I "laud and defend him for the sake of the money to be obtained by debating with him." Not a particle of proof to sustain the assertion. I never defended him, only in the same sense that I defend a Roman Catholic—defend his right to free speech. I could not be a Freethinker if I refused to do so.

He says that I "cannot conceive the possibility of anyone being honest in offering to make any real sacrifice for the cause of truth."

I think I can. When the "offer" has attached to it so many unreasonable conditions that there is no likelihood the "offer" will ever grow into a "real" sacrifice, there is no difficulty in reaching a conclusion. W. F. JAMIESON.

Monte Vista, Col.

Lectures and Meetings.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG, J. E 's sixteen-year-old chip, is making campaign speeches in Kansas.

CHARLES WATTS intends making a lecturing tour through Kansas, Colorado, and Utah next January and February. Friends on those routes requiring lectures at that time from Mr. Watts should write him at once, as he is now filling up his list of engagements. Address him direct—282 Sumach street, Toronto, Ont., Canada.

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE, having recovered from the illness which prevented her speaking at the Pittsburgh Congress, will lecture in Philadelphia for the Friendship Liberal League at its hall at Broad and Wood streets on Sunday, November 11th. Subject at 2:30 P.M., "The Girard College Steal." At 7:30 P.M., "The Drama of the Nineteenth Century." Admission free.

Babel.

We read in Gen. x, 5, as follows: "By these were the isles of the gentiles divided in their lands, every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations," and we understand, as perforce we must, that the people of the earth were at this time of sundry and divers tongues or languages, don't we? Well, I do, anyhow, yet the next chapter opens in the first verse thus: "And the whole earth was of one language and one speech," showing that the people of divers tongues must hav struck a "Volapük," even at that early day, and settled down to one style of speech, a very sensible thing to do, but which the people of to-day don't seem to be sufferingly eager to do, owing to a press of other matters, I suppose. How happy we could be were the "whole earth of one language," speaking "Volapük" fluently as per the following sample: "Spelobs das olabom studelis mödik in Melop!" Happy? well, I should observe.

When we think that the devoutly-to-be-wished-for state of affairs of which the above verse in Genesis treats might hav continued to date but for one of the most brilliantly idealistic enterprises ever conceived in the mind of man, barring Stewart's ridiculous "hotel for women," we feel like "cussin'" that enterprise, at least I do, with cuss words of forty-horse power depth and breadth, so to speak. Of course you all know the enterprise to which I refer—the tower of Babel affair. Only for that miserably ambitious attempt to reach the inaccessible and all throughout the world to-day would be volapüking in concert and congeniality, the Turk being understood by the Choctaw when stigmatizing the latter as a chump, the Malay masher by the Bluenose belle when declaring his passion, and so on and so forth, of course.

There is no time when I feel so sore over this Babel affair as when I get into a mixed company of Chinese, Irish, Italians, Polish Jews, Dutchmen, Arabs, Spaniards, Frenchmen, Congoese, Turks, Yankees, Canucks, Bostonese, etc., such as one can't help getting into at times in cosmopolitan Gotham, and then I feel sore clean through, I tell you. It isn't so much that the various jargons are dissonant and so shocking to the auricular apparatus, as that I am painfully aware of being a heavy loser of good things said in tongues unknown to me—the bon mot in Chinese, the joke in Arabic, the wise saw in Congoese, the reparteé in Turkish, the deep cult in Bostonese, etc.—and a loser without rebate, as no amount of study of these languages could bring these things back to me, though enabling me to catch on to the future emanations from like sources.

When one thinks that at a certain period in the previously prior, "the whole earth was of one language and of one speech," the rest of mankind doubtless likewise exploiting their minds, and then looks over the globe to find a thousand and one living languages in activ service, with not a few defunct specimens lingering in the lap, so to speak, of linguistical lexicographers and literary lazzaroni, which languages are all Greek to him, and Greek a sealed book, he feels as though he would like to boot those beetle-headed blokes of Babel who brought about that remarkable confusion of tongues on the jump, as it were; more especially when invited to a fête champêtre in the back yard of a rue de Mulberry maison, or a conversazione, or flux de bouche, in an avenue de Baxter salon, or otherwhere in the slums where divers tongues in confusion worse confounded prevail—feels like jumping on those Babel bullheads with both feet; at least I am one who feels just that way inclined.

But now let us get onto that Tower. It would seem, from the reading in Gen. xi, 1, 2, that the "whole earth" was to be found in "a plain in the land of Shinar," or that the people of the "whole earth" had gathered together on said plain. Here are the two verses; read and see how it looks to you: 1. "And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech." 2. "And it came to pass, as they journeyed from the east, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar; and they dwelt there." In default of mention "they" are to be taken as the people of the "whole earth;" if not, who then were "they," from the reading? If so, and it must hav been so—it was the whole hog or nothing—then the "whole earth" or people thereof settled down on the plain of Shinar! and all of "one language and one speech," notwithstanding that, shortly before, "the isles of the gentiles were divided in their lands, every one after his tongue." But perhaps the "gentiles" weren't reckoned as part of the "whole earth," eh? Well, we don't know and it doesn't matter much at this late day, perhaps.

Well, the "whole earth," or "they," at all events, having settled down on Shinar's vasty plain, were simultaneously and unanimously seized with a raging desire to build a city, and not only a city but a tower whose top would reach unto Blissville! And they were also anxious to "make them a name lest they be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth," which goes to show that there were other broad acres lying loose around and about Shinar, thus expanding the "whole earth" to more respectable proportions, you see. Nothing but the proposition to build is given in the Holy Queer, but that "they" went at it hammer and tongs, so to speak, is proved by the statement in the H. Q., that Jehoveh "came down"—presumably from Blissville, although he might hav been camping on a mountain, a favorit coign of vantage with him in later years—"to see the city and the tower which the children of man builded."

It would appear that Jahveh was not particularly pleased with what he saw, for he exclaimed—in whose presence no one knows: "Behold, the people is one, and they hav all one language; and this they begin to do; and now nothing will be restrained from them which they hav imagined to do." It is very evident from this speech that he believed the builders of the tower would land the top of it in Blissville or bust in the attempt; and that he did not believe they would bust is proved by his next remark on the subject, and what is said to hav occurred thereafter. His next remark was as follows: "Go to, let us go down and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech." This is a trifle mixed and off its base, as it were. "Let us go down"—who were "us?" A case of "We, Us, and Co.," evidently, but who went to make the "us?" Gabriel, with Jahveh, perhaps, and a few cherubim, eh? "Go down." Jahveh must hav gone up and reported matters after his first remark concerning the tower, for, according to the H. Q., he "came down to see" it. His return evidently was not reported. But that was a trivial affair compared with what followed the going down of "us," reported as follows:

"So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth; and they left off to build the city." Well, rather, I should suppose, having been "scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth." This wholesale scatteration proves conclusivly that Shinar plains, with a little outlying and contiguous border land, could not with any degree of propriety claim to be the "whole earth," as a hurried reading of the second verse of Genesis xi might lead one to suppose to be the case; it settles it, however, that the "whole earth" or people, barring the "gentiles" of sundry tongues, alluded to in the preceding chapter, were gathered together on the plains of Shinar; and it is well enough to know this for future guidance in debates on man and his whereabouts in the heretofore, the "gentiles" of the period treated of, and all others, perhaps, not to be counted as within the pale of humanity, you know.

Speaking of that Babel affair, there was a world of meaning in these words of Jahveh: "And now nothing will be restrained from them which they hav imagined to do." Did he really fear they would raise that ridiculous tower unto the confines of Blissville, then swarm over the parapets and take possession of the citadel? Sure pop, or why didn't he laugh the builders to scorn and let them go ahead until their ridiculous shaft toppled and fell kerchug to earth? You see, Jahveh had never seen anything built by the hand of man higher than a two-story house, if as high, and, seeing that if the bricks held out—it probably never occurred to him that it would topple on reaching an altitude of thirty or forty miles, or so—it was only a question of time when they "got there," he decided to nip the enterprise in the bud, and nipped it at one fell swoop, as it were; and the duffers who designed and went to work on the tower ought to hav known that they would be knocked out before success crowned their efforts; and here is where their idiocy sticks out like a bill-sticker in the circus season.

There is another view to be taken in the premises with the camera of conjecture. Perchance in those days the plain of Blissville hung low, exceeding low, in ether, say within a mile or so of Tearville, in which case the engineer-in-chief of the universe did well to adopt summary and stringent measures whereby to hold the fort against the tower builders who, if not interfered with, would hav penetrated his domain as sure as eggs are eggs and rats are rodents! But this view of the possible condition of things does not detract from the chumpiness of the chumps engaged in rearing that ridiculous tower, for it was several years subsequent to the big freshet that swept off wicked humans and brutes from the face of the earth, and said chumps ought to hav known who they were bucking against and that they would hav no sight of success. As for this view, I am inclined to accept it at par one hundred, as Jahveh, being called almost daily to Tearville to look after things, would naturally locate his headquarters handy by, you know. Severing his business connection with Tearville some two thousand years ago he removed his headquarters to a locality best known to himself, and, possibly, Talmage. To those of but ordinary acumen he appears to hav gone where the woodbine twineth. Selah!

Church and State.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With that supreme feeling of security which comes from unthinking ignorance, the average freeborn American citizen will assure you, should it be suggested that the union of church and state is not merely a possibility, but even a planned-for probability, in this country, that such a thing can never be. "No citizen of these great United States, sir, would stand it for a moment, sir!"

In the vain hope of arousing him from his false security, you point out the power, constantly increasing, of the Roman Catholic church in New York city and St. Louis, the intolerance which prevails in any and every section of the country where some one religious sect is greatly predominant, and the infamous persecutions carried on, in the name of religion, by such self-styled and self-appointed censors of public morality as the society whose 'least of apostles' is Mr. Antony Comstock—I hav omitted the h from his given name, as I consider it an immoral synonym—perceiving how little impression you make upon him by generalities, you bring out from your mental secret-drawer a choice incident: Monsignor Capel, on his last visit to this country, told a prominent citizen of St. Paul that the Catholic church aimed at dividing the Catholic vote in the United States, so as to make that church a power in politics. Then you show him how such an attempt was really made during the Blaine campaign of 1884, and is repeated by the free-whisky plank in the Republican platform of 1888.

You will find that your arguments will be altogether vain, and that it is impossible to shake his blind faith in the Constitution and the great American people.

I must confess that I was, until very lately, a sharer in the popular belief of our safety from any form of religious oppression. Little by little, however, my eyes were opened, and an incident of which I was an eye-witness the other day fully revealed to me the danger in which we stand.

On Sunday, September 23d, I chanced to be at White Bear Lake, a popular summer resort in the vicinity of St. Paul, Minn. A regiment of United States troops, the Third Infantry, was encamped on a common in the outskirts, and hearing there was to be some ceremony performed in the evening, I strolled out in that direction. I found the soldiers in line, and watched the precision of their drill with great interest. Suddenly the officer in command moved two companies, one at either end of the line, so that they stood at right angles to the main body, thus forming a hollow square, and then I heard a voice, with an unmistakable ministerial sniffle in its tones, say, "Let us pray!" After a properly orthodox supplication to the supreme architect, the fine regimental band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee," with great pathos. Next the reverend gentleman delivered himself of a sermon, which, by its drift and argument, betrayed him as a Presbyterian. The customary benediction followed and the conventicler retired. The regiment was then formed again in line, and some military movements were executed.

The whole proceeding struck me as being so very curious that I approached one of the soldiers after they had broken ranks, and addressed him:

"Might I ask the name of your chaplain?"

"He ain't our chaplain, sir. He's some minister tramp. Our chaplain is back at Fort Snelling and is a Roman Catholic."

"Then I suppose the majority of you were glad to hav the chance to listen to a Protestant."

"What are you a-giving me? The most of us is Catholics, and don't believe in any such a fake as that fellow."

"But why did you go to services, if you are Catholics? It is a mortal sin for you to do so, is it not?"

"Well, I like that. If we hadn't a-gone there, there would hav been a general court-martial awaiting us for disobedience of orders. You see, we was on parade, and we durstn't leave. I'm thinking the father will hav to absolve us. If he don't, we're in a box."

"Why, my good fellow, it is unconstitutional for your commanding officer to make you attend divine service of any kind unless you wish to do so."

"That don't help us much. We've got to obey orders first and let the Constitution hav a show afterward."

"Anyhow, you can write to the papers and let the public know of the wrong done you."

"Oh, hell! Write to the papers! Why, what on earth is the Sixty-second article of war for but to stop that sort of thing?"

With an air of disgust at my dense ignorance of military matters, the gallant defender of his country turned away. Upon further inquiry, I found the facts in the case to be: That the great majority of the soldiers were Roman Catholics; that of the fifteen officers present in camp at most three were Presbyterians, five were avowed Freethinkers, and the balance were either indifferent to any sect in particular or but nominal church-members; that the colonel was a steadfast Presbyterian, and had invited the minister to preach of his own motion, and without consulting with anyone; that he had marched the regiment on parade, and that it would hav been impossible for anyone to leave it without asking his permission, unless in open violation of an article of war. Now, the thought which strikes me is: If one zealot can do so tyrannical and unconstitutional an act as to make two or three hundred men attend divine service against their will, at a time when all religious denominations are trying to gain popular favor by loudly proclaiming the necessity of every man's selecting his own creed, how would many hundred fanatics act should their particular sect be successful in obtaining political supremacy in this country?

General Washington, as president, wrote the following declaration: "The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." This was doubtless true; but, unless I am much mistaken, the structure being erected on this foundation is essentially Christian, and the main building is the Roman Catholic church, which, being a more theologically consistent hierarchy than any other, is the more to be dreaded.

There is an article of war left from the old British regulations still incorporated in our army regulations, which recommends all "officers and soldiers diligently to attend divine service." This recommendation is now little heeded, and is considered obsolete; but were the Catholic church or any other denomination to gain the upper hand, it might be revived with disastrous results to the religious freedom of the United States army. It should be stricken out; and just now it would be an easy matter for any Congressman to secure the passage of a bill to that end.

SOSIA.

Can This Be All There Is of American Liberty?

It is related of D. M. Bennett that when he was first arrested at Watkins, his sense of humiliation, at being the victim of such a bold outrage, was so keen that he was heard to murmur repeatedly to himself, as if dazed by some sudden shock which had rudely destroyed his confidence in his fellow-men: "Can this be all there is of American liberty?" Looking about me to-day, and witnessing the, as yet, unchecked aggressions of the fiends who joined in the persecution of good old D. M. Bennett, I often ask myself mournfully the same question, "Can this be all there is of American liberty?"

To the liberty-loving American who has reverently read in the history of his country of the fierce struggles and bitter sufferings through which that liberty was achieved, nothing can be more oppressiv than to be confronted with such a confession as the following, which appears in a letter from that earnest, devoted, noble woman, Mrs. Celia B. Whitehead, to the editors of Lucifer, and published in that paper Sept. 7, 1888:

> Standing a little in awe of the "obscenists," I dare not express all I feel on this question, but I do wish we might come up ourselvs, and help others on, to a plane of thought that shall make possible a cordial friendship and affection between a man and a woman that shall not develop into generativ passion except at their mutual bidding and with the approval of their judgment.

That a pure woman is "in awe of the obscenist," that a thoughtful woman dares not express all she feels, that the people are to be deprived of the benefit of her thought and knowledge because she is terrorized by the bulldozing of the Comstock gang, is humiliating indeed. That any citizen of this country can be restrained or intimidated in the honest expression of his opinion on any subject, unless, of course, such expression works direct and positiv injury to some other citizen, is so oppressiv, unjust, and unwarrantable that every patriot should struggle against it with all his power. If these aggressions are allowed we will soon be in such a condition that the discussion of matters not tolerated by the American Inquisition will be attended with as much personal danger as the publication of an emperor's diary is in Germany. The threat which these conditions imply is one which every patriot should hasten to resent.

But bad as Mrs. Whitehead's case is, there is yet a worse feature of this business. Learning that the case of U. S. vs. Chase, reported in 27 Federal Reporter p. 807, had been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and knowing, as a lawyer, that the case as reported was not only bad law and a wrong conviction, but also beneath contempt as an authority, I wrote to the counsel in the case, asking him to send me a copy of the letter on which Mr. Chase was convicted. I did this, not for the gratification of idle curiosity, but to satisfy myself if it could be possible for a private letter to be written which could so excite the animosity of a judge who might assume to pry into it, as to make him disregard all sense of judicial fairness, honesty, and justice, and violate the obligation of his office for the sake of venting his spite against the writer. I can hardly express how surprised I was on receiving a reply refusing my request, not through any discourtesy, nor through unwillingness to communicate the facts, but because of the infernal terrorism that exists in such cases. The counsel accompanied his refusal of my request with the following statement:

> The construction contended for by the counsel for the United States would render attorneys liable under the statute for consultations by mail with their associate counsel in the ordinary course of business whenever and wherever a prurient fancy could so construe the communication as to excite libidinous thoughts. The fact is, I should be liable to prosecution if I should comply with your request. Not that I admit the obscenity of the matter mailed in the Chase case, but where is the standard? How am I to know in my ordinary correspondence whether I obey or break the law?

The fiends whose religion and morals lead them to make this world as nearly like the ideal hell as possible, and who busy themselvs in procuring the enactment of severe penal laws for the regulation of other people's conduct, always fall back on the the stock argument that the punishment of offenders sets an example which deters others from the commission of the offense. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that this fallacy is not a fallacy but a truth, what deterrent effect can it hav upon the general public to punish a man for some vague, indefinit something, and then tell the people they shall not know what the offense is? This is too much like the methods of Loyola to be suited to the genius of American institutions, and reduces the punishment in such cases to an act of pure vindictivness. I maintain that if a human being is to be put in prison in this country I, as a citizen, am entitled to know what for. First, as a security to liberty, and that no one may be imprisoned unjustly. And secondly, that I may be informed by this example what the law really is. Can it be that the law of this land prohibits a consultation between counsel by mail upon any subject? I do not so understand it? And yet, if the conviction of Mr. Chase is to stand, and the law upholds his conviction, and his counsel is right in his reasons for refusing to tell me what it is all about, then consultations between counsel, when conducted by mail, may become criminal.

Already under this new and disastrous legislation, of the very existence and of the true nature and extent of which the country at large is yet wholly unaware, men of science, artists, and philanthropic reformers publishing their works in utter good faith, are living, so far as they hav been cognizant of those laws, under a veritable reign of terror, and in so far as they are not informed they are daily incurring the risk of a savage, terrific, and excessiv punishment from the law, for no crime, in ignorance of their danger, and trusting to the spirit of freedom which has hitherto characterized our country and distinguished it from Russia, Turkey, and the despotisms of the past. Again I ask with D. M. Bennett, "Can this be all there is of American liberty?"

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. Guild's Explosiv Notions.

A TYNGER FROM TYNGSBORO.

Tyngsboro, Mass., is the half-way side-track between Lowell and Nashua. It is famous for its Daughrock farm, boasts two box shops and a brush factory, glories in three gospel-mills and sundry sawmills, had a high school some time according to ancient history, and this year sports six licensed liquor saloons and a wholesale hell-stew house. A writer in the Boston Record wants to know how the present taxes compare with those of the past, when drinking dens were not so numerous and were run under public censure instead of legal sanction; also, what are the prospects of the high school, and what kind of an elementary education may be expected from the saloons. I learn that the idea of the town board is that the licenses are to lessen the taxes, but where is the general profit of having a conflagration for the sake of the cinders?

Since the above writing I learn that one trinity-factory has been shut up and one liquor-seller has vamoosed the ranch.

A DRAUGHT FROM DUNSTABLE.

Col. Jonas H. French, of Boston, has had made at his Bay View quarries a fine monumental public drinking-fountain, and presented it to the town of Dunstable. This piece of art, combining the useful with the beautiful, is much appreciated, and though worth but about $1,500, is a better benefit than would be a bouncing brewery. Let those elsewhere who can afford to, go and do likewise, and get their name up for doing something worthy of praise and remembrance.

Pure cold water, good as can be,
Better far than rum or brandy;
If this truth excites your fury,
Let your horse be judge and jury.

The notable news of the day in Dunstable is the tearing down and drawing off of a partly built Universalist church by a town committee. The question whether the town or the Universalist parish owns the land will hav to be decided by the supreme court. A speaker in town meeting said he did not care if there was a church in every house, and he did not care if there was not any about, for he had a creed of his own—Do as I would be done by—which did not permit him to vote away the people's land. If there was any other Christianity than that, away with it.

THE GODS MUST GO.

> Science has given us a new God and more exalted ideas concerning him than in the past; a God vastly grander, larger, and truer to the wants of man's nature.—Rev. J. A. Chase, Unitarian, Chelmsford, Mass.

Science has never had anything to do with God, for the same reason that it has nothing to do with the end of a circle—namely, it not only has never found one, but never can, for as soon as the proposition is squarely presented, the terms of the question afford its own refutation. Science has done for the Gods what daylight always does for the ghosts—it shows that they were not there. Science invents useful machinery, and never institutes holy horrors. Science has been damned by every God which fraud ever fashioned to intimidate ignorance, and in return science dooms all the Gods to shame and everlasting contempt. When theology has to be revised to accord with advanced reason, and when material investigation is made to interpret spiritual revelation, human judgment is acknowledged to belong on the highest bench, and religion may as well be kicked under the footstool.

Those who are bound to boom a God of some sort or other will doubtless do so, even if they hav to steal one, as Jacob's wife did, and when they hav got them they may do with them as Rachel did with the pilfered seraphim. Such disposal of deity for security will hardly serve to magnify holy dignity. The straits to which close-pressed piety is put to retain the wretched objects of its worship are both laughable and pitiful. But why cater to the habit of superstition by carving out other idols in the place of such as common sense has demolished? Tear the world's rag-babies in tatters as the evolution of reason outgrows them, and do not idly and inconsistently mold other dolls, no matter how esthetically fine they may be got up. It is time mankind was done with its Punch and Judy shows and settled in satisfied enjoyment of the realities of life.

EVOLUTION AND REVELATION.

> Neither evolution nor revelation explains the universe, but evolution explains revelation. Theology does not explain revelation. Theology confuses revelation. Evolution follows reason. Theology baffles, evades, if it does not defy, reason. Theology makes creation a fatal mistake, Christ an imperfect reparation. And in saying this let me not be thought so foolish as to bring a railing accusation against theology, that noblest of sciences, one of the strongest powers of the world, whose savants hav been mighty men of valor, whose gravest mistakes hav been from too close pursuit of the reason's rigid command.—Gail Hamilton.

The above is the worst bosh that Abigail Dodge, or anyone else, ever wrote. What does she mean by revelation and theology being thus opposed in their teaching? Either one of them presupposes the other. How can the noblest, the grandest of sciences "baffle, evade, if it does not defy reason?" Yes, and not only must it defy but directly controvert reason if the grossest mistakes of this mighty science hav been from too close pursuit of reason's rigid command, and if so then science is irrational, or the more irrational the better. Grave, indeed, hav been the mistakes of those bigots whose valor consisted in torturing women and ripping infants from their mother's bowels, according to the spirit of theology and the letter of revelation. The weaker the power of such God-fearing manslayers the better. The revelation of "Gail Hamilton" asserts that God made the universe thus and so. Evolution shows that story to be untrue. If it explains it at all it explains it to be a lie framed to cheat its believers. The worst charge against Mr. Blaine is that he keeps for secretary a woman capable of inditing such idiocy.

THE APOSTLES' CREED—SHORT METER.

There once was a God,
Who in heaven did dwell;
He was murdered on earth,
And then went to hell.

Either the church people believe their written creeds or else they don't. If they do, they are under the influence of the most abominable teachings that ever could be put in words; if they do not, then they hav no right to profess them—by doing so they damage whatever influence for good they may hav in other directions in mixing any show of decency up with sacred dirt. Until the churches erase from their documents the insanities which are no longer accepted as inspiration and repudiate the doings of madmen as primal ecclesiastical authority, it is the right and business of sensible and honest men to condemn them as enemies of reason and progress. The best use that religious dogma can be put to is as a foil to rational philosophy.

Sonnet to Saul.

Hail, Saul the First—the last, the only Saul—
Leader of Israel's long line of kings!
Better thou hadst remained, O youth so tall,
A jackass-keeper for thy dad, by jings!
Than listened to the saintly Samuel,
Who set the king-bee buzzing in thy hat,
Seduced thee from the ranch, where all was well,
And king-anointed thee with mutton fat!
O king ill-starred! on thee the Lord went back
For that which high applaud good men and true—
To mince-meat Agag you declined to hack—
They crying loudly, "Bully, Saul, for you!"
Like Conrad's, Saul, thy name is, in these times,
Linked with one virtue if a thousand crimes!
Requiescat in pace! SI SLOKUM.

A New Scheme of Church Thievery.

The Congress of the United States is, or was before its adjournment, in a pretty business for a legislativ body supposed to be guided by the Constitution. It was nothing more nor less than a Christian missionary enterprise to hire the dupes of one religion to change to another.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, has kindly franked us his speech made in the Senate on October 2d relativ to "the work of the Industrial Christian Home Association of Utah territory." The Senate had under consideration the conference report of the committees of both houses on the general deficiency bill, and the committees could not agree. Mr. Hale's text for his speech was the Senate amendment to the House report, as follows:

"112. Industrial Christian Home Association of Utah territory: To further aid the Industrial Christian Home Association of Utah territory, under its articles of incorporation, in the establishment and maintenance of an industrial and educational institution in Salt Lake City for the benefit of the dependent women and children of Utah and Idaho territories who desire to sever their allegiance to the Mormon church, $75,000; and for contingent expenses of the association, $5,000; in all, $80,000.

"113. The money hereby appropriated shall be disbursed by the treasurer of said association, who shall giv such bonds for the faithful performance of his duties as may be deemed requisit by the secretary of the interior. All accounts of expenditures under this appropriation shall be audited by the Utah commission, which shall hereafter act as the board of control for said institution, and shall make an annual report to Congress covering the work of said institution and its expenditures."

It seems that this scheme to evangelize the Mormons at the public expense was started two years ago "by the philanthropic women of America who hav been largely represented by the organizations known as the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of which Miss Frances Willard is president, and the National Women's Home Missionary Society, of which Mrs. R. B. Hayes is the president." The officers of the institution were to be "Christian women," and its purpose was to "disintegrate the Mormon church." The originators were backed up by the "bishop of the M. E. church in Utah," the Methodist editor of the Utah Christian Advocate, and other prominent Christians of the territory. The forty-ninth Congress was asked for $100,000 to build the home and set it going.

At first the petitioners asked for the money to support Mormon women and children "who renounce polygamy." Mr. Hale took care of the bill, and $40,000 was given—

"To aid in the establishment of an industrial home in the territory of Utah, to provide employment and means of self-support for the dependent women who renounce polygamy and the children of such women of tender age in said territory, with a view to aid in the suppression of polygamy therein; said sum to be expended upon requisition of and under the management of a board of control to consist of the governor and justices of the supreme court and the district attorney of said territory; and said board shall duly and properly expend said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purposes herein indicated, and shall, from time to time, report to the president their acts and doings and expenditures hereunder for transmission to Congress."

With this $40,000 the officers of the "home" leased and fitted up a building for temporary use, and applied at once for another $40,000, which Senator Edmunds tried to giv them, but failed through lack of time to push the bill through in the closing hours of the second session of the same Congress. Now they come back for $80,000, and a proviso that it may be expended to support all women who desire to sever their allegiance to the Mormon church. The Association has purchased land upon which to build, and has closed a contract for the main structure, the foundations of which are already in place. But, as Senator Hale told the Senate, the money will be nearly expended when the main building is erected, and the additional appropriation sought in the present bill will be needed under the estimates of the architect employed by the Association for the purpose of adding another story to the main building, and two wings three stories high, all of which will be needed by the Association to develop the industrial part of its work. The balance of the appropriation will be needed for the next year in fitting up the new building, in the employment of a moderate force to conduct the work of the Association, and for the expenses of maintaining it. As soon as the enterprise is fairly entered upon, and the scope of its work can be seen, the Association will make, through the board of control, detailed reports of its work, and will be able to present definit estimates for future expenditures.

To bring the propositions of the association down to a point, they are: Forty thousand in hand; eighty thousand during this year, and future sums as per yearly estimates of the executiv committee of the Association, and all this to support the women who desire to change their religion. It occurs to us that it is a pretty high premium to put on female Mormon apostasy.

There is, however, a principle involved in this proposed measure, and it does not require a magnifying glass of very high power to see it. It is this: What power, what authority, has Congress to vote money to feed and clothe a number of females who desire to swap churches? Can Congress build a home to support all the Catholic women who see the error of their faith and want to become Infidels?

It is true that Senator Hale apologized for the language of the bill—"sever their allegiance to the Mormon church"—and offered to substitute other words, but so long as the meaning is there, it makes no difference as to the phraseology. Even retaining the words of the first bill, "to support the dependent women who shall hav renounced polygamy," the measure is as grossly unconstitutional as any that even Senator Blair has ever had the impudence to offer. Congress, in the territories, may punish crime and imprison the criminal, but where on earth does it get the constitutional authority to provide food and clothes and shelter for a certain class of citizens? Still more preposterous is it for Congress to set up an institution admittance to which depends upon the applicant's renunciation of certain religious tenets! The bill should never hav had a moment's consideration in the Senate or in the House of Representativs, and it never would hav had had not a lot of fanatical politicans like Senator Blair, of New Hampshire. and Edmunds, of Vermont, set the example of catering to the church for the sake of votes to be won and influence to be used in their behalf. It was this bad example that induced Congress to confiscate the property of the Mormon church on grounds by which, if parallel reasoning be allowed, every congregation in this country could be fleeced of almost every dollar's worth of property it possesses. Congress has simply gone into a religious crusade against one particular Christian sect at the behest of another, or several Christian sects. And the result is that it has got to support the victims, and in doing so giv employment and money and a national backing to the victorious sect. It's great business, indeed!

If Senators Hale, Blair, and Edmunds could be permanently retired from any participation in legislativ affairs it would be money in the pockets of every taxpayer in the country. And their retirement would conduce not a little, also, to the preservation of constitutional forms of government in the United States.

The School War in Boston.

In spite of the approaching presidential election the school question continues to be the top subject in Boston now, and the voting for a school board next month will be a warm contest. The Roman Catholics, while of course opposed to woman suffrage, will use the females of their faith for everything that will count, and the male members of the flock will be made to walk turkey—as the New Englanders felicitously phrase parental or legal coercion—if they do not vote as the priest orders them. The Freeman's Journal (Roman Catholic) says:

"If women are to be a factor in our voting population, the Freeman's Journal should regret to see the experiment made on an issue of this sort, and in such a spirit, but having to face the fact that a species of bulldozing is to be tried on, we cannot help feeling a certain amount of satisfaction that the coercionists will not be allowed to hav things all their own way. So, then, as things stand we are not one bit sorry that the Catholic women of Boston are to take a hand in the coming election, and our prayer is that they may do it so effectually that a school board will be chosen whose patriotic fairness cannot be questioned."

"Patriotic fairness" will strike the average reader as a very ingenious way of rounding up that last sentence. The Boston Transcript leans toward the Secular idea. It says

"Circulars hav been issued to the Catholic portion of the population appealing to them to be assessed if they wish to 'retain the Catholic power on the board.' Such an idea is altogether foreign to the purposes for which the school board exists. The American and common school idea is that sectarian notions and prejudices should be unknown in managing the schools. And the people are strong enough to enforce the idea, despite religious bigots on either side."

The Home Journal has very decided opinions on this school controversy:

"A Catholic has no more business to be placed upon the school board than the sworn foe to a prisoner has to be empaneled upon the jury which is to try him."

Some of the Protestant religious journals are, however, almost taking sides with the Catholics. The Christian Weekly, lamenting the good old times when the Westminster Catechism was taught in Boston schools, says that while "it would doubtless not be wise to teach that catechism now," yet "these accepted truths" should be taught, i.e., "That God is; that he speaks to us in his inspired word; that he saves us by his son; that to God all men are responsible for the deeds done in the body." To this claim the Christian Register, a Unitarian organ, retorts:

"We assure the Weekly that there are many Protestants who are ready to protest against any such invasion of their rights as citizens. The place to teach the Westminster Catechism, or the theology derived from it, if it is to be taught at all, is in orthodox Sunday-schools, not in schools supported by the public money."

Thus the war goes on, and the religious brethren are having great sport making claims and denying them, just as though the world belonged to them to divide up as they pleased. But one of these days, we hope, the common-sense people will wake up and pitch all the sects out of the school-house windows and tell them to go to their churches to fight their battles, and pay the funeral expenses of their own dead.

A Poor Prospect for Protestantism.

A Lutheran minister writing in the Independent reveals a state of affairs in German cities more satisfactory to Freethinkers than to Christians. The burden of the minister's plaint is that the large cities of the German empire are almost entirely given over to irreligion, and that unless great effort is made to establish and support "city missions" the devil will get about all of the Dutchmen. The German capital, he says, has now over one and a quarter million inhabitants; yet the number of congregations is only thirty-eight, and of the clergy one hundred and three. In the outskirts of the city with a million of souls there are only thirty-five ministers. In this way a Berlin pastor is expected to care for from twenty to thirty thousand souls. Comparativly Hamburg is no better provided for, and Königsberg with its one hundred and forty-five thousand Protestants, Stettin, with one hundred and twenty-five thousand, Magdeburg, with one hundred and eleven thousand, Breslau, with one hundred and eighty thousand, average at least ten to fifteen thousand souls for each pastor.

In this state of apathy toward Christianity the clergyman finds not only a "negativ loss of spiritual privileges," but a positiv gain in pronounced anti-Christian tendencies, the most alarming of which is the increase of Socialists, who in that land correspond in the eye of the church and government to the Nihilists of Russia. In the largest parish in Berlin, with a population of about one hundred thousand, at the last election the Social Democrat candidate received thirty thousand votes. It is the opinion of the church that each of these votes was cast by an undisguised Infidel, and she therefore hates Socialism as she does Infidelity. But that is not the worst of it. Nearly all the representativs sent by Berlin to the Prussian Landtag and to the German Reichstag are either advanced Radicals or outspoken Socialists, which is the same thing, except that the Socialists put the political ahead of the religious sentiment. The "de-Christianizing of the masses in the cities," says the minister, "has resulted not in mere religious indifferentism, but to a great extent in activ antagonism to the church and to the social order founded on Christian principles. When, after the repeal of the law compelling parents to hav their children baptized, it was learned that in the next twelve months ten hundred infants had not been baptized, a leading Berlin paper exclaimed: 'Hurrah for the first thousand heathens in Berlin.'" Another loss sustained by the church is that of the press. The Berlin papers are controled by "reformed," that is, Rationalistic, Jews, and to their influence, says our minister, is due to a great extent the irreligious condition of the German metropolis. The government, too, is reluctant to spend money in building churches, though the present emperor is heartily in accord with the pietists. In Leipzig, two years ago, the first new church erected for nearly four centuries was dedicated, and it is a rare thing to hear of the building of a new church in a German city.

This condition of ungodliness naturally excites the Christians, and they are now from private resources trying to reëstablish religion in the cities. In this they hav the help of the new kaiser, the fighting grandson of his grandfather, and his wife, who hav both expressed themselvs as desirous of seeing the people become Christians—possibly for the reason that then they will the more readily obey the "divinely appointed rulers" and be the more ready to starve or put themselvs up as targets for the greater glory of the emperor and his God. But the government will hardly spend much money on churches while needing it so badly for the army, and private enterprise is not likely to evangelize Berlin in a hurry. The Germans of the cities are mainly Rationalists, while the agricultural peasantry and unskilled labor class are chiefly Roman Catholics. Between the upper and nether mill-stones of Reason and Rome, the Protestantism of Germany is in hard luck, even though it be the legal religion.

Mr. Pecci and This Young Man.

There is no man in the world whose speeches are so easily read between the lines as are Mr. Pecci's, of Rome, Italy. This gentleman is variously known as "his holiness," the "sovereign pontiff," the "pope," and so forth, and he exercises a good deal of influence over several millions of people who imagin that in some way he has a strong political "pull" with the superintendent of one or two other-world places. Mr. Pecci, in other words, is a spiritual ruler, and considerable of a temporal ruler as well, though just now he has no army or navy to enforce his decrees.

Knowing who Mr. Pecci is and comprehending the position he occupies, the following interview between him and the representativ of a London newspaper is not without interest because of the plain statements made between the lines. Mr. Pecci was found on a throne, dressed in white, with pallid complexion cast into high relief by hangings of dark crimson curtains. There were three chairs on either side of him, and when the correspondent had kissed his slipper, Mr. Pecci deigned to ask the news-gatherer what he wanted. Evidently thinking that he was in great luck not to be kicked, which attention he would hav received with equal obsequiousness, the correspondent spoke:

"I ventured to ask his holiness if the German emperor's recent visit to the Vatican had proved satisfactory.

"'I cannot say,' he replied, 'that we are either satisfied or dissatisfied with the emperor's visit. That he came to Rome was not at our request, nor was his object in coming favorable to us, but rather to those who are against us, to those who for ten years past hav practically compelled me to restrict myself to this palace, from which I cannot issue. My dignity forbids me to do so.

"'This young man, having acceded to the German throne, has been making a round of visits to European courts, and finally to Rome, where his presence was calculated to strengthen our adversaries and consolidate their position, not to benefit us. He came to see me.

"'It was an act of courtesy, and I was glad to receive him.

"'I had much to say to him, but just as I was beginning my discourse he interrupted me by calling in his brother in order to present him to me. After that I had no further opportunity of speaking privately with him. . . . With our episcopacy and clergy in Germany all is going smoothly and satisfactorily; vacant offices hav been properly filled up with the accord of church and state alike, and to the contentment of both. Of our religious orders which had been expelled from Germany three hav been authorized to return —the Franciscans, the Dominicans, and the Benedictines. We are in negotiation about the withdrawal of prohibitions affecting our educational orders, but there is great difficulty in this. The German government desires to keep in its own hands the exclusiv instruction of Catholic children. To this I cannot consent.

"'The teaching rights of the church must be recognized and their exercise must be duly authorized by the state. With less than this I may not be satisfied, and, as you know, when the pope is dissatisfied Catholics are discontented.

"'In the German empire there are fifteen million Catholics whose wishes and feelings must be respected, it being to the interest of their temporal rulers to keep them contented. When the civil authority is righteously exercised it is always supported by the church. As head of the church I cannot countenance injustice done to those who are committed to my care and whom I am bound to protect and defend.'"

Notice, please, the We with which Mr. Pecci alludes to himself. That is the "plural of majesty," and the plural of majesty was used by Jehovah himself when he said, Let Us make man. Since then various people calling themselvs sovereigns hav used this form of expression. But the most prominent point brought out by this interview, however, is that We are not pleased to be pleased with "this young man," because he, or his government, will not let Us run his schools while he pays the bills. And unless this is done at once We shall sulk, and make Our people sulk, and then there'll be the devil and all to pay. Of course We always support the government of kings (We used to be in partnership with the fellows) when they do as We say, but no government is righteously exercised unless We are the power behind the throne, or are the throne itself. Therefore, and finally, We are not satisfied with "this young man."

The irreverent American will want to know who We are, but as that has been already explained, the question is not pertinent.

The Humbug of the Missions.

"The Great Missionary Failure," is the title of an article in the last Fortnightly Review, by Canon Taylor, who has before now disgusted his fellow-clerics by explaining to the people who support missionary societies the folly of their giving. In this article Canon Taylor reaches the conclusion that the attempts of the churches to convert the world to Christianity are positiv failures. The facts from which Mr. Taylor argues are briefly summarized by the Sun:

"Leaving out Thibet, Borneo, and other regions of which the population is unknown, the most recent estimates make the non-Christian population of Asia and Africa upward of 920,000,000, of which the natural increase by the excess of births over deaths must be more than 11,000,000 annually. Dr. Maclear, who is the principal of a training college for missionaries, and 'perhaps the greatest living authority on the subject,' estimates the annual increase of nativ Christians due to missionary efforts at 60,000. At that rate, then, it would take the missionary societies 183 years to overtake even this natural increase of the non-Christian population in a single year. 'In spite of our advance, instead of overtaking the work, the work is overtaking us. It is like the tortoise racing with a railway train; the longer the race continues the farther the tortoise is left behind.' Something like $10,000,000 is spent annually on Protestant missions, and there are about 6,000 American and European missionaries, with about 30,000 nativ agents, and yet there are to-day upward of 10,000,000 more heathen and Mohammedans than there were a year ago.

"The greatest of the missionary societies is the Church Missionary Society, with an expenditure of about $1,500,000 yearly, and yet the annual increase of nativ Christians due to its labors is not more than 4,000 at the outside. Therefore it would take the society 2,750 years to convert as many Moslems and heathen as are gained by birth in a single year. If the population remained stationary and all the converts steadfast, it would take more than 330,000 years to convert the world, or nearly a million years if the relapses are taken into account.

"The annual increase of nativ Protestant Christians in India, due to the labors of 35 societies, is reported to be 19,311, and of Roman Catholics 21,272, or 40,583 in all. At this rate it would take 64 years to come up to the increase of the non-Christian population of India in a single year. In China the situation is even more disheartening. The number of adults baptized by the Church Missionary Society last year was only 167 out of a population of 382,000,000, with an annual gain of at least 4,580,000 by the excess of births over deaths. At this rate the society would hav to work 27,000 years to come up to the natural increase of one year, and more than 1,680,000 years to convert China, even if the population remained stationary. The expenditure, too, is enormous; in any other department of effort it would be called wasteful. In China the cost of the 167 conversions was about $75,000. In Ceylon last year 424 agents of this society spent $55,000 in making 190 adult converts out of a population of nearly 3,000,000; and yet the relapses were more numerous than the conversions, for there was an actual decrease of 143 in the number of nativ Christian adherents. In northern India it cost $170,000 and the labors of 715 agents to make 173 converts. Many of the converts are paid, 35 of the 94 communicants in Hong Kong being paid nativ agents, and 7 of the 10 in Egypt and Arabia. In the missions to Egypt, Persia, Palestine, and Arabia the society employs 119 agents, and has expended over $117,000 in the last two years, with absolutely no conversions. All the efforts of the Protestant missionaries against Mohammedanism hav been utterly unavailing. Islam stands out firmly against Christianity, and is far more successful than it is in propagandism."

But this is not all. The miserable showing in numbers is followed by an equally unsatisfactory exhibit as to the quality of the converts. Unprejudiced testimony in all heathen countries is unanimous that the men and women most easily brought under the influence of the missionaries are those who make the most undesirable members of any decent community. And Canon Taylor corroborates this testimony most unequivocally. He quotes the English vice-consul in the Cameroons as reporting that after twenty years of labor the missionaries in many important districts can scarcely number twenty sincere converts; and in other parts of Africa the religion of the nominal Christians "is discredited by numbering among its adherents all the drunkards, liars, rogues, and unclean livers in the colony. In the oldest of our West African possessions all the unrepentant Magdalens of the chief city are professing Christians, and the most notorious one in the place boasts that she 'never missed going to church on a communion Sunday.'" After a quarrel in a nominally Christian village, three years ago, the victors proceeded to cook and eat the bodies of the slain. The vice-consul says that, with rare exceptions, the nativ African pastors, teachers, and catechists whom he has met are "more or less bad men." A missionary reports the same.

Added to the moral rottenness of the converts, another great drawback to the conversion of the world to Christianity is found in the persistent and inevitable rows among the various Christian sects. Canon Taylor quotes Dr. Legge, for forty years a missionary among the Mohammedans, to the effect that "we shall fail to make converts so long as Christianity presents itself infected with the bitter internal animosities of Christian sects, and associated in the minds of the nativs with the drunkenness, the profligacy, and the gigantic social evil conspicuous among Christian nations." There are two hundred and twenty-four societies which work for converts. One missionary complains that one of his "inquirers" has been "decoyed" and baptized by the missionary of another society. Another records that an inquirer, to whom he was paying five dollars a month, struck for higher pay and ran off to a rival missionary. A third discovered that a hopeful inquirer of his had adopted inquiry as a paying business, and was going the round of the missions.

These last criticisms of the Eastern missionary methods reveal a striking resemblance to the Freshman mission to the Jews in this city, and it is not unlikely that the latter is a fair model of missions everywhere. At any rate, the results appear to be the same abroad as at home. Few converts, and those of undesirable persons; fighting and scheming and bribery practiced on all sides, and the deluded but honest Christians footing the bills. A "million for missions" raised in one church alone to be spent on Western hypocrits and Eastern debauchees and prostitutes—such is the spectacle presented to those Christians who hav given more than they can afford, even to robbing their children of their pennies, in the vain hope of bringing the heathen to the foot of the cross. Surely it is time to bring this imposition to an end. And now that Canon Taylor, himself a distinguished member of the English church, has given us the facts, the supporters of the humbug system, as well as those who profit pecuniarily by it, should go a little slow in bleeding the unsuspecting church-members.

Letters from Friends.

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Below find synopsis of lecture delivered at our meeting yesterday afternoon in Memorial Hall, which we hav leased for 3 o'clock Sunday afternoon meetings. In addition I will say that Professor Bell is a very fine speaker, and has his audience under perfect control, all being as interested and eager at the close as at the beginning. It was as good a lecture as the Cleveland Secular Union has ever had the pleasure of listening to. We hope to secure his services again. F. S. MERRILL, Cor. Sec.

BOSTON, MASS., Oct. 2, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Cool weather is fast approaching, and in order that we may keep our mutual arrangements all a-going, I yesterday sent you a postal order for another year's subscription to the gallant TRUTH SEEKER.

We are having an elegant row in this lively village between the two sets of superstitious scalawags oalled Protestants and Catholics, and I rejoice heartily as I remember that "when rogues fall out honest men get their dues." I should be pleased to see Brother Heston show up this holy religious turmoil. GEO N. HILL.

OMAHA, NEB., Oct. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I never want to be behind in sending my subscription. I hav weighed nonsense and reason in the scales of good common sense; then be sure you hav me for life to your honorable paper.

The Salvation Army is activ. The Mormons are working here, and they told me I was a fit subject for hell, when I tell them they are peddling garbage. Would that I could write something that would stir some big heart, and shake this ungodly superstitious place. $13,000 was taken up last Sunday in the Congregationalists' new church. W. L. GRAY.

LANARK, ARK., Oct. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed will carry me into my fifteenth year. I like the paper as well as ever. It seems to grow in grace. I think it is the best educator I hav ever read, and I can't think of stopping. I hav a few readers, and I am making considerable impression. One man told me the other day that he could not see now how he believed the way he had. I told him that he was raised on the other side; that there were two sides to everything, and that to render a proper verdict we must hear the evidence on both sides; that I had been in the same fix, and any man that was not willing to hear both sides in every case was not an honest jurist.

COALTON, KY., Oct. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At this place there is a large coal mine employing about three hundred miners. The company is headed by Christians, and in order to show how these Christians love their fellow-Christian miners, I will tell you about the law of the state which compels mining companies to ventilate their mines. (We hav to make laws for Christians as well as sinners, and they are as often broken by Christians as sinners.) Well, not long ago some miners were talking about the woeful condition of the air in the mine where they worked. I said, "Why don't you report this to the mine inspector?" "Why," said they, "we would be discharged immediately." Then I concluded if that was the case I would, for the sake and safety of humanity, try to stir them up by writing to the governor and hav him, if possible, lay the matter before the inspector. In my letter I referred the governor to the Rev. John R. Collins, who was also a justice of the peace. He is also an employee in the mines. The mine inspector wrote to Mr. Collins concerning the ventilation of the mine, and the Christian superintendent heard of it, and now threatens to discharge his brother Christian from the company's employ. Why? Simply because Mr. Collins was written to by the mine inspector and might be instrumental in having the law executed—a law for the protection of humanity. Those same Christian tyrants profess great love for the children at the Sabbath-schools on Sundays, but forget to love and care for them on the week-days while in the damp, noxious mine. The Rev. Mr. Collins should remember the scriptures, and should never oppose the powers that be. He should also remember that Christianity is always consistent in its sayings and doings. It's a great civilizer and worker for good, as the above case shows.

Yours for U. M. L., S. P. HERRON, P.M.

ESTELLINE, DAK., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In a recent issue a writer asks, "Who are Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John? All we know about them is the assertion that they were fishermen." It is implied that the assertion that they were fishermen is to be found in the New Testament, but it is not found there. On the contrary, Matthew is said to hav been a publican or custom house officer (Matt. ix, 9). Mark's occupation, previous to his discipleship, is not stated, but we learn that his mother lived in Jerusalem (Acts xii, 12), from which it is inferred that Mark did also, and that he was not a fisherman. Luke was a physician (Col. iv, 14). This Luke is generally conceded to be the third evangelist. John was the only fisherman among them (Matt. iv, 21).

I hav selected this instance as a basis for a few remarks. I am a thoroughgoing Liberal, as much so as any writer in these columns. I believe the gospel stories to be largely fabulous, but I should dislike to see anyone join the Liberal ranks through the influence of reckless statements. Let us leave misrepresentation to our adversaries—they hav need of it, while we hav not. A clear and lucid presentation of the exact truth will win for Liberalism the victory over superstition and ignorance. It is an easy matter for our opponents to point out errors of this kind, which they are only too glad to do, in the hope of throwing discredit upon the cause as a whole. And this in fact is the effect produced upon minds not accustomed to independent thought on religious subjects—a class numbering the greater part of mankind. They are taught to look at it in a way something like this: Writers who make such erroneous statements must be either very ignorant or very dishonest—in either case unworthy of credit. It is well to see ourselvs as others see us, for we profess to look at all sides. In this way only can we prove to be truly Liberal.

I hope the gentleman whose statement I hav been criticising will not be offended at what I hav said, for I assure him he stands acquitted of both charges. A number of the apostles were fishermen, but only one of the evangelists, and it is confessed (Acts iv, 13) that Peter and John were ignorant and unlearned men (Greek, idiotes). Mistakes of this nature are easily made, which is the very reason for exercising great care in controversial writings. C. L. ABBOTT.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Oct. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is autumn now, four months and four days since I wrote a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER; and what changes hav occurred from rosy June till frosty and rainy October! Yes, the sky weeps now; it is 9 P.M., and we sit in our room, surrounded by good books and papers, and I think as I scribble off this epistle of the thousands of noble truth seekers, men, women, and children, all over this and other lands—none fairer than our loved America—who hav tried to extract the sweets from life in various ways this Sabbath day, each person according to his mentality, moral and intellectual worth, and preferences, indulging in what he believed was the best thing for him to do.

Thoughts are the seeds of character, and it's an old saying: "As a man thinketh so is he;" and I conclude, as a man does, so is he. In a few short weeks the cold and cruel winter will visit the mansions of the rich and the wretched hovels, called homes, of the starving poor of the metropolis. Men, women, and their pledges of love, dimpled children, will shiver and weep because coal and the necessaries of life are dear and wages are low—largely owing to "combines," "trusts," that the mouthpiece of the Republican party, James G. Blaine, of Maine, has the audacity to say, "No one has any right to interfere with." At this point I recall the battle of Zutphen, where Sir Philip Sydney, after having two horses slain under him, was shot in the thigh. He was a mile from camp, and was obliged to limp in that condition to his tent. On reaching the tent, exhausted with loss of blood, he feebly called for water. It was procured with some difficulty and brought to him. As he was about to put the flagon to his mouth his eye fell upon a poor, common soldier lying wounded a few yards off upon the ground, whose piteous eyes were turned toward the refreshing draught. Sydney forgot his own agony, put the cup down untouched, and said: "Giv the water to him; his necessities are greater than mine." Fourteen days after that Sir Philip Sydney died, in the flower of his life, but leaving behind him a name that for inherent gentlemanliness, for manliness, for courage, for delicacy, and for self-denial, will liv as long as the word "gentleman" preserves its significance. But has Blaine such sympathy for the poor as Sydney had for the soldier? It appears not. Next Sabbath the church bells will ring out on the startled air and hundreds will wend their way to hear T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., decked in their costly clothes, their very best. "Devout Christians," I believe they are called, but I choose to call very many of them devout thieves. Is that language too strong? Well, if some who drive in their carriages through the streets of New York are not thieves; if capitalists and monopolists who dine and wine, who make men shiver and women weep—capitalists who wax fat and are slick and prosperous, while the cheeks of innocent childhood and helpless babyhood pale and plaintiv voices cry for bread, and proclaim how merciless the struggle is for existence—if these are not thieves, who are? Let there be no more mocking of their woe. Ye men of wealth, won't you please help the needy, poor, and heartbroken toilers of the race? Visit the filthy haunts of poverty, of sickness and crime. Open your pocket-books and speak words of comfort and kindness into aching human hearts; then you will feel blessed—feel better and will make others do so too.

Very truly, R. R. JONES.

BURTON, MICH., Oct. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to present to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER some of my experience with the marvelous little oracle the planchet. In the presence of churchmen, Materialists, Spiritualists, Atheists, old and young, under strictly test conditions, I hav seen this unconscious piece of furniture move rapidly across the table, climb its length up some person, move back, and answer questions by rising up on one side and striking its legs three times on the table for yes and once for no. I hav seen it keep a company in deep and absorbing thought, sharp hits causing frequent roars of laughter for an hour, with one or two persons holding the ends of their fingers gently on it and using no physical means to move it. I affirm that conscious intelligent spirits work this little piece of wood as my spirit works my pen in this writing. There is a right and a wrong way in the working and management of this instrument. A few plain rules must be understood and observed. Sit regularly once or twice a week. Those composing the séance should be honest truth seekers, no matter what their political or religious creed or if they hav no creed. There should be a retired, comfortable room, and no disturbance allowed after séance is opened by music, instrumental or vocal, or both. Vocal is best. Music is harmonizing, elevating, and spiritualizing. Sing any lively, popular air, with suitable words, as, "Come, Angel Band," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," "Shining Shore," etc. Then form a circle around a table and let some one audibly invoke some true, loving spirit friends to be present and lend their aid in establishing happy reunions through the planchet. Let this invocation be sincere, earnest, modest, covering the object of the sitters. Let scoffing, ridicule, or discourtesy be in abeyance. Cherish and maintain the same feelings as if some mortal friends were to call. Let scoffers and those who do not wish to meet their whilom friends stay away. They are not the ones to decide that their friends do not exist as individuals with their affections intact. They will learn that in the realm of causes when disrobed of all that is mortal, if they are too self-sufficient and unteachable to learn that lesson here. Then sit still or sing some thirty to forty minutes to magnetize planchet, table, room, etc., so as to concentrate electro-magnetic forces on this little unconscious oracle. Their spirit forms are electro-magnetic, and electricity and magnetism are the agents or forces they use to move inert matter, as do our spirits operating muscles, bones, and sinews. After sitting that length of time, anyone holding planchet, inquire audibly if any spirit friend is present, and ask that if so he will please indicate it by tilting the instrument upon one side and rapping the feet three times on the table. If there is no motion, wait awhile and let another ask. And thus let each one of the circle ask for his friend. Usually it will work freely before the sitting closes. When a spirit has moved planchet and been identified by question, confine all questions to him or her until through, then say, "Thank you for this interview; please meet us at next séance"—at designated time. Then call for another. Sometimes some spirit is so intensely anxious to reach a friend there that others will giv way to that one. Question freely. Put all questions so answers can be given by Yes or No. When planchet works well, allow another and another of the circle to change with the one operating it. They can thus find in whose hands it works best. After a little use it will work with one alone at home and be the household oracle. Never trifle with it. Truth seekers and any who may read this, try it. No other teachers will go so deep or work half as cheap. We are using one in this way. We learn much. Here is proof of immortality. This is more than a Delphic oracle. Its price is sixty cents, postpaid. D. HIGBIE, M.D.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It amuses me to read the timid, shaky articles which appear from time to time in our magazines on the awful subject of governmental interference. Men who kneel to the monopolist are afraid of the very shadow of tyranny when the general government attempts to do anything for our good in an orderly way, with its method grounded upon precedents known to those familiar with the history of liberty. Such skeptics deny the very existence of genius, whose Byronic, fiery words, even when they counsel us to do wrong, will rouse from his torpor some heavenly, timid thinker and cause him to pour forth utterances which shake the moral universe. If the government is in the wrong, then it must be set right, for it is the only staff we hav to lean upon. If our rulers are anarchists, disregarding precedents, perhaps some "village Hampden" may bring them to reason. I supposed that men in office were the servants of the ballot-box, and that our laws and institutions proceeded from a similar source. The post-office department needs no private interference, and if other matters of general interest cannot be conducted in the same way, good citizens should at once giv the subject their serious consideration. Nothing can lead to despotism which is subservient to the wishes of patriotic voters. They can even force the man of unwieldly fortune to bequeath a part of it to the poor. But, of course, votes of free men cannot control the corporate body, or powerful individual, who rules that vote. A powerful impulse from the people, however, can prevent the state from being a catspaw in the hands of the capitalist. Already do they despise the aristocracy, who assume influence without license, who are amenable to none, decimating the fortunes of poor citizens, causing the masses to subsist upon the crumbs which fall from their tables. A happy chance to amass riches, or a crafty instinct to accumulate, impels some men to liv by snatching morsels from the honest artisan or laborer who has not time to watch for or prevent the theft. How easily could a few changes in the machinery of government be made to hinder these greedy individuals from imitating the terrible orc of the Spanish poet, whose best powers and talents were devoted to the task of devouring a dozen families with their provisions at one meal! We ought to hail with delight the advent of a Vulcan who can forge a chain capable of holding a leviathan, whose intellectual acumen enables him to discover the principles of only one great art—and this is, to revel in the exercise of the instinct of the lowest animals, who store away more provisions than they and their children could consume if they lived to the age of Methusaleh. With our dearest interests trembling in the balance, hav not Americans the brains and power to avert the impending calamity? Will they not make this one resolution—no more to nominate for offices, although they may be the main pillars of our churches, men who possess but one available talent, and that is, to enact the role of the wolf who invited the hungry crane to supper? And secondly, let them recollect that "the Constitution has no other object than the general happiness."

"Are you bound to obey a law unless you help to make it?" These golden words of Madison and Paine hav been quoted anew with great effect by Mrs. Amarala Martin, authoress of a book entitled, "Our Uncle and Aunt." Take this work in your hand, and while you meet with the above sentiment, so tersely expressed, your heart glowing with patriotic feeling, your senses are bathed in the aroma of the apple-blossom in the paradise which she creates around you. I love to peruse "The Vicar of Wakefield," but I revel now in something still more noble, which touches with magic hand the great topic of the well-being of society. She proves conclusivly that this cannot be promoted to any great extent while the destructiv and degrading tyranny continues which subjects and blights the female half of the human race. She awakens your sympathies and better judgment as she describes the misery of homes where women's best wishes are disregarded. She unfolds the sad routine through which you trace the loathsome degradation of heart, home, and society at large. The influence is ignored, oftentimes, of the kind angel who bears the heat and burden of the day with a keen appreciation of wrongs which others faintly comprehend. ALHAZA.

WATERVILLE, MINN., Oct. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Waterville and vicinity are just as happy as there is any use to be since we had the little giant, Geo. H. Dawes, with us for four lectures, as follows: first, "What Objections to Christianity?" second, "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" third, "The Mission of Liberalism;" fourth, "Inspiration of the Bible." Liberals, you need not fear to engage Mr. Dawes for a course of lectures, for he is truly a giant in shaking up old orthodoxy.

MR. EDITOR: What man in this busy time can go through history from page to page and show to the world better teaching than THE TRUTH SEEKER unfurls? When you find him, please bring him forward, and he shall hav my sympathy for showing we are not right. Yes, let us press forward and see what we can gain, and never turn back to the dogmas and creeds and dead ages for food for the mind. And in closing this I will say, THE TRUTH SEEKER is right—if it isn't, doggone it. ALBERT S. WHITE.

CULVER, Sept. 26, 288.

MR. EDITOR: There is no money here, only what is in the hands of the money shark. We hav lost three crops the three last years. The farmers are the worst slaves that I hav ever seen, and I saw black slavery in the good old Christian times gone by. Six farmers out of every ten break up. There is no help for it or for the farmers. Nine-tenths of the real estate in central Kansas is under mortgage, cut-throat mortgage at that. There is no pleasure in being a farmer. We breast all the hard knocks, pay nearly all the taxes, bless all the candidates for president. I won't vote for a man of them, or Congressman either, so good-bye, politics. The world is my country; to love women and children, respect an honest man, despise a hypocrit, and hate a politician, is my religion, if I hav any. I am an Atheist of sixty-two years' standing. Who can tell who is an older Atheist than I? Success to you and the Truth Seeker Company. There is no success for us farmers. We work hard, eat light, go nearly naked, are poor talkers, and still poorer writers. Keep THE TRUTH SEEKER booming. W. M. ROBINSON.

YORK, PA., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: McArthur says, "The evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidences of a thousand who hav not seen." Can a spirit be seen? If so, it must hav some kind of a form. What does it look like, and how does it exist? McArthur further says that the question is still open for discussion, to determin from a scientific and philosophic standpoint the truth or falsity of the Spiritual phenomena. What are these phenomena? As I understand them, they are that the spirit livs after the body dies. Can this be determined from a scientific standpoint? How is it possible for a spirit to liv without a material body? To me the idea is absurd and unreasonable, just as much so as that something can be made out of nothing. If it is a mere matter of seeing, what is the use of discussing the matter? Why can not everybody go and see the spirit of this or that one, and so settle the whole thing at once? But what is the use of asking these questions? They hav been asked hundreds of times in THE TRUTH SEEKER before, and about all the consolation we get is to be told that we are unfair, unjust, narrow, bigoted Materialists, and the questions propounded not worthy of consideration. MAZO MANIE, Oct. 18, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The presidential election is now near at hand, and I intend voting for the Democratic nominee for president, though, up to the present time, I hav voted the Republican ticket. Now, my reasons for changing my vote are simply these: The Republican convention rejected the conservativ Liberal, Gresham, and nominated the zealous churchman, Harrison. By so doing, the party plainly indicated that it is relying on the support of the orthodox church to elect their nominee. This of itself ought to be sufficient to cause every true Liberal to vote the Democratic ticket. Of course, no true Liberal can think of voting the Prohibition ticket, for it would be voting direct for a God in the Constitution, and the enactment of persecuting Sunday laws. But I think that it is much better for us Liberals to unite and try to elect Grover Cleveland, for I think that we could hav more confidence in him to veto any bill passed by Congressmen simply in the church interests, or, in case Liberals should succeed in Congress and pass a bill for the taxing of church property, we could hav more confidence in Cleveland than we could in Harrison that such a bill would be vetoed. I think that there are sufficient indications that Cleveland is no favorit of the orthodox churches, for, during the campaign four years ago, he was commonly talked of by the opposition as being as much an Infidel as ex-Governor Seymour and Col. R. G. Ingersoll. I also know that the first letters that were published in the Chicago Tribune accusing him with that famous scandal came over the signature of orthodox clergymen, and it is well known that the Irish Catholic vote was divided for and against him, for the Irish Catholic will not vote for an Infidel while under the influence of his church. Though Cleveland is now a nominal church-member, it seems really necessary in order to allay the prejudice of religious people at the present time.

MR. EDITOR: On the question, which is first, brain or thought? "Alhaza" writes: "Genius may sometimes be capable of synthetic judgment, but to assert that thought is created first and the brain afterward is an affirmation too disgusting to proceed from any but an ignorant or cowardly source."

These assertions or denunciations are too sweeping to be overlooked. It is one of the yet unsolved problems which is first, mind or matter, brain or thought. Yet the affirmation either way ought not to be called the effect of ignorance or of cowardice.

I am astonished at the amount of vituperation and abuse so often heaped upon so-called Liberals by one another.

Why is this? Is it not possible for all sincere seekers after truth to be kind and lenient to those in pursuit of knowledge, even if they search for it and speak of it in other ways and terms than they approve? This is an age in which humanity is striving to go abreast in the broader road of science and philosophy, turning from the narrow paths marked out by ignorance and superstition, in which so many still follow blind leaders of the blind. I do not care to discuss these abstract questions, while there are so many others of still greater moment to the interests of human advancement and of more practicable knowledge.

LUNA HUTCHINSON.

MANTENO, ILL., Oct. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of October 13th is a critique on Mr. Underwood's article on protection by F. M. Holland, in which he says, "Those who would hav our government buy bonds, rather than reduce duties, are reminded that the premium is now exorbitant." Now, the question to be answered is, Why pay any premium at all, when they are payable at par, under the law, at the option of the government. The Public Credit act of March, 1869, contains the following conditions with reference to the payment of the bonds before maturity, and is as follows: "But none of said interest-bearing obligations, not already due, shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States, bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin." Now then, United States notes (greenbacks) are convertible into coin at the option of the holder. Bonds bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin! Therefore, "interest-bearing obligations" (the very bonds which the government is buying up at a twenty-nine per cent premium), although "not already due," may be redeemed as paid before maturity. It seems to me the English language cannot possibly express anything in plainer terms than the above. Now, Mr. Editor, I would like for you, or Mr. Underwood, or any other man, to rise and explain why the government is compelled to pay such a high premium to get possession of her bonds. It cannot be that refunding the bonds would render the law obsolete. O. W. BARNARD.

BERLIN, N. J., Oct. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: R. Gunther, of California, had an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, some time ago, in which he expressed his sorrow that J. Hacker was so full of things not worth knowing. I asked him through your columns to name the things not worth knowing, referring him to articles of mine in your paper. He has at length got off a reply of some two columns, and the sum and substance of all he names in my writings that he thinks not worth knowing is, that I find fault with our government, and that I advocate man's birthright to land enough to make a home and raise his food on.

As every tree is known by its fruit, so is every action of individual men and governments known by its fruit or its results. Seven hundred years ago bandits went from England to Ireland and took possession of the land, and from that time to this the Irish people hav been slaves to them and their heirs, in consequence of which thousands of them hav died of starvation, and thousands more would hav starved if they had not come to America.

In the great Irish famin of 1847 thousands of the Irish people died of starvation, and yet there was food enough raised in Ireland that very year to make them all comfortable. Why, then, did they starve? Simply because the earliest and best of all their crops had to go to England to pay land robbers rent on the farms. There was little or nothing left for the Irish but potatoes, and the rot taking that crop, the people, thousands of them, could do no better than lie down in their cabins and starve. That famin and all those deaths were the beautiful fruits of land robbery, which Mr. Gunther advocates, and thinks the facts not worth knowing, while, according to his story, he holds two hundred acres of land more than he has any birthright to.

The working classes of all the nations of Europe are, in consequence of land robbery, living on the brink of starvation, while the robbers are rolling in idleness and dissipation on the fruits of the workers' labor, and the same terrible curse is increasing every day in this country. I hav a list of over twenty millions of acres that our own robber government has sold to foreigners, who hav agents here establishing the same system of robbery and oppression that pauperized Ireland, Italy, and other nations of the Old World.

Mr. Gunther has probably read of the numerous strikes and lockouts of laborers in this country, and still advocates the right of the government, which, by robbing men of their birthright to land, has been the cause of all this trouble and loss of time. Land robbery has driven millions of men from agriculture, where they could hav gained a living, until all other occupations are overstocked with hands underbidding each other on labor to avoid starvation, and land robbery alone has been the cause of all the trouble between capital and labor, and the condition of laborers here is becoming worse every year.

A few weeks ago, when the peach harvest was about to commence in Delaware, foreigners, mainly Italians, went down there from Camden and Philadelphia to get work. Two hundred of them were clustered around one station, and before they could get work some of them became so hungry that they stole things from the cars. A sheriff was sent for to put the whole two hundred in prison, as tramps, but he did not go because the prisons were all full and there was no place for them. The paper stated that there were not less than ten thousand of these tramps on the peninsula. And this is the beautiful and delicious fruit produced by that upas-tree land robbery that R. Gunther thinks should be nurtured and protected by our despicable government, till it spreads its baleful influence over all our land. These men had been driven from their nativ countries by land robbery to underbid our workers in wages and reduce them to the same pauperism.

Since then, over in Monmouth county, this state, when the cranberry harvest was about to commence, the nativs who had usually harvested the fruit met at the agent's office as in former years, expecting to hav work, but were told to wait. After waiting an hour a train arrived with two hundred Italians who had been driven from their nativ land by Brother Gunther's beautiful upas-tree land robbery, and who had agreed to work cheaper than the nativs ever had. The nativs were then told that they could work too, if they would work at the same starvation wages; but as they could not liv on such cheap food as the Italians had been accustomed to, they refused, and the agents had to hurry the Italians into carriages and send them off to the cranberry-bogs to prevent a riot, and I hav not heard from them since. Beautiful upas-tree, Brother Gunther!

Between forty and fifty years ago I wrote and published in my paper, the Pleasure Boat—old volumes of which I am now selling postpaid at fifty cents—the first article I ever saw on free land, and knew only one man then who agreed with me on the subject, but now there are millions in this country, and the same great truth is spreading through all the countries of Europe. The time is not distant when land robbery will demand and receive as much attention as colored slavery did before the war, for it is making a large portion of the white people even greater slaves than the colored people were, and if this great sin is not soon abolished, it will cause a more ferocious war than colored slavery did. There are many shylocks robbing the people, but the workers are yet in the majority, and if they would unite and elect honest rulers the war might be prevented. But it is not likely they will until hunger drives them to use desperate means, and if so, then woe to all land-grabbers. The whole world will know in a few years that land robbery is a million times worse than all other crimes, and the cause of at least seven-tenths of all the poverty, crime, immorality, dissipation, and misery on earth, and no one but thieves will then say that these things were not worth knowing.

Yours, J. HACKER.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, Oct. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find pay for a few more numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER bearing date of October 6th. The article in that paper by Prof. C. L. Haskell is worth a year's subscription. I want the paper to circulate among our Christian friends, that they may learn the Atheist's creed. I think it may do them good.

I hav been somewhat surprised in reading a few articles in your paper on the subject of tariff or free trade, and am sorry to think that some of the articles bear the mark of extreme ignorance or dishonesty. But after reading the subject up closely on both sides for over forty years, I hav made up my mind that there is only one man in a thousand that knows much about it. But there is one thing every man knows that has a thimbleful of brains or one-half that much wit, and that is that the tariff placed on foreign goods is not always, and in fact but seldom, to be paid by the home consumer. To illustrate, I once built a house with nails at ten cents per pound in free times—our factories driven out of existence and hands idle and times as bad as could well be. But Congress, seeing our mistake, placed a tariff of five cents per pound on foreign nails. Now for the result. If free trade argument is correct nails would immediately hav advanced to fifteen cents per pound. Did they? Not much. American factories that had gone down in the first crash went into operation again. Now for the result. With hands all employed again, times reviving, and opposition and competition showing their natural results, nails came down until, when I built a large house two years ago, I paid for a much better nail, American made, three and one-half cents per pound. Will any free trader tell me why they were not fifteen cents in the place of three and one-half, or hav they been fibbing a little? It is best to look to such articles well. When a man tells us in the winding-up of a free trade article, "Now giv us free trade and we will burst up all monopoly and combinations," he simply takes you to be what he has made himself—a very foolish man. Free trade and the man in the moon are equal in breaking up trusts. A good, stringent law, and that alone, will break up trusts and combinations, and the sooner we hav such a law the better for the country. But no Grover or free trade in mine, if you please, but protection to the American laboring man forever.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

While the Days Are Going By.

There are lonely hearts to cherish,
While the days are going by;
There are weary souls who perish,
While the days are going by;
If a smile we can renew,
As our journey we pursue,
Oh, the good we all may do,
While the days are going by.

There's no time for idle scorning,
While the days are going by;
Be our faces like the morning,
While the days are going by;
Oh, the world is full of sighs,
Full of sad and weeping eyes,
Help our fallen brother rise,
While the days are going by.

All the loving links that bind us,
While the days are going by,
One by one we leave behind us,
While the days are going by;
But the seeds of good we sow,
Both in shade and shine will grow,
And will keep our hearts aglow,
While the days are going by.

Should misfortune dark come o'er us,
While the days are going by;
Think what brightness is before us,
While the days are going by;
In our home where all are blessed,
There's no sorrow to molest,
But we all may be at rest,
While the days are going by.

Did He Liv Alone?

His name was David Jones. People said he lived all alone in the woods, afar from any human habitation, in a rude little log cabin. When Dora and Annie went berrying one day with their cousins, Arthur and Johnny Howard, they sailed away up the river and stopped on the banks above Grassy Landing. Wandering in the wood, they suddenly came upon the home of David Jones. They had sometimes seen him in town, on his occasional visits to sell the skins of animals, eggs, and herbs, and knew him at once.

"How awfully lonely you must be, living here all alone!" exclaimed Dora.

"Not so, not so, my good girl," said Jones. "I am not so lonely or alone as you think."

"Who told you so?" piped a voice from the corner.

"Oh, here is a parrot, I declare!" screamed Annie.

"Yes, my parrot is good company. He came all the way from Africa, and by this tie I am connected with that foreign country, somewhat, you see. I will make you a cup of tea if you will drink it with me, and this tea here," said he, taking some from a tin canister, "came all the way to me from China. It tells me of pagodas and—pig-tails," he added, laughing. "Here's a piece of the rock of Gibraltar," he continued, "that a sailor gave me who had sailed up the Mediterranean, and this curious shell," taking an odd-looking and beautiful specimen from the rough mantel, "came from the shores of Japan."

They all gathered about the old man with great interest.

He went on: "I paid a dollar for a dozen eggs, and the hen who laid them came from Hamburg. That tinkling bell you hear is around my cow's neck, and her father was born in Scotland."

"So all the foreign countries help to make you comfortable," remarked John.

"Yes, and happy. I think of the colored people away down in Louisiana who pick the rice that I eat, who make my sugar and molasses. I think of the planter who grows cotton for my benefit, and the miner in Pennsylvania who digs coal for me out of the earth, yes, and the oil that I burn in my lamp, too. Why, my little men and little women, how cau I be lonely with so many people from so many countries constantly furnishing me with necessary articles? This flannel coat on my back was once wool on a sheep's back. Away down in Massachusetts they took it into a mill and made it fit for me to wear. Now, I do a little to keep up intercourse with the outside world. For instance, I send my eggs every day to Mrs. Pinkerton, who is sick and can eat only a fresh egg daily. Every fall I send the skins of the animals I kill down to Boston and New York to make muffs and collars to keep the little girls warm in the cold winter."

"What do you keep in yonder bags, if I am not too bold?" inquired Arthur.

"Oh, no; in this is the bark of the bay; in that, juniper, and in the green one is sarsaparilla root. Wormwood is in that yellow bag, and sage in the one next to it, and it would tire you to hear about the contents of all the other bags, but they are all useful, and will be sent to the chemists and druggists to make medicin to cure the sick and the lame."

"There are seven big, puffy bags up on that shelf," whispered Dora to Annie. "I wonder what is in them."

David Jones heard her, and replied, "Those are pine needles, as we call them. They go to the city, also, and are there made up into pillows and sold for a dollar apiece and upward. Sleeping on one is said to cure the headache, catarrh, and other difficulties. Oh, people don't know the healing there is in the pine-trees; if they did, they would come and liv among them, as I do."

The boys and girls had forgotten all about the tea, but David Jones had not, and he served it in some very old-fashioned pewter mugs that came originally from England. They shared their lunch with him, and it was near the close of the afternoon before they took their departure. They picked berries not far from his quaint log house, and he showed them some Indian arrowheads that he had found there, which must, he thought, hav been in that spot more than a hundred years. "And these arrowheads," he said, "take me away back to the children of nature who had not half the conveniences that I hav, and yet were, no doubt, just as happy."

"Then you are happy here," said Annie.

"Certainly! How can I be otherwise? People are as dependent upon me as I on them. The earth givs me much, and I giv to others. The fact is, we are all dependent upon one another. From the floating jelly-fish up to man we blend, interblend, and depend, for health, comfort, happiness. We all hang together, and not a thing that livs and breathes or moves but has its significant part and purpose to play in this life of ours on earth. Go home and look your house over and see how much you find there from nearly all parts of the world, and you will be surprised to learn how closely you are connected with foreign as well as nativ elements."

The boys and girls went away with several new ideas, and one was that David Jones was not lonely, and that he did not necessarily liv alone because he occupied a log cabin apart from the busy throng in the town.

Boys, Keep Out of Debt.

Do not borrow money, boys, if you can avoid it in any way in the world. It is a bad, bad habit, and one that grows. No matter how much you want a thing, do without it, if you cannot get it without paying some one's money, not your own, for it. Commence saving your nickels, and by and by you will hav a little surplus fund with which to buy knick-knacks and the many things dear to a boy's heart. The best men in the world began an honorable career by acquiring habits of economy and industry in early youth—by earning what they had and by keeping out of debt—or, if they formed a debt, it was paid promptly at the promised time. The best way is to be saving and prudent in youth, generous when you can afford it, and this will enable you to reach maturity with an easy conscience, owing no one anything but love and good will. S. H. W.

Grit and Pluck in Sickness.

Dr. M. Maurice, in the St. Louis Republic, says: "I hav seen grit save many a life. I hav had a patient who coolly said to me, 'I will not die.' I was compelled to assure her that she would. There was no hope for her. 'Doctor,' she answered, 'you are a fool. I shall not die.' Grit it was that carried her through. A few years later she was sick again, and, as I thought, unto death; but there came the same all-conquering reply: 'You are talking nonsense—I shall get well.' And she did. This was repeated a third time, till I actually began to believe she would get well anyway and at all times. It never occurred to me to think of her as liable to die. Finally her mortal sickness came, and I expected to help her up as usual. But now she replied; 'Doctor, you can come or go as you please. I am going to die. This is my last illness.' 'Oh, no,' I said, 'we will hav you out in a few days.' 'Nonsense,' she answered, 'you are talking what you know nothing about. I shall never be well again.' In two days she was dead. Her grit gave out; her pluck was good to the last. She had pluck enough to face death; she had no longer grit to endure disease. There is no question but that moral and mental grit go with physical to sustain vitality. A stout will wards off the blows of disease. In this case the patient went straight ahead to die without a flinch or whine. She had a vast faith in the 'all right,' and allowed no one to dabble in theology at her bedside. She marched into the 'next life' as she often had into the next year and had not a tremor. She took her pluck with her. She treated a neighbor's prayers as she treated any medicin. 'You can come if you like,' she said, 'or you can go. Your prayers can't stop me and they can't change me—any more than the doctor's powders.' She was a woman of extraordinary intelligence and determination."

Training the Color Sense.

Jean Ingelow describes, in the odd dialect of the north of England, the process of teaching boys and girls to match colors. It appears that about four per cent of the children were unable to distinguish colors, even the most unlike.

There was a class-room in which was a table covered with skeins of German wool, bits of stained glass, and silks of all colors. The master said, "Now, bairns, back end a' last week I tell'd ye I'd gie ye an ould farrant lesson to-day. You, Josey, ye see this?" holding up a red rose.

Josey, a small child of six years, "Ay, master."

"What be it, bairn?"

"Why, a rose, master, for sure."

"Ay, but what kin' o' rose?"

"A red un, sir."

"Well, now you go into the class-room and fetch me out a skein o' wool the nighest like this rose ever ye can."

Josey takes the rose, and fetches back the skein of just the same hue. After this about twenty of the children were sent on the errand, and matched the color perfectly. At last, a little white-faced fellow went into the class-room, stayed some time, and finally came out with two skeins in his hand. Shouts of surprise and derision filled the room.

"Surely, what be ye thinking on?"

"One on 'em's as green as grass, an' t'other as gray as a rattan [rat]."

The little boy looks frightened.

"Thou's done as well as thou knew how," says the master, rather gently. "Don't thou be scared; thou's nobbut tried once. Here, take and match me this." He givs him the glossy leaf of a laurel.

The child goes out again, and, with a much more cheerful and confident air, comes back and puts into his hand a skein of the brightest scarlet. The other children, too much surprised to laugh, whisper together, "He beant a fondy, neither." Fond here has the old sense of foolish.

Correspondence.

ELK GROVE, CAL., Oct. 20.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to make the acquaintance of the young people who read and write for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am doing all I can for Freethought. At every entertainment we hav here I help fling our banner to the breeze. The church people are already after me, but I don't care—I will hav my say just the same. Here is my speech at the Grangers' entertainment at this place.

"Grangers, Ladies and Gentlemen: As the tariff is the great issue now, I suppose I should devote considerable time to it. And first, I want good health put on the free list. Mr. Republican, don't you? I want it within the reach of everyone. It is a commodity that I want to see crowd out all opposition. Yes, sir; I do. And I want rosy cheeks and ruby lips put on the free list. And when we all hav a good, round share of health and plenty to spare, then I am for Harrison. Then I want a tariff put on them that will protect them forever. I would like to see good health drive off every drug-store on this planet. And I want happy homes put on the free list too.

"Now don't begin to squirm, for I know you want human joy and human hope put on the free list, don't you? And when these become as plentiful as frogs used to be in Egypt, then you, Mr. Democrat, will want a William Henry Benjamin Harrison tariff put on them, won't you? And I want every good gift of nature put on the free list. And so I want brains put on the free list. For when I see superstition demanding revenue of reason, I say, 'Open the gates, ye gods, and let the intellectual commerce of this world come in free.'

"And I want religion put on the free list too, for I don't like to see a revenue officer stand between every man and his God. When I think of the millions of money that hav been squandered on the churches and things connected with Christianity, I wish heaven had been put on the free list, too, or left unmanufactured." JACOB T. FOSTER.

P. S.—This is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am fourteen years old, and I am in the second grade at school. J. T. F.

A Sheffield lady asked one of the children in her Sunday-school class, "What was the sin of the Pharisees?" "Eating camels, ma'am," was the reply. The little girl had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels."

A boy who had been in the habit of repeating a formulated prayer every evening surprised his parents the other evening by saying: "O God, I wish you would make the trees walk." When remonstrated with for his singular request, he replied, "You say God can do anything, and I want to see the trees walk, and I shan't pray for anything else until they do."

"You attend Sunday-school, do you?" inquired the Rev. Mr. Smith of Nellie. "Then you must know a great deal about the Bible. Now tell me something nice that is in the Bible here, can you?" "Yeth, sir; Sis hath some dried leaves in it, a pieth of Aunt Jane's wedding dress, a pieth of my dreth when I was a baby, thome hair, and Sis's fellow's picture."—Freethinker.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

A CARD TO MY FRIENDS.

I desire to establish myself as Your Jeweler. I can do so if I can convince you that it is to your interest financially, not otherwise. I am aware that it is no object for you to patronize me unless I can do better by you—sell you as good or better goods—than your home jeweler, at lower prices. Can I do it? Yes. How? Permit me to explain: My establishment is phenomenal. No other store in the world, in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, has the standing, reputation, and does the amount of business, in my line, that mine does. No stock outside of few largest cities embraces the quantity of elegant Fine Gold Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver, Optical and Fancy Goods as mine. I buy the best—Watches from $5 to $300. Diamond Jewelry from $10 to $1,000, etc. Merchants who compete with me liv only in largest cities, but which of necessity, implies large expenditures and large profits. If you patronize them, this you must pay. If you buy a Watch or Diamond of them, they will and must charge you a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. If you will order of me, I will and can sell you the same quality of goods at 5 to 10 per cent profit. And if you buy of a small dealer in any other small town, he also must charge you 30 to 50 per cent. Why? Because his sales, aggregating at most $10,000 per annum, will not cover expenses at 10 per cent. To liv and come out ahead he is compelled to charge you an average of 30 per cent.

But my sales now approximate $50,000 per year. Therefore I can cut down profits—divide them with you—and yet realize a larger surplus at the end of the year than my competitors:

$50,000 merchandise sold at 10 per cent profit equals $5,000 gain; $10,000 merchandise sold at 30 per cent profit equals $3,000 gain; showing a profit of $2,000 on the goods sold at 10 per cent over and above those sold at 30 per cent. On Broadway, New York, or on State street, Chicago, Jewelers pay from $15,000 to $20,000 rent. I pay $3.0 and other expenses in proportion. Therefore, having been established in Rochelle thirty-one years, having always paid "a hundred cents on the dollar," being an infallible judge of every article I buy, and buying goods in large quantities, all jobbers, importers, and manufacturers are anxious to sell me their wares at Bottom Price, as to any one in existence. And therefore, buying low and selling more goods than any other dealer in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, I can and will send you any thing you may need in my line (prepaid per mail or express, and cash back if not satisfactory) at 10 to 30 per cent lower than any other house. Order from my catalog and giv me a chance to establish myself as Your Jeweler.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

The Advanced Woman.

She went round and asked subscriptions
For the heathen black Egyptians
And the Terra del Fuegians,
She did:
For the tribes round Athabasca,
And the men of Madagascar,
And the poor souls of Alaska,
So she did:
She longed, she did, to buy
Jelly-cake and jam and pie
For the Anthropophagi,
So she did.

How she loved the cold Norwegian,
And the poor half-melted Feejeean,
And the dear Molucca islander,
She did:
She sent tins of red tomato
To the tribes beyond the equator,
But her husband ate potato,
So he did:
The poor helpless, homeless thing
(My voice falters as I sing)
Tied his clothes up with a string,
Yes, he did.

I held my peace and wrote this rhyme.
They never knew I knew it.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

IF Canada is annexed, our Catholic population will be largely increased.

THE British-American Association filed articles of incorporation for New York state.

THE Union Labor party is making a violent fight against the old parties in parts of the West.

IN a recent one-hour meeting Catholics subscribed $250,000 for a diocesan seminary in New York state.

THERE is forming in France a League of the Rose, for "the reëstablishment of monarchy and the defense of conservativ interests."

SPAIN has 221 monasteries, 200 having been built since 1876, with a total of 4,220 monks; and 1,109 convents, with 25,000 nuns.

WILLIAM II. is traveling, visiting kings, who liv off others, and ecclesiastics, who befool others, and reviewing soldiers, who kill others.

COMMISSIONER OF LABOR WRIGHT will hav ready for Congress by January an exhaustiv report of divorce in this country for the last twenty years.

IN England Mr. Chamberlain, the queer, half-hearted Radical, enlarges upon the necessity of improving and developing religious education in Ireland.

A MAN named May started a new religious order called the Brotherhood of the Sun, resting upon "the fundamental truth that underlies all religious systems."

BISHOP VINCENT, Methodist Episcopal, says that the press has been subsidized by ecclesiastical money, neither of the political parties daring to expose it, as both are sold out.

PAPERS continually discuss whether America could whip England. The silliness and horribleness of any two "civilized" nations fighting each other at all is never by any chance touched upon.

OUR national expenses are larger than those of Germany, whose army almost dominates Europe, and within $27,000,000 of those of England, with its monarchy, navy, standing army, and colonial empire.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS, of Philadelphia, said to be the Comstock of that city, has written a tract, "Essay on the Incompatibility of Theater-going with Christianity," translations of which are being distributed in Paris.

LOUISE DREXEL, of Philadelphia, whose father left $16,000,000 to go to the Catholic church if his daughters died childless, is engaged. It is a pity that the church cannot keep the profitable doctrin of celibacy as popular now as of old, so that it could persuade the girls into a convent and pocket their money.

AT Charleston eighteen Presbyterian elders protested against the recent anti-evolution decision of the presbytery, which presbytery since forbid the discussion of evolution. The protest says: "We deny the right of the church to dogmatize to its officers and members on scientific subjects, and we still more deny the right of the presbytery to forbid the discussion in public or in private of what is considered a mistaken utterance of the general assembly."

BALAAM'S BEAST STŪMBLES.

And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she fell down under Balaam: and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff.—Num. xxii, 27.

Odds and Ends.

"THE silent watches of the night" are well enough, but the chap who wishes to rise early needs an alarm-clock.

AN exchange says: "Nobody knows where the flies go to." Perhaps not; but we know where people tell them to go to, though.

OVERCOATS remain at practically the same prices as last season; three per cent a month, and the principal advanced by your uncle.

HERE'S something for people to ponder upon,
In this world of troubles and cares;
The cheaper the dress a woman has on,
The larger the bustle she wears.

THE Rev. Moses Meecker (jumping up): "Why on earth do you interrupt me in this way, Maria? You're enough to drive one crazy! Didn't I tell you I should be busy all the morning writing my sermon on Patience?"

"DON'T you like Wagner's wedding-march, Miss Pauline?" he inquired, tenderly. "I don't know much about it, Mr. Culch," she replied; "but I think his running away with that other man's wife was perfectly shameful."

OLD lady: "Little boy, do you go to Sunday-school?" Little boy: "Yes'm. I go to the Baptist Sunday-school." Old lady: "You are the son of Christian parents?" Little boy: "No, ma'am; they are Baptists, just the same as I am."

TEACHER: "Who was the most upright man in the Bible?" Smart boy: "I know who was the straightest." Teacher: "Well, who was the straightest?" Smart boy: "Joseph." Teacher: "Why?" Smart boy: "Because Pharaoh made a ruler of him."

OLD gentleman: "What is the price of that parrot?" Bird dealer: "I wouldn't sell that bird for love or money." Old gentleman: "He must be very proficient in conversation to make him so valuable." Bird dealer: "On the contrary, sir, he's dumb."

"GENTLEMEN and fellow-citizens," exclaimed an impassioned orator, "what if all the European countries should put a tax on our raw materials, what would be the consequence?" "All of our dudes would hav to stay at home," shouted a voice from the rear of the house.

DEALER (to clerk): "I'm going to make those boys' diagonal suits fifteen dollars to-morrow." Clerk: "Fifteen dollars! Why, we've been selling them for ten dollars right along." Dealer: "I know it; but I'm going to giv away a baseball bat with each one free of charge."

MR. POMPADOUR: "Would you like to go with me this evening to the church? They hav just introduced a new boy choir, and the service is said to be very interesting. Very high church, you know." Miss Heavycrape (in mourning for her father): "I hardly know what to say, Mr. Pompadour. You see, I hav been to no amusements since poor papa died."

"No, madam," he said, "I am not an ordinary pedler, You hav only to hear the name of the article I am introducing to feel that you hav lived too long without knowing me. You hav, I observe, five children, and you do not wear tailor-made gowns. Your next-door neighbor is the pastor of the parish. The article I refer to may be applied to any sewing-machine, and it is called the 'Sunday Muffler.' My rates——" "Come in!" said the lady, cordially.

MY fond heart, it doth ache
With love, for thy sweet sache.
Say yes—say yes, and mache
My gray life rose tints tache.
We'll sail love's glassy lache,
Where billows never breache,
In bark that ne'er shall quache.
Joy'll follow in our wache—
Now, ho! the wedding-cache!

A SAFE BET.

The Prohibs would destroy all liquor,
Put sudden stop to trade and diquor
In wine and spirits, muchly quiquor
In warming friendships up, and thiquor
With joys than water—well, I should sniquor!
With gentleman and rough rag-piquor
They argue stout or hotly biquor,
Foam, fume, and flash, but somewhat fliquor,
I reckon. Now, I'll bet my "tiquor"
Against a nail or bodkin priquor,
A ten-cent basket made of wiquor,
A champagne glass, which is much sliquor,
That they'll grow gray and sick, and siquor
Than dogs, ere they cut off our liquor!

—Dan D. Lyon.

IF you should chance to see
A parson—clever as clever can be—
Who tickles his flock with jest and riddle,
And worships God with flute and fiddle—
The latest clerical fad is he!

And should you chance to see
The man whose fine philanthropy
Assumes that every man's a brother,
That he's a saint and you're another—
The devil a saint at all is he.

But further: should you see
A priest grow plump on penury—
Gad zooks!—don't take it for a miracle,
Or deem his diet is atmospherical—
An anti-poverty priest is he!

Or if you chance to see
The man that vows that you and he
Hav equal title to all the earth
By Nature's warrant—the right of birth—
Why, so hav the wolf and chimpanzee!

In short, where'er you see
The real, original patentee
Of a New Crusade—look out for gammon!
His creed is Self, his God is Mammon,
And all his preaching is tweedle-dee!

Gems of Thought.

THE dogma of salvation by faith offers an additional premium on mental prostitution. By punishing honest doubt as a crime and inculcating the merit of blind submission to the authority of reason-insulting doctrins, the defenders of those doctrins struck a deadly blow at the instinct of free inquiry, and for a series of generations actually succeeded in eradicating that instinct from the mental constitution of their victims.—Professor Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

THE persecutor can never be certain that he is not persecuting truth rather than error, but he may be quite certain that he is suppressing the spirit of truth. And, indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that the doctrins I hav reviewed represent the most skilful and at the same time most successful conspiracy against that spirit that has ever existed among mankind. Until the seventeenth century, every mental disposition which philosophy pronounces to be essential to a legitimate research was almost uniformly branded as a sin, and a large proportion of the most deadly intellectual vices were deliberately inculcated as virtues. . . . In a word, there is scarcely a disposition that marks the love of abstract truth and scarcely a rule which reason teaches as essential for its attainment that theologians did not for ages stigmatize as offensiv to the almighty.—Lecky.

PERADVENTURE, I am one of those Jehovah included when he declared, in the interests of eternal truth, "I shall send them strong delusions, that they may believe a lie." But, if the Lord has, in his divine benevolence, sent me "strong delusions" so that I may "believe a lie," he will, of course, be satisfied with his own handiwork. I very strongly suspect that the tracts that his gospel-grinders assure us are so holy and so ancient are neither holy nor ancient. The traditions upon which "holy writ" is based are ancient, and, at various times and in divers manners, scraps of traditional records may hav been written on stone, papyrus wood, or parchment; but the scriptures, as we hav them, can establish no claim to antiquity. For mendacious century upon century, fraud upon fraud, and forgery upon forgery, were the order of the day. Every student of ecclesiastical history knows this, and the more searching his investigations, the stronger becomes his conviction that his bark of exploration is afloat on a very sea of Literary Fraud.—Saladin.

LILLIPUT and Blefuscu—which two mighty powers hav, as I was going to tell you, been engaged in a most obstinate war for six-and-thirty moons past. It began upon the following occasion: It is allowed on all hands that the primitiv way of breaking eggs, before we eat them, was upon the larger end; but his present majesty's grandfather, while he was a boy, going to eat an egg, and breaking it according to the ancient practice, happened to cut one of his fingers. Whereupon the emperor his father published an edict, commanding all his subjects, upon great penalties, to break the smaller end of their eggs. The people so highly resented this law, that our histories tell us there hav been six rebellions raised on that account; wherein one emperor lost his life, and another his crown. It is computed that eleven thousand persons hav at several times suffered death rather than submit to break their eggs at the smaller end. Many hundred large volumes hav been published upon this controversy; but the books of the Big-endians hav been long forbidden, and the whole party rendered incapable by law of holding employments. During the course of these troubles, the emperors of Blefuscu did frequently exostulate by their embassadors, accusing us of making a schism in religion, by offending against a fundamental doctrin of our great prophet Lustrog, in the fifty-fourth chapter of the Blundecral (which is their Alcoran). This, however, is thought to be a mere strain upon the text; for the words are these: that all true believers break their eggs at the convenient end.—Swift's Gulliver's Travels.

THE absurd creatures, men, mistakenly called "reasoning animals," will shed oceans of blood to support varying conjectures as to the meaning of words that chanced to be scribbled down by some old barbarians, all the while not comprehending in the least the meaning of the whole passage or book, and there usually being no discoverable meaning in it at all. The more unintelligible or trivial and unimportant is the matter, the more blood is shed over it.—Anon.

ALL these fictions of giants, pigmies, flying islands, that Swift uses, are means for depriving human nature of the veils with which habit and imagination cover it, to display it in its truth and its ugliness.—M. Taine.

LIFE is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy.—Emerson.

IF I proceed to treat of theology, I shall step out of the bark of human reason, and enter into the ship of the church. Neither will the stars of philosophy, which hav hitherto so nobly shone on us, any longer giv us their light.—Bacon.

ROME.—JUPITER'S PAGANS AND JEHOVAH'S CHRISTIANS.

Notes and Clippings.

THE most accurate piece of political news printed before the election was in the Richmond Enquirer: "It cannot be denied that Belva Lockwood and Anna Dickinson hav contributed largely to the bustle of the campaign."

THE Church Defense Institution, in its recent annual report, regrets that "the disestablishment of the church in Wales is now accepted as an article in the program of the party which acknowledges Mr. Gladstone's leadership."

MR. SPURGEON, of London, is depressed in spirits. "Do not," he says, "look upon England as a Christian country. It was a great mistake to think that it was. They were living in old heathen land again. He spoke to a minister the other day, and asked him if some of his people were Christians, and he replied, 'No, they are just heathens.'"

THIS charitable sentiment is from the Catholic Union and Times: "The relations between Germany and England are daily growing more strained. May God continue the good work. It would be our heart's delight to see the German eagles pick out the bloody eyes of the British lion, and otherwise lacerate that crouching old brute, until Ireland is given her own again."

THE Parliamentary committee of the trades union congress publishes a list of the religious and anti-religious journals who pay fair and unfair prices to their printing staff. Nearly half the religious periodicals are classed as "unfair" paymasters who refuse to giv the trade prices. All the Freethought journals pay "fair" wages. The Christian Commonwealth, the Rock, the Christian Herald, and many others, beat down the wages, and denounce the sweating system—in others—as anti-Christian.—London Freethinker.

HERE is an old controversy presented in a new form: "Please say when the twentieth century commences, in order to decide a dispute." The first century is completed at the end of the first hundred years; and then the second century commences. The nineteenth century is completed at the end of the first nineteen hundred years; and then the twentieth century commences. We shall be living in the nineteenth century until the end of the year 1900, when the twentieth century will commence.—Sun.

SUPERSTITION of the grossest sort still has its hold upon the Christians of Russia. In Scheberschin, an out-of-the-way town in Russia, a leading Jewish inhabitant died and was buried. A short time afterward his grave was found open, and a little distance off lay his skeleton, from which every scrap of flesh had been removed. The deed was traced to two men of evil repute, who finally confessed that with the flesh cut from the corpse they had hoped to make an ointment which, rubbed upon their bodies, would make them invisible and enable them to commit crime with impunity.

RAINY-DAY philosophy of the Herald: "It is universally regarded as unhealthy if not positivly dangerous to go to church in the rain. A downright pour will not keep us from the opera or the theater on Monday, but even a drizzle on Sunday dooms the poor minister to preach to empty pews. Whether the Sunday rain is exceptionally wet, or there is more rheumatism flying around on that day, or religion, like sugar, dissolves when in contact with moisture, we will not attempt to say; we simply indicate the peculiarity and leave to others the pleasure of solving the puzzle."

THE Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a decision to the effect that the law passed by the legislature of Texas imposing a tax on commercial travelers is unconstitutional. It would seem, says the World, that state legislatures ought to understand the principle here involved after a while This is at least the third decision of the kind that has been pronounced by the court. One of these was on a case coming up from Michigan and another one from Tennessee. The commercial traveler may roam and sell goods at his own sweet will throughout the length and breadth of this land and not pay a cent for the privilege.

DR. MCGLYNN paid his compliments to Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, in his speech at the Cooper Union last Sunday night before the Anti-Poverty Society. The people of Rochester, he said, were afraid to hav him, Dr. McGlynn, there to speak, because a man in that city did not approve of it. The same man whom some of those people were in awe of had said recently that a member of the state legislature should never hav been elected had he, "the man referred to," known that he was friendly to Dr. McGlynn. The man who had the assurance to say the people could not elect a certain gentleman to the legislature without his consent, the doctor said, was Bishop McQuaid. "I am honored," Dr. McGlynn said, "by the hostility of Bishop McQuaid and of his friends, who are principally land-grabbers and corrupt politicians."

OUR London correspondent having said of the Oaths bill: "Had the bill been thrown out, it would hav been brought forward year by year until it was passed in its entirety, and with a Radical government in power there would scarcely be a difficulty in getting it through." Mr. Bradlaugh adds in correction: "This writer conveniently forgets that a lesser bill was in the year 1880 introduced by Mr. Labouchere, and never even reached a second reading. That Mr. Gladstone with an enormous majority was, when prime minister, defeated on the second reading of a bill which only went a small part of the way, and that Sir John Simon's bill, which did not reach a second reading, was not nearly as enabling as the present bill. It is too much to write as if the whole Liberal party supported an affirmation bill."

SAYS the Sun: "While the Canadian politicians are warning the habitants against the thought of annexation to the United States, the dissatisfaction of the people of Manitoba with Canadian legislation is growing stronger than ever. The railroad policy of Canada is especially obnoxious to them, but their remonstrances against it hav been of no avail, and they are beginning to look across the border for relief. We learn from the Winnipeg dispatch in yesterday's Sun, that annexation to the United States is now proposed as the only means of relief from the unfriendly action of the Dominion government. This is not surprising in view of the way in which the interests of Manitoba hav been disregarded by Canadian statesmen. It is not the first time that annexation has been advocated up there, and there is good ground for the opinion that the sentiment in its favor is extending."

Rome, or Reason?—A Reply to Cardinal Manning.

From the North American Review.

PART II.

If we liv thus tamely—
To be thus jaded by a piece of scarlet—
Farewell nobility.

No one will deny that "the pope speaks to many people in many nations; that he treats with empires and governments," and that "neither from Canterbury nor from Constantinople such a voice goes forth."

How does the pope speak? What does he say?

He speaks against the liberty of man—against the progress of the human race. He speaks to calumniate thinkers, and to warn the faithful against the discoveries of science. He speaks for the destruction of civilization.

Who listens? Do astronomers, geologists, and scientists put the hand to the ear fearing that an accent may be lost? Does France listen? Does Italy hear? Is not the church weakest at its center? Do those who hav raised Italy from the dead, and placed her again among the great nations, pay attention? Does Great Britain care for this voice—this moan, this groan—of the Middle Ages? Do the words of Leo XIII. impress the intelligence of the Great Republic? Can anything be more absurd than for the vicar of Christ to attack a demonstration of science with a passage of scripture or a quotation from one of the "fathers?"

Compare the popes with the kings and queens of England. Infinit wisdom had but little to do with the selection of these monarchs, and yet they were far better than any equal number of consecutiv popes. This is faint praise, even for kings and queens, but it shows that chance succeeded in getting better rulers for England than "infinit wisdom" did for the church of Rome. Compare the popes with the presidents of the Republic elected by the people. If Adams had murdered Washington, and Jefferson had imprisoned Adams, and if Madison had cut out Jefferson's tongue, and Monroe had assassinated Madison, and John Quincy Adams had poisoned Monroe, and General Jackson had hung Adams and his cabinet, we might say that presidents had been as virtuous as popes. But if this had happened, the verdict of the world would be that the people are not capable of selecting their presidents.

But this voice from Rome is growing feebler day by day; so feeble that the cardinal admits that the vicar of God, and the supernatural church, "are being tormented by Falck laws, by Mancini laws, and by Crispi laws." In other words, this representativ of God, this substitute of Christ, this church of divine origin, this supernatural institution—pervaded by the Holy Ghost—are being "tormented" by three politicians. Is it possible that this patriotic trinity is more powerful than the other?

It is claimed that if the Catholic church "be only a human system, built up by the intellect, will, and energy of men, the adversaries must prove it—that the burden is upon them."

As a general thing, institutions are natural. If this church is supernatural, it is the one exception. The affirmativ is with those who claim that it is of divine origin. So far as we know, all governments and all creeds are the work of man. No one believes that Rome was a supernatural production, and yet its beginnings were as small as those of the Catholic church. Commencing in weakness, Rome grew, and fought, and conquered, until it was believed that the sky bent above a subjugated world. And yet all was natural. For every effect there was an efficient cause.

The Catholic asserts that all other religions have been produced by man—that Brahmanism and Buddhism, the religion of Isis and Osiris, the marvelous mythologies of Greece and Rome, were the work of the human mind. From these religions Catholicism has borrowed. Long before Catholicism was born, it was believed that women had borne children whose fathers were gods. The trinity was promulgated in Egypt centuries before the birth of Moses. Celibacy was taught by the ancient Nazarenes and Essenes, by the priests of Egypt and India, by mendicant monks, and by the piously insane of many countries long before the apostles lived. The Chinese tell us that "when there were but one man and one woman upon the earth, the woman refused to sacrifice her virginity even to people the globe; and the gods, honoring her purity, granted that she should conceive beneath the gaze of her lover's eyes, and a virgin mother became the parent of humanity."

The founders of many religions hav insisted that it was the duty of man to renounce the pleasures of sense, and millions before our era took the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, and most cheerfully lived upon the labor of others.

The sacraments of baptism and confirmation are far older than the church of Rome. The eucharist is pagan. Long before popes began to murder each other, pagans ate cakes—the flesh of Ceres, and drank wine—the blood of Bacchus. Holy water flowed in the Ganges and Nile, priests interceded for the people and anointed the dying.

It will not do to say that every successful religion that has taught unnatural doctrins, unnatural practices, must of necessity hav been of divine origin. In most religions there has been a strange mingling of the good and bad, of the merciful and cruel, of the loving and malicious. Buddhism taught the universal brotherhood of man, insisted on the development of the mind, and this religion was propagated not by the sword, but by preaching, by persuasion, and by kindness—yet in many things it was contrary to the human will, contrary to the human passions, and contrary to good sense. Buddhism succeeded. Can we, for this reason, say that it is a supernatural religion? Is the unnatural the supernatural?

It is insisted that, while other churches hav changed, the Catholic church alone has remained the same, and that this fact demonstrates its divine origin.

Has the creed of Buddhism changed in three thousand years? Is intellectual stagnation a demonstration of divine origin? When anything refuses to grow, are we certain that the seed was planted by God? If the Catholic church is the same to-day that it has been for many centuries, this proves that there has been no intellectual development. If men do not differ upon religious subjects, it is because they do not think.

Differentiation is the law of growth, of progress. Every church must gain or lose; it cannot remain the same; it must decay or grow. The fact that the Catholic church has not grown—that it has been petrified from the first—does not establish divine origin; it simply establishes the fact that it retards the progress of man. Everything in nature changes—every atom is in motion—every star moves. Nations, institutions, and individuals hav youth, manhood, old age, death. This is and will be true of the Catholic church. It was once weak—it grew stronger—it reached its climax of power—it began to decay—it never can rise again. It is confronted by the dawn of Science. In the presence of the nineteenth century it cowers.

The cardinal asserts that "Christendom was created by the world-wide church as we see it before our eyes at this day. Philosophers and statesmen believe it to be the work of their own hands; they did not make it, but they hav for three hundred years been unmaking it by reformations and revolutions."

The meaning of this is that Christianity was far better three hundred years ago than now; that during these three centuries Christendom has been going toward barbarism. It means that the supernatural church of God has been a failure for three hundred years; that it has been unable to withstand the attacks of philosophers and statesmen, and that it has been helpless in the midst of "reformations and revolutions."

What was the condition of the world three hundred years ago, the period, according to the cardinal, in which the church reached the hight of its influence, and since which it has been unable to withstand the rising tide of reformation and the whirlwind of revolution?

In that blessed time, Philip II. was king of Spain—he with the cramped head and the monstrous jaw. Heretics were hunted like wild and poisonous beasts; the Inquisition was firmly established, and priests were busy with rack and fire. With a zeal born of the hatred of man and the love of God, the church, with every instrument of torture, touched every nerve in the human body.

In those happy days, the duke of Alva was devastating the homes of Holland; heretics were buried alive—their tongues were torn from their mouths, their lids from their eyes; the Armada was on the sea for the destruction of the heretics of England, and the Moriscoes—a million and a half of industrious people—were being driven by sword and flame from their homes. The Jews had been expelled from Spain. This Catholic country had succeeded in driving intelligence and industry from its territory; and this had been done with a cruelty, with a ferocity, unequaled in the annals of crime. Nothing was left but ignorance, bigotry, intolerance, credulity, the Inquisition, the seven sacraments, and the seven deadly sins. And yet a cardinal of the nineteenth century, living in the land of Shakspere, regrets the change that has been wrought by the intellectual efforts, by the discoveries, by the inventions and heroism of three hundred years.

Three hundred years ago, under Charles IX. of France, son of Catherine de Medici, in the year of grace 1572—after nearly sixteen centuries of Catholic Christianity—after hundreds of vicars of Christ had sat in St. Peter's chair—after the natural passions of man had been "softened" by the creed of Rome—came the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the result of a conspiracy between the vicar of Christ, Philip II., Charles IX., and his fiendish mother. Let the cardinal read the account of this massacre once more, and after reading it, imagin that he sees the gashed and mutilated bodies of thousands of men and women, and then let him say that he regrets the revolutions and reformations of three hundred years.

About three hundred years ago Clement VIII., vicar of Christ, acting in God's place, substitute of the infinit, persecuted Giordano Bruno even unto death. This great, this sublime man, was tried for heresy. He had ventured to assert the rotary motion of the earth; he had hazarded the conjecture that there were in the fields of infinit space worlds larger and more glorious than ours. For these low and groveling thoughts, for this contradiction of the word and vicar of God, this man was imprisoned for many years. But his noble spirit was not broken, and finally, in the year 1600, by the orders of the infamous vicar, he was chained to the stake. Priests believing in the doctrin of universal forgivness—priests who when smitten upon one cheek turned the other—carried with a kind of ferocious joy fagots to the feet of this incomparable man. These disciples of "Our Lord" were made joyous as the flames, like serpents, climbed around the body of Bruno. In a few moments the brave thinker was dead, and the priests who had burnt him fell upon their knees and asked the infinit God to continue the blessed work forever in hell.

There are two things that cannot exist in the same universe—an infinit God, and a martyr.

Does the cardinal regret that kings and emperors are not now engaged in the extermination of Protestants? Does he regret that dungeons of the Inquisition are no longer crowded with the best and bravest? Does he long for the fires of the auto-dâ-fé?

Another claim is made, to the effect "that the Catholic church has filled the world with the true knowledge of the one true God, and that it has destroyed all idols by light instead of by fire."

The Catholic church described the true God as a being who would inflict eternal pain on his weak and erring children; described him as a fickle, quick-tempered, unreasonable deity, whom honesty enraged, and whom flattery governed; one who loved to see fear upon its knees, ignorance with closed eyes and open mouth; one who delighted in useless self-denial, who loved to hear the sighs and sobs of suffering nuns, as they lay prostrate on dungeon floors; one who was delighted when the husband deserted his family and lived alone in some cave in the far wilderness, tormented by dreams and driven to insanity by prayer and penance, by fasting and faith.

According to the Catholic church, the true God enjoyed the agonies of heretics. He loved the smell of their burning flesh; he applauded with wide palms when philosophers were flayed alive, and to him the auto-dâ-fé was a divine comedy. The shrieks of wives, the cries of babes when fathers were being burnt, gave contrast, hightened the effect, and filled his cup with joy. This true God did not know the face of the earth he had made, and had forgotten the orbits of the stars. "The stream of light which descended from the beginning" was propagated by fagot to fagot, until Christendom was filled with the devouring fires of faith.

It may also be said that the Catholic church filled the world with the true knowledge of the one true devil. It filled the air with malicious phantoms, crowded innocent sleep with leering fiends, and gave the world to the domination of witches and wizards, spirits and spooks, goblins and ghosts, and butchered and burnt thousands for the commission of impossible crimes.

It is contended that: "In this true knowledge of the divine nature was revealed to man their own relation to a creator as sons to a father."

This tender relation was revealed by the Catholics to the pagans, the Arians, the Cathari, the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the heretics, the Jews, the Moriscoes, the Protestants—to the nativs of the West Indies, of Mexico, of Peru—to philosophers, patriots, and thinkers. All these victims were taught to regard the true God as the loving father, and this lesson was taught with every instrument of torture—with brandings and burnings, with flayings and flames. The world was filled with cruelty and credulity, ignorance and intolerance, and the soil in which all these horrors grew was the true knowledge of the one true God, and the true knowledge of the one true devil. And yet, we are compelled to say, that the one true devil described by the Catholic church was not as malevolent as the one true God.

Is it true that the Catholic church overthrew idolatry? What is idolatry? What shall we say of the worship of popes—of the doctrin of the real presence, of divine honors paid to saints, of sacred vestments, of holy water, of consecrated cups and plates, of images and relics, of amulets and charms?

The Catholic church filled the world with the spirit of idolatry. It abandoned the idea of continuity in nature, it denied the integrity of cause and effect. The government of the world was the composit result of the caprice of God, the malice of Satan, the prayers of the faithful—softened, it may be, by the charity of chance. Yet the cardinal asserts, without the preface of a smile, that "demonology was overthrown by the church, with the assistance of forces that were above nature;" and in the same breath givs birth to this enlightened statement: "Beelzebub is not divided against himself." Is a belief in Beelzebub a belief in demonology? Has the cardinal forgotten the council of Nice, held in the year of grace 787, that declared the worship of images to be lawful? Did that infallible council, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, destroy idolatry?

The cardinal takes the ground that marriage is a sacrament, and therefore indissoluble, and he also insists that celibacy is far better than marriage,—holier than a sacrament,—that marriage is not the highest state, but that "the state of virginity unto death is the highest condition of man and woman."

The highest ideal of a family is where all are equal —where love has superseded authority—where each seeks the good of all, and where none obey—where no religion can sunder hearts, and with which no church can interfere.

The real marriage is based on mutual affection—the ceremony is but the outward evidence of the inward flame. To this contract there are but two parties. The church is an impudent intruder. Marriage is made public to the end that the real contract may be known, so that the world can see that the parties hav been actuated by the highest and holiest motivs that find expression in the acts of human beings. The man and woman are not joined together by God, or by the church, or by the state. The church and state may prescribe certain ceremonies, certain formalities—but all these are only evidence of the existence of a sacred fact in the hearts of the wedded. The indissolubility of marriage is a dogma that has filled the lives of millions with agony and tears. It has given a perpetual excuse for vice and immorality. Fear has borne children begotten by brutality. Countless women hav endured the insults, indignities, and cruelties of fiendish husbands, because they thought that it was the will of God. The contract of marriage is the most important that human beings can make; but no contract can be so important as to release one of the parties from the obligation of performance; and no contract, whether made between man and woman, or between them and God, after a failure of consideration caused by the willful act of the man or woman, can hold and bind the innocent and honest.

Do the believers in indissoluble marriage treat their wives better than others? A little while ago, a woman said to a man who had raised his hand to strike her: "Do not touch me; you hav no right to beat me; I am not your wife."

About a year ago a husband, whom God in his infinit wisdom had joined to a loving and patient woman in the indissoluble sacrament of marriage, becoming enraged, seized the helpless wife and tore out one of her eyes. She forgave him. A few weeks ago he deliberately repeated this frightful crime, leaving his victim totally blind. Would it not hav been better if man, before the poor woman was blinded, had put asunder whom God had joined together? Thousands of husbands, who insist that marriage is indissoluble, are the beaters of wives.

The law of the church has created neither the purity nor the peace of domestic life. Back of all churches is human affection. Back of all theologies is the love of the human heart. Back of all your priests and creeds is the adoration of the one woman by the one man, and of the one man by the one woman. Back of your faith is the fireside—back of your folly is the family; and back of all your holy mistakes and your sacred absurdities is the love of husband and wife, of parent and child.

It is not true that neither the Greek nor the Roman world had any conception of a home. The splendid story of Ulysses and Penelope, the parting of Hector and Andromache, demonstrate that a true conception of home existed among the Greeks. Before the establishment of Christianity, the Roman matron commanded the admiration of the then known world.

She was free and noble. The church degraded woman—made her the property of the husband, and trampled her beneath its brutal feet. The "fathers" denounced woman as a perpetual temptation, as the cause of all evil. The church worshiped a God who had upheld polygamy, and had pronounced his curse on woman, and had declared that she should be the serf of the husband. This church followed the teachings of St. Paul. It taught the uncleanness of marriage, and insisted that all children were conceived in sin. This church pretended to hav been founded by one who offered a reward in this world, and eternal joy in the next, to husbands who would forsake their wives and children and follow him. Did this tend to the elevation of woman? Did this detestable doctrin "create the purity and peace of domestic life?" Is it true that a monk is purer than a good and noble father?—that a nun is holier than a loving mother?

Is there anything deeper and stronger than a mother's love? Is there anything purer, holier, than a mother holding her dimpled babe against her billowed breast?

The good man is useful, the best man is the most useful. Those who fill the nights with barren prayers and holy hunger, torture themselvs for their own good and not for the benefit of others. They are earning eternal glory for themselvs—they do not fast for their fellow-men—their selfishness is equaled only by their foolishness. Compare the monk in his selfish cell, counting beads and saying prayers for the purpose of saving his barren soul, with a husband and father sitting by his fireside with wife and children. Compare the nun with the mother and her babe.

Celibacy is the essence of vulgarity. It tries to put a stain upon motherhood, upon marriage, upon love—that is to say, upon all that is holiest in the human heart. Take love from the world, and there is nothing left worth living for. The church has treated this great, this sublime, this unspeakably holy passion, as though it polluted the heart. It has placed the love of God above the love of woman, above the love of man. Human love is generous and noble. The love of God is selfish, because man does not love God for God's sake, but for his own.

Yet the cardinal asserts "that the change wrought by Christianity in the social, political, and international relations of the world"—"that the root of this ethical change, private and public, is the Christian home." A moment afterward, this prelate insists that celibacy is far better than marriage. If the world could be induced to liv in accordance with the "highest state," this generation would be the last. Why were men and women created? Why did not the Catholic God commence with the sinless and sexless? The cardinal ought to take the ground that to talk well is good, but that to be dumb is the highest condition; that hearing is a pleasure, but that deafness is ecstasy; and that to think, to reason, is very well, but that to be a Catholic is far better.

If, as the cardinal says, the religion of Christ is in absolute harmony with nature, how can it be supernatural? The cardinal also declares that "the religion of Christ is in harmony with the reason and moral nature in all nations and all ages to this day." What becomes of the argument that Catholicism must be of divine origin because "it has ascended the stream of human license, contra ictum fluminis, by a power mightier than nature?" If "it is in harmony with the reason and moral nature of all nations and all ages to this day," it has gone with the stream, and not against it. If "the religion of Christ is in harmony with the reason and moral nature of all nations," then the men who hav rejected it are unnatural, and these men hav gone against the stream. How then can it be said that Christianity has been in changeless opposition to nature as man has marred it? To what extent has man marred it? In spite of the marring by man, we are told that the reason and moral nature of all nations in all ages to this day is in harmony with the religion of Jesus Christ.

Are we justified in saying that the Catholic church is of divine origin because the pagans failed to destroy it by persecution?

We will put the cardinal's statement in form:

Paganism failed to destroy Catholicism by persecution, therefore Catholicism is of divine origin.

Let us make an application of this logic:

Paganism failed to destroy Catholicism by persecution; therefore, Catholicism is of divine origin.

Catholicism failed to destroy Protestantism by persecution; therefore, Protestantism is of divine origin.

Catholicism and Protestantism combined failed to destroy Infidelity; therefore, Infidelity is of divine origin.

Let us make another application:

Paganism did not succeed in destroying Catholicism; therefore, Paganism was a false religion.

Catholicism did not succeed in destroying Protestantism; therefore, Catholicism is a false religion.

Catholicism and Protestantism combined failed to destroy Infidelity; therefore, both Catholicism and Protestantism are false religions.

The cardinal has another reason for believing the Catholic church of divine origin. He declares that the "canon law is a creation of wisdom and justice to which no statutes at large or imperial pandects can bear comparison;" "that the world-wide and secular legislation of the church was of a higher character, and that as water cannot rise above its source, the church could not, by mere human wisdom, hav corrected and perfected the imperial law, and therefore its source must hav been higher than the sources of the world."

When Europe was the most ignorant, the canon law was supreme. As a matter of fact, the good in the canon law was borrowed—the bad was, for the most part, original. In my judgment, the legislation of the republic of the United States is in many respects superior to that of Rome, and yet we are greatly indebted to the civil law. Our legislation is superior in many particulars to that of England, and yet we are greatly indebted to the common law; but it never occurred to me that our statutes at large are divinely inspired.

If the canon law is, in fact, the legislation of infinit wisdom, then it should be a perfect code. Yet, the canon law made it a crime next to robbery and theft to take interest for money. Without the right to take interest the business of the world would, to a large extent, cease and the prosperity of mankind end. There are railways enough in the United States to make six tracks around the globe, and every mile was built with borrowed money on which interest was paid or promised. In no other way could the savings of many thousands hav been brought together and a capital great enough formed to construct works of such vast and continental importance.

It was provided in this same wonderful canon law that a heretic could not be a witness against a Catholic. The Catholic was at liberty to rob and wrong his fellow-man, provided the fellow-man was not a fellow-Catholic, and in a court established by the vicar of Christ, the man who had been robbed was not allowed to open his mouth. A Catholic could enter the house of an unbeliever, of a Jew, of a heretic, of a Moor, and before the eyes of the husband and father murder his wife and children, and the father could not pronounce in the hearing of a judge the name of the murderer. The world is wiser now, and the canon law, given to us by infinit wisdom, has been repealed by the common sense of man.

In this divine code it was provided that to convict a cardinal bishop, seventy-two witnesses were required; a cardinal presbyter, forty-four; a cardinal deacon, twenty-four; a sub-deacon, acolyth, exorcist, reader, ostiarius, seven; and in the purgation of a bishop, twelve witnesses were invariably required; of a presbyter, seven; of a deacon, three. These laws, in my judgment, were made, not by God, but by the clergy.

So, too, in this cruel code it was provided that those who gave aid, favor, or counsel, to excommunicated persons, should be anathema, and that those who talked with, consulted, or sat at the same table with or gave anything in charity to the excommunicated should be anathema.

Is it possible that a being of infinit wisdom made hospitality a crime? Did he say: "Whoso giveth a cup of cold water to the excommunicated shall wear forever a garment of fire?" Were not the laws of the Romans much better? Besides all this, under the canon law, the dead could be tried for heresy, and their estates confiscated—that is to say, their widows and orphans robbed. The most brutal part of the common law of England is that in relation to the rights of women—all of which was taken from the Corpus Juris Canonici, "the law that came from a source higher than man."

The cardinal appeals to the author of "Ecce Homo" for the purpose of showing that Christianity is above nature, and the following passages, among others, are quoted:

"Who can describe that which unites men? Who has entered into the formation of speech, which is the symbol of their union? Who can describe exhaustivly the origin of civil society? He who can do these things can explain the origin of the Christian church."

These passages should not hav been quoted by the cardinal. The author of these passages simply says that the origin of the Christian church is no harder to find and describe than that which unites men—than that which has entered into the formation of speech, the symbol of their union—no harder to describe than the origin of civil society—because he says that one who can describe these can describe the other.

Certainly none of these things are above nature. We do not need the assistance of the Holy Ghost in these matters. We know that men are united by common interests, common purposes, common dangers—by race, climate, and education. It is no more wonderful that people liv in families, tribes, communities, and nations, than that birds, ants, and bees liv in flocks and swarms.

If we know anything, we know that language is natural—that it is a physical science. But if we take the ground occupied by the cardinal, then we insist that everything that cannot be accounted for by man is supernatural. Let me ask, by what man? What man must we take as the standard? Cosmas or Humboldt, St. Irenæus or Darwin? If everything that we cannot account for is above nature, then ignorance is the test of the supernatural. The man who is mentally honest, stops where his knowledge stops. At that point he says that he does not know. Such a man is a philosopher. Then the theologian steps forward, denounces the modesty of the philosopher as blasphemy, and proceeds to tell what is beyond the horizon of the human intellect.

Could a savage account for the telegraph, or the telephone, by natural causes? How would he account for these wonders? He would account for them precisely as the cardinal accounts for the Catholic church.

Belonging to no rival church, I hav not the slightest interest in the primacy of Leo XIII., and yet it is to be regretted that this primacy rests upon such a narrow and insecure foundation.

The cardinal says that "it will appear almost certain that the original Greek of St. Irenæus, which is unfortunately lost, contained either the Greek word, or some inflection of that Greek word, which signifies primacy."

From this it appears that the primacy of the bishop of Rome rests on some "inflection" of a Greek word —and that this supposed inflection was in a letter supposed to hav been written by St. Irenæus, which has certainly been lost. Is it possible that the vast fabric of papal power has this, and only this, for its foundation? To this "inflection" has it come at last?

The cardinal's case depends upon the intelligence and veracity of his witnesses. The fathers of the church were utterly incapable of examining a question of fact. They were all believers in the miraculous. The same is true of the apostles. If St. John was the author of the Apocalypse, he was undoubtedly insane. If Polycarp said the things attributed to him by Catholic writers, he was certainly in the condition of his master. What is the testimony of St. John worth in the light of the following? "Cerinthus, the heretic, was in a bath house. St. John and another Christian were about to enter. St. John cried out: 'Let us run away, lest the house fall upon us while the enemy of truth is in it.'" Is it possible that St. John thought that God would kill two eminent Christians for the purpose of getting even with one heretic?

Let us see who Polycarp was. He seems to hav been a prototype of the Catholic church, as will be seen from the following statement concerning this father: "When any heretical doctrin was spoken in his presence he would stop his ears." After this, there can be no question of his orthodoxy. It is claimed that Polycarp was a martyr—that a spear was run through his body, and that from the wound his soul, in the shape of a bird, flew away. The history of his death is just as true as the history of his life.

Irenæus, another witness, took the ground that there was to be a millennium—a thousand years of enjoyment in which celibacy would not be the highest form of virtue. If he is called as a witness for the purpose of establishing the divine origin of the church, and if one of his "inflections" is the basis of papal supremacy, is the cardinal also willing to take his testimony as to the nature of the millennium?

All the fathers were infinitly credulous. Every one of them believed, not only in the miracles said to hav been wrought by Christ, by the apostles, and by other Christians, but every one of them believed in the pagan miracles. All of these fathers were familiar with wonders and impossibilities. Nothing was so common with them as to work miracles, and on many occasions they not only cured diseases, not only reversed the order of nature, but succeeded in raising the dead.

It is very hard indeed to prove what the apostles said, or what the fathers of the church wrote. There were many centuries filled with forgeries—many generations in which the cunning hands of ecclesiastics erased, obliterated, and interpolated the records of the past—during which they invented books, invented authors, and quoted from works that never existed.

The testimony of the "fathers" is without the slightest value. They believed everything—they examined nothing. They received as a waste-basket receives. Whoever accepts their testimony will ex claim with the cardinal: "Happily, men are not saved by logic." ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

A Christian's Thoughts.

Alastor in Secular Thought.

The St. Andrew's Cross, a journal published in Chicago and ded cated to the spread of Christ's gospel among young men, has in a recent number an article on "Skeptical Insolence." It asks how the lying lips of Agnostics are to be put to silence, and proceeds to vindicate its mission to propagate Christ's gospel by hinting in the following terms the best way of doing unto people who possess skeptical ideas and desire to utter them: "You must not blame some of us if we sometimes think that a cool stone cell, in a comfortable jail, with a very abstemious diet, would be a well-earned reward for some of this loud-mouthed anti-Christian writing and teaching. We are men, and such thoughts will come to us. I know the cry of free sp ech will immediately be made. True, but you do not stretch that principle to cover the utterances of one who stands up and talks open treason and incites the people to revolt. You would soon silence him and arrest him. Ought not the same rule to apply to those men who, by attacking the Christian religion, are sapping the foundations of all morality, and leading on the ignorant masses to that inevitable outcome of all Infidelity—the Commune." The malevolent writer, so zealous for the spread of Christ's gospel, is perhaps too ignorant to know that his argument for suppressing free speech is the old stock argument—aged as tyranny—made use of ineffectually for thousands of years. But it meant more in the mouth of a Torquemada than in that of the unknown Chicago scribbler, though both are equally malevolent and intolerant; but, the circumstances being different, the effect is not precisely the same. The threat in the mouth of the first would hav been immediately translated into murderous action; in the mouth of the second it means only the hiss of an impotent snake.

Curiously enough, in turning over Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe" for proof of the above assertion regarding the suppression of free speech in the past, I came across the following: "Throughout the East, men in terror destroyed their libraries for fear that some unfortunate sentence contained in any of the books should involve them and their families in destruction. The universal opinion was that it was right to compel men to believe what the majority of society has now accepted as the truth, and, if they refused, it was right to punish them. No one in the dominating party was heard to raise his voice in behalf of intellectual liberty." St. Andrew's Cross should hav been published in the days of Constantine, miscalled the Great.

Mr. Green's Congratulations.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Oct. 14, E.M. 288.

FRIEND STEVENS: I hav just read the report of the Pittsburgh Congress and I am much pleased with it. They could not hav done their work better. No more suitable man could hav been selected for president than Judge Westbrook, especially as it is proposed to look into the Christian fraud on Girard College. The judge's late work on that subject shows that he is most admirably prepared to lead the movement. The Union should make the unearthing of that stupendous iniquity one of its special works during the coming year. I know of nothing the Union could do that would tend so much to unite the Liberals of America as would a well-planned and well-directed movement in that direction. Such a movement would command the sympathy of every just person, whatever might be their individual opinions.

I am glad you were reëlected, for I am sure you hav done all in your power, and all anyone could hav done during the last year, to advance the Secular movement. The treasurer and chairman of the executiv committee and finance committee are good selections. I shall do all I can through the Magazine to aid you. I wish you as secretary great success. Command me, wherever you can see that I can in any way be of value to you. Fraternally, H. L. GREEN.

Per Augusta Ad Augusta.

For several years a cheerful-looking, matronly English lady, accompanied by a handsome daughter in her teens, whose features bore the indelible stamp of refinement and intellectuality, were faithful attendants of our meetings. It was some time ere I learned that the young lady was training for a kindergarten teacher—that finally she had mastered Froebel, obtained her graduation certificate, and rendered the usual probationary gratuitous service for six months; but when she fully expected to procure a paid school she found she was deficient in the all-important prerequisit—she had no church or ministerial indorsements, so that her expense, time, and studies were of no avail. This is not only an outrage, but a swindle on the part of the Chicago Free Kindergarten Association.

As Miss Laura Lee is one of our most enthusiastic Freethinkers, she will stand by the Secular Union school or no school, and at present is the proficient secretary of the Young People's Society.

However, my particular reason for bringing this sparkling but modest young lady into prominence at this time is owing to the distinction she has just obtained, reflecting credit on her research as well as honor on the Society. A short time ago the Chicago Mail offered several cash prizes to those who would answer the most of one hundred and twenty questions, ranged in series of twenty each, pertaining chiefly to authors, history, grammar, and general literature, and of the most complicated character. Miss Lee undertook the task, determined to win for the honor of the Secular cause, and our Young People's Society in particular.

As it may be a matter of interest to your readers to know of what these questions were composed, I hav selected at random a few of them:

What is meant by saying of a person that he was "oyster-shelled?"

Who was the first person that openly, in any public meeting held in Massachusetts, declared for a total independence of the thirteen North American colonies?

Of what battle may it be said that it checked the Protestant reformation, and why?

Why are American ministers to foreign countries and foreign ministers to the United States not called embassadors?

Quote three or four anachronisms of Shakspere.

By whom was the game of dominoes invented, and why was it so called?

Two of the greatest men died the same day; who were they? Giv date of their death.

Who suggested "E pluribus unum" as the motto for the great seal of the United States, and from what Latin author did he borrow it?

Who was Aldiborontiphosocophornio, and who wrote about him?

According to parliamentary law is "a motion to lay on the table" or "a motion to take from the table" in order? If not, why not?

Who said, "Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away?"

What much-read novel of a celebrated English novelist concludes with the words, "The worst use you can put a man to is to hang him?" Are the words original with the novelist? If not, from whom are they plagiarized?

Why was Mme. Maintenon called "La Belle Indienne?"

Those questions may not appear very difficult of solution, but the trouble is, the popular impression as to the correct answers is so much at variance with the facts that when you imagin you hav the answer you are farther away than ever.

Out of the one hundred and twenty questions Miss Laura Lee answered correctly one hundred and twelve, securing the second prize, while Miss Lane, who took first prize, was credited only with one hundred and fourteen. In reality, Miss Lane did not answer any of them, as her father, a literary man, found the answers and credited them to his daughter, while Miss Lee had to attend to her duties, receiving little or no assistance. Under the circumstances she ought to hav secured the first prize. However, as the Mail debarred only its employees from competing, anyone was eligible, young or old. Miss Lee appears as the personification of the Latin motto at the head of this article ("Through trials to triumph"), and we take this occasion to congratulate her on her excellent record. This being the third (or fourth) public prize won by young lady members of the Chicago Secular Mutual Improvement Society since its organization last May, we hope that its example may be a stimulus to our young Freethought friends everywhere to organize, and prove to the world that the claim of Secularists to sterling mental capacity is not merely a sham. E. A. STEVENS.

Our London Letter.

Mr. Bradlaugh announces in his paper that he has received a sum of close upon £2,500 from public subscriptions, which will clear off the debts incurred through his parliamentary struggle, and leave him about £1,000 to the good. It is really wonderful how he has borne such a load for so long without serious injury to himself, and it is more galling to a man who would owe "no man anything." The relief to his mind can be better felt than described. It is still more surprising that one who not so long back "was despised and rejected of men" should hav found so many friends even among those who are totally opposed to his anti-theological tenets. He certainly deserves his good fortune, for he has worked hard and thoroughly.

Mr. Foote's appeal to the readers of the Freethinker has not turned out very satisfactorily. He wished to hav their opinion whether the illustrations had a favorable or unfavorable effect on the circulation, and the replies hav not tended to settle the question. He says the majority of subscribers hav not said anything on the subject, but if they had done so, they could only hav expressed their own ideas, without being able to say anything decisiv. A report from the various newsvenders who sell the paper would hav been more satisfactory, for it is only those who deal in an article can speak as to its circulation, and what may tend to increase or retard it.

The articles in recent numbers of the Andover Review on the decay of religion in the back towns of New England must be rather interesting reading, more especially to the Freethought party. The suggestions as to the course to be pursued to gain the backsliders may be successful to a certain extent; they appear to be well assorted, the majority savoring of things carnal. There would not be a great run on the printed sermons to be circulated, though the violin and cornet, with Sunday-evening lectures, gymnasium, reading-room, library, and general amusements, may prove a draw. What, however, these last hav to do with the gospel as it is in Jesus—what they hav in common—it is difficult for the unbeliever to see. It only shows that the clerical party are by no means particular what they do or permit to be done, as long as they can be supported without having to work. Jesus would hav rather a rough time of it if he reappeared and went through the same performances as on the previous occasion.

The Salvation Army must be rather proud of its latest converts at Tunbridge Wells, who perpetrated so diabolical a murder and were planning other atrocities when they were arrested. One of them has written a letter from jail, which expresses no regret for the crime, but self-gratulation that all his sins are forgiven and Jesus is constantly with him in his cell. When he meets his deserts, no doubt the angels will rejoice over him, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. J. D.

To Mrs. Slenker.

Do not let any question come between us other than the one on which I am trying to concentrate your efforts, viz., the truth or falsity of the Spiritual phenomena viewed from a philosophic and scientific standpoint. Let us keep this in view, and treat all else as side issues. I should not hav mentioned Dr. Bouton's name had it not been for your eulogy of him.

You hav my proposition, made fairly and squarely, and I am prepared to carry out my part of the program. Are you prepared with yours?

Of course it will be necessary for us to hav some common ground on which to stand, and as you publicly admitted that you believed a very small portion of the phenomena to be true, I ask that you giv a detailed statement of that part of your experience, supplemented with any remarks, favorable, unfavorable, or explanatory, that you may elect to make.

By so doing, both of us will be relieved of the necessity of several preliminary letters, and we can enter at once into the consideration of the subject.

You will now pardon my saying a word to J. C. Roe, of York, Pa.

Mr. Roe asks many questions, and answers them for himself—satisfactorily, I hope. But in a letter of a score of lines he propounds enough to engage one a year in answering.

The phenomena may appear to him as "absurd and unreasonable," but this is simply the opinion of one man, and a man who never has investigated—presumably because he did not wish to make himself appear absurd.

I promis to attempt to answer all his questions when the proper time arrives, as, strange as it may appear to him, these "absurd and unreasonable" phenomena are to be proved, if proved at all, to be in strict accord with the theories of the greatest materialistic philosophers of this century.

I hav said it before, and I repeat it now, that the "continuance of life" can be safely established from the Darwinian theory alone, and that any Materialist who is violently opposed to the term Spiritualist, can entirely ignore that name while pursuing his investigations.

The mind of man is finite. We know nothing of an infinit mind. We are all liable to make mistakes, to make false deductions, and not one of our philosophies is absolutely correct.

In dealing with certain subjects we must indulge in speculation to a degree, and cannot, as some of the friends hav demanded, reduce a proposition to a mathematical accuracy. There is no such a thing as mathematical accuracy. There is as wide divergence between theoretical and practical mathematics, as it is possible to conceive. Let me illustrate.

Take two athletes and allow that one can run ten times as fast as the other, and place the slower one a hundred yards in advance. Then, at the word, both start.

When the swifter has covered a hundred yards, the other has run ten yards; and when the swifter has covered that ten, the slower has advanced one-tenth of a yard; and while the swifter is covering that tenth of a yard, the other has run one-hundredth of a yard, and so on, till eternity ceases, for the slower will always be in advance of the swifter, even though it be only "the infinitesimalest portion of a fraction."

The ten-year-old boy of Mr. Roe, if he has one, knows what would be the practical result of the race.

So, in a discussion of the kind proposed, I presuppose that we are ordinary sort of people, every-day sort of people, and we will discuss it in language that all will understand.

We are dealing with the "here," not the "hereafter." If there be a spirit world, it is here. If there be spirits, excarnated human beings, then all of us are as truly spirits to-day as we will be one thousand years hence.

There is no necessity for us to go up to the clouds. We hav enough around and about us to keep us busily employed, for I fully agree with Milton when he wrote:

> Not to know at large of things remote
> From use, obscure and subtle, but to know
> That which before us lies in daily life,
> Is the prime wisdom.

McARTHUR.

Toe-Joint Spiritualism.

Shortly after the first appearance of the Fox girls as public mediums, forty years ago, the ex-Rev. C. C. Burr undertook to account for the mysterious rappings on the toe joint theory. He gave lectures, and his brother Heman illustrated the theory by cracking his big-toe, just as Margaret Fox Kane did the other night, when she declared herself a reformed impostor. There are thousands yet living who will attest that the rappings produced in her presence in former years were not done with her toe-joint. And they know that intelligent answers were given by those rappings to questions propounded by them. Those answers Miss Fox knew nothing about until they were spelled out by means of an alphabet held in the hand of the inquirer.

In February, 1852, I saw one of the Fox girls at the Burnett House in Cincinnati. Her mother was in the room with her. The girl stood on two inverted tumblers placed on the center-table. She had her shoes on, and the raps came loud and distinct on the table below her feet. The toe-joint theory was then exploded, and this insulating performance was intended to show that the sounds were not produced by electricity.

Some time afterward, either in the same year or the next, she was holding séances in Washington. A friend of mine went to one of them with a series of mental questions all prepared, but resolved to get only such answers as he willed. He was successful. Every answer was exactly what he willed it, and everyone was false except the first. The girl did not know the questions, much less the answers. When he got through she asked him if the answers were correct. He replied: "They are satisfactory."

That friend is now living in New York city, and I believe he takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. BURR.

Liberalism in Milwaukee.

I wish to report once more the progress of Freethought here in our city. We hav an association called the Milwaukee Liberal Club that meets every Sunday evening. Our exercises are music and a recitation, or reading; then a lecture, followed by discussion of the lecture and a reply by the first speaker. They are well attended by a class of thinking people, who listen to the discussion of all subjects

Now, it seems to me that such meetings might be held in almost every town or city in the country, and giv Liberal-minded people a place to go where there is a chance for Freethought, without the forms and ceremonies and conservatism of the churches. Some might say that we hav many Liberal discussions from some of our liberal churches, but even there you hav the forms and ceremonies that belong with the most orthodox church.

It strikes me that the Freethinkers are not half awake to the fact that American liberty never was so badly menaced as at the present time. And as one of the signs of the times, I wish to call the reader's attention to the report of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the American Secular Union Convention that was held in the early part of this month in Pittsburgh, Pa., wherein it stated that there was a society there that called upon the proper official to cause the arrest of the members of the meeting for blasphemy.

I was astonished that at this age, after this society of Secular Unionists had met annually for so many years, there was danger of their being arrested.

But I tell you that is what is being tried all over this country—to suppress Freethought, and there are different ways used to help bring about this condition of things. There is to-day a political party whose principal object is to endanger the liberty of the individual and suppress what they call Infidelity, and that is the Prohibition party.

It is a church party run entirely by the church and in the interest of Christianity, and I am surprised to find many Liberals that are to work with this party thinking they are doing a good work toward ridding this country of a great evil in suppressing the liquor traffic.

But they do not seem to pay any attention to the first plank in their platform of principles, and that is to get God in the Constitution, to Christianize this country. It does not say so in so many words, but that is what it means, as they say. And when that is done, where are the rights of the Infidel? Read what Colonel Ingersoll said in the last TRUTH SEEKER, of October 27th, upon Prohibition, which confirms what I hav stated.

It seems to me that half the Liberals all over this country are asleep and do not realize the danger we are in, notwithstanding the outrages that are being perpetrated all over the country.

Too many of them are attending churches and paying pew-rent, as I know of a good many that are doing so in this city, and leaving all the work of trying to make this government a government of the people, instead of making it in the interest of a certain class, to a few brave souls that are willing to devote their whole life to the good work, and thereby make it easy for all to enjoy a free government.

I say, then, Arouse, Liberals, all over this country, and organize meetings in some form and do all you can to help Secularize this government. And giv us free thought, free speech, free press, free mails—in fact, freedom to think and act in our best judgment what is best for all. A. B. SEVERANCE.

The Way the Reporters Got It.

From the Sun.

CITIZEN MACDONALD MAY AFFIRM WITH BOTH HANDS IN HIS POCKETS IF HE WANTS TO.

Eugene M. Macdonald of the thirty-fourth election district of the twentieth assembly district presented himself for registration, but declined to swear on the Bible. He said he was willing to affirm. He had his hand in his pocket, and the chairman of the board requested him to take it out and hold it up. This he refused to do. The chairman thereupon asked him if he believed in God, and Macdonald's reply was that he was not justified in answering that question, and that the chairman had no business to ask it.

Thereupon the chairman of the board refused to register his name, and the other inspectors coincided with him. Macdonald asked Judge Barrett for a mandamus. Judge Barrett said yesterday that the chairman had no business to ask Macdonald to hold up his right hand.

"The inspectors seem to think that a man in order to affirm must hold up his hand," said the judge. "I know of no law that compels a man to take his hand out of his pocket to affirm. This board must reconvene to register the name of this man."

The judge then prepared his opinion in writing as follows: "The inspectors had no right to require the relator to affirm with the uplifted hand. Nor was it within their province to exact a religious test. Indeed, every interrogation upon the subject of the relator's belief in the existence of a deity was an impertinence to which no citizen, in the absence of any suspicion of his truthfulness, should be subjected. A mandamus must be granted."

From the Herald.

JUDGE BARRETT SAYS A MAN'S BELIEF IN GOD IS NO BUSINESS OF POLL CLERKS.

A severe but merited rebuke was administered yesterday by Judge Barrett, of the supreme court, to overzealous election inspectors. It grew out of a refusal by the inspectors in the thirty-fourth election district of the twentieth assembly district to register Eugene M. Macdonald, because he refused to raise his right hand when asked to swear to the truth of his statement qualifying him to register.

Another ground for refusing to register him was his polite intimation to the inspectors that they had no business to ask him whether he believed in a God or not.

"Inspectors," said Judge Barrett yesterday, in granting a mandamus directing the inspectors to register Mr. Macdonald, "hav no right to require a man to affirm with uplifted hand; nor was it within their province to exact a religious test. Indeed, their interrogations of the relator's belief in the existence of the deity was an impertinence to which no citizen, in the absence of any suspicion of his truthfulness, should be subjected."

AN INGENIOUS SCRIBE'S VERSION.

From the News.

The members of the board of inspectors of the thirty-fourth election district of the twentieth assembly district last Saturday undertook to interpret the laws governing registration to Eugene M. Macdonald.

Macdonald when asked to swear refused to do so on the ground that he did not believe in God. The board at first were inclined to refuse to register him on the ground of his unbelief.

A thought, however, struck the chairman of the board, who had, once upon a time, seen a witness in court affirm with uplifted hand. He told Macdonald to affirm, which the latter proceeded to do, with his hands in his trousers pockets.

"Hold up your right hand," said the chairman.

"Not much. I prefer to keep them in my pockets," answered Macdonald.

"Then we can't register you," replied the chairman.

"All right, then, I'll make you," said the persistent voter as he left the registry place.

He kept his word to-day, for he had the matter brought before Judge Barrett in supreme court chambers, and the judge laughed at the action of the board and ordered them to reconvene at once and allow Mr. Macdonald to register if he should feel inclined.

"A man can commit perjury and be liable therefor just as well when he affirms with his hands in his pockets as with uplifted hand, and these judges were evidently ignorant of their duties," said the judge.

FROM A RELIGIOUS POINT OF VIEW.

From the Washington Post.

Judge Barrett of the supreme court of New York, has granted a mandamus to compel the inspectors of election to register the name of Eugene M. Macdonald, of the twentieth assembly district. When Macdonald presented himself for registration he declined to swear on the Bible, but said he was willing to affirm. He refused, however, to hold up his hand or to answer whether or not he believed in God.

The inspectors thereupon refused to register his name.

The judge held that the inspectors had no right to require the relator to hold up his hand, and further held that it was not within the province of the inspectors to exact a religious test. And with the judge is the sentiment of every fair-minded man.

There could scarcely be a more preposterous or blasphemous suggestion than that a lot of ward politicians should act in the capacity of judges of a man's religious belief, to decide whether he was possessed of sufficient Christian grace to entitle him to a vote in a political election. It is bad enough for men in holy calling to prescribe the metes and bounds of a rational man's belief in that which is a sealed book to all creatures, but it is unpardonable, it is ridiculous, in men who are professional politicians in general and ward bummers in particular. It is a burlesque of religion, a profanation of the divine name and attributes, that such things are possible, and Judge Barrett's decision, from a religious point of view, can only be considered as a reproof to those whose zeal has degraded the purposes of their religion.

But How Many People Knew It?

From the New York Herald.

Judge Barrett the other day decided that a man cannot be made to swear if he chooses to affirm, and that in the latter case he can neither be required to lift up his hand nor be questioned as to his religious belief. "Indeed," he says, "every interrogation upon the subject of the relator's belief in the existence of a deity was an impertinence to which no citizen, in the absence of any suspicion of his truthfulness, should be subjected." This sensible decision was rendered in a case in which the election inspectors had refused to register a voter because he would not raise his hand or submit to an inquisition as to his religious belief.

The law is clearly as Judge Barrett has interpreted it, but this does not seem to be generally known. The custom of holding the Bible when being sworn or kissing it afterward, and the practice of holding up the hand when affirming, are so old and so universal that they are commonly supposed to be required by law. But such is not the case.

The law allows every person to make either oath or affirmation. In neither case is any formality required other than speaking the words. Touching the Bible, or uplifting the hands, is no more essential than closing the eyes

Any person who prefers to affirm is free to do so without giving any reasons for his preference. To question him as to his religious belief is, as Judge Barrett says, impertinent.

Prosecutions for Blasphemy in Sweden.

From the National Reformer.

A Freethinking Association has recently been established in Sweden entitled, the Utilistiska Samfundets (Utilitarian Association). Its headquarters are at Stockholm. It has several provincial branches. Its president is Victor E. Lennstrand, and the vice-president Alfred Linquest, both of whom are graduates of the Upsala University. The program of the society states:

> The utilitarian society teaches that this life is the only one about which we know anything: that the end and aim of man is to diminish pain and produce happiness for as many as possible. It contests decidedly the whole Christian view of life: it denies every faith in anything supernatural and assails all kinds of theology as unreasonable and superstitious: it seeks to spread knowledge and to found morality on rational principles. It agitates for unlimited liberty of religion, of speech, of printing, and it claims that every opinion may be freely proclaimed; it protests against the existence of any state church: it claims for everyone the right not to be compelled to educate his children in another creed than the parents wish, the rights to marry and inter without interference of priests, and to be delivered from the duty of making oaths.

Captain Otto Thomson, the president of the Eskilstum branch of the society, writes that Messrs. Lennstrand and Linquest hav been indicted for having openly declared that the dogmatical Christian faith is unreasonable. That on trial they hav been found guilty and sentenced—Mr Lennstrand to three months' imprisonment, and Mr. Linquest to one month's imprisonment. Appeal has been made against these sentences to the Court of King's Bench, but it is feared the decision will be adverse. Captain Thomson adds: "Their courage is unquenched, and old fellows like myself, as well as the young of both sexes, flock to the banner of Freethought held aloft by these two noble young men, who are determined not to abate in the struggle for freedom of utterance."

The Blasphemy of Religion.

From the earliest dawn of reason in our childhood days we hav heard with "bated breath and whispering humbleness the name of God." The awe inspired in our infant hearts was only equaled by the fear of his displeasure; he rode upon the storm, he flashed the lightning from the sky, he opened the bowels of the earth and swallowed up great cities, his power was omnipotent, his will the law of the universe, and none who hav thus been early taught of his prerogativs can ever cease to name his name with a certain fear and reverence. This is the creator of all things, the builder of the trackless universe, the boundless extent of which is beyond our comprehension. Pope has written almost all we really know of this creator in his oft-quoted lines:

> Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
> Sees God in clouds and hears him in the wind.

And what more do we know, or what hav we seen, or what has been proved to us that others hav seen or heard, of this creator?

The Indian with his untutored mind not only saw and heard God in the clouds and wind, but saw him in all that part of creation within the margin of his vision. And this, we hold, is the only way the creator has ever revealed himself to mortal man, or ever will. His voice may be the rumbling thunder, his whisper the gentle wind, but his love for all is revealed in the fruitful earth, whose wonderful potencies bring forth material to make a heaven of this beautiful world. But we do not make a heaven of it, but through ignorance, mainly, and selfishness and superstition following close in its wake, we hav managed to make of it a first-class hell.

Away back in the earliest recorded history of our race, was told a lie that has rolled down the centuries and, like a snow-ball, increased prodigiously in size, until now we hav men who actually believe that Moses talked with the creator, and that the Bible was inspired by the creator. Moses may hav talked with a so-called God; that same God may hav inspired the whole of the Bible, but the great mistake people make in this matter is, that they confuse the God of the Bible with the creator of the universe. They are two separate entities, and hold not the slightest relation to each other. The God of the Bible is revengeful, eternally remorseless in his vengeance against puny mortals; the creator of the universe smiles in the sunlight of his love upon all, making ample provision for all, and if all do not get their just share, it may be justly charged to the social condition of man which had its origin and continuance under the auspices of the God of the Bible. I would not dare accuse the universal creator of the authorship of such a jumble of historical truths and lies. He has done nothing in his visible creations to warrant such an accusation. His handiwork is the very acme of perfection, it moves on unalterably through countless cycles of time, obstacles in its path are swept aside as gossamer threads before a tornado.

This is his only revelation to us, and with it we are gifted with reason and instinct, which are amply sufficient for us to translate his will in regard to our relations with him and our fellow-man. Take the lesson of the flower that blooms and thrives under the rays of the sun and the falling dew. How beautiful it is, how fragrant! How quick its growth, as if in haste to emit its odorous thanks for the gift of life!

But suppose this flower had been moved from the gentle rays of the sun and covered over to prevent the dew from inspiriting its growth. Its life would hav been a failure, its growth and development impeded, its death premature. And so it is with humanity to-day; instead of coming out into the broad sunlight of natural truth—that truth which can be proved to be the truth, and from the simplest analogy seeing our duty to our brother-man—we are skulking around and dodging the false issues raised by a rag-tag and bob-tail sort of crazy-quilt account of ancient Jews, so thoroughly absurd and blasphemous that no man on this earth, gifted with reasoning faculties, could (if he were not early taught that it was from the creator) believe that the author of the universe ever had any hand directly, or indirectly, in putting such an Arabian Nights sort of entertainment—as the Bible certainly is—on the market, and ramming it down the throats of sensible people. That it is, and has always been, a curse to humanity, can be proved in one word.

What better appreciation and gratitude does the giver of a good gift want from the receiver than that of his making the best possible use of the gift?

Hav we made the best possible use of the gift of life and of this earth? Let eighteen hundred years of Christian civilization make answer.

To-day more men in arms awaiting the word from their master to slaughter their fellow-men than ever before in the history of the world. To-day more poverty throughout the world, more oppression of the powerful against the weak, more solid combinations of capital against the helpless laborer, more corruption, immorality, and crime, more miserable unnecessary deaths produced by inhuman injustice, than ever before, and, pity 'tis 'tis true, more churches towering to the sky. If we would for one moment cease praying over the traditions of a dead past and turn to the living present, we could not fail to see what renegades we are. We hav actually thrown back into the very teeth of our creator the priceless gift of life and this fair earth. We call it a corridor of heaven or a vestibule of hell, we call it a probationary lodgment; we decry it with our mouths and fight for its benefits with our hands and heads; and then we turn and look away back upon some fetish and giv it thanks. The great cause of existence, call it what you may, creator, Jehovah, or God, is speaking now, and has been speaking from the first. His instructions to man are coeval with his birth, and not filtered down through thousands of years nor through the medium of millions of liars. And what are these instructions? They can best be summarized by two elements which predominate creation—love and justice. They are inherent in man, but he tramples upon them, ignores their monitions, and turns to his ancient fetish and absolutely covers it all over with abject and flattering ovations, and this he calls religion, and the fetish he calls his God.

No man can conspire against his neighbor to injure him in any way but that he feels that it is wrong. That is the created monitorial sense of justice which is speaking to him. No man can look upon a pastoral scene of country life—the waving grass, the lowing herd, the warming sun, the fields of corn and grain—and not feel the love of the creator who, like a kind and loving father, so bountifully provides for us.

The eighteen hundred years of Christianity hav been devoted to the worship of an alien God, an old dried-up mummy of ancient barbarism, when with us all the time, neglected and scorned, has been the true God of love and justice. And how we hav used his great gift, the earth; we hav crowded ourselvs into masses of struggling, pushing, brutal gangs, each seeking for the other's throat, while wasted lands and opportunities lie right before us! We hav distorted and misapplied our intellects and our energies to make life not a blessing but a curse, and we certainly hav succeeded. We must turn about, not to the past, for that is gone, not to the future, for that is to come, but to the present which is now; we must turn about and face the neglected creator, the true God of love and justice, and acknowledge him to be our inspiration and our guide. And with this conversion would come a reverence for the works of the creator, and towering above all created things, man takes his allotted place, the first. Not one man, but all men. Who then among us would not see to it that all men had their just proportion of love and justice? This being so, we could hav no wars, no discontent, no poverty. The world would then show in an unmistakable manner its gratitude to the maker of all things.

The so-called religion of to-day is a curse, from the fact that it assumes the power to forgiv sins—to insure eternal salvation in a world to come which we know nothing about. Now, these two prerogativs—relics of ancient lies—act directly against the proper performance of man's duty on this earth from a sense of love and justice toward all, for the simple reason that the church shields individuals, and, it is said, saves them, no matter how long they hav outraged love and justice in their dealings with their fellow-men. It is their bulwark, their prop which upholds and sustains them, and with a barbaric glee at having conciliated the old fetish, they go on forging heavier chains for the poor and oppressed. The old fetish of the church of course has no heart—it is but a bundle of dried bones, and being so, it emits no spark of living love and justice for those who liv, but a great overdose of it for those long since dead. What we want is a religion for this world. If we get a good one here, the next world will take care of itself. Now, this is precisely what the churches do not want. They want a religion for the next world while the devil harries us to death in this. And right within the portals of the church we shall find this devil, veiled like the great Mokanna, "o'er whose features hung a veil, a silken veil, which he had flung in mercy there, to hide from mortal sight his dazzling brow till man could bear its light." The adherents of Mokanna followed him in deference and reverential fear, but one impious follower tore off the veil, when lo! instead of the beautiful brow impressed with divinity, was revealed an ugliness so horrible that words fail to describe it.

The tolling bells, the robed priest, the magnificent cathedral, the solemn procession, all—all the devices of superstitious ignorance—in these the maker dwells not, but rather in the tear of pity over some fallen ones, rather in the heart that prompts a deed of hidden kindness, rather in the unsought love to the friendless and the poor will be ever found the creator of the universe. No intoned litany or surpliced priest need herald good to him; 'tis done and all repaid in the sweet consciousness of a noble deed performed. We must hav a religion to the true God of love and justice. We must thank him for this life by developing all its possibilities, not by thwarting them. This is the only possible way for us to express our gratitude; words are useless, prayers are in vain. The world is complete and so is man. What is left for us to do is to follow the dictates of love and justice, and this scene of desolation, of wrong and misery, shall be turned into a veritable heaven, which it was certainly meant to be. WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Hell-Bullies.

Over the glowing portals of hell Dante points to the awful legend: "Let all who enter here leave hope behind."

How the despair of the newly condemned victim must be magnified, his terror intensified, as he reads the fiendish inscription! Knowing his doom, the wretch might well exclaim with the primal murderer, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." He sees in the horrible announcement agonies before him "like to Mount Ossa piled upon Pelion;" anticipates torments succeeding tortures in endless succession; and with nothing left but the lifetime aphorism, "Go in and bear it," he enters upon the soul-cremation that knows no end. "Let all who enter here leave hope behind"—a verbal scourge, the inspiration of barbaric religion—a played-out horror, however, "whistled down the wind," and of which ere long it will be said—

> And like the baseless fabric of a vision,
> Left not a wreck behind.

Of mankind in the past, we hav been made to ask if they had eaten of the insane root that takes the reason prisoner. A conundrum that finds its solution now in the word "evolution," a word which in the highest possible degree justifies the father for having transmitted the diabolical enormities of the altar in his teachings, and in bearing with such oppressions as the stake, the thumbscrews, and the dungeon for so many centuries.

"Let all who enter here leave hope behind."

I heard the sentiment at one time used by the president of a college while addressing a meeting of poor-masters who had convened purposely to listen to his counsel in the matter of management of tramps. Said he, "Let your treatment of them be as suggested by the lines of the poet; searing into their comprehension by a severe regimen and comfortless surroundings that the way of the tramp is the way of the transgressor, and is therefore hard." The merciless duffer with his thousands a year and splendidly appointed apartments, together with the incense-breathing deference of a large community eager to do him honor, had no more charity for his broken-down, honestly needy fellow-men than hell's boss "inscription," "Let all who enter here leave hope behind." A Christian minister was the shambling, hulking monster—a Baptist. And this is the venomous language of his dismal profession. His was not the spirit of the meek Beatitudes, but that of the God of Abraham and Jacob, the bully leader of the Jews, the scourger of the heathen, whose chief delight was blood and to play hell generally. Jehovah was our clerical president's exemplar in his dealings with the unfortunate. Wrath, wrath, wrath, is the stock in trade of the churches. "For they shall know that I am the Lord," the great architect who made the earth and sea and all that in them is in six days, and on the seventh rested from his labors, bushed, fagged out. The flimsy puffball lie of the altar! And still believed in by many because spread before their starved intellects scourgingly dished up with hell-sauce, and the devil as chief waiter.

There are ruffians of the intellect as well as of the muscle; educated sluggers who use their acquirements and social position to pound people's brains into recognition of their accepted dogmas, just as the others crack you over the sconce or gouge your eye out to prove they can "lick" you. The same instinct guides both classes. Confined to no particular division of society, they are to be met with in every deferred-to profession in our midst; mostly, however, are they to be found among college professors—fellows who unite a percentage of the clergyman to the teacher. "I ought to know more than you do," is the basis of their insolent presumption; and full of the spirit of the class-room, they hold the pistol of self-assertion to your head, demanding of you acceptance of their dogmas, just as road-agents rob victims of valuables on the highway.

If I were asked how long the nuisance will be likely to continue, I should reply, just so long as the deferential concessions made by the great majority to their assumptions giv force to the delusion. Among the humbugs of a humbugging age they "bear the gre abune them a'," backed by the shallow, popular acknowledgment that the school and the church are the only civilizing agencies of life, and that they—the bullies—are the only legitimate representativs of social and political advancement; the avant couriers of progress; the male caryatides, in fact, of our civil and religious structure. They deport themselvs as if they were indeed the appointed leaders of the world. A selfish, overweening vanity is their distinguishing characteristic, together with an unmanly dependence on the generosity of the more affluent members of their sects—a dependence in many cases carried beyond the verge of degradation.

The shameless exhibition of their ruffianism is strange enough, but what shall we say of the impunity with which it is met? We are still in the leading-strings of the monk. Except in squabbles of politics or trade, or questions fit only for a mob to be interested in, society is "stale, flat, and unprofitable," contentedly dragging the chain of a degrading masterdom. True, the pope's legate can no longer bring a king to his knees. But the masses giv but slow assurance of breaking away from traditionary servility. Powderly is the choice of the Knights of Labor, and popery would guide the councils of the leaders of that powerful guild.

There is no such bar to progress as the pulpit; all reforms spring up outside its pale and flourish in spite of it. It has been, and is now, the central barricade to all social and industrial revolutions. Of all species of conservatism it is the most defiant and aggravating; giving, as it does, a wisp of any faith for the substantial realities, and seeking to enforce the acceptance of its visionary substitutes with death and hell. I would back plain plenty, along with a fair share of instruction in the obligations we owe to one another, as authorized by the deductions of modern science, against all the superstitions which hav flourished since the pliocene period of the tertiary formation, in enforcing love to good and pity to man. Away with your paltry fables!

Love flourishes only along with truth. Absolute knowledge only is holy, for it comes from the very heart and brains of greatness. The idea of sacrifice for the sin of others is an infantil conception and is fast playing out. Let each of us contribute to push it beyond the outer wall by mockeries and jests, if nothing else.

A truce with white chokers and bands, genuflexions, altar tomfooleries, and holy water puerilities, fonts, fasts, and sacraments—garotes of truth, all of them. Fetters of the intellect hav they been; manacles, shackles, pinions, binding mind to silly observances, shutting out progress. Their weight still weighs heavy on the reaching soul. Thirteen years from now, the millennium will be upon us, say the ninnies of the ancient faith—to be opened by the tooting of a monster trumpet, when the heavens shall open and down will plump the whole court of heaven with magnificent surroundings; a spiritual pontificate to judge the world; sending "ane tae heeven and twae tae hell, a' for thy glory;" after which will commence the "loafing around the throne" by the "unco guid" that will know no ending. Yep!

Our bully of the intellect, the college president, has not a word to say about the grinding inequalities of classes which is the swaying problem of our age. No, no; nothing of the sort. That would be distracting the mind from the great question of salvation of souls. The mouths of such fellows are stopped by the text, "The poor ye hav always with you," a sentiment of the feudal priesthood that is still rolled as a sweet morsel under the tongue of pulpitarians, a sentiment, however, in our days softened down by the ever-flowing forces of progress.

Error has been so much mixed up with truth, and the centuries, as sifters, so open between the wires, that the screening process has been slow, so that the shortcomings of our college president cannot be said to be wholly without extenuation. I detest these and all such learned frauds as teachers, but accepting the sentiment that "the mission of culture is to enable us to endure each other," I cap to this quotation from John Stuart Mill. He says something to this effect: "The feeble-minded people in society, in whatever class found, are conservativ. Conservatism, however, is not always the result of adoption of views from convictions; the most intensely conservativ being the most forward in their exhibition of the sentiment in order to gain and afterward retain the position which to them involves the needed bread of life—a species of fraud or rapacity, the result of the uncertainty of our social conditions. Posing on a liberal salary with a prospect of promotion, they look over the vantage-ground of their position, and seeing dispossession in a change of front, they say, as did the reckless king, 'Here will I plant my standard.' And so, heedless of conscience, they hold their own against all comers."

If wisdom were necessarily a concomitant of the duty-loving soul, there would be fewer instances of yielding to the governing ruffians who rule and ruin society—the anarchic "soiled bench" and the lesser rabble of millionaires, the fellows who, as corporators in large industries, sway the interests of thousands without a thought of the severities their course compels. Poor society, succumbing to the merely legal, goes whirling along, grinding common souls between the nether and the upper millstones of artificial destiny, each hopeful, some of heavenly interposition, others looking to the mitigations arising from the slow processes of progress. Truly, the mills of the gods grind slowly. Let us be thankful they press the life out in their terrible work. The centuries hav mostly repeated the fable of Sisyphus. The organ of life, with old Time at the crank, has ground out the melancholy music of existence, whil the tired performer sweated at his stone-rolling work. Poor Sisyphus! Poor humanity! We are the merest fantocini of the fates; jerked by unseen strings, each struts and frets his hour upon the stage and then is heard no more. Society is a crawling mass of tugging interests. None are free from ills. The smaller sins are the parasites of the crimes; the peccadilloes are the vermin that liv upon the sins, so traced by the microscopic scrutiny of the "unco guid" through all the by-ways of moral conduct, just as on the epidermis of the larger animals the fleas and bugs are found that find food and nourishment there, the smaller following in geometrical ratio till genus and species become lost in the inertia of matter.

Le Roy, N. Y. 74.

Westward Ho!

To satisfy my Secular friends that I hav neither died, retreated, nor given up the colors, I will giv a brief sketch of my trip westward with incidental accompaniments.

On leaving the merry, fair, and Liberal society of the Congress at Pittsburgh, I little thought I was turning to a blank page in the world's album on going to Indianapolis, yet after a brief visit with a dear sister, and a glimpse at the worst phase of Indiana politics, I began to experience such a mixture of pleasure and disgust that I am yet unable to find a name for the sensation produced.

The people were mad, children were excited, and dogs seemed to be catching the craze and adding voices to the noisy bombast of the campaign. Had I belonged to either party, I should hav felt unsafe in the presence of the other. When they had asked my politics and I had given them a few American sentiments, they would look blank for a moment and change the subject.

A visit to the country with an honored friend, "Billy" Chamberlin, was a relief indeed from the muddy streets and the blustering noise of the city.

After purchasing some books I bid adieu to all and took the train to St. Louis. I had a stop over here of twelve hours, but, not knowing the address of any of our Secular friends here, contented myself by visiting the exposition, and taking in the sights of the city.

The display at the exposition was magnificent, and as it was president's day, a vote was cast, and Cleveland was elected by several thousand majority.

The Anheuser-Busch lager-beer works alone make a city.

The convents, cathedrals, and nunneries make a grand show, but to the Secularist present a sad sight.

The Old Ladies' Home is a lovely and a useful institution.

Jefferson Barracks, a few miles down the Mississippi, is a place better to look at than to experience. It has a beautiful situation, and in time of war would be a dangerous place to attack.

The night train of October 21st bears us on to St. Joseph, Mo., and Morrill, Kan. The word is given that a man is knocked off the track. The train halts, and the wakeful ones go with the trainmen back to the place of the accident. The man is picked up and shaken well to arouse speech. "Hurt much?" says the conductor. "No," yawns the man. "Bones broken?" "No," as he feels of himself to see if all are present. "Look where the blood has run on the ground," said I, as I thought I had discovered a frightful wound in his hip. "Not at all," said the brakeman, "that is his broken bottle and whisky spilt." Happy thought! I will now tally one for the God-and-morality party. "Been to a Democratic rally, hav you?" "Na-a-w," said the tipsy bum, "I'm a Republican." The laugh was on me, and I solemnly declare that henceforth I shall never try to tell a man's politics by the bottle he carries.

Landing at Morrill on the noon train, I stepped into a restaurant for a lunch. To my amazement there stood Jake Hoffman behind the counter, and by some mysterious method claimed he knew me on sight. Jake is the dispenser of eatables here. He also sells cider, soda-water, and another drink which, in Kansas, they giv the name of "hops." I didn't test it, so I hav no right to make any inference, but the bottles were of the same size and shape which we tap for lager beer out in New Mexico. If I had time and space I could tell some funny stories on Jake, but must hurry on.

After spending a few days with my brother Tom and our good Liberal brother Jonathan Scott, I began to turn my attention to Secular work.

The campaign being hot here, I concluded to do a little missionary work and prepare the way.

Sabetha, the first town I struck, proved to be wide awake and ready to welcome the joyful news. Many of her best citizens are in hearty sympathy with the Secular cause, yet they had heard very little of the Secular Union or its work.

Among the Liberals here are Dr. O. J. Lyon, a good physician and an old soldier, Dr. Geo. E. Irwin, an old-timer, and a good man to send for when you are about to die. N. S. Smith is a furniture dealer and police justice. Geo. Adams sells hardware. Ira Collins is a genial Grand Army man, and carries the scar in proof of his service and loyalty. He is a merchant and doing a driving business. L. L. Lyon, Bready, Mathews, and Sweetland are among the farmers and tradesmen of Sabetha and vicinity. I look for a successful visit among these true patriots, and shall organize a Secular society if such be desired. They seem to be taking few papers, and this accounts for their not being posted as to our aims and doings. This must be attended to, and I shall take pleasure in offering them the G. O. P. (grand old paper, you see).

In company with friend Scott I visited the two-year-old town of Horton, a city of several thousand inhabitants, with electric lights and a street railway. Here I heard A. J. Grover and Moses Hull expound the gospel of the Union Labor party. Grover is running for Congress, and if the party grows as fast in the last ten days of the campaign as it did in the ten days previous, we may hav a Freethinker in Congress before we had expected it.

Mr. Hull is a power, and makes many converts to the Labor party, which is quite strong in Kansas. Horton has Daniel Smith, Lucien Smyth (you will notice these Smyths are not brothers), A. O. Baldwin, and John Radford for her standard-bearers.

Horton is a promising town, and if the blasting influence of overgrowth does not kill it, we may organize a good society there.

Hiawatha, the county seat of Brown county, where I am presently located, has a population of 2,230 and a church for every 200 people. It is the most thoroughly orthodox of any city this side of Boonton, N. J. I stopped here, not for its congenial Liberal atmosphere, but for its railroad advantages.

I desire friends in southern Nebraska, western Missouri, or northern Kansas who want lectures or organizations effected to write me immediately, as I expect to start soon after the election on a tour through these localities. My terms are easy, which will be made known on application. As I hav not previously been before the Liberals in this line, I am willing to take chances where Secular papers are generally taken.

I shall adopt the policy of the converted Indian who went preaching, "no pay, not much preach," and I hav no objections to this rule being reversed. Giv me a trial, friends. You may be happily surprised at the success.

Thanking God that the Yellow Fever Epidemic Didn't Spread.

President Cleveland's Thanksgiving Proclamation.

Constant thanksgiving and gratitude are due from the American people to the almighty God for his goodness and mercy, which hav followed them since the day he made them a nation and vouchsafed to them a free government. With loving kindness he has constantly led us in the way of prosperity and and greatness. He has not visited with swift punishment our shortcomings, but with gracious care he has warned us of our dependence upon his forbearance, and has taught us that obedience to his holy law is the price of a continuance of his precious gifts.

In acknowledgment of all that God has done for us as a nation, and to the end that on an appointed day the united prayers and praise of a grateful country may reach the throne of grace, I, Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 29th day of November, inst., as a day of thanksgiving and prayer to be kept and observed throughout the land.

On that day let all our people suspend their ordinary work and occupations, and in their accustomed place of worship, with prayer and songs of praise, render thanks to God for all his mercies, for the abundant harvests which hav rewarded the toil of the husbandman during the year that has passed, and for the rich rewards that hav followed the labors of our people in their shops and their marts of trade and traffic. Let us giv thanks for peace and for social order and contentment within our borders, and for our advancement in all that adds to national greatness.

And mindful of the afflictiv dispensation with which a portion of our land has been visited, let us, while we humble ourselvs before the power of God, acknowledge his mercy in setting bounds to the deadly march of pestilence, and let our hearts be chastened by sympathy with our fellow-countrymen who hav suffered and who mourn.

And as we return thanks for all the blessings which we hav received from the hands of our heavenly father, let us not forget that he has enjoined upon us charity, and on this day of thanksgiving let us generously remember the poor and needy, so that our tribute of praise and gratitude may be acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Done at the city of Washington on the first day of November, eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, and in the year of independence of the United States the one hundred and thirteenth.

From Macaulay's History of England.

During the last three centuries, to stunt the growth of the human mind has been the chief object of the Roman Catholic church. Throughout Christendom, whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth, and in the arts of life, has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertil provinces of Europe hav, under her rule, been sunk in poverty, in political servitude, and in intellectual torpor, while Protestant countries, once proverbial for sterility and barbarism, hav been turned by skill and industry into gardens, and can boast of a long list of heroes and statesmen, philosophers and poets. Whoever, knowing what Italy and Scotland naturally are, and what, four hundred years ago, they actually were, shall now compare the country round Rome with the country round Edinburgh, will be able to form some judgment as to the tendency of papal domination.

An Editor in Search of a Vote.

Up in the 34th election district of the 20th assembly district of New York city—a neighborhood locally known as the New Jerusalem—livs an Editor of a Journal of Freethought and Reform. The Editor is a nativ of the United States, white, and of sufficient age to participate in the duties of a good citizen who looks personally after the character and principles of his Public Servants. During the current month it became necessary for "we the people" to appoint a new set of servants. The contract with the man who runs the White House, scares the Canadians, and sends British ministers about their business, for $50,000 per year and perquisits, expires next March, and Governor Hill, of this state, had signified his intention of leaving Albany unless asked to stop by a plurality of the people for whom he had been working for the past three years. Various other state and municipal servants had given notice, and the domestic economy of the country was likely to be disrupted unless the sovereign masters visited a few intelligence offices and engaged another set. Through the kindness of the Celtic gentlemen who act as butlers in the household of New York, various intelligence offices are provided where public servants can be engaged, and one of these happened to be on the same block, around the corner, as the residence of the Editor. With the intention of signifying, when the time came, his choice for his public servants, the Editor casually wandered into this office to hav his name recorded as an American sovereign, ready at all times to do his duty and purify politics by casting an intelligent and uncorrupted ballot.

The Editor encountered at the door a person of Celtic extraction in blue uniform, about half asleep, and sitting around a table four other persons, the majority of whom looked as if their naturalization hadn't "took." There was Mr. Doherty and Mr. Dollinger and Mr. Nuss and Mr. Brenauer, and over in a corner a tailor sat cross-legged sewing on a garment. He was showing his patriotism by letting the government use his shop as a polling-place at $7 per day. Inquiry in words of one syllable, as suited to the capacity of the questioned, elicited the fact that that was the place the Editor sought, and he made known his intention of registering.

"Take the book," said the only one of the board whose face showed evidences that he first saw the light of day on this side of the Atlantic.

The book looked greasy, and besides that the Editor recognized it as a volume on which he had spent some gallons of ink in criticism, and he said, No; he didn't go much on books of that sort, and against that one in particular he had special enmity. But if the speaker would kindly repeat what the legislature had designated as an Affirmation, he, the Editor, would undoubtedly subscribe to its sentiments.

The gentleman looked blank. He had forgotten the lines. He turned twice around in his chair, looked at each fellow-inspector and the policeman in turn, and then his face became illuminated. The first thing to do had come to him. "Hold up your hand," he said to the Editor. Now, holding up your hand is not a hard task, and as the Editor's hand was clean, save a few ink-stains on the northwest finger, he had no objections on that score to hav the outer extremity of his starboard arm examined. But in the Affirmation in such cases made and provided to be used by the legislature, there is no hint that an American sovereign shall hold up his hand like a school-boy who wants to go out. He therefore declined, alleging that it was unnecessary, that it was childish, and moreover partook of the nature of a superstitious act. He alleged further that he had affirmed many an Affirm as juror, witness, and voter, and had ceased for many years to elevate that member of his physical system in so doing. "Well, take off your hat, then." This command was almost shouted. But the Editor moved not. When he entered the place, he had looked around for the presence of ladies, or to see if he were in the presence of any number of gentlemen, but finding neither and only a tailor shop occupied by some males, he had kept his hat on. It was a new one, he was proud of it, and if he took it off it might get covered with tobacco juice, or get lost. By putting paper under the inside band, almost any of the persons present could hav worn it. Besides, the statute, sections 845 to 849, said nothing about hats, and the Editor is a strictly law-abiding citizen. He therefore announced his determination to retain his hat upon his head.

By this time the matter of signifying an intention to help choose some public servants was getting interesting. The policeman woke up. So did the other members of the intelligence-office board. One of them, an aged owl, thought he had discovered the mare's nest. "Don't you believe in a God?" he hooted across the table at the Director of Intellect of the Freethought journal. "It is none of your business what I believe," said that person. "I did not come here to be catechized as to my religious belief. Be good enough to administer the Affirmation without any frills or scalloped edges, as the law directs, and then ask your questions as to qualifications as an elector." The Owl glared, and his nose worked up and down. "Don't you believe in a God?" he hooted again. The Editor repeated his former answer, adding that if they did not like to take his statement they could look up the statute for themselvs. "Then you can't register," said the Owl. "We won't take you. No man who don't believe in a God can't vote in this country." The Editor gathered from this that the Owl was getting ungrammatically excited, and turned to another bifurcated specimen having some resemblance to a man. "Won't you please look up the law, and, after satisfying yourself that I am right, take my registration?" No; he wouldn't! "You can't vote!" he repeated. "I wish you all good-night," said the Editor. "I will see you later."

The next morning the Editor turned his steps toward police headquarters, where the Bureau of Elections is domiciled, which aforesaid bureau is supposed to hav control of the district boards of election. Over this bureau presides a gentleman who owes his remunerativ situation to the esteem in which he is held by the magnates of Tammany Hall. To him the Editor stated his case. "Can't do anything. They wouldn't take orders from me. You must go to court." So spake the Tammany favorit. "Which court?" asked the Editor. "The supreme court," growled the pet of the Sachems. This court is located in the court house built by Tweed, and in the building of which three dollars were stolen for every one spent in labor and materials. Judge Barrett was on the bench, busy. The Editor approached the clerk of the court. "I want to see the judge about a registration matter," he said to that functionary. "You must get a lawyer and hav your papers drawn up. What organization do you belong to?" The Editor had never drank beer at the expense of any candidate, and replied, None. "Well, who are you going to vote for most?" As that was a private matter with the Editor, he demurred to the question and asked why the information was sought. "Because the organizations hav got lawyers hired for these cases, and it won't cost you anything if you go to them," answered this practical politician. Two years ago the Editor had refused to vote for the present mayor because that gentleman had refused to let the committee of reception to D. M. Bennett hav Cooper Union when the Founder of this journal came back from Albany, but Mr. Hewitt has stood out so strongly for Sunday opening of the museums and other sensible reforms, that the Editor had concluded to reward his virtue by voting for him this time. So he said to the court clerk's explanation that he would try the County Democracy, whose nominee for mayor Mr. Hewitt was.

The County's place was in Center street, and down there the Editor traveled through the mud, only to find it a naturalization bureau, where full-fledged American citizens were speedily made out of the raw material of pauper Europe, at no cost to the material except a vote for the County's ticket. That was not exactly the place the Editor wanted, but he thought he might find out something and he dropped in. "What's the matter with your papers?" was the answer he obtained on asking for the address of the County's lawyer. The situation was explained. "Oh, you better go up to the district attorney's office. Ask for Mr. Goff, and he'll get out a mandamus." Loaded with this point the Editor started for the office of Mr. Fellows, who "leads a simple Christian life," as the mayor once certified, and knows as much about politics as any man in New York. Mr. Goff was in, but busy; would the Editor come again. The Editor would and did. He was after a mandamus, and that mandamus would be forthcoming, or the other sort would be invoked. When Mr. Goff got back the Editor was there. "I can't do anything in the case in my official capacity," said Mr. Goff when the matter was explained to him; "there would be the devil to pay if I did." "But the fellows down here in Center street said you could," asserted the Editor. "Oh, yes; I hav given some advice in some cases where registration was refused and dictated the form of application for a mandamus, but voting is a private right, and must be defended as such by the individual. However, I'll lay your case before the Executiv Committee of the County Democracy to-night; we are going to hire lawyers to attend to these matters, and perhaps they'll attend to yours. If you don't hear from them on Monday, you will do well to take your own steps."

The Editor was getting angry. It occurred to him that when a set of public officials had wronged a private citizen, it was the duty of the district attorney to right that wrong. But Mr. Goff went into a private room, and the Editor had not got his mandamus. Reluctantly he turned his steps homeward, trusting that the self-interest of a political organization would obtain for him the justice which a public prosecutor, paid to care for the public interest, could or would not.

Monday morning arrived as it usually does after Sunday night has gone, but no word from the lawyers arrived with it. Saturday had been the last day of registration, and the papers said that whoever had failed to hav his name on the lists on that day could not exercise the rights of an American sovereign. But Mr. Goff had assured the Editor that the persons comprising the board of the 34th election district of the 20th assembly could be gathered up any day before election; and the Editor derived a somewhat angry consolation from this. He was now on the warpath. He had been injured in his most tenderest feelings, and reparation or blood must ensue. Down in the mayor's office in the city hall, right in the very bowels of justice, Counselor Sherman makes pothooks at the dictation of His Honor and keeps the list of funds for the yellow fever sufferers of Jacksonville. Mr. Sherman is also famous as the bosom friend of the Man With the Badge Pin. He was found opening the mayor's mail, and piling greenbacks up on his desk in neat little heaps. The Counselor is an Episcopalian principally because very few other folks are; and he banks heavily on law. Therefore he "feared that after the close of the registration days, such a case is a wrong without a remedy." The presence of a lady typewriter prevented the full expression of the Editor's idea on the subject, and he withdrew to the corridor to think it over. He summed the matter up as follows: 1. The board of registration had illegally refused to allow him the opportunity to vote for Mr. Hewitt, and thereby rebuke Mr. Corrigan, the Roman Catholic gentleman who runs Tammany Hall from the distance between Fourteenth street and the cathedral. 2. The superiors of the board of registration would do nothing. 3. The supreme court must hav the matter presented by a lawyer before it would listen. 4. The district attorney would not be that lawyer. 5. It was the opinion of a bright legal light that the wrong was without a remedy. 6, and last. It was the opinion of the Editor himself, standing in the cool corridor of the City Hall, that he would hav that mandamus and compel the board to reconvene and take his plain and unornamented affirmation, or he would drive the goddess of justice from her lofty pinnacle on the building. He would get a lawyer, and go at it systematically.

Yes, Counselor Sherman knew a lawyer, a good one, Mr. L. S. Phillips, 35 Broadway, fourth floor, room 77. Mr. Phillips was at home—what was the Editor's casus belli? The grievance was set forth. Mr. Phillips called his stenographer, repeated the Editor's story in legal phraseology, and when it came out of the typewriter it was a formidable document with many whereases and deposes, and much repetition, and closed with a neat peroration invoking the judge to order the "said Charles C. Nuss, Albert Brenauer, George T. Dollinger, and John A. Doherty, to show cause why a peremptory mandamus should not issue requiring them forthwith to duly organize as a Board for the registration of voters in said election district and to receive the application of deponent and requiring them to affirm him according to law."

Mr. Phillips is a young man who gets up before noon usually, and early Wednesday morning Judge Barrett, of the Supreme Court, had the paper under consideration, which he promptly signed, ordering the aforesaid Nuss and Doherty and Dollinger and Brenauer to put on their good clothes and appear before him Thursday morning at 11 of the clock, and show a reason, if they had one, why the Editor should not be allowed to hav his say in selecting public servants on November 6th, instant. Copies of the document were impartially distributed to the defendants by a capable young man from the office of the Journal of Freethought and Reform, and were quietly received by all except Mr. Nuss, who incidentally remarked that he would knock the deponent Editor higher than a kite.

This was progress of a substantial sort, and the seat of the goddess of justice in the City Hall was getting more secure. The "wrong without a remedy" was becoming less remediless, and the truth of the septuagenarian saw that every Jack has his Gill was becoming patent. Thursday morning found the case on the calendar, "The People of the State of New York, ex rel. Eugene M. Macdonald, vs. Charles Nuss, et al. Writ for Peremptory Mandamus." The defendants had got their boots blacked, hired a lawyer, and when the judge called the case answered in loud tones that the Opposition was ready. Mr. Phillips modestly, but with great clearness, stated his case. "Anything to say on the other side?" asked Judge Barrett. The Opposition passed up an affidavit. The judge read it. "This won't do at all," he said; "it's no answer to the relator." The defendants had sworn that the Editor refused to affirm in the regular way, by holding up his right hand. "Holding up the hand," said the judge, elevating the digital extremity of his right arm, "is part of an oath. The relator has the right to affirm without doing that." The defendants looked crestfallen, but they had another affidavit, to the effect that the relator had refused to take his hand out of his overcoat pocket at the command of the board. "This is no better," said Judge Barrett; "it's no answer; it's ridiculous. There is no law compelling a man to take his hands out of his pockets if he don't want to. He is entitled to affirm in the simplest way, and by so doing is amenable to the pains and penalties of perjury. This board will hav to convene and register this man according to law, and as required in a court of justice. You can't ask him whether he believes in God. There is no such test in this country." To borrow an expression from the orient, the judge had jumped on the board with both feet. Instead of doing their duty, they had committed a crime, and obtained a judicial lecture in place of Christian praise. The crowd in the court-room laughed softly when he decided that a man could affirm and at the same time keep his hands in his pockets, and appeared pleased at the decision. The Editor chuckled and looked toward the person who was to knock him higher than a kite. That individual shrunk gradually together, and looked the other way. He had learned something about legal affirmation and the rights of an American citizen in New York, and the knowledge appeared to chafe his Christian spirit. The judge signed the mandamus writ, a clerk in another room put on the seal of the court, Mr. Phillips paid the fee, and the aforesaid Nuss, et al, accepted service of the writ, and agreed to be on hand and register the Editor at 9 A.M. the next morning, and the goddess of liberty on the City Hall was safe. She is there yet, and the American eagle screams as usual over the city, when the stars and stripes float outward on the breeze of freedom. Friday at 9 A.M., the defendant board of election inspectors assembled just as the deponent Editor had assured them they would do, and allowed him to affirm in a chaste and artless manner, with no frills nor ruffled edging to hurt his feelings. On last Tuesday he voted for Abram S Hewitt, with a hope that that gentleman would be reëlected and keep the directors of the Metropolitan Museum of Art from getting that extra $15,000 or compel them to open the doors of their building on Sunday.

MORAL.—There is a practical moral to all this, as well as a principle involved, else had not the Editor given so much time and space to the matter. The moral is this: If Freethinkers will learn their civil rights, and, knowing them, dare maintain them, the Christians who may be clothed with a little brief authority will find out after a while that this is a secular government. In all states, perhaps, the case could not hav been won with such comparativ ease, but in no state would it hav been won unless the outraged citizen pushed the matter, and spent a little time and money to maintain his rights. If that person in Albany who was refused his naturalization papers because he would not "swear" had bestirred himself, he would now be a citizen of the United States instead of a man without a country. The thing for Freethinkers of this land to do is to wake up. Petty denials of rights to Infidels are getting altogether too common.

Judge Barrett's Afterthought.

In the decision in the case of "The People of the State of New York ex rel Eugene Macdonald vs. Charles Nuss, et al," Judge Barrett filed the following as the official decision:

"SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS.

"BARRETT. J.

"The People ex rel Macdonald v. Nuss et al, inspectors of election, etc.—The inspectors had no right to require the relator to affirm with the uplifted hand, nor was it within their province to exact a religious test. Indeed, their interrogation upon the subject of the relator's belief in the existence of a deity was an impertinence to which no citizen (in the absence of any suspicion of his truthfulness) should be subjected. The mandamus must be granted."

Does the honorable judge mean to say that in case a man's veracity was doubted it would be allowable to question him in his religious belief? We hold it to be an impertinence to inquire, under any circumstances in legal proceedings, into a man's religious opinions. Would Judge Barrett, for instance, allow an attorney to question a witness as to what his belief is, in the face of this constitutional provision: "No person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief?" We do not believe he would.

A man's veracity or unveracity should be settled by his record, and by facts, not by his belief on speculativ subjects.

A Tall Story.

At a Methodist church in this city a few days ago, James Morrill, agent of the Philadelphia Bible Society, gave the audience what he said was a report of the missionary work being done among the Jews in this country. This is one of his statements:

"Here in America, where Jew and gentile liv on equal footing, the feeling between them is becoming rapidiy of a more kindred nature. Every effort should be made by the Christian church to bring these worthy people into its fold. In spite of the public press, which insists that the mission work in this direction is yielding naught, yet in one year we made fifty thousand converts, and three thousand of them became Christian ministers."

There is indeed a kindred feeling growing between the Jew and the gentile in this country, but it is not growing because the Jew is becoming a Christian, but because he is becoming a Rationalistic American citizen. The statement that fifty thousand Jews were ever converted to Christianity in one year in the United States is a barefaced, brazen falsehood, and Mr. Morrill knows it as well as anybody.

The fact is, the Jews are not being converted at all. The Jews of Russia certainly are not going over to the Greek church, whose adherents rob and murder them, and pillage their property unceasingly; the Jews of Austria are not kneeling at the foot of a cross whose bearers persecute them and accuse them of offering human sacrifices; and the Jews of Germany are not going over to a Protestantism whose chief preacher is a fanatical "Jew-baiter." Even the London society for the conversion of the Jews has to admit that it pays its thousands of pounds annually for almost nothing, but few descendants of Abraham yielding either to bribery or persuasion. But in this country, about which the statement is made, there are absolutely and positivly no conversions made worth mentioning. New York, of course, has the largest Jewish population of any city in the United States, and the Christian churches maintain a society for the conversion of the Jews, but the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know well enough what the society has not accomplished. Similar societies in other cities are even less efficient.

Mr. Morrill tells his stories for effect, to get more money, and to maintain himself in a nice fat position. We doubt if he can produce ten Jews, who are honest converts, for all his years of labor and thousands of dollars expended.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S Thanksgiving proclamation is too pious for anything. It has, says the Herald, the flavor of the proclamations which were read in the New England churches a hundred years ago. The Herald's astonishment is natural, but Mr. Cleveland in drafting the document has gone on well-known lines. "Hav you joined the Prohibition party?" asked a man of one of his acquaintances. "No," he replied, "I never was a drunkard." There is no one so bitter against liquor as the reformed inebriate, no one so pious as the "converted Atheist," and none so virtuous as the reclaimed rake. It is on these lines that we account for the puritanical flavor of President Cleveland's proclamation.

THE Rev. Mr. Lambert, Catholic priest at Waterloo, N. Y., has been hauled before an ecclesiastical court at Syracuse, presided over by Bishop Ludden of the see of Syracuse. The prosecutor is another priest, Mr. O'Hara, and the charge is preaching heretical doctrins. Mr. Lambert has not given very good satisfaction in Waterloo, and differences between himself and his bishop hav occasionally sprung up. We learn from the Catholic Union and Times, whose editor, Mr. Cronin, is a warm personal friend to Mr. Lambert, that the latter will take his case to Rome and let the old man of the Vatican settle it. Mr. Lambert's only claim to notoriety, aside from his priestly troubles, is having written very strong denunciations of Infidelity, and then having refused to meet its champions in debate.

WHEN Cynthia Leonard, woman's rights candidate for mayor of this city, read in the papers Friday morning that Judge Barrett had granted a mandamus to an Editor who wouldn't reveal his religious predilections at the command of a board of election inspectors, she perceived a point whereon she trusted to impale the election board which had registered her, but which had subsequently assured her that they would not allow her to vote. She had them haled before Judge Lawrence of the same court, to show cause why she would not be permitted to vote. In her case, however, the reason was apparent—she wears a gown instead of trousers with pockets wherein to conceal the hands, and it is trousers and coats that vote in this country, not gowns. Judge Lawrence told Mrs. Leonard's lawyer that he was fighting windmills, and said that no court could go back on the precedents established; therefore the mandamus was denied. Mrs. Leonard should be a man.

THE Southern Presbyterian church is in a peck of trouble over the Woodrow-evolution controversy. The points are briefly: The Rev. Mr. Woodrow held and taught that the evolution of man through lower forms of life was not inconsistent with Christianity. He was clearly in the wrong, and the presbytery removed him. He appealed to the synod—the synod sustained the presbytery. He went to the general assembly—the assembly sustained the synod. This stopped the public teaching of Professor Woodrow, but did not end the trouble. People talked about it, and preachers talked and wrote about it, some on one side and some on the other. The presbytery of Charleston, in alarm at the spread of heretical doctrin, tried to stop the talk by issuing an edict that no one should write upon or criticise the action of the church authorities in suppressing Dr. Woodrow. Then the synod took the matter up and condemned the action of the presbytery as not only unlawful but an abridgment of the right of free speech. The presbytery was directed to reconvene and correct its irregular proceedings. The presbytery has not and probably will not obey, and the discussion goes gloriously on just as though the say-so of the Presbyterians would make evolution either true or false.

Letters from Friends.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Oct. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I make bold to say that, in my opinion, the cartoons of Mr. Heston in THE TRUTH SEEKER are very interesting. They, for themselvs, are worth the subscription price of your excellent paper. H. M. COTTINGER.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Oct. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Reading to-day in THE TRUTH SEEKER, September 22d, of Mr. Cook sending his mite to Mr. Hacker, makes me feel that if I am a Liberal I must go and do likewise. I therefore send him $1. Now, I hope all Liberals will take a hint and take care of that old couple the rest of their lives. No wonder Christians ask, What hav Infidels ever done? There are a hundred Liberals, yes, a thousand, that can send a hundred dollars as well as I can send $1.

LUCINDA DAVIS.

MONTROSE, MO., Oct. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a postal note for $1 to apply on my account. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can find plenty of persons that would like to take the paper, but times are so hard that I failed to get any subscribers. I was expelled by the Masonic lodge last December because I failed to believe in the God of the Bible. Inclosed I send you the decision of the Grand Lodge. It is a clipping of the St. Louis Republic. The vote in the lodge stood 16 for expulsion to 6 against, so you see they were not all bigots.

J. G. LOBAUGH.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished the perusal of "Our Uncle and Aunt," a delightful work on women's rights, by Mrs. Amarala Martin, of Cairo, Ill. A more delicious combination of wit, patriotism, and womanly sympathy it has never been my fortune to meet with. I entreat readers to send for it, for a brighter or more useful gem never graced a table. It is a compound of deep philosophy and ardent benevolence, an entering wedge capable of revolutionizing the affairs of women. If they seek political equality, now is the accepted time and now is the day of salvation.

Yours respectfully, ALHAZA.

STOCKTON, UTAH, Oct. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just had three lectures—one at Grantsville and two at Stockton—from the inimitable C. B. Reynolds. We had large and attentiv audiences in both places, and the lectures were well received. There is considerable discussion going on in regard to them, and of course all are not pleased, yet many who differ from us pronounce the lectures good. We hav set the people to thinking and hope to do some good. Some literature was sold, so the thinking will not end with the lecture. Mr. Reynolds, for one who has seen so little of the Mormons, is remarkably well posted on the Mormon question, and a lecture from him on this "peculiar" people would no doubt be very amusing and instructiv, and would be as successful as any lecture he givs. The munitions of war for Grantsville were furnished by that old Liberal warhorse Amos Fenstimacher, who presided at all the lectures. He took Mr. Reynolds, as it were, under his protecting wing, and kept him there from the time he left the train until he saw him safely back again, and then sent him to the "Mecca" of the saints with a hearty goodspeed. Yes, Fenstimacher stuck to Mr. Reynolds like a brother, but perhaps it was to save him from becoming a "brother" and a much married "saint." But what am I writing about? "There are no more plural marriages in Utah;" of course not; "we obey the laws" if we are a "peculiar" people. At Stockton, Brother Henry Booth secured the school-house. He and his son William, nobly assisted by John H. Davis, Charles Smith, and others, made the "tenderfoot" feel he had fallen amongst friends. We are rather poor in this part of the vinyard, but we shall make an effort to hear Underwood and Watts when they come out this way. W. O. WILLIAMS.

CHICAGO, Oct. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The religious sect known as Adventists are, almost every one of them, well posted in the "scriptures." As a matter of fact, they are the most true to the scriptures of any sects we know of. They do not, however, look for the restoration of the Jews, or "Israel," to Palestine, as seems to be plainly taught in many of the books of the Bible.

But I should like to hav any man or woman, Adventist or otherwise, attempt to reconcile Peter's application of Joel, second chapter, from the eighteenth verse to the eighth verse of the third chapter. At the eighteenth verse of the second chapter it says, "Then will the Lord be jealous for his land and pity his people." Then it goes on to tell what the Lord will do for "Israel," and makes it very clear that the Jews as a nation are meant, thus making it impossible for anyone to "spiritualize" it. At the twenty-eighth verse it says: "And it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh," etc., which Peter says was being fulfilled on the day spoken of by Christians as "Pentecost." It will be observed that it was to be after Israel had been restored to their own land. But to make it certain that none other than literal Israel was meant, the first verse of the third chapter says: "For behold in those days, and at that time when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will gather all nations and bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for my people and for my heritage Israel, whom they hav scattered among the nations and parted my land." (Read the whole chapter.)

But what shall we say of the boasted inspiration of Peter on this occasion? He must hav been "filled with new wine," as they said—to use a more modern phrase, he was "full."

Joel had distinctly said that it should be "afterward," that is, after the Lord had done to Israel, his people, the great things promised. And then think of the opacity of the brain of the preachers for the past few generations, not to hav seen that Peter made a most awful blunder. If any clergyman thinks he can harmonize Peter's application with Joel's prediction I shall be most happy to read his attempt.

If such an attempt is made in THE TRUTH SEEKER the thunder will then commence in earnest. This is only a little distant premonition of a storm. JOHN HUDSON.

GLENORA, N. Y., Oct. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On the 16th inst. Nathaniel Townsend, of this place, after months of painful illness, passed quietly away, leaving upon his countenance an expression almost of pleasure. It was not permitted that meddlesome priest or pious fanatic should disturb his last hours. His outspoken tendency toward Freethought had made sectarian neighbors anxious to ascertain whether he might not "show some sign" of abandoning his opinions at the last moment. But they were not able even to surmise this. He suffered much, but only expressed a desire to go and be at rest. His end was calm and serene and painless. He was sixty-five years of age. He leaves a widow and two daughters.

What religion he had was of the natural order. He had no faith in any supernatural religion. It was never objected to him that he was not upright and neighborly; he had the respect and confidence of the community in which he lived; it was only that he did not reverence the books and teachings of the theologians. He never hesitated to express his disbelief in church doctrins and assumptions. If candor and independence of mind are religious qualities, he possessed them.

The funeral called out a large concourse of relativs, friends, and neighbors. A Universalist attended, reading from the Bible, praying, and speaking. His object appeared to be to prove from the Bible that "all would be saved," rather than to notice the attitude of the deceased to religion. His doctrin, little known or favored among religionists here, he sought to defend in a way to show that he worshiped the Bible and supernaturalism as much as they. Although discarding the doctrin of vicarious sacrifice, he based his whole faith, seemingly, on the advent, life, and death of Jesus; it not occurring to him that such hypothesis was equally illogical and irrational.

But inappropriate as was the treatment to the occasion, it doubtless did something to divert the attention of such as see in the death of an Infidel only an opportunity to invent imaginary tales of deathbed horrors, and, it may be, to beget a doubt in their minds as to whether even their Bible sanctions the creeds of partiality, infernal cruelty, and revenge which they profess. J. K. INGALLS.

FARMDALE, Oct. 15, 288.

MR. EDITOR: As I never see a letter from this place, I hav decided to write a few words in praise of Mrs. Mattie Freeman. She gave two lectures here on her return from the Pittsburgh Congress, and I feel that the Secular Union here ought to acknowledge through your excellent paper her fine talent for speaking, that other Unions may enjoy the privilege of listening to so fine a speaker. Mrs. Freeman should be kept very busy in the lecture field, and if all knew her worth she would find no rest. Though Christians may not agree with her, they must enjoy her graceful gestures and fine speaking ability. Some of my Christian neighbors listened to her first lecture on "His Satanic Majesty" and went home declaring she was a falsifier of history, etc., feeling, perhaps, that they would never go to hear another Freethought lecture. And here, I think, is where we fail to do the amount of work we desire. The Christians will not knowingly go to listen to a lecture where their most sacred book, the Bible, is so rudely handled, and Christian people spoken of as dishonest and ignorant. Now, all Liberals know of some honorable, upright, and intelligent Christians. "Not so on account of religion, but in spite of it." And since the devil is not a pleasant subject to speak on, nor either is the Bible, I think the time is at hand for our lecturers to lay aside the destructiv part of Liberalism and take up the constructiv, thus showing just what Liberalism is and is teaching. We hav been battling that science may prevail and be as universal as religion is now—or, in other words, that truth may take the place of church creeds and superstition. A lecture upon any one of the sciences, intelligently delivered, would prove so interesting that Christian and Liberal alike would be most delighted, and eager to hear more and read more of all natural phenomena, and thus the Christian be lured away from the supernatural and superstitious to the world of science, humanity, and liberty.

I wish to say here that Mrs. Freeman's lecture, "Cross and Crown," is grand, and all that heard it spoke in highest praise and hoped to hear her again. And I hope our Liberals everywhere will prove their loyalty to women by keeping our lady lecturers very busy. Miss De Cleyre gave two lectures here some months ago, and our Secular Union listened to her with delight and should hav acknowledged the same long ago. She shows rare ability for one so young in years; she seems to hav stored away sufficient knowledge to crown the head of fifty years, and to interview her for an hour is a pleasure not soon to be forgotten.

Now a word for our splendid poet and lecturer, Samuel Putnam. He lectured here one year ago this month and found a warm place in all our hearts. How proud we should be with such talent as his! I for one wish to thank him for his unselfish devotion to our cause. I had my plans all laid to enjoy the great pleasure of attending the Congress and listening to our many speakers, and looking upon all and perhaps taking each by the hand and wishing Godspeed, which to me means goodspeed, to each and every one in this noble work for humanity, but circumstances made the realization of my fond hopes impossible, and I yielded to my fate with the best grace I could, still hoping that I might yet see you all. With most affectionate regards to THE TRUTH SEEKER family, I am, Yours for truth and humanity,

MRS. NORA E. FERRELL.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is my sad duty to chronicle the death of our old friend, Chris Brown. Mr. Brown died at Eureka Springs, Ark., September 22d, aged seventy-one years and six months. He had gone to the springs in hopes of regaining his health. To within a few days of his death he seemed to be getting better. His disease was muscular rheumatism. He had been unable to walk or work for several years. He was brought home for burial. His funeral was Secular in every sense of the word. Col. W. F. Potter delivered the funeral oration. Appended you will find a few lines taken from the Independent. C. K. LEVERING,

President Burlington Secular Union.

IN MEMORIAM.

On Friday, Sept. 28, 1888, was committed to the earth the worn-out body of our old friend Chris Brown. Living more than the allotted time, threescore years and ten, he passed to the unknown crowned with the halo of honor coming from a long and well-spent life. In the common meaning of the term Chris Brown was not a Christian, but in the real, true sense of the word Christian, friend Brown was certainly one of the truest and best. Giving, so long as strength lasted, the better part of his time to the labor of a mechanic, he found leisure to read much, was a close observer and deep thinker. Guarded by his best thought and reason in word and deed, he was always fully up to the right according to the light that was in him, proving himself, by the deep filial affection shown by the large family he has left, and by his many acquaintances and friends, to hav been a devoted husband, loving father, true friend, and kind neighbor. These are the attributes that truly belong to friend Brown. And what titles can there be more honorable, more to be desired, or what more entitles a human being to the name of Christian? Possessed of a strong individuality as a speaker and writer, Chris Brown clothed his thoughts with forcible yet simple language, so clearly expressed his ideas that they thoroughly impressed both hearer and reader with a higher plane of thought, inciting all to better lives for having read or listened. Ignoring all pretenses, he was a plain, true man. So passed the life of friend Chris Brown. In word, thought, and deed, striving always for what he deemed to be the right, and to do good to all within his influence. Though the places that once knew him will know him no more, he will not be forgotten; living always in our memory as an incentiv to better things; to be as he was, true man, strong always for the right, and to carry out in our lives the dominant idea of friend Brown, help for the living, hope for the dead, and for the unknown to which he has departed of a surety there is no oblivion.

We can trust the mighty shepherd,
Who loseth none he led:
That somewhere yet a place awaits us,
To greet the faces of our dead.

BUXTON, ORE., Sept. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am reading your real "TRUTH SEEKER," which is kept by my neighbor often, and as I hav seen you hav started to reform the American language in freeing it of some unnecessary letters, I will send you a copy of a bill brought before the legislature of Washington territory by Mr. Keane last spring, and printed in a number of newspapers. The bill of Mr. Keane would go a good way in relieving children of unnecessary spelling so they could use their brains for more useful learning, and would save a good deal of time to printers, correspondents, and the public in general. A similar reform was put in law in Germany about ten years ago, and Bismarck, the great statesman, was amongst its strongest supporters. Hoping more newspapers and magazines will follow THE TRUTH SEEKER's example, I remain, Yours truly, MAX BURGHOLZER.

PHONETIC SPELLING.

The following is the substance of Mr. Keane's bill providing for the use of phonetic orthography in all public schools supported wholly or in part by money from the county or territorial treasury:

1. Drop silent e when phonetically useless, as in live, vineyard, believe, bronze, single, engine, granite, rained, etc.
2. Drop a from ea having the sound of e, as in feather.
3. Drop e from ea having the sound of a, as in heart, etc.
4. Drop o from eo having the sound of e, as in leopard, etc.
5. For o, having the sound of u in but, write u in above (abuv), tongue (tung), etc.
6. Drop o from ou having the sound of u, as in journal, nourish, rough (ruf), etc.
7. Drop silent u after g before a in nativ English words, as guarantee, guard, guess, etc.
8. Drop final ue in analogue, catalogue, harangue, etc.
9. Double consonants may be simplified. Final b, d, g, n, r, t, f, l, z, as in ebb, add, egg, inn, purr, butt, bailiff, buzz, etc.; medial, before another consonant, as in battle, written (writn), etc.; initial unaccented prefixes and other unaccented syllables, as in abbreviate, accused, affair, traveller, etc.
10. Change d and ed to t, when so pronounced, as in crossed (crost), etc., unless the d affects the preceding sound, as in chafed, chanced, etc.
11. Change gh to f when it has that sound, as in cough, laughter, etc.
12. Change s to z in distinctiv words, as in abuse, house, etc.
13. Drop t, as in catch, pitch, etc.
14. Write f for ph, as in philosophy, sphere, etc.

Use the amended spelling in the following words:

Ache (ake), anchor (anker), beauty (beuty), could (coud), whole (hole), parliament (parlament), receipt (receit), rhyme (rime), scent (sent), scythe (sithe), women (wimen), yeoman (yoman).

Drop silent b in bomb, crumb, doubt, plumb, succumb, etc.
Change c to s in cinder, fierce, once, scarce, whence, etc.
Drop the h of ch in chamomile, choler, school, stomach, etc.
Drop the g in feign, sovereign, etc.
Drop h in aghast, etc

Drop gh in haughty, though (tho), through (thru), etc.
Drop s in aisle, island, demesne, etc.
The foregoing rules shall not apply to proper names. Any school official who refuses or neglects to instruct according to this method shall be removed. The amended orthography shall apply to all printing, and it shall be the duty of the proper officials to see that the new system has been reasonably complied with before authorizing payment for such printing.

KIMMSWICK, Mo., Oct. 26, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Our Christian friend Charles D. McCoy, of Kalamazoo, Mich., in the October 26th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, thinks that he has got us fellows by the wool, because he fancies the Bible answers his long list of questions better than science can. First let us see what constitutes superiority in an answer to a question. Is it agreeableness, marvelousness, mysteriousness, indefinitness, or is it plainness, truthfulness, and reasonableness? Is any answer better than the naked truth? The question in regard to the Bible's answers is: Are they true? In many cases we know they are not, in some cases it is doubtful, and in some they are passably correct, but they reveal nothing but what men who hav never heard of the Bible hav known for thousands of years.

First you ask, Who created man? Here you assume two things neither of which you or the Bible can prove. One is, that man was ever created; and the other is that he had a personal creator. It is just as important to know who created small-pox or yellow fever, and as reasonable to suppose they had personal creators as to suppose man had. Then, the question is indefinit. What man? Which man? Primitiv man, or yourself and myself? I am an animal generated by another animal, and he by another, and so on back, and I hav no reason to suppose there was ever a beginning or a first cause. That present man is a growth from lower forms, no well-informed scientist can doubt. The principles of life are easily discernible in the deadest mineral. Atoms themselvs hav a certain kind of life. Man is but an aggregation of them brought to his present condition by the survival of the strongest and the heredity and variation laws.

"Who was man like?" When? In the beginning? If man is now in the image of God, so are the monkey and gorilla. Which man? The Hottentot, the Carib Indian, or the Chinaman? If man was made like God, who was God made in imitation of? What does God look like? Are you sure that he looks as man does now? There is no sense or use in the question, anyway.

What rank did he hold? I reply that angels hav never been proved to exist, and that man now holds the first rank within twenty-five million miles of here, and he is the sole creator and preserver of all the God there is. "For what purpose was man created?" Isa. xliii, 7, must be a lie, for the reason that if there is a real God who is infinit, his glory is also perfect and infinit, and it is utterly impossible to add to or increase or perfect what is already infinit and perfect. My reply to the question, Why does man exist? would be, Because he cannot help it? And he continues for the pleasure and benefit of himself and his kind.

"Has this purpose been carried out?" you ask, and quote Rom. iii, 23, which givs your God dead away. He knows the end before the beginning. He made men for his own glory, and they all sinned and came short of it.

He is either too weak to bring out his designs or too ignorant to foresee results.

"What is the result of sin?" Not necessarily death, as your text, Rom. vi, 23, says, but pain or unhappiness. We would all die, even if we never sinned, for the reason that as we had beginnings we must hav ends. "All forms are perishable," and whatever grows dies. "Is God willing that any should perish?" I reply that if a God exists he cannot help himself. Second, he is willing if he can help himself and has not done so. Third, he is willing, because he has, according to the Bible, made the way to hell or death so broad that none could miss it, and the way to bliss so narrow that few can find it, and man so constituted that few wish to find it.

"God loves the world" just this much, "that he determined to damn the most of us." And if he hadn't "taken pleasure in the death of the wicked," instead of deluging the earth with a flood he would hav performed a less miracle and turned all the wicked people into righteous ones.

I've "sought the Lord" near and far, but would like to know really just where he can be found. A God who is confined in one place, who has to be sought after, and who has to be called on when he is near, is no God that we fellows feel like worshiping.

"How may the wicked find favor with God?" Chiefly by becoming his slaves; having no will of their own; debasing themselvs, and believing good is bad and bad good—that is, if the Bible is true. "Does God regard all men alike?" Your text, Rom. ii, 2, says Yes. I reply, then he is either an unjust tyrant or an idiot. But I concur with the Bible in this case, for I don't believe there is any God who has intelligence enough to tell one man from another. But you contradict scripture by scripture in your very next quotation. You ask, "To whom will the Lord look?" (Isa. lxvi, 2). If he is no respecter of persons, he won't look any more to him of a broken and contrite spirit than to me.

In answer to your next question I reply: No, he does not countenance wrong in anyone but himself and except when he commands it; then of course it is right. He is a very jealous God, you know, and does not want anyone to beat him at anything.

As I hav overhauled enough of your questions to show how shallow they are and how foolish their biblical answers, I will say farewell. I was once in your shoes, and for ten years quoted the same texts. I hope you may be delivered from the degrading delusion of Christianity. There is no true happiness in it. Please answer one question: Is God going to damn creatures of his own make who hav turned out just as he knew they would, and after all has his redemption scheme proved a failure? Think of a God dying to correct his own mistakes and then finding out that he hasn't succeeded. Yours for the naked truth, C. L. HASKELL.

UPPER MATTOLE, Oct. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. M. Groh says that he does not see what use the quotations I used in my answer to Mr. Holland are in the present discussion to get to the truth of what is best for the laboring man, since manufacturing has improved so much since then that the old state of things has passed away. The first quotations I used were to show that Mr. Holland was wrong in saying that the Republican party was unwilling to surrender any part of the protectiv system. And the second was to show his mistake in saying that the founders of the government were as the Democratic party is to-day on the tariff issue. A child could tell the use of those quotations. Now, after denying the use of quotations from contemporaneous and past statements, he brings forth from his "political Bible" as an axiom something that was said over half of a century ago. Now, assuredly I do not understand him.

Mr. J. M. Groh writes: "To-day we behold England, having outstripped all her protectiv neighbors in substantial progress, the greatest manufacturing and commercial nation on earth, with the condition of her laborers or common class much improved after a practice of comparativ free trade during forty-two years, thus giving the lie to all protectiv theories of the past." Now, when a truthful man makes an assertion we generally take it for what he thinks is so, and generally a man is able to prove what he says, so I would like to hav Mr. Groh prove that the poor class are better off to-day in England than they were forty years ago. Now the people work for about twenty cents a day. Their food amounts to about this—bread made out of yellow meal and butter, fish occasionally, and in the best families meat once a week. In what condition were they before forty years ago? They can now hardly liv. Were they dead forty years ago, or were they like the Egyptian mummy lying away—yes, lying away for free trade? I shall now giv a list of things called the necessaries of life from the retail prices in England: Bread, per pound, 3 cents; beef steak, 20 to 24 cents; roast, 17 to 20 cents; common, 14½ cents; chickens, each, 36 to 60 cents; mutton, per pound, 14½ cents; pork, 15½ cents; veal, 13 cents; eggs, per dozen, 14½ to 20 cents; butter, per pound, 24 to 36 cents; cheese, 24 to 28 cents; coffee, 30 to 48 cents; tea, 96 to $1.25; sugar, 7 to 10 cents; potatoes, per 100 pounds, 72 cents; cabbage, apiece, 2½ to 5 cents; flour, per pound, 4½ to 5½ cents; kerosene oil, per liter, 6 cents; milk, per liter, 5 cents.

Can anybody find that the necessaries of life where the highest average weekly wages are $5.76 are not fully up to the net price of necessaries of life in America? Now, what is there in life and prosperity in England that should fascinate anyone in this country? How can one compare a country that is not able to raise any of the necessaries of life with one that is able to raise all of them?

In the United States during the period of low tariff from 1848 to 1860 wages were as low in this country as in England to-day. Any person that lived during that period cannot deny this. What is the cause of the rise of wages in the United States above free trade England and her free trade period? That is the question. The reason exactly is protection that we shall not be brought into competition with foreign cheap labor.

I am acquainted with an Englishman who worked in the silk-mills of England a number of years ago when silk was put on the free list between England and France. He says that every silk-mill in England was closed and hundreds of men, women, and children were thrown out of employment. Although he is an Englishman and looks to everything that is good for his country, still he is in favor of protection in the United States. Now, this is not from a theorist, but from a man of experience.

The laborer in this country is better off than he has ever been before. With wages higher on the average, with the price of living lower on the average, he is in this respect immensely better off than anywhere else in the whole world. The wage-earners in this country own more property than all the other wage-earners in the world put together. The wage-earners of Connecticut and Rhode Island own more property than all of the wage-earners of the whole of Europe, including Great Britain and all of her dominions. The attempt to make the laboring man believe that he could liv as well and as cheaply here under a system of free trade as he does now under a system of protection is not worthy of even a free trader, in view of all the statistics, and the refutation which has been made.

Mr. J. M. Groh tries to make it appear that protection is the cause of all the strikes, pauperism, and the labor organizations. Let us examin the official statistics of the year 1880. The returns are as follows:

Countries.	Population.	Paupers.	Ratio to population.
Great Britain.	34 623,930.	1,037 404.	1 to 33.
United States.	50,155,783.	88,665.	1 to 565.

There is no evidence, however, that a protectiv tariff is responsible for the presence of these unfortunate people in this country, while on the other hand the fact that there are so many more paupers in Great Britain than there are in the United States according to the population indicates that the industrial system of that country is responsible for the excess.

The Chicago Anarchists were murderers, and had a fair trial. No man with any manhood can place those murderers with John Brown.

Instead of protection being the cause of strikes, it is the freedom of the press and speech, which allows cranks and agitators to stir the minds of ignorant men and women to do things—for which in a few cases they hav received justice. I say, hang the agitators and send those poor devils where they shall be treated with humanity, for instance, in the state prisons and houses of correction.

I can now say that my distinguished opponent knows but little about history and less about tariff. Richard Cobden and his associates who were called the Cobden Club were the founders of free trade. In 1846 they had a bill passed through Parliament which allowed corn to be free. Richard Cobden holds as prominent a place in the history of England as Henry Clay does in the history of the United States. I commend you, Mr. Groh, to the study of history.

HEPPNER, ORE., Oct. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 22d Mr. C. L. Abbott undertakes to account for the appendix vermiformis from the evolutionary standpoint. He first says that "it is an error to say it is found only in the human system," and then goes on to show from his own description of it that such is really the case. He then begins his explanation by assuming as the basis of his conclusions that the vermiform appendix was formed by the shriveling up or atrophying of the closed end of the cœcum, which is supposed to hav occurred during the transmutation of the lower animal into the man, and says: "The very fact of its atrophying proves that it has ceased to perform any useful function in the physical organism." Now, if this be true, this very fact ought to furnish a clue as to what that use was in the lower animal that has disappeared in the man, and, as far as I know, this has not been done.

The fact is, if the vermiform appendix had been formed in this way it would undoubtedly hav presented such an appearance of gradual enlargement as it approached a gradually diminishing cœcum as would render it difficult to determin just where the latter ended and the former began, and anatomists would scarcely hav deemed it necessary to giv two different names to what was really one and the same thing. But when we come to examin the facts in the case, we find a very different state of affairs. The cœcum is that part of the large intestin forming a "blind pouch" just below the point where the large and small intestins unite. It is perforated at one end, the other terminating abruptly. Attached to this well-rounded extremity is the appendix vermiformis, a worm-shaped tube about four inches long, the size of a goose-quill, and of about the same uniformity in size and shape, the line of demarkation between the two being as well defined as is that between the large and small intestins.

The gentleman further says that "the present is merely a transitional stage," which transitional stage, we are told, has already lasted for "at least hundreds of thousands of years," and for all present indications to the contrary, may last for as many thousand years to come, since no community of human beings hav as yet been seen in process of improvement toward winged angels. And that "as we shall never get down on all-fours again [which in view of "retrogression" evolutionists are by no means safe in assuming] the vermiform appendix will continue to atrophy until it wholly disappears." This last being in direct opposition to the fact that, from the first time the surgeon's knife laid bare the mysteries of the human form until now, the vermiform appendix has stubbornly maintained its original size, shape, and position, as if it served, not to teach man "the lesson of his humble origin," but instead, that the modern evolution theory is an empty dream, unsupported by any fact in nature rightly seen. But Mr. Abbott is doubtless aware of the fact that this is not the only part of the physical organism whose use is not well determined.

In the same paper in which Mr. Abbott's letter is published appears another of those lovely cartoons for which Heston is so justly celebrated. It is easily understood. "The Liberal Camp" represents THE TRUTH SEEKER, but who is that man at the gate? The Editor, probably, or an assistant. What does he say? "Free to everybody, but no rubbish admitted." Which, in plain English, doubtless means, "We draw the line at Christians." And why? The answer is: "Our sanitary regulations will not allow us to admit any dead things or unhealthy baggage." Indeed! "Unhealthy baggage" is liable to breed disease, is it not? And so "we are actually afraid that if we admit your unhealthy baggage it will be the means of spreading disease among our constituents, thereby weakening our ranks." Many thanks for this frank confession. One might hav supposed that the handsome young man at the gate would hav said: "Walk right in, friends, your baggage can't harm us; we hav a sure cure for all disease resulting therefrom." Or, "We will disinfect your baggage so as to render it perfectly harmless." But laying all jokes aside, I appeal to all good Liberals who read this paper, Is this a fair sample of the average Liberal courtesy? What has become of the noble, whole-souled, liberal-minded gentleman who would not stoop to do anything unbecoming to the dignity of a man? One might excuse the simple-minded school-boy, who, for some fancied wrong, draws rude pictures with his slate and pencil, but what ought we to think of him who, in the strength of his intellectual manhood, resorts to the use of such weapons as this? It may do very well for children to indulge in the like, but not for grown folks. And now others may do as they please, but I accept this as final. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER undoubtedly has a right to say who shall and who shall not enter the columns of his paper, and since he has indorsed this most courteous method of dealing with unwelcome guests by giving it an airing through his paper, I hereby pledge him my word and honor never again to ask for admission, excepting as I may feel called upon to reply to some article pointed especially at me. And this I claim as a right. But if it is against the rules of the institution to admit religionists, it seems to me that the more generous method would hav been to emblazon the fact on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, so that all who read might understand. Remember, "The generous heart should scorn a pleasure that givs others pain." MRS. H. A. RITCHEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Nix's Mate.

A LEGEND OF THE BLACK ROCK IN BOSTON HARBOR.

"The tide runs strong, and the sea grows dark,
Hark ye, pilot! (Cling, clang, cling!)
The night wind freshens and drives the bark;
(Cling!)
The sluggish fog horns fill the air,
And fitful is the beacon's glare,
And near us lies an island bare,
Hark ye, hark ye!"
(Cling—clang—cling!)

"Quiet, lad, 'tis the bell-buoy tolls
As the heavy sea beneath it rolls.
The lights are bright on the long sea-wall,
I know the reefs where the breakers fall,
And I know where there are no rocks at all."

"But the isle is black without shoals or sands,
Hark ye, hark ye! (Cling, clang, cling!)
And black on the rock the beacon stands.
(Cling!)
And the bell-buoy's voice has a warning tone,
And flares the light on the pile of stone.
What makes the isle so black and lone?
Hark ye, hark ye!"
(Cling—clang—cling!)

"That island, boy, was once fresh and green,
The fairest isle in the harbor seen,
'Tis the ghost of an isle that you yonder see,
Now the bell strikes one, now the bell strikes three,
And the night shades fall, and the wind blows free.

"The trees are gone, the fields, the shore,
And the heron comes to the reef no more,
No sea gull's wing to the rock dips down,
No petrel white nor seamew brown,
Nor boat stops there from port or town."

"Do you know the rocks of the reft sea-wall?
Hark ye, pilot!" (Cling, clang, cling!)
"I know where there are no rocks at all."
(Cling!)

"Then, pilot, we're safe, so tell to me
The tale of this isle on the haunted sea,
While the bell strikes one, and the bell strikes three,
Hark ye, hark ye!"
(Cling—clang—cling!)

"Listen, boy, the tide runs fast
Where the green isle lay in the years long past.
There once a gibbet the moon shone through,
And its iron frame the high winds blew—
There the crimes of the sea received their due.

"Old Nix was a captain, hard and bold,
And he reaped the sea and gathered gold;
He gathered gold, but one windy night
They found him dead 'neath the gunwale light,
And his mate stood near him, dumb and white.

"And his mate they seized—a young sailor he—
And charged him with murder upon the sea.
And they brought him here where the island lay,
Where the gibbet rose o'er the windy bay;
'Twas more than a hundred years to-day."

"O pilot, pilot! how dark it grows!
Hark ye, hark ye! (Cling, clang, cling!)
Across the bay the fog wind blows,
(Cling!)
The beacon turns in the fog clouds drear,
And my head is dulled with nameless fear;
They did not hang that sailor here?
Hark ye, hark ye!"
(Cling—clang—cling!)

"Here lay the ship, and the island there,
And the sun on the summer oaks shone fair,
And they took him there 'mid the chains to die,
And he gazed on the green shore far and nigh,
Then turned his face to the open sky.

"And he said, 'Great heaven, receive my prayer;
The shores are green and the isle is fair;
To my guiltless life my witness be;
Let the green isle die 'mid the sobbing sea,
And the sailors see it and pity me.

"'In her old thatched cottage my mother will spin,
And dream of her boy on the coast of Lynn,
Or watch from her door 'neath the linden tree;
O heaven, just heaven, my witness be,
Let the island beneath sink into the sea.

"'Let it waste, let it waste in the morning waves,
With its withered oaks and its pirates' graves,
Till it lie on the waters black and bare,
The ghost of an isle 'mid the island fair,
Where bells shall toll and beacons glare!'

"He died, and the island shrank each year,
The green trees withered, the grass grew sere,
And the rock itself turned black and bare
And lurid beacons rose in air,
And the bell-buoy rings forever there.

"The bell-buoy rings in the moaning sea,
And it now strikes one, and it now strikes three!"

—Journal of Education.

"You can't add different things together," said a teacher in one of the New York public schools. "If you add a sheep and a cow together, it does not make two sheep or two cows." A little boy, who was the son of a Harlem milkman, held up his hand and said: "That may do with sheep and cows, but if you add a quart of milk and a quart of water it makes two quarts of milk. I've seen it done more'n a thousand times."

Keep Your Promises.

Be careful about making a promis, but after it is made do not break it. The person who thinks nothing of his word is not to be trusted. To think lightly of a promis foreshadows dishonesty, ruin, and disgrace. Sometimes, of course, it is, from unforeseen causes, absolutely impossible to keep one's word. In such case a broken promis may be excusable. But, as a rule, this cannot happen where one is careful and conscientious.

When we hear of a person of whom it is said that "his word is as good as his bond," we hav reason to believe that such an individual is honest and trustworthy. He has won his reputation by being always prompt and sure. And we feel he can be trusted, because he is not indifferent to his promises. He regards his sacred word of honor above all things. Faithfulness to all trusts, careful consideration before making a promis that involves a transaction of moment, and keeping the promis to the letter after it is made, insures a good and honest character, in whose care may be placed the affairs of business, and the confidence of men and women.

We liv in an age of fraud. Here and there are found men and women who betray trusts reposed in them. This is due largely to the light manner with which the promis is made and regarded. Let all try to keep promises as sacredly as honor itself. Make few promises, but when once made keep them sacred.

Forests.

Forests are of the greatest importance in the general economy of the globe, influencing the humidity of the air and soil, lessening the extremes of heat and cold, affording shelter to man and beast, and enriching the soil on which they grow. Trees supply timber and fuel to man, and furnish him with a vast variety of drugs, dyes, and articles of food. Historical records giv us reason to believe that the habitable earth was generally covered with forest growth before it became the abode of man, and also proof of this is found in the extensiv remains of ancient trees.

The geological record mav also be referred to as evidencing by its coal-fields the extensiv breadths once covered by the richest vegetation.

The arboreous vegetation of the earth is remarkable for its great variety; many countries are rich in pines, others in oaks; Australia in gum-trees, India in teak—called the king of Indian timber trees; it is prized for ship-building beyond any other wood, and is especially valuable for works in contact with iron—California in sequoia, a kind of fir-tree, and Brazil in palms.

Trees, like other plants, require different degrees of heat, light, moisture, and elevation above the sea for their vigorous development, and hence various countries hav their characteristic forests. The birches and pines of the north make way in the temperate zone for oaks and beeches, and in the tropics for palms and other heat-loving trees. The same trees seem to require similar climates, but the same climates do not always produce the same plants. The mountains of South India and Ceylon closely resemble the regions where the cinchona forests occur, but the genus is wanting in Asia.

Again, the teak is unknown in America, although parts of Brazil resemble its home in Malabar. It is also remarkable that some forests consist solely of one particular tree, such as the birch in Lapland, the pine in North America, the deodar, or "god-tree," as it is called by the Asiatics, in the Himalayas. It is a kind of cedar, and is employed for a variety of useful purposes, especially in building. They are technically called "pure forests," so as to distinguish them from mixed forests. The European forests, on the contrary, are generally composed of coniferous trees mingled with oak, elm, ash, beech, poplar, willow, alder, birch, and lime, interspersed with hornbeam and various others, being hazel, elder, buckthorn, viburnum, roses, etc.

The American forests contain a still greater variety of species, a fact strikingly illustrated in Missouri.

In little more than half an hour, and less than a mile's walk, one can see in a patch of nativ forest a few miles from St. Louis, on the Missouri, forty kinds of timber trees, including eleven of oak, two of maple, two of elm, three of ash, two of walnut, six of hickory, three of willow, and one each of plane, lime, hornbeam, hop-hornbeam, laurus, poplar, birch, mulberry, and horsechestnut, together with about half that number of shrubs.

Take it all in all, trees are the most beautiful and interesting works of nature, and are well worthy of our knowledge.

Nantucket Anecdotes.

There was a time when people knew little of tea-making or tea-drinking. The first tea brought to Nantucket has a little history of its own. A gallant captain sailing from that port had tasted some of the beverage on one of his voyages to Japan. He liked it so much that he bought a chest of it to bring home. On his arrival he ordered some of the tea made for a few friends who had gathered to bid him welcome home. His good wife had never before seen any tea, and was at a loss to know just how to prepare it. But she thought she would make it good and strong, so she put a quart-bowlful of the tea in about eight gallons of water and set it boiling. Her sister thought this scant measure and she threw in another quart-bowlful of tea. This was boiled down to four quarts, and a queer mess indeed it was. When brought to the table nobody could drink it. The captain declared that a teaspoonful of it was enough to kill the whole party. Then he prepared some himself, and it was made after the manner of the orientals, as the captain had seen them prepare it, and all declared it was the most delicious drink they ever had tasted.

Along with this is the story about some chocolate, and this story is said not to belong to Nantucket, though I don't know about that. A good minister was once presented with a cake of chocolate, and passing the same to his wife told her to hav some for the Sunday dinner. It was a boiled dinner, and when it was brought the minister looked in vain for his chocolate. "My dear," said he, "where is the chocolate?" "I'm sure I don't know," she replied. "I put in the whole cake in the pot along with the vegetables and boiled it a whole hour, but when I took up the dinner I could find neither hide nor hair of the chocolate. It must hav been bewitched!"

Another story is of a deacon and his wife who were invited out to tea once upon a time. There was something on the table that seemed to meet the approbation of both the deacon and his wife. The wife passed the plate containing it repeatedly to her husband, urging him to take more and more of it. "Eat, Byron"—his name was Byron—she urged, "you'll never get such good corn bread as this again, for I never did see the beat of it, sure!" It chanced, however, with their eating of the good corn bread that there was not sponge cake enough to go round and the other guests had none. Deacon Byron and his wife had mistaken the sponge cake for corn bread. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

Nov. 1, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw that you desired an essay on "Timber" for the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, so I send you one similar to it on "Forests," if it is yet desirable and not too long to hav published.

As ever, Your universal mental liberty friend, LEONORA STOCKINGER.

VERSAILLES, IND., Oct. 28, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never written to the Children's Corner before, I thought I would write to you and my friends. I am thirteen years old, and go to school and study arithmetic, history, grammar, geography, and physiology. I intend to graduate this year. A few days ago one of my schoolmates asked me why I never came to Sunday-school. I told her I never took any interest in it, and that I would rather read some interesting book. Then she told me that I should not talk that way and that I was very wicked. If I am wicked, I am so much the wiser, for during the Sundays I read far more interesting books than the Bible or the Sunday-school papers. I hav read nearly all of Dickens's novels; my favorit is "The Pickwick Papers," although they are all very interesting. I will tell my friends a true story that happened to my grandpa. He and grandma had adopted a boy five years old, and had raised and educated him as their own. One day in the summer, as grandpa and Eddie, the boy, were feeding the horses in the barn, grandpa noticed that wheat was being thrown on his head. Then he asked Eddie where it came from, and he said he did not know. Well, the wheat-throwing went on for about a month. Grandpa was getting inquisitiv as to who did the mischief; they related it to their neighbors, and they came and joined the search. Wherever they went wheat was being plentifully thrown about them. One man told grandpa that something was going to happen to his family. Of course grandpa did not believe this, but he desired to know who or what was wasting his wheat. Soon after, the neighbors went out with pistols and clubs, and said they would shoot down the thing that did the mischief.

All this time grandma remained in the house and performed her household duties, and laughed at those superstitious neighbors (for they were Catholic).

At last she resolved to go out and try her luck in finding the ghost, or culprit, or whatever it was. The next morning she went out in her cabbage patch, and Eddie was near her, when all at once a shower of wheat rained down upon her. She called Eddie to her, and stooped and picked a grain of wheat from a cabbage leaf. Then she said, "See, Eddie, isn't this a grain of wheat?" As he came near she caught him by the arm and asked him if he did not throw it. He did not deny it and so she examined his pockets, when, lo! they were full of wheat. Of course he was punished for his mischievous act. The boy looks as if he could not count three, yet he is smart in many ways. My father told him that he deserved a medal for holding the superstitious in such suspense. If it had gone on much longer, the people would hav believed that the place had been bewitched. Well, my friends, I hope we will not be so superstitious before we hav given the question some thought.

I will now close by wishing success to you and the Corner. Your Liberal friend,

EMMA STOCKINGER.

[Many strange things occur in some such way as did the showers of wheat as related above, and might often be traced to as simple a source. Mystery is only another name for ignorance. We should aim to carefully investigate all seemingly mysterious happenings, and to be always free from superstitious fancies. Law governs all forces.—ED. C. C.]

A Queer Legend—The Story of the Contest for the Crown.

The story of the contest for the crown, in which the wren outwitted the eagle, is traditional is Germany, France, Ireland, and other countries. It seems that the birds all met together one day, and settled among themselvs that whichever of them could fly the highest was to be king of them all. As they were starting, the wren, unknown to the eagle, perched himself on his tail. Away flew the birds, and the eagle soared far above the others, until, tired, he perched himself on a rock, and declared that he had gained the victory. "Not so fast," cried the wren, getting off the tail and springing above the eagle; "you hav lost your chance, and I am king of birds." The eagle, angry at the trick played upon him, gave the wren as he came down a smart stroke with his wing, from which time the wren has never been able to fly higher than a hawthorn bush. The story is told with a different conclusion in Germany. According to the German version the tricky wren was imprisoned in a mouse-hole, and the owl was set to watch before it, whilst the other birds were deliberating upon the punishment to be inflicted upon the offender. The owl fell asleep and the prisoner escaped. The owl was so ashamed that he has never ventured to show himself by daylight.

Railway Signals.

One pull of the bell-cord signifies "stop."
Two pulls mean "go ahead."
Three pulls mean "back up."
One whistle signifies "down brakes."
Two whistles signify "off brakes."
Three whistles mean "back up."
Short rapid whistles, "a cattle alarm."

A sweeping parting of the hands on a level with the eyes means "go ahead."

A slowly sweeping meeting of the hands over the head signifies "back slowly."

A downward motion of the hands, with extended arm, signifies "stop."

A beckoning motion with one hand indicates "back."

A red flag waved up the track indicates "danger."

A red flag by the roadside means "danger ahead."

A red flag carried on a locomotiv signifies "an engin following."

A red flag raised at a station means "stop."

A lantern swung at right angles across the track means "stop."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

A CARD TO MY FRIENDS.

I desire to establish myself as Your Jeweler. I can do so if I can convince you that it is to your interest financially, not otherwise. I am aware that it is no object for you to patronize me unless I can do better by you—sell you as good or better goods—than your home jeweler, at lower prices. Can I do it? Yes. How? Permit me to explain: My establishment is phenomenal. No other store in the world, in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, has the standing, reputation, and does the amount of business, in my line, that mine does. No stock outside of few largest cities embraces the quantity of elegant Fine Gold Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver, Optical and Fancy Goods as mine. I buy the best—Watches from $5 to $300, Diamond Jewelry from $10 to $1,000, etc. Merchants who compete with me liv only in largest cities, but which of necessity, implies large expenditures and large profits. If you patronize them, this you must pay. If you buy a Watch or Diamond of them, they will and must charge you a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. If you will order of me, I will and can sell you the same quality of goods at 5 to 10 per cent profit. And if you buy of a small dealer in any other small town, he also must charge you 30 to 50 per cent. Why? Because his sales, aggregating at most $10,000 per annum, will not cover expenses at 10 per cent. To liv and come out ahead he is compelled to charge you an average of 30 per cent.

But my sales now approximate $50,000 per year. Therefore I can cut down profits—divide them with you—and yet realize a larger surplus at the end of the year than my competitors:

$50,000 merchandise sold at 10 per cent profit equals $5,000 gain; $10 000 merchandise sold at 30 per cent profit equals 3,000 gain; showing a profit of $2,000 on the goods sold at 10 per cent over and above those sold at 30 per cent. On Broadway, New York, or on State street, Chicago, Jewelers pay from $15,000 to $20,000 rent. I pay $3:0 and other expenses in proportion. Therefore, having been established in Rochelle thirty-one years, having always paid "a hundred cents on the dollar," being an infallible judge of every article I buy, and buying goods in large quantities, all jobbers, importers, and manufacturers are anxious to sell me their wares at Bottom Price, as to any one in existence. And therefore, buying low and selling more goods than any other dealer in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, I can and will send you any thing you may need in my line (prepaid per mail or express, and cash back if not satisfactory) at 10 to 30 per cent lower than any other house. Order from my catalog and giv me a chance to establish myself as Your Jeweler.

"The Fall."

A GARDEN MELODRAMA WITH SERPENTINE ATTACHMENT.

Dramatis Personæ.

ADAM, head gardener of Eden.
EVE, his wife, though not conventionally so.
SERPENT, "more subtil than any beast of the field."
VOICE OF THE LORD strolling around.
Tree of knowledge bearing luscious pippins.

SCENE.—Eden, garden of.

ACT I.

SCENE 1.—Center of the garden. Tree of knowledge, with its tempting but forbidden fruit.

Enter Eve. Takes up a position under the spreading branches, and gazes longingly at the golden pippins. Enter Serpent, with a number thirteen smile of unalloyed guile on his open countenance.

Eve. Oh, mercy!
Serp. Pardon, madam; hav no fears.
I hav at heart but thy best interests,
Believe me, Madam Eve.
Eve. Thanks, awfully!
So noiselessly and suddenly you came,
That I was startled slightly, that is all.
I fear thee not—indeed, why should I, pray?
So beautiful a being, one of grace
So full, could not inspire the tiny bird
With fear, I ween, nor guile in quantity
Contain the slightest.
Serp. Madam, I should smile!
And all that thou hast said of me I say
Of thee, with double compound interest,
Most captivating one. A daisy thou
From Daisyville, make no mistake. But I Saw thee with admiration gazing on
The golden pippins, hanging temptingly
These spreading branches from.
Eve. Oh, aren't they nice
To look upon? I wonder if to eat
They are as nice?
Serp. As to the eye they look,
Fair Eve, so to the tongue and palate do
They promis keep. The king of all the fruits,
Within this garden growing, has its throne
Upon this royal tree. Before this king—
King Pippin—other fruits and all must hide
Their heads diminished! Hold thy apron, Eve—
Ah, pardon; I forgot. I will ascend
And shake to earth some of this golden fruit;
The fall not great, not great will be the bruise,
This grassy carpet, soft and thick, will scarce
Allow of damage to the fruit.
Eve. Oh, my!
Don't do it, dear. Of these we may not eat—
'Tis his command. All else that grows within
The garden walls to eat we hav carte blanche,
But these most lovely apples may not touch—
It's too provoking, I declare!
Serp. It is,
Indeed, or would be and thou didst pay heed
To the command, so arbitrary and
So cruel; fruit like this, so glorious,
Placed here to ravish sight and tempt the tongue,
But all forbidden! Cruelty refined
Is this, fair Eve. Why, pray, shouldst thou not eat
Of this most tantalizing fruit? Thou hast
Desire for it. Whence comes this strong desire?
Thrice cruel one is he to ravish sight,
To tempt the taste and fierce desire create
As well. Come, fair one with the golden locks,
Of this fair fruit consume a portion, say
One golden sphere, nor let desire consume
Thy beauteous self!
Eve. Dear me! I'd like to, but
I dare not even take a bite of one—
It's just too awfully provoking, you!
But he has said that if we eat we die—
To die; that's not to liv; to giv up sight
And feeling, breathing and all that. Oh, my!
That must be dreadful, you! Dear me! what did
He place this tree here for, with all this fruit
So golden, and so tempting to the sight?
But which to eat—a single fruity globe—
And we shall die!
Serp. Eat of the pippins, Eve,
Thy fill. Thou shalt not die, make no mistake,
But liv, and knowing be as are the gods;
And he doth know it as do I myself,
Which is the reason, most assuredly,
Why he commanded thee and Adam not
To eat the fruit particularly choice
And tempting!
Eve. My! is that so, Serpent wise?
And sha'n't I die if I an apple eat?
Shall wisdom come instead of death? Ah, why
Should I be wise? Am I now happy now?
What does the poet say? "If ignorance
Is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." Pray, why Should I be wise? I ask.
Serp. To be as gods,
Not common clods, fair Eve.
Eve. And will I be
As are the gods and not lose life so sweet?
O Serpent, it's just splendid here to liv
In this bright garden—just too lovely it
For anything! I do not want to die—
It must be horrid!
Serp. But die thou shalt not,
And eat ye of this tree, but liv and be
As wise as are the gods. Eat not and liv,
But as the beetle, bear, and butterfly,
No wiser thou. I'm giving thee, fair Eve,
The sure, straight tip!
Eve. Dear me! I wish I knew.
Now, honor bright and hope to die, if thou
Dost not speak true?
Serp. Yes, honor bright and hope
To die, if I the gilt-edged truth am not Purveying, beauteous Eve!
Eve. I do believe
Thee, serpent wise, for why should thou desire
To do me harm? I fail to see. I vum!
I'll eat a little tiny one—I can't See any harm in eating one, can you?—
A little tiny one at that!
Serp. No harm
The slightest, only good. Believe in me,
And liv to be as gods. Be bold, fear not!

[The arch-tempter glides up the tree like a flash, and, hanging on a limb, bends it within reach of Eve, who skittishly touches a small pippin, and, finding it does not bite, plucks up courage and plucks the forbidden fruit, when there is cast the die that brings a world to grief! Hesitating a moment, she takes a tiny bite, when, realizing that she still livs, she masticates and takes another and larger bite. This she disposes of, with the rest of the apple, then plucks two big ones from the tree, the serpent dropping to the ground.]

Serp. How to thy taste, these golden pippins, Eve?
Dost find them good?
Eve. Delicious! Just too too!
Perfectly splendid! Just to think of such
Fruit growing here, and all for nothing—nay!
Or only for the birds to peck and spoil—
It's just a shame, I do declare it is!
One of these pippins, as thou callest them,
I'll take to Adam dear. If aught of ill
Should happen, he and I in the same boat
Should be, I think, don't you?
Serp. Assuredly,
Fair Eve. But livest thou, who were to die
If eating of the tree of knowledge?
Eve. Yea,
I am alive and well, that is a fact;
But I must say I do not feel, as yet,
The presence of the transcendental cult
That sitteth on the Boston girl. Perchance
'Twill come in time.
Serp. It will, depend. Ere set
Of sun thou'lt be a wiser (solus: and
A sadder) woman, sure as eggs is eggs!
Ta-ta. Remember me to Adam, dear.

Having got in his work, the serpent gracefully glides into the bush and disappears, Eve quite as gracefully making her way to the cottage where, on the back porch, she left Adam asleep in a hammock.]

ACT II.

SCENE 1.—Back porch of cottage. Adam snoring in hammock.

Enter Eve, with two big pippins.

Eve. O Adam, wake! I've just got something nice—
Beats peaches all to pieces, dear, you bet!
Wake up! wake up! Dear me, how sound you sleep! (Shakes him up lively.)
Here, now, take this and eat—it's just too nice
For anything, you'll find.
Adam. What is it, dear?
Mine eyes are scarce wide ope enough to see.
Eve. No need to see. Now just you take a bite,
And own it's nice. There, ain't that just too too
For anything, my dear?
Adam. It's bully, Eve—
It is indeed extravagantly good!
Eve. O mercy, me!
Adam. Why, what's the matter, dear,
That thou shouldst scream like that?
Eve. Matter enough.
O Adam! we are na-na-naked—oh!
What shall we do?
Adam. Alas! what hast thou done?
Mine eyes are opened, too. Thou'st struck the tree
Of knowledge, Eve, and we're undone!
Eve. Oh, now,
Don't cry before you're hurt. I ate, I liv;
You ate, you liv; so where comes in the harm—
Unless in knowing, we, a thing or two
We didn't know before? But I must go
At once, and make of fig-leaves aprons, dear,
For I should die of very shame were he
To come and catch us in this awful plight—
I know I should!
Adam. So much for knowledge, Eve.
Pray, what's this knowledge worth?
Eve. Oh, now, don't preach.
It's something worth, I'm sure, to know when we
Are not presentable. I'll go right now
And make those aprons, dear, lest he should come
And catch us thus. I should be mortified
To death, I know I should!
Adam. O Eve, too high
You paid for knowledge, much too high. What does
The poet say of ignorance and bliss?
Eve. Oh, I don't know and I don't care, there now!
Why preach when—— Mercy me! I hear The Voice
In the front yard. Quick! let us hide ourselvs
In yonder clump of bushes, where he can't Observe us. Oh, I'm faint with shame. Come on!
(Exeunt, hiding in the bushes.)

ACT III.

SCENE 1.—In the shrubbery.

[Enter "Voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day," thus obviating the necessity of a sun-umbrella.]

Voice. Ho, Adam! where art thou?

[Eve no doubt felt greatly relieved at not being called herself.]

Adam. I'm here, O Lord!
Eve. Shut up, you fool! [in forceful whisper hissed]
I'd die in blood-red shame were he to come
And find us here!
Adam (heartless). I heard thy voice,
And being naked was afraid, so hid
Myself.
Voice. Aba! oho! and who told thee
That thou wast naked, Adam?
Adam. She—'twas she——
Eve. You mean old thing, to tell on me like that!
Voice. Hast eaten of the tree whereof I told
Thee not to eat?

[Adam was in for making a clean breast of it, and made it, the "mean old thing" that he was.]

Adam. The woman whom thou gav'st
To be with me, she gave me of the tree,
And I did eat of it.
Eve (hissed out). You horrid man!
You're just too mean for anything, I vum!

[And she was right. The walking Voice should then and there hav put a head on Adam—punched him in the snoot. It was the meanest squeal the world has ever known!]

Voice (to Eve). And what is this that thou hast done?
Eve. The serpent did beguile me, Lord, and I
Did eat; but 'twas a little tiny one,
O Lord—O such a little tiny one!
[Enter Serpent, with a hang-dog look on his wealth of mouth.]
Voice (to Serpent). And now because thou hast done this,
It shall go hard with thee.

[For what was dealt out to tempter and tempted in the way of sentences see Gen. iii, and find that the "just judge" out-Jeffried Jeffries, of English and unpleasant memory. One thing to the credit of the V. of the L. G., perhaps—he made for Adam and Madam, before evicting them from Eden, and to cover their nakedness, long coats of skins—not too long, but just long enough, probably.]

ACT IV.

SCENE 1.—Wilderness outside of Eden.

[Enter Adam and Eve as tramps, he growling like a dog with a sore head.]

Adam. Aud this—this all too tough experience—
Because of thy most silly longing for
An apple—oh! Because too curious
To know the taste of fruit forbidden thee.
Because forbidden, thy perverseness bid
Thee on, and hell before thee yawning wide!
I never would hav touched that tree, had I
Lived there ten million years.
Eve. Oh, no, of course
You wouldn't. You'd be satisfied to liv
A know-nothing through all eternity!
I touched the tree and ate of it—I wish
I'd eaten more, I do—and now that's all
There is about it, you. One thing there is—
Ne'er had I squealed on you as you on me,
You mean old thing—too mean for anything.
I hate you—yes, just hate you, there!
Adam. O Eve!
But 'twas a mortal sin for you to eat——
Eve. There, do, pray, stop. I just don't see it—now!
But 'tain't the sin per se that troubles you,
It is the bounce, old man! You had a nice
Soft thing the garden in, but now you've got
To hump yourself and hustle for the grub,
That's what the matter is with Hannah—you
Just bet I know!
Adam. Oh, talk not thus, my Eve.
But oh, that garden beautiful! 'Tis hard
To lose that sweet domain of ease——
Eve. Oh, yes,
Of course it is; the loss of ease just sticks
Right in your crop. But what of me? Will it
Not be as rocky quite for me as you?
But I don't care a snap! I wouldn't wish
A garden to liv in alway; 'twould pall
On me. In all this great wide earth there must Be hunki-dori places, sure, where we
Can squat, and not be limited to fruits
That grow on this tree here and that tree there—
The idea—my!
Adam. O Eve, do not reflect
On him, the giver of all good——
Eve. All good?
Well, what's the matter now with bad? Just think
You of the dose we got because we ate
An apple—why, it's just too horribly
Severe for anything!
Adam. We're punished, Eve,
For disobedience——
Eve. Well, I don't care,
The punishment was most unjust for such
A little slip as that. Would you a son
So punish for a disobedience
As trifling? Not if I were round, you bet!
But I don't care a cent. I'm glad I'm out
Of that too hifalutin garden patch.
I know I should hav sickened of the spot—
Before long, too—sweets pall upon the taste.
Now, Ad, we'll find a jolly spot somewhere
In this wide earth around—it looks quite wide—
And, found, we'll squat and settle down, and liv
In clover, eh?
Adam. Damfino where to look
For it, I'm sure.
Eve. Oh, you're a cake! I'll find
The spot——
Adam. O Eve, that garden was the spot
Of all the spreading earth——
Eve. O fiddlesticks!
Do let that garden slide and giv your tongue
A rest. I'll find the hunki spot, you bet,
With no embargo laid on this or that
Or t'other tree, that we may find about.
No pent-up Eden now confines our powers,
The wide, wide earth around about is ours!
[Exeunt in the direction over against Jericho.]

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

LIBERAL HYMN-BOOK

In your meetings, to make them lively and interesting. THE LIBERAL HYMN-BOOK contains songs by the best poets, adapted to well-known tunes. It is highly recommended by Messrs. Wakeman, Parton, Wright, Green, Underwood, Mrs. Slenker, and, indeed, by all who hav examined it. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

News of the Week.

A FRENCH electrician claims that he will soon be able to produce a thunder-storm wherever and whenever it is desired.

LIBERAL Brazilians are uneasy at the clerical leanings of Princess Isabel, who may soon succeed Dom Pedro to the throne.

NEW YORK state has 1,053 Societies of Christian Endeavor.

THE Washington Catholic University will be dedicated Oct. 6, 1889.

THE czar recently had another narrow escape from death by dynamite.

THE fund for Mr. Bradlaugh amounts to £2,485, which will pay all his debts.

QUITE a schism is growing among Charleston, S. C., Presbyterians over evolution.

LORD SACKVILLE WEST, the British minister, was dismissed by Cleveland for advising a citizen how to vote.

IN Italy, whence we receive such a flood of immigration, 61 per cent of those above fifteen can not read or write.

PARIS police were obliged to seize all portraits of the dangerous Boulanger, the count of Paris, and Prince Napoleon.

CLERGYMEN are giving to the newspapers their valuable opinions upon how we shall pass our time in heaven.

THE national geological survey is busily preparing to recover 1,300,000 miles of desert between the Rocky mountains and central Kansas.

PRIESTS of the Argentine Republic are on a strike because the government lowered the rates for masses, marriages, burials, and other ecclesiastical services.

DR. MARSHALL, an eminent investigator, givs these statistics of murder: In England, to a population of 10,000.000, 237 murders; Belgium, 240; France, 265; Scandinavia, 266; Germany, 279; Ireland, 294; Austria, 310; Russia, 333; Italy, 504; Spain, 633; United States, 830.

THE clergy of Hoboken, N. J., on a recent Sunday got the authorities to raid Jacobs's and Cronheim's theaters, so that any wanting to go to shows would hav to patronize theirs. This is outrageous.

MR. GLADSTONE writes to the secretary of the National Divorce Reform League in this country that he "holds by the law of the whole western church, which teaches marriage to be indissoluble."

A BANQUET was given at Paris commemorating the presentation of the statue of Liberty by France to America. The American minister said: "All of the great truths upon which modern social order is based were elaborated and spread throughout the world by French genius."

IN the national election occurring last Tuesday, Mr. Harrison, Republican, was elected president. New York will cast her electoral vote for him, but Governor Hill, Democrat, was reelected. Indiana and New Jersey went Democratic, Connecticut, Republican. A Democratic governor was chosen in Illinois. New York city selected H. J. Grant for mayor, a very substantial victory for the Catholic church.

THE three emperors, German, Russian, and Austrian, who are thought to be concerting some scheme for pillage and murder of the neighboring nations, are eminent Christians. They are energetic in forwarding religion among their people—the German emperor declares that he "will foster piety and the fear of God;" the czar is substantially the pope of his church, and the Austrian ruler is as devoted a Catholic. Those who can read between the lines may apply their cunning to the discovery of why these men wish to keep their people religious.

BALAAM HAS A CONTROVERSY WITH HIS BEAST.

And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass; and she said unto Balaam, What hav I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times.—Num. xxii, 28, 29, 30.

Gems of Thought.

Two interpretations may be given of the mode of government of the world. It may be by incessant divine interventions, or by the operation of unvarying law. To the adoption of the former a priesthood will always incline, since it must desire to be considered as standing between the prayer of the votary and the providential act. Its importance is magnified by the power it claims of determining what that act shall be.—Draper.

THE clergy, who held this language respecting their opponents, exhausted the choicest epithets of praise on themselvs, and on their own pursuits. When one of them got into the pulpit, or took a pen in his hand, he seemed as if he could not find words strong enough to express his sense of the surpassing importance of that class of which he was himself a member. They had their instruction direct from heaven; they were, in fact, the ambassadors of Christ; from him they received their appointment; and since no one else could reward them, so no one else had a right to rule them. As they were messengers sent by the almighty, they were rightly termed angels, and it was the duty of the people to listen to their minister, as if he really were an angel who had descended upon earth. See Durham's "Commentarie." —Buckle's History of Civilization.

MINISTERS are called angels, because they are God's messengers, intrusted by him with a high and heavenly employment; and it is a title that should put ministers in mind of their duty, to do God's will on earth as the angels do it in heaven, in a spiritual and heavenly way, cheerfully, willingly, and readily; and it should put people in mind of their duty, to take this word off ministers' hands, as from angels. Therefore are ministers called angels, and angels, ministers.—Durham's Commentarie upon the Book of the Revelation.

THE ministers of the Lord never giv cause for scandal, and nothing would be more scandalous than to say they scandalize us. Only unbelievers are scandalized by the conduct of scandalous priests. When believers see a scandalous priest, they should pluck out their eyes, in accordance with the words of scripture.—Voltaire.

THAT there is a remarkable adaptation of living beings to their environment, is apparent to all, and has in all ages and among all peoples originated and maintained the theory of an intelligent, designing deity. Can this wonderful adaptation of living beings to their environment be otherwise explained? The doctrin of evolution—natural selection—the survival of the fittest, explains all in a most satisfactory manner.—Prof. H. D. Garrison.

DID it ever occur to religious people that a cancer is as beautiful in its development as is the reddest rose? That which they are pleased to call the adaptation of means to ends, is as apparent in the cancer as in the April rain.—Ingersoll.

I HAV no doubt that scientific criticism will prove destructiv to the forms of supernaturalism which enter into the constitution of existing religions. On trial of any so-called miracle the verdict of science is "Not proven." But true Agnosticism will not forget that existence, motion, and law-abiding operation in nature, are more stupendous miracles than any recounted by the mythologies.—Huxley.

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey-work of the stars,
And the pismire is equally perfect, and a grain of sand, and the egg of the wren,
And the tree-toad is a chef-d œuvre for the highest,
And the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven,
And the narrowest hinge in my hand points to scorn all machinery,
And the cow crunching with depressed head surpasses any statue,
And a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of Infidels. —Walt Whitman.

NOTHING can exceed the credulity of the early fathers, unless it may be their ignorance. They believed everything that was miraculous. They believed everything except the truth. Anything that really happened was considered of no importance by them. They looked for wonders, miracles, and monstrous things, and—generally found them. They reveled in the misshapen and the repulsiv. They did not think it wrong to swear falsely in a good cause. They interpolated, forged, and changed the records to suit themselvs, for the sake of Christ. They quoted from persons who never wrote. They misrepresented those who had written, and their evidence is absolutely worthless. They were ignorant, credulous, mendacious, fanatical, pious, unreasonable, bigoted, hypocritical, and for the most part, insane.—Ingersoll.

WHATEVER the early Christians deemed conduciv to the interests of Christianity, they inserted in their books.—Scaliger.

Odds and Ends.

THE main point to be watched by the leader of a brass band is the toot ensemble.

A NEIGHBOR had so natural a picture of a hen that it laid in his drawer for a week.

THE author of the "Old Oaken Bucket" evidently did not believe in "letting well enough alone."

MRS. BROWN: "Now, just look at those flannels. If anything will shrink more from washing I'd like to know what it is." Mr. Brown: "A boy will, my dear."

"HANDSOME? Yes, beyond expression.
Bich? Immensely so, I hear.
Love him? Tnat is gross digression.
Marry him? Of course, my dear."

YOUNG wife: "Before we were married, George, you never smoked in my presence." Young husband: "I know it, my dear, and you never wore curl-papers in mine."

HE (cautiously): "What would you do, Fannie, if I were to kiss you?" Fannie: "Nothing, Harry. What would there be for me to do? You could attend to it, couldn't you?"

"MY friend, do you search the scriptures?" "Yes; been searching 'em all morning." "And did you find anything consoling?" "You bet; I found a lot of postage stamps I left there last winter."

HE (to marriage license clerk): "Giv me a marriage license, sir." Clerk: "Do you want single or round trip?" He: "Round trip, of course." And the clerk made out a license with divorce coupon attached.

MR. PEWBENT: "Your sermon 'On Economy' this morning, doctor, was a very sensible discourse." Dr. Churchmus: "Thank you; it seems to hav been appreciated, from the appearance of the contribution-basket."

OLD JENKINS happened to meet his three young nieces, and asked them to hav a little refreshment. "Girls are just the same," said the old man, as he stood at the cashier's desk and picked up $2.85 out of a $20 bill; "very little change!"

A GENTLEMAN while in church, intending to scratch his head, in a mental absence reached over into the next pew and scratched the head of an old maid. It is said he discovered his mistake when she sued him for a breach of promis of marriage.

THE McNab treated the family to a fantasia upon the bagpipes, and when he had concluded he looked round with honest pride and remarked: "Eh, mon, but that's vara deefficult!" "Is it?" said the O'Flaherty. "Be jabers, Oi wish it had been impossible."

SHE had auburn hair, and he wanted to say something very cutting, so he observed, "In some parts of the West I believe they light the streets with red-headed girls." "Humph! that never would do in your town," answered the girl. "Why not?" asked the young fellow. "Why, you'd be hugging the lamp-posts all day, as well as half the night," was the crushing reply

WIFE: "I was so annoyed, my dear, to-day, to find one of my pictures displayed in a photographer's show-window." Husband: "Why didn't you go upstairs and tell him to take it out?" Wife: "I declare I didn't think of that—and, besides, the picture is a very good one!"

BOBBY: "Ma, Clara ain't got any pluck, has she?" Mamma: "I don't know, I'm sure. Why do you ask?" "Because I heard her tell Mr. Brown last night that he'd better not do that again, and he right up and done it. I'll betcher if I told anybody to quit they'd quit."

A PROMINENT old St. Louis gentleman in his sere and yellow days "jined the church." He was asked by a committee of young ladies to take charge of a class in Sabbath-school. "What am I to teach them?" he inquired. "Oh, you know. Teach the young idea how to shoot." "All right," said he, "I was a damned good shot in my young days."

"WILLIAM WEESBACK, you are charged with having beaten your wife." "The charge is correct, your honor." "What are you smiling about, then?" "I hav reason to smile. We've been married five years, and in all the scraps we've had, this is the first time I havn't come out second-best. Hav a cigar, judge?"

"BE me sowl," exclaimed Mrs. Finnegan, "iverything is blamed on the poor Oirish nowa days." "Arrah, phwat's ailin' ye," responded her liege lord. "Phwat is the Yanks blamin' to now, Biddy acushla?" "Wud yez belave it, Pat? They do be sayin' that an Oirishman gave the people in the Sout' the yallow faver—a felly be the name av Mike Robe."

AGENT (to woman who has bought a Bible on instalments): "I've called, ma'am, for the monthly payment." Woman: "All right; I've got it tied up in a rag for you. I'll fetch it." Agent: "You are pleased with the book, of course, ma'am?" Woman: "Well, yes; I like the kivver, but neither me nor the old man are much sot on the readin' matter."

LINES in a hymn-book: "I forgot to invite Janet to the picnic. Wasn't it disgraceful?" "Look at that fright of a bonnet." "Do you hear that man asleep?" "It isn't a man. It's a little child." "Does that rip in my back breadth show?" "That's a lovely hat you've got." "Ought to be Cost $11 68." Beside these, there were some I could not read. They had been partly rubbed out.

THE sad sea waves, with their ceaseless roar,
Still beat the cliffs to-day,
But the seaside belle we behold no more,
Oh, where does she hide away?
She has gone from the sands where the minstrels play,
And the waves roll in and splash;
In a New York dry goods store to-day
You may hear her screaming "Cash!"

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 46. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. {New York, Saturday, November 17, 1888.} 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

A PUZZLED PILGRIM.

Notes and Clippings.

BELVA ANN LOCKWOOD sent a congratulatory telegram to President-elect Harrison. Belva sustains her defeat with equanimity.

THE currency commission convened in London has finally made its report. It advocates the coöperation of England with the United States, Germany, and the Latin Union to secure the restoration of bi-metalism.

A MINOR maxim of journalism: When, as it too often happens, two fools solemnly agree that upon a specified contingency one shall wheel the other across the landscape in a barrow, do not speak of the agreement as a "novel election wager."

"I HAV fought the good fight," quotes the devout Col. Elliott F. Shepard in yesterday's Mail and Express. Is that so, Pecksniff? asks the World? Well, now, just calm your politico-biblical enthusiasm and pack your trunk for Jerusalem, Jericho, and the Holy Land.

THE rumor that Mr. Gladstone would at Birmingham announce his retirement from the leadership of the Liberal party appears to hav been without foundation. He stated yesterday to a deputation that he considered it his duty to remain in public life until the Irish question is settled.

ROSE COGHLAN, one of New York's best known actresses, does not consider marriage a failure. She says: "Consider well. How grave a thing is marriage! The communion, blest by heaven, between two immortal souls; not the fancy of an hour that can be laid aside at will, but a holy sacrament to endure for all time and all eternity." Rose ought to know. She's married.

WILLIAM E. RANSOM, a theological student of this city, will canvass sewing-machines for three weeks owing to over-confidence in Cleveland's luck. The World thinks that he is sorry now that he did not heed the divine inspiration which settled like a halo about the head of St. Elliott F. Shepard.

COL. HENRY S. OLCOTT, the president-founder of the Theosophical Society, who has been in England for some months, has returned to India, his tour in this country having been abandoned for the present. Early in January next he will visit Japan upon Theosophical business, and will come to this country by way of California. Theosophists are preparing to hav him visit the branches throughout the United States and to giv lectures upon Theosophy in the large cities. A fund is being raised to guarantee Colonel Olcott's expenses on this long tour in America. He will return to India from here by way of England.

MESSRS. SMITH, LYMAN, AND TAYLOR, three members of the Mormon church, are in Canada to interview the Dominion government in connection with the Mormon settlement at Lee's Creek, Northwest Territory. Smith is a son of the late prophet of the church. Smith, on being interviewed, said: "Our colony consists of one hundred and twenty-five souls. We do not exclude other Christians from the settlement. Our business is combined ranching and farming." "Do you propose to practice polygamy?" "We do not propose to break the laws of the country. We are Christians. We believe in Jesus Christ, and believe in him as strongly as any sect on the face of the earth." "In what essential particular do you differ with orthodox Christianity?" "The great difference is that we believe in modern as well as ancient revelation through the medium of prophets, seers, and revelators."

IN the House of Lords on the 6th inst., Lord Salisbury announced that Germany had invited England to coöperate with her in the work of preventing more effectivly the exportation of slaves from and the importation of arms to east Africa. England had promised to aid in the work, as it was in accordance with her traditional policy. The proposed measures would be effected by a naval and not a military force. France had also agreed to render assistance, and would send a man-of-war to coöperate with the German and English vessels in a blockade against slave and arms bearing vessels. The vessels forming the blockade would hav the right to search vessels under any flag.

THIS touching little story comes from China via the London Freethinker: "A Chinese evangelist, being unable to find any traces of his runaway donkey, after a long and exhausting search, 'prayed the Lord to make the donkey bray, and immediately he brayed.' Thus encouraged, the evangelist borrowed a latern and with four hired men continued the search or pursuit till he was tired out. Then he turned to him who is a very present help in trouble. As a last resource he knelt again and fervently prayed that the great ruler of the universe would make the donkey bray again, and he (the donkey, not the Lord) was ultimately found in the yard of a fried-cake shop; whereupon our pious evangelist gave hearty thanks to God for his great goodness."

A GOOD many things hav been said against King Dave Kalakaua of the Sandwich islands, but we do not credit the story that he is writing a novel to be called, "The Mystery of Mauna Loa; or, The Poi Eaters of Oahu." David is, adds the Sun, more likely to write editorial articles for some Prohibition paper.

IN 1887 the Nevada legislature passed an act providing that "no person shall be allowed to vote at any election in this state who is a member of or belongs to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, commonly called the Mormon church." The same statute required the registry agent to exact an oath from the voter to the effect that he was not a Mormon. This legislation was assailed as unconstitutional, and the supreme court of Nevada has now declared it to be invalid. The state constitution prescribes the qualifications of voters. All male citizens, twenty-one years of age and upward, who hav actually resided in the state six months and in the election district or county thirty days preceding the election, are entitled to vote, except such as hav been convicted of treason or felony, or hav borne arms against the United States, or held office under the Confederate States, or are idiots or insane persons. The supreme court holds that the legislature cannot add to the disqualifications specified in the constitution. If a citizen possesses the qualifications declared in that instrument, he cannot be deprived of the right to vote by virtue of any statute whatever. The constitution of the state is paramount, and so long as it exists in its present form the members of the Mormon church cannot be disfranchised in Nevada.

Communications.

Tom, Dick, and Harry.

As Father, Son, and Holy Ghost represent the triune God of heaven, so do Tom, Dick, and Harry, the popular social trinity, stand for the constituents that make up what in the state is known as "the lower orders of society;" thus making the heavenly and the earthly to correspond to the zenith and the nadir, the antipodes of each other; and just so through all the centuries hav they stood, embodying the idea underlying all systems of human governments; investing the governor, as the vicegerent of heaven, with the god-like prerogativ of dictator, and placing Tom, Dick, and Harry in the relation of subordination, deference, unquestioning submission.

And such has been the condition of mankind till toward the close of the last century of our era; the change, heralded by shouts of impatience by the Toms, Dicks, and Harrys of the passing years, but to which little or no heed was given beyond cutting off a refractory head or two as a warning not to presume to call in question the heaven-ordained scheme given for man's government upon earth. The governors were not to blame. Taught to regard the system of government of which they were the legitimate heads as a system modeled after the plan given by this triune God of heaven, they took for granted that their chief duty was its protection, a duty made all the more imperativ by their being the "Lord's anointed."

> What, rail against the Lord's anointed!

Words, it is true, quoted from Richard III., but he, none the less, a legitimate governor. And don't you forget it.

A most natural conclusion was this hacking off of heads on the part of the governors, particularly when backed by the self-constituted authorities in all questions between the God-appointed and the governed—the priests—a class eternally on the side of authority, let who will suffer.

When Tom, Dick, and Harry complained, the priest comforted them by promises of compensation in the enjoyments of heaven. "Servants, be obedient to your masters, your rulers," said they, "and great will be your reward"—checks on the Post Mortem Bank of Heaven, an institution now voted insolvent.

When Tom, Dick, and Harry, maddened by hunger, shouted, "Bread or blood!" the noble replied, "Let them eat grass;" a recommendation to which the popular trinity gave heed by compelling the insulter to show them how to do it; filling the noble's mouth with a wisp cut from the sod below his feet, as he dangled from a lamp-post in the public square. And here I would say that, while it would be a sight greatly to be lamented to hav a man's body dangling from a lamp-post, it is a matter infinitly to be rejoiced over that there are ropes and lamp-posts within reach, and that there are Toms, Dicks, and Harrys ready to use them.

There can be no real, permanant advancement in society until men hav sloughed the ancient beliefs, and entered on the régime of the scientist; utterly exploding the faiths of the fathers—faiths of the state as well as of the altar. All progress in society must be in the ratio of emancipation from ancient trammels. The individual must stand stripped of all faith but faith in man.

Believing with Combe in the supremacy of the moral sentiments in the government of society, there are no limits to advancement. Right recognizes only the superiority seen in the life of the individual who seeks the greatest good to the greatest number—a sentiment of the mouth only in the competitiv present, and regarded by the priest-ridden noodle as the antagonism of God's plan sent to guide and direct humanity. Poor noodle! poor priest!

There is but one plan: the force inherent in the constitution of things; natural development from natural causes; all being under the guidance and direction of resident power; self-governing, immutable ruling without shadow of turning, relentless; as heedless of the wolf "who howls his watch," as of the priest who intones his rigmarole. Blizzards, earthquakes, tornadoes, floods, disturbances in the social world, famins, wars, anarchic conditions, making no change. Deaf, inexorable, inflexible; in harmony with the planets, tireless as the circling sun.

Time is always supreme, dominating and assertiv in man's affairs, let who will be millionaire or pauper. Allowing no permanent mastery, the hours keep wagging. Their work may, to the superficial observer, appear blundering. Seen from the Pisgah hight reached by the explorer of the promised land, however, the hoped-for wine and the honey are always seen in the distance, to be drunken and to be eaten by the coming man; Tom, Dick, and Harry, in the mean time, waiting but to encounter the well-attested truths that there is nothing so certain as uncertainties, and that hope deferred maketh the heart sick. Well, there is no help for it. The inevitable confronts us all. Trust in your manhood, T., D., and H., and keep your powder dry.

Each epoch treading on the heels of its predecessor has given proof that the prophet of a higher civilization has been truthfully inspired. The tramp of to-day, with all his degradations, has no fear of the halter because he is out of money and is found seeking employment. The "authorities" will but meet him with confinement and hard fare, and, dismissing him, leave him to die bravely by the roadside. Tramps in the time of "Good Queen Bess," in "merrie England," were hung in rows by virtue of the edict which gave to Dogberry authority to "comprehend all vagrom men." Some advancement seen there, we must allow. Come, let us join voices with Mackay:

> There's a good time coming, boys.

Resuming: There is also some difference, to our advantage, observable in the land question between the Elizabethan age and the Victorian. Then, the baronial stood supreme. Now the baron's claim is bravely disputed. Henry George, in the role of a modern Peter the Hermit, called upon the masses to arouse and redeem their own holy land. And the Toms, Dicks, and Harrys at once begun the work.

True, the syndicates and the trust organizations of our day, here with us, hav measurably taken the place of the baron of the past, and are most grievously felt, but even of them we can quote to Tom, Dick, and Harry:

> —— In them nature's copy's not etern,
> Then be thou jocund.

T., D., and H. must also remember that they too hav organizations, giving them a sweeping majority of seventy to one, a majority which, when fully aroused, will wipe out our syndicates and trust companies at the word Go, law or no law. And yet law is eternal, defying extinction, a paradox of the family of the fiction: "The king is dead. Long liv the king!" The king cannot die; the title at once passing to the successor. In this sense law cannot die, it will be but superseded. There will be quite as much authoritativ law after the days of the syndicates and the trusts are numbered as there was before, but it will be in favor of the many, not of the few. Tom, Dick, and Harry will be in the ascendant.

There is nothing between the range of extremes that men, properly organized, are not capable of accomplishing, so gracious has nature been in her bestowals of the constituents that make up humanity—a fact in itself suggestiv of possible transition in the widest sense of survival of the fittest. The question of questions is, What makes the fittest? The reply to which comes in a quotation: "My son, among all thy gettings, get understanding." Understanding is the sign-post, pointing the way to advancement. For lack of understanding, Tom, Dick, and Harry are hungry and oppressed. The poor earth-trio hav relied so much on the sky trinity for help that they are irresolute of purpose. Let them drop their pleading and gather self-reliance. There is a lion in the way, some say. Shoot it down, is the reply. "Come to Jesus," is the caution; "his yoke is easy and his burden is light." And so the jargon of tradition riots, wilting Tom, Dick, and Harry into impotence.

Yet is there a breaking away from the leading-strings of both the state and the altar.

Chunder Sen calls for amelioration to the conditions of the dusky sons of Hindoostan, burdens imposed upon them by the traditions of a civilization having its roots so deep among the antiquities as to defy the plummet of the explorer, cast he ever so wisely. The Indian philanthropist refuses to accept "the way and the truth" as offered by Christianity, claiming for the sacred demigods of their hoary past the authority of a wisdom greater than Jesus. On the other hand, we hear of a modern apostle in Chicago, in self-estimation authoritativ as the oldest of the teachers, calling for disciples to his standard of revolt against Christianity, calling himself a "heathen;" both men excellent in morals, eloquent of tongue, and incisiv of intellect. Chunder demands for the Pariah equality with the Brahman; the Chicagoan insists on the brotherhood of the race. Let the former pierce the armor of caste riveted by centuries transcending in number the Mosaic figures to the degree of trenching on the misty line of the geologist, and he will do a "big thing." And let the other melt in the crucible of argument the traditionary prejudices of our era—then what?

Come up, Tom, Dick, and Harry, and comfort yourselvs with a nip from the old bottle of the pulpit:

> There is rest for the weary
> In the sweet by and by.

Unquestioning obedience brings harmony. Obedience to what? "Ay, there's the rub." Error sits only in our neighbor's house, and—wise fellows that we are—not without a protest against the local nuisance.

What are the chances for Western intellectual elevation, beyond the small arc of the cranial circle that takes cognizance of amassing shekels? True, the old faith no longer cramps the mind, but what are the promises for the intellect of the future? Enterprise rules the hour. The counting-room is now the stronghold of the ruling baron. Power holds court in the chamber of commerce, sending its edicts forth by steam and electricity, subordinating common interests.

Tom, Dick, and Harry be damned.

Yet, despite all that, and the lines of the Lake poet to boot,

> The good old simple plan:
> That they may take who hav the power,
> And they may keep who can—

I say, despite these things, the day of the marauder is coming to a close. Hav courage, Tom, Dick, and Harry. I repeat,

> There's a good time coming, boys;
> Wait a little longer.

In the universality of the protest against the inequalities of the present we see a spirit that will not "down" at bidding of Gods or men—altar, legislature, court, or Thug. The directing agency of the future neutralizes the spell of the foul demon of the past; an agency heard in the discussion of the land question, seen in the flaunting banners of organized labor, felt in the frenzied efforts of bossism to overrule by law the boycott of the unions. The spirit of the "sections," too, says, "We bide our time."

It may be that Tom, Dick, and Harry see with but feeble vision the presages we speak of; noting but the shadows of the coming events, unmindful of the majestic presence of the vanguard; not even aware of the skirmishers who hav invaded the market-place. They are there, however, notwithstanding the blindness of our humble trinity. T., D., and H. must hav their eyes anointed with more than spit and clay, and well rubbed in, before they can be made to see and hail the coming legions of the future rushing with nimble feet over the abatis and rifle-pits of the enemy, silencing their batteries.

Tom, Dick, and Harry hav so long lived in the illusion of millionairism and the altar, bowing before them with the adoration of the sun-worshiper, that they hav become blinded to other objects. "Put money in thy purse," has been to them the Iago lesson of life; and bending to it some hav raked the loose change of the dickerer into their keeping, as the chiffonier hooks from filthy heaps the accidental droppings of the household; godsends making them accept the gospel of the trickster as their best means of securing the plenty that assures them, through the hireling priests, of the favor of heaven, telling them that all differences in social life exist in obedience to the will of God, assurances given in the same breath with texts of scripture to the suffering many; such as: "Subdue the lust of gain, my brethren; cultivate obedience to the divine will, and greater will be your reward than loaded vaults of filthy lucre. Law and order demand obedience to authority," they add.

Poor Tom, Dick, and Harry do not seem to know that law and order, as a shibboleth of the unjust ruler, is a something partaking so much of the character of the kaleidoscope that, presto! they change to suit the moment. As witness over in "merrie England:" a certain British marquis, speaking in his place in the House of Lords in vindication of the legislation by which miles of commons were taken up and incorporated into contiguous individual estates, so depriving the local poor of their use as gardens and as grazing ground for goats, donkeys, and an occasional cow, said: "People were guilty of sedition in questioning the legality of these innovations, the changes having been made by sacred acts of Parliament." A defense of baronial theft to which Joseph Arch, a representativ of labor, himself a workingman, but a member of Parliament, made reply, giving the true meaning of the phrase "law and order." Said Arch: "The marquis tells us we lay ourselvs open to the charge of sedition in questioning the robbery of the commons and despoiling the poor of their God-given heritage. Let me tell him that when we laborers get the power, the land shall return to us and by equally sacred acts of Parliament."

Heads up, Tom, Dick, and Harry. Bide your time. It is coming. Evolution is your friend. Our social system is a common scourge. There can be no civilization till the balance-wheel of right is so nicely adjusted in our social and industrial system that the withholding of what is needed for the best health and the highest culture will stir the community as would the commission of a great crime in our midst.

Tom, Dick, and Harry, I am with you even unto the end. 74.

Le Roy, N. Y.

Boston and Pittsburgh.

Thou hypocrit, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye (Matt. vii, 5).

We hav been reminded of this text of scripture by reading the fierce discussion or contest now raging in Boston and Pittsburgh over the question of teaching or excluding the topic of religion from the public schools in those cities. The difficulty arises between the two branches of the Christian church—that is to say, the Catholics and the Protestants. Both of these claim the name of Christians. To an outsider —one who does not believe in either church nor yet in Christianity as taught by both those branches of the church, the difference is simply between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

To us it is rather amusing than otherwise to see how those Christians love one another, and it induces a feeling akin to that expressed by the old woman as she witnessed the fight between her husband and the bear, when she remarked that "she didn't care much which whipped." It is a singular circumstance that the professed followers of Jesus the Christ, the same that Christianity takes its name from, and upon whom both the Catholic and the Protestant church claims to be founded, should be found to differ as widely as they do, while both believe in and use the same Bible, with only slight variations in the translations, which, however, do not change the essential facts.

Now, both claim that the Bible is the word of God, and that a belief in and acceptance of what it teaches are absolute necessities, if one would be happy both now and forever—that is to say, if we would escape hell and enjoy heaven in the next life. Now, they both seem to teach what they deem to be the sacred truths of that book, and the main difficulty seems to be in the time and methods.

The Catholics desire exclusiv schools in which they will teach religion according to their understanding of it, and likewise according to the traditions and instructions of their church. They wish to use their own translation of the Bible and employ only teachers of their own faith, which must always be of the consecrated and sanctified order of the priesthood; and they only shall read and expound the scriptures, believing that it is dangerous for the unconsecrated to read or hav the Bible in their possession. And for this the Catholics contend.

The Protestants allow all their subjects to read their Bibles, but disallow any construction to be put upon it except and only such as their church and their creeds and their theological schools shall prescribe.

They claim that their Bible is the true one, and a much better translation than the Catholic Bible is. And now against the authority of law both are contending for supremacy. The Protestants, however, by tolerance, hav practiced reading the Bible in many of the public schools, and prayers are said by the teachers daily. And it is a practice in all state institutions, such as the normal schools, state universities, all the charitable and penal institutions that are under the patronage of state governments, to hav the Bible read and prayers repeated daily, and in some schools that we know of songs or gospel hymns are sung, and these are called devotional exercises. Now, it is entirely pertinent to inquire by what right or authority is the time taken in those schools for those devotional exercises by the Protestants and disallowing the same privileges to the Catholics. Only let the reading from the Catholic Bible be substituted for the Protestant Bible, to say nothing about praying and song-singing, and immediately a tumultuous howl of objection would go up from every Protestant throat in the land.

It remains to be shown that the Catholics desire to use more time in teaching their form of religion in their schools than the Protestants are now, and hav all along been, using in the public and state schools. And still the fact remains that neither Protestants nor Catholics hav any warrant by law to spend any time, which is both the time and money of the state, in teaching any religion; not even a half hour in each day, because such use of the time is in total disregard and opposition to organic law, which says, in Article I, Amendment of the Constitution of the United States: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," etc.

Education is carefully provided for in all the states, and laws are enacted by which no portion of the public funds shall be used for sectarian or religious purposes. Hence we say that reading the Bible, prayers, and the singing of gospel songs in the public schools and state institutions is as much a violation of law as it would be to allow the Catholics to appropriate the school funds to the support of their schools.

It should be remarked in this connection, however, that the laity of the Catholic church are satisfied with the law as it is, and with the present school system, as the funds are now appropriated. But the whole difficulty originates with the priesthood, the hierocracy of that church. They are a mob of hypocritical, designing, selfish, unscrupulous tyrants. They seek to lord it over the American people and American institutions as they do over their deluded followers in those countries where education is at a discount.

They foster ignorance and credulity in their people, because these are their stock and staple by which they liv and thrive.

They well know that as soon as their children become educated, their intelligence will lead them away from their church, and hence their efforts to hold them in ignorance in order to supply their church with fresh recruits, and thus perpetuate their own power over a system that is as false as hell.

But bad as the hierarchy of the Catholic church are at the present time, they are still far behind their God and the license he givs them in his holy Bible to commit wickedness in all its worst forms.

A fair idea of the character of the Christian God may be obtained by reading the twenty-eighth chapter of the book of Deuteronomy, beginning at the fifteenth verse.

Christians claim to hav both God and devil in their system. But if their God has truly described himself in the Bible, it would seem quite unnecessary to employ a devil. He would simply be a superfluity and as unnecessary as the fifth wheel to a wagon. The God represented in the Bible would be equal to any emergency without the aid of any devil.

Hence, then, the devil is more ornamental than useful, his functions being supplied by his superior.

J. C. N. ABBOTT.

The Morality of Man.

What are morals?

Morals are all laws, written and unwritten, by the observation of which the great human family may lead a harmonious, well-regulated life.

The necessity of suppressing certain dispositions in man, which become more and more dangerous as human society grows, has made it necessary to establish certain fixed laws of morality.

These few words describe, in a brief manner, the nature as well as the reason for morality of man, and the task, hardly begun, would end here already if I was only sure that I am fully understood, but there are phenomena probably so seldom investigated by many of my readers, that I consider it my duty to refer to some of them particularly, so as to make sure of a mutual understanding.

To fully understand the meaning of morality, we must observe man in all the stages of his gradual development; if we do otherwise—that is, study only civilized beings—the great organized society of high culture—we will be misled, for the very simple reason that the roots of high culture must hav been laid already in the lowest stages of existence from which mankind developed to its present high state.

To begin with the man in his primitiv condition, we observe that he knows nothing of morals, and that he does not form any large society on account of the preponderance of his brute inclinations.

Among semi-cultured races of man we notice the beginning of morals; their life is more social, the family ties are more firm, and some of the brute inclinations are suppressed.

The more a race advances in civilization the higher it stands in morality; its social relations grow steadier; its politics become more developed, and it commences to form a large and well-organized nation.

Morality, therefore, begins with the first constraint which man himself lays upon his brute inclinations, and with the moment in which he sees that his own unruled inclinations are a danger to the formation and preservation of communities, and larger societies composed of individuals of different races of mankind.

Morality thus becomes the basis for all other laws, traditional and social, and the social laws are only a written compendium of morality for human society.

To think that morality is the product of the spiritual and ideal life of whole races would be a mistake, because all the moral laws of the past and present are the results of the studies and the work of single individuals. These men, by their superior mental power to detect the weaknesses in their fellow-men and their evil influence upon social life, and by their drawing conclusions based upon their observations, and their finding ways and means for the suppression of such evils, become the founders of human society, of culture, of order, of scientific progress, and of the laws of morality.

We call them "philosophers," "pioneers of truth," but in reality they are, and always hav been, "the pioneers of civilization;" they hav elevated humanity from its animal existence to the high culture of to-day.

Some thinkers of our times claim that there is a more pleasant cause for morality than I do. They say, for instance:

"Morality is a feeling embodied in man;" or, "Every religion represents the sum of different moral laws."

I cannot deny that such a definition of morality is somewhat justified by the individual life of all highly cultivated races of to-day, but speaking of mankind in general, such definitions are entirely wrong, for the following reasons:

1. The religions of all primitiv human beings are in many instances wholly devoid of morals; they are the results of a great fear, and still greater inquisitivness.

2. Primitiv human beings form only small and very loose communities.

3. Only the religions of higher, cultivated races are, more or less, interwoven with morality, in accordance with the state of their culture.

4. All religions are more or less based upon fear of punishment by some god or gods, i. e., personifications of the mysterious powers of nature, after death.

The theoretical results of our search for truth are very pleasant, but when we commence to compare with real facts, the reverse is the case.

To prove the correctness of my former assertion, that the morality of man is, and always has been, the result of the labors of a few wise men, I wish to call attention to the history of man.

I refer to Moses, the leader, the prophet, the creator of the grand Ten Commandments. All deeds of the great warriors, philosophers, inventors, and discoverers; of the emperors and politicians of ancient and modern times together, had not the lasting and powerful influence upon men which the one great deed of Moses at the foot of the mount Sinai had. Moses has created, and through the great fear of his people of the great Jehovah, forced his tribe to accept his creation as a law, and his law has become the foundation for all laws and all the morality of all the civilized nations—laws which are as good to-day as they were thousands of years ago!

Are not our own laws, and those of all highly civilized nations of to-day, based upon the Ten Commandments?

Are the many variations in our laws anything else but definitions of the laws:

Thou shalt not steal.

Thou shalt not kill.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Thou shalt not bear false witness.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, house, servant, etc.?

The Greeks had laws, so did the Romans, but with the advance of Christianity they were transformed and adapted to the Mosaic laws, and the latter spread continually over the whole world, enforcing progress of civilization wherever they came.

What was the reason that Moses gave those laws? He gave his Ten Commands because he had discovered the roots of the evils which threatened to destroy the organization and the family life of his people, and which finally would hav destroyed the existence of his entire nation. He also knew that the commands alone would not destroy the evils, and therefore gave them out as laws of God.

Thus it was that Moses, knowing the great power of religious fear over men, placed the much-feared, all-powerful, and revengeful Jehovah in his place as the creator of the Commandments.

The Israelites of that time were but a semi-cultured nation, and remained so a long time after—in fact, until Christ made his appearance.

Christ was, after Moses, the next greatest philosopher and moralist. He, as well as Mohammed, had three features in common with Moses—they were creators of laws, founders of new forms of religion, and used the power of existing religious fear to giv their creations stability. Neither, however, was as great as Moses, and Christ as well as Mohammed made the Mosaic law the basis of their improvements.

Jesus knew by personal experience that the stern religion of the Jews only increased the brute inclinations in man: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth." Such a law could only prove a drawback to the development of love and humanity. He saw that the revengefulness of the Jewish nation was the cause of their endless sufferings at the hands of other nations, therefore he gave different laws—his morals of humanity. Let us be thankful to him.

By what means did Christ transform the results of his philosophy into a constraint upon his people's disastrous inclinations? He followed the footsteps of Moses, but having a headstrong people before him, he made his laws still more powerful, and in the completion of his task he risked his very life—and lost it—and declared himself to be the son of the great Jehovah.

Only five hundred years after Christ Mohammed appeared as philosopher and moralist; but what Mohammed could not gain through religious authority like Christ he gained through the help of the sword. He was rich and powerful and therefore could afford to do so.

The history of mankind and ethnography shows that all morality of man consists of a constraint of his brute inclinations forced upon him by single individuals and with the help of religious fear. It further shows that morality is the result of philosophy, and has caused the fast development of mankind to higher stages of culture. Morality, therefore, is no inherent power in man to decide about his own actions, but a constraint forced upon him by others for his own welfare.

When the history of Freethought is written, high in the temple of its famous names that of Samos Parsons will be inscribed, for few men hav done more for Freethought and progress, and none hav more liberally sustained the cause. We feel the more under obligations to his generous support from the fact that he has imagined us a fiery petroulase and a sort of holy terror generally, but I assure him that I am quite mobil, amiable, and gentle, and glad I can agree with him heartily in the matter of Secularization of the state. During the times which tried men in this vicinity I wrote my impressions and never replied to any criticisms or attacks made upon me—never replied to a purely personal attack, no matter how vile. My friends would not believe it, and my enemies—well, I could always afford to let them howl. Brother Parsons need not be afraid of my belligerence. I am never spoiling for a fight.

Well, I am glad to know that our pioneer of San José desires "To help our cause all I can. I want my brother Freethinkers to all come up and take life-memberships and also try and giv a life membership to every Freethought lady in the land." And the venerable warrior closes with, "If we giv priestcraft and superstition a hard fight we will hav all we want to do."

Photius Fisk is another Freethought philanthropist who spends his declining days in doing good for the coming generations. Instead of needing urging to duty, he is always anticipating what is most necessary to be done. Through his noble philanthropy and sterling devotion to justice the name of Photius Fisk is so well known and highly honored that any word here seems superfluous. Suffice it to say that this patriarch was not forgotten when the list of vice-presidents was made at the last Congress, and as a slight recognition he was prominently placed among them.

From a Noank, Conn., subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER a postal order for $25 was received. This modest person is apparently not willing to allow the left hand to know the good the right is doing. The letter says, "When you begin proceedings against the Girard College trustees I will chip in again." Good!

Brother Baker was at the Chicago Congress and apologizingly forwards his pledge of $5 from Sweet Home. That it may be the sweetest home in Indiana is the desire of the writer.

We take this occasion to thank our devoted friend, Wm. Walker, of Dwight, for his contribution paid over while enjoying himself at our entertainment, when Brother Putnam was among us. We can always count on Brother Walker.

W. I. Haldiman sent us $5 to the Congress as an evidence of his earnestness, and after considerable traveling around it came to hand all right.

Ida M. Merritt, secretary of the Fairmont Secular Union, forwards a charter fee. This frontier fortress of Freethought is the work of Geo. H. Dawes, who promises to organize a dozen during this year. He being the latest addition to our lecturers, it does seem as though the older ones might do much more in that direction.

J. F. Beck sends for a charter for West Union, O., where they organized just prior to the Congress.

Our enthusiastic friend Robinett is going to do five times as much if possible. He is a whole-souled Liberal.

Through Brother Dawes we receive Mr. Alexander's contribution, and the sender says: "He is a sturdy veteran of Freethought of seventy-four. Age has neither dimmed his earnestness nor enthusiasm, and he is the possessor of a valuable library. No theologian will cross swords with the old gentleman but once."

Wm. Reynolds is always ready to help the cause and inspire others to do the same. He is a stalwart.

Chas. Lownd forwards $2, and words of warmest praise for the work done last year, for which we thank him most sincerely. Mr. Lownd is full of enthusiasm for the cause of justice. We hope to see him soon.

Brother Jaques is the earnest, intelligent worker of Akron, and we hav great hopes that through his labors a powerful Union will be built up. He writes:

> You may well be proud of having such an able and talented lady as Mrs. M. A. Freeman in your midst. "Cross and Crown," which she delivered here Sunday, is par excellence. I met one of our friends this morning who declared she was equal to the champion, R. G. Ingersoll. I am only sorry she did not hav a larger audience; but should we succeed in organizing, she will be heard again in this city.
> I am yours for freedom of thought, JOHN JAQUES.

John Nuessle is stirring up our friends at Hamburgh and already has the nucleus of a noble band who stand for universal mental liberty.

Our earnest friend Spencer is alive to the issues of the hour; and why should he not be, for, though eighty-one, he reads every line of THE TRUTH SEEKER each week?

Scarcely anything givs us more pleasure than to see a thoroughly united Freethought family such as the Seldes. It is not Father, Son, and Holy Ghost that they are interested in so much as mother, father, and son. I should not wonder—but Brothers Fress and Wies are sons-in-law in Liberalism.

Brother Crane is one of Wm. Reynolds's recruits, and we hope to hear from him.

A. W. Noble, a friend of Mr. Dawes, and formerly a fellow-teacher, is a well-educated and splendid young man who has given lectures on Liberalism and thinks of entering that precarious profession, the Liberal lecture field. E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

John Fiske on Thomas Paine.

Critics, I saw, that other names deface,
And fix their own, with labor, in their place.
—Pope's Temple of Fame.

An extract of about five hundred words from an article by John Fiske in the Atlantic Monthly on the merits and demerits of Thomas Paine as a writer is before me. Were I to judge the merits of Professor Fiske by this portion of his essay, I would be justified in characterizing him as a literary charlatan. Almost every sentence contains an error, some of which are inexcusable. The most important of them I will repeat in his own words. He says:

> Franklin had secured Paine employment as editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine.
> Paine had a crude, undisciplined mind, and was quite devoid of scholarship. He succeeded in making everybody read what he wrote, and achieved a popular reputation out of all proportion to his real merit. His "Age of Reason" contains much crude argument. Its tone is coarse and dull, and, with the improvement in popular education, is fast sinking into complete and deserved oblivion.
> Paine published his "Common Sense" on the suggestion of Benjamin Rush, and with the approval of Franklin and Samuel Adams.
> The pamphlet is full of scurrilous abuse of the English people.
> It resorts to such stupid arguments as the denial of the English origin of the Americans.

Some of the above allegations, I concede, are based upon apparently good authority, but they are all nevertheless false.

The Pennsylvania Magazine was started by Robert Aitkin, a bookseller. After issuing one number he applied to Paine for assistance in writing for it. Paine accordingly contributed anonymous articles to the second and several subsequent numbers. But in a letter to Dr. Franklin, dated March 4, 1775, he says, "I hav not entered into terms with him;" and doubtless he never did, for we know that Paine never wrote for pay. Nor did he remain in Philadelphia long after the date of that letter; he went back to England secretly—probably to procure gunpowder, saltpeter, and arms—and did not return to America until near the close of the year 1775.

Paine was as well educated as Abraham Lincoln or Horace Greeley, and was superior to either as a writer. Therefore to say that he had "a crude and undisciplined mind and was devoid of scholarship" is contemptible priggery.

He "succeeded in making everybody read what he wrote," because he was the finest writer of that time. This is conceded by the most competent critics, among whom I will name Van Buren Denslow, Robert G. Ingersoll, Charles A. Dana, and A. R. Spofford. And I am sure none of them will admit that Paine "achieved a popular reputation out of all proportion to his real merit."

To say that Paine's "'Age of Reason' contains much crude argument"—that "its tone is coarse and dull," and that "it is fast sinking into deserved oblivion," is what we might expect from a bigoted priest who never read the "Age of Reason." Its tone is neither coarse nor dull, its argument is not crude, and there is no work of the kind written in the last century that is half as much read now as Paine's "Age of Reason."

Paine did not publish his "Common Sense" at the suggestion of Benjamin Rush or anybody else. I know that Dr. Rush, in a letter to Cheetham in 1809, claimed for himself the first suggestion of the work and even of the title, saying that Paine read the sheets to him, and that when finished he advised him to submit the manuscript to Dr. Franklin, Samuel Adams, and Judge Wilson. That Franklin saw it and struck out a passage, and that he believes Adams also saw it. All this is untrue, as may be seen in Paine's "Crisis No. 3," where he states that he did not at this time know either of the Adamses, and that he surprised even Dr. Franklin with the first printed copy. And again he writes in 1802: "In my publications I follow the rule I began with in 'Common Sense'— that is, to consult nobody—not to let anybody see what I write till it appears publicly."

Dr. Rush was vice-president of the Philadelphia Bible Society and was distinguished for his piety. He was writing to Cheetham about what occurred thirty-four years before, and his letter is full of errors, some of which are corrected by Cheetham in the publication. Cheetham himself was a notorious liar, and he may hav tampered with Dr. Rush's letter.

And, by the way, Cheetham's judgment of the merits of Paine's literary work is much the same as that of Professor Fiske. He says "it has no merit," is "defectiv in arrangement, inelegant in diction, with no profundity of argument, no felicity of remark, no extent of research, no classical allusion, nor comprehension of thought."

But unfortunately, in reverting to the subject of literary style, Cheetham stultifies himself. The "Declaration of the Thatched House Tavern," in 1791, was attributed to Horne Tooke. In Part 2 of Paine's "Rights of Man" he says that Horne Tooke, having spoken much in commendation of the Declaration, and being jocularly accused of praising his own work, to free him from this embarassment, and to save him the repeated trouble of mentioning the author, as he has not failed to do, "I make no hesitation in saying that I drew up the publication in question."

Unwilling to rob "the great grammarian" of the credit of the composition, Cheetham says this is doubtless a falsehood and adds:

> No one could mistake the uncouth and ungrammatical writings of the one for the correct and elegant productions of the other.

One more critical remark of Cheetham, I venture to quote:

> Wretched as Paine's "Common Sense" is in point of literary merit, his "Rights of Man," a pandect of Anarchy, is still inferior. Horne Tooke, it was said, corrected its grammatical errors, but every page of the work refutes the assertion.

Cheetham was a British Tory, who, by abuse and falsehood, while editor of a New York paper, brought upon himself many prosecutions. Paine demanded a public apology from him for falsehood in October, 1807, under penalty of a prosecution, and said, "You cannot even state truth without running it into falsehood."

In order to prove the truth of Paine's statement that he never consulted anybody about what he published, I will advert to a popular fiction published more than thirty-five years ago, and frequently republished since. George Lippard, the novelist, drew upon his imagination for a thrilling scene in a lonely room at night in Philadelphia, just after the battle of Bunker Hill. George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Benjamin Rush, and John Adams are solemnly debating the crisis. A visitor in homely garb is announced. He is introduced by Franklin as Thomas Paine. He is informed of the topic of discussion. With flashing eye and earnest words he horrifies them with his political blasphemy. But as he goes on and pictures the glorious future of Independent America, the universal empire of the Western continent, he makes converts of all four on the spot. They press the stranger in the brown coat by the hand, and Washington, in a voice deepened by emotion, begs him to "write these words in a book."

This story is as fictitious as that of the little hatchet. The news of the battle of Bunker Hill reached Thomas Paine in London, whereupon he at once wrote "A Crisis Extraordinary," which was published August 9, 1775. It was signed "Casca," and was one of a series of similar papers contributed anonymously to "The Crisis" during the year 1775 and 1776 until after the Declaration of Independence.

But to return to Professor Fiske; he says that "'Common Sense' is full of scurrilous abuse of the English people."

O shame, where is thy blush? Paine was preëminently the friend of the people, and the enemy of their oppressors. Nor is there a sentence or a word in "Common Sense" to support Professor Fiske's assertion. Could he hav read the pamphlet enough to know what it contains? Or did he borrow the assertion and repeat it on trust?

And when the professor adds that the writer "resorts to such stupid arguments as the denial of the English origin of the Americans," he shamefully perverts the language of "Common Sense." This is what the writer says:

Europe, and not England, is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. . . . Not one-third of the inhabitants even of this province (Pennsylvania) are of English descent. Wherefore I reprobate the phrase of parent or mother country, applied to England. But admitting that we are all of English descent, what does it amount to? Nothing. Britain, being now an open enemy, extinguishes every other name and title, and to say that reconciliation is our duty is truly farcical. The first king of England, of the present line (William the Conqueror), was a Frenchman, and half the peers of England are descendants from the same country; wherefore, by the same reasoning, England ought to be governed by France.

I am aware that the rules of grammar are sometimes violated in Paine's works. And these were the principal faults dwelt upon by his critics. But I hav good reasons to believe that these trifling faults were intentional, which reasons I forbear now to state.

In regard to scholarship he made no pretension. But I find in many of his secret essays, especially in the letters of "Casca," Latin quotations with a free translation. Paine was also familiar with the French language, which he sometimes quoted. He was also a poet of no mean capacity, and while in Paris he wrote and published a short poem entitled, "What Is Love?" which is unexceptionably fine. But he was too practical to waste his time in verse-making, and devoted his life to the good of mankind. Nor was he at all devoid of the education and learning requisit for the work he attempted to do.

WM. HENRY BURR.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

UINTAH, UTAH, Sept. 24.—This can scarcely be called a village, but is a thoroughly Mormon agricultural settlement. It was near this station that in 1862 the notorious Morrisite massacre was perpetrated.

The country between here and Ogden is very fertil where water is obtainable. Grain and vegetables of all kinds grow to perfection, and yield abundantly. Charles De La Baume, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber, a scholarly French gentleman, with a passionate love for horticulture, has a very beautiful and most productiv vegetable farm. With Brothers A. Bowman and Thomas H. Peck he can occasionally indulge in interchange of Liberal ideas, but it seems incongruous for a gentleman of birth and erudition to be content to abide with such uncongenial neighbors as the average Mormon.

The lecture was at the school-house. There was a good attendance, and it created quite a furore. It is to be hoped that the free distribution of sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the sale of Liberal pamphlets, will result in the redemption of some of the honest and intelligent.

MORGAN, UTAH, Sept. 25, 26.—From the light and beauty of Uintah the train rushes through a gap in the mountains, crossing a bridge high above the seething whirl of waters, where massiv, frowning rocks rear their gigantic crests far up toward the Witches' Caldron—on, on, on we climb; up, up, up through the wild, weird scenery of the Devil's Gate, plunge into the dark and gloomy gorge, then out into the beautiful valley, on, on, till we stop at Weber Station (post-office, Morgan). Waiting to greet me I found good Brother D. Williams, a stanch Liberal, who was for many years a most devout Mormon, but his eyes once opened, he escaped from the cruel despotism of the church, and now rejoices in mental freedom. He and his son do about all the business done here, their store and warehouse being the only business places outside of the Z. C. M. I. store, the post-office, a lager-beer saloon, and a blacksmith shop. I greatly enjoyed my visit at the happy home of Brother Williams, and learned while there much of the true inwardness of Mormonism from those who had passed the dire ordeal, as well as from some who remain inmeshed in its relentless toils.

I delivered a lecture at the school-house, which was packed with earnest listeners. In my first lecture I always smooth down the fretful porcupine quills of the opposition, show how we are all more or less prejudiced—the result of lack of honest investigation—and so are apt to condemn that which, if we really understood, we needs must commend. I impress the fact that securing heaven here and now by lives of love and ministrations of benevolence is the very best and surest way to secure heaven in the future, if heaven in the future there be. Thus I win the hearty good will of the majority present, avoid stirring their prejudice, but induce the honest to begin to read and investigate. A good Mormon bishop, who attended the lecture, came to the house of Brother Williams that same night, despite the lateness of the hour, and purchased a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason." There will be some loss of tithes next year as the result.

September 26.—The Wednesday night lecture was advertised at the school-house in Brother L. P. Edholm's neighborhood, about six miles up the valley. Brother Edholm has had full experience of the delights of celestial marriage (threefold), but by reading Freethought publications he was delivered from the subtle snare; obtained executiv clemency, and has provided for his other two families, who are now far away, and although this necessitated division of his property and left him in comparativ poverty, he now finds full compensation in the peace and happiness afforded by having one, and one only, wife, a truly noble woman and real helpmate, and their bright, happy little ones. I was surprised to find so many people at the lecture, wondered where they all came from, but in this country it is astonishing how small a dwelling will accommodate a large number of people.

The prospects for advancement of Liberalism are bright and hopeful in Weber valley.

ECHO, UTAH, Sept. 27.—From Weber station I was whirled so fast by the train that I only just caught a glimpse of the Devil's Slide—immense serrated rocks—two ridges of granit reaching from the river nearly to the summit of a sloping grass-clad mountain. The rocks are from fifty to two hundred feet high; the two ridges run parallel about ten feet apart. A few miles farther and we come to Lone Tree, an old solitary, scraggy pine; suspended from its lowest limb is a sign-board that tells western-bound travelers they hav passed over one thousand miles of rails since leaving Omaha. Next our interest is centered on those queer red, yellow, and gray conglomerations called Witches' Rocks, more generally known as Plum Pudding Rocks. They stand out in bold relief in all sorts of odd, queer shapes, and fill us with wonder till we reach Echo City, forty-one miles from Ogden, at an altitude of 5,500 feet.

Echo is the biggest little place I ever visited, and it has more big-hearted, large-brained Liberal folks to the quarter acre than any other place in Utah.

The "city" is situated on the eastern bank of the Weber river, half a mile below the mouth of Echo canon. The little valley is not more than half a mile in width. Excepting a few gardens, stock-raising is the only occupation of the people. The few houses afford dwellings for the railroad employees. The only really beautiful residence and garden is that of jolly Fred Hirst, the station agent. He is a paragon Liberal, an educated gentleman, a scientist and deep thinker, with none of the pedantry of erudition, but a jolly, whole souled, big-hearted man, with a noble, bright, good woman for wife, and two bright, intelligent, pretty little daughters, making his life a perpetual delight and his home a very paradise.

I had a large and intelligent audience at Echo school-house, and long for the delight of complying with the oft-repeated request to "come again."

COALVILLE, UTAH, Sept. 28, 29.—From Echo, a branch of the Union Pacific railroad runs up the Weber river to Park City. Just before leaving the main track and turning south, we pass the noted "Pulpit rock," on the top of which, it is said, Brigham Young preached his first sermon in Utah. This is doubtless only tradition, but the Echo canon is a wondrous reality, and has been the scene of untold horrors—massacres of fleeing fugitivs who dared rebel, to denounce the rapacity of the priesthood, and attempted to return to the states; doomed wretches cut off from the church (throats cut), cut off by the ministrations of the Danites or Destroying Angels, to say nothing of hundred upon hundred who perished by cold and starvation, having crossed the plains, weak, weary, emaciated, provisions having given out—for weeks their only food a quarter of a pound of flour stirred in water—delayed, impeded by the dreadful snow, vast numbers dying almost in sight of Zion. Coalville is a large Mormon village, with a grand, stately temple, uncompleted, and of no real use, and extensiv coal mines of very great use, affording employment to the people. I delivered two lectures at the school-house. Brother Smith bantered and poked fun at the grand mogul, the presiding bishop of the stake, telling him he must attend the lecture; that on the first night I offered to answer all questions, but no one responded, and the bishop would lose all his flock if he did not go to their rescue, etc. The bishop did not attend, but issued a decree for Mormons to keep away, and they did. Coalville is a hot-bed of superstition, yet there are brave, independent Liberals enough there to eventually work a reformation.

SALT LAKE CITY, Sept. 30.—Despite lack of advertising and absence of lights in front of the Opera House, there was considerably larger attendance than the first Sunday. I received many encomiums for the delivery of the lecture, "The Bible: Whence It Came, and What It Really Teaches."

TO LIBERALS OF NEBRASKA AND DAKOTA.

I propose to lecture in Nebraska during November and December, and Dakota during January. Friends in those states desiring my services will please write me at once to Evanston, Wyo. Terr. My terms are $20 for three lectures, friends paying hotel bill. One lecture, $10. Letters addressed to me at Evanston, Wyo. Terr., will be promptly forwarded.

Nov. 3, 1888. C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Toe-joint Postscript.

[Since I sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER the brief article on "Toe-joint Spiritualism," I hav received, via Mrs. Slenker, an account of the séance with the Fox girls in 1853 to which I alluded, written out by my friend himself, with permission to offer it for publication. I will only add that the "deceased" person inquired of by Mr. Parkhurst was his brother John, a bachelor, still living, and that the "spirits" rapped out the number of his children.—BURR.]

In March, 1853, I made two visits to the séances of the Fox girls in Washington, D. C. I quote results from memoranda published at the time. At the first visit I noticed that questions were answered with remarkable accuracy when the mind of the questioner was concentrated upon the answer. I had hitherto generally received in Spiritual circles distinct, certain, and correct answers. Suspecting that the answers were dictated by the will, I took care on the first evening not to will any answers to my questions. I received faint, uncertain, and incorrect answers, Miss Fox thinking it was an infant that responded. My judgment was: "I think therefore that there were no communications from spirits that evening. The disposition of these mediums is not careful, candid scrutiny, nor even a respectful treatment of the opinions of others. Hence I should be much more surprised to find them acknowledging the true explanation, than I am at their having started the commonly received doctrin of spirits."

After writing the above I made my second visit. This time I prepared a set of questions and answers comprising a purely fictitious case. After a series of unsatisfactory replies to four other parties I commenced my questions. The person asked for responded at the third trial. My prearranged questions, interspersed with others, were then all answered without hesitation, in obedience to my will. The only exception out of about a dozen questions was this: It was suggested that I should ask of what disease he died. As the person was not dead and the question had not occurred to me, I hesitated in selecting one. When I asked with regard to the one I selected, the answer was, No. "Was that what it was supposed to be?" said I. "Yes," was the unhesitating reply. My last question was: "Is it my own spirit which produces these rappings?" "Yes." The question had been asked in writing, and I leaned back in my chair, indicating that I was through. "Is that correct?" inquired Miss Fox. "I suppose so; I was not certain. Is the spirit confident that that is right?" "Yes," rapped the spirit, unhesitatingly.

My solution at the time was this: "The questioner wills the answer, and the medium, perceiving the volition, produces or aids in producing the rappings."

Now the same medium declares that it was all fraud, that she produced the rappings with her toes. I do not know but she did, but I do know that she had enough power of mind-reading, if that was so, to read all the answers I willed to my questions, while she had not enough to read the questions themselvs. Her present avowal does not meet the case, for it does not explain the many tests which she gave, which convinced so many of the genuinness of the manifestations. I did not trust her then. I do not trust her denial now. Whatever her tests were worth then, they are worth now. If there were spirits aiding her, I biologized them by my will, or they were mischievous enough to join in the deception without her knowledge. It was the intelligence in the answers that was alone of value; if that came from disembodied spirits, who cares whether she produced the raps with her toes or how they were produced? She now meets only the subordinate issue.

A Step on the Road to Ruin.

From the Hebrew Journal.

The influence of the act of Congress authorizing the escheating of the property of the Mormon church is seen in the decree of the Utah supreme court dissolving that church, and substantially confiscating its property. This decree will, of course, come up before the United States Supreme Court for final adjudication. We think it will be a sorry day for those who advocate religious freedom if the Court shall determin that the provision of our Constitution is a nullity which prohibits Congress from making any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. The Mormon belief, outside of polygamy, is not more repugnant to non believers than some others; and while our citizens hav looked with approval on the government's endeavor to stamp out this practice, as being in violation of the morality and of the spirit of the civilized world, yet this new step not only infringes our great charter, but is an insidious step countenancing those bigoted Protestants who seek to secure "God in the Constitution," meaning thereby their own peculiar religious belief and custom, and the utter exclusion of their neighbors'. This intolerance crops up in our common school management occasionally, and needs stamping on vigorously by every friend of freedom of conscience.

Mrs. Freeman Wants Her Say.

Of course everyone has heard by this time all about the Pittsburgh Congress. They hav heard, too, all about the wonderful old city nestling among the picturesque hills. The road that leads to it is not the "strait and narrow path" of legendary lore, but a sinuous, serpentine, winding way, impartially turning toward every point of the compass. This interminable turning and twisting proved too much of an agitation for some of the delegates, especially "our boys," and to the amusement of their more hardy, and perhaps more hardened, companions, they became wretchedly seasick.

The woods were aglow with the many-tinted colors of autumnal beauty—golden, russet, red, and brown. The ragged rocks, towering upward, defiantly met the shifting clouds, that for some unexplained reason wept profusely over the city of Pittsburgh during the week of the Congress. Nor would they be comforted—the clouds, I mean. It was a week of cold comfort, anyway. Whether this mourning was due to its own Jonahs, or whether to the strangers abiding within its gates, history has not affirmed. It is a fine old town, there is no denying that, with the rush and roar of a miniature Chicago. But here the resemblance ends. Many of its streets are like alleys. The old nursery rhyme involuntarily presents itself to the mind:

I was forced to go to London to buy myself a wife,
The way was so long and the streets were so narrow,
That I was forced to bring her home on a wheelbarrow.

Pittsburgh is set down at the foot of big mountains of coal and iron, the houses here and there ambitiously creeping to their very tops, and peering from the edges of abrupt precipices as though in wanton play. One feels like shouting up to them a word of caution. But the high-perched domicils seem as much at home as deer on Alpine hights, and the resident rushes up and down the hundred or so stony steps cut into the walls of rocky cliffs with the agility of a trained acrobat. The Pittsburgher is a good climber, and, if experience is worth anything, ought always to attain the hight of his ambition.

This used to be a black, smoky town—soot everywhere. It never looked up into the blue sky; its face was always clouded. It wore a sullen expression. Orthodoxy regarded it with dark suspicion. There were strange fires gleaming among its hills. There were deep, dark pits, and the heavy air was laden with sulphurous smells. Its citizens were ever on the alert to catch a glimpse of a cloven foot. This is the legend. And we may rest assured that the time was when there was no place so dark and forbidding as Pittsburgh. The wondrous magician, Science, lifted her mighty, potent wand and the clouds disappeared, the sun shone brightly, the city was aglow with light. She became at once a "thing of beauty and a joy forever." She stands to-day a resplendent monument, an imperishable example to the power of—gas! Gas rescued Pittsburgh—snatched her, as it were, a brand from the burning—forever silenced the dark accusation that through her winding ways lay the road to Pluto's realm.

The American Secular Union, remembering this, the triumph that had been achieved, inflated its lungs to their fullest extent, and proceeded to accomplish for the world at large—the universe included—what had already been done for Pittsburgh. It turned on the gas. There was a cry of pain. The light was too strong. The preachers waked up. They didn't like it. It disturbed their nap. The authorities were notified. They began to turn over old, musty volumes, looking for some antidotal and antiquated law of 1600 or so to silence the sacrilege. They stood up in their pulpits and howled. They lifted up their voices and wept. For four long, blessed days their life was made a burden to them, and they called upon their own mountains to fall down and hide them from the horrible glare of modern light. O for the good old days of Pittsburgh smoke and smudge—for the good old times when a man could be flogged for kissing his wife on Sunday! They solemnly informed the Congress that the time was soon to be when no heathen, no Infidel, no person who disbelieved the Bible, would be permitted to vote; and thereupon Charles Watts, with a dexterity for which he is noted, turned on such a flood of gas that every preacher ran into his cellar and barricaded the door, and on all the streets in Pittsburgh no godly man was seen. Like the ostrich, who hides by sticking his head into the sand, they closed their eyes to the world's progress, and the world moved back! It is a dangerous thing to blow out the gas. Many an old granger has come to grief through the experiment. Orthodox fossils should take warning. Died by asphyxiation, returns the coroner. Terrible decision! How much more horrible when the subject is asphyxiated and persists in living! Suspended mental animation. It struck the world once and sent it whirling backward a dozen centuries. Poor old superannuated mummies, crawl away into the dark if you will, but keep your sacrilegious hands off the throttles of the mighty forces that move the world.

To impress the city and its resources more thoroughly on the minds of the delegates, an escort was provided by the entertainment committee and they were taken to see the great Carnegie Iron Works. The delegation boarded a street-car. The escort forgot to get on. Left to the tender mercies of the driver, they were taken a mile or so beyond the appointed designation. After an hour's delay, amid much laughing and walking, the committee managed to gather together under its wings the wandering delegates, or rather the delegates managed to gather themselvs together under the committee's wings.

A shrewd suggestion presented itself to the brilliant minds of the escorted, whether this visit to the great iron foundry might not be intended as a significant object-lesson—a sort of a Dante's Inferno. This has already been hinted by the "mediumistic" Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and possibly had its influence in rendering him conspicuous on that occasion by his absence.

There were the seething, boiling caldrons, overflowing in heavy, hot streams of glowing liquid lava; the air was filled with brilliant showers of fiery coruscations, the horrible din was that of a pandemonium, and perched at the top of the great crucibles, seemingly almost ready to topple in, were human figures, which in the weird light it required only a little stretch of imagination to convert into the fabled devils of orthodox theology with the veritable pitchforks poking up the coals. It is no wonder that "Eugene" evaded the visit. The delegates nudged one another, pointing significantly to the realistic representation. They regarded it critically, recalling the story of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, remembering that these escaped unharmed from a fiery furnace seventy times hotter than the hottest iron. This iron was hot, there was no question as to that; it might safely be called extremely hot, the hottest hot, and yet that ancient furnace was seventy times hotter than this. The incredulity of the wicked, scoffing delegation was strengthened, and they came to the conclusion that if Shadrach, etc., could stand it, they could. They didn't take much stock in the idea of frying a beefsteak eternally, anyway.

From the crucibles the liquid iron was poured into molds; from these a ponderous pair of tongs swung them into space, and little "devil engins" rushed in like sentient things of life, opened their strong iron jaws, clutched them closely, and dashed away madly with their horrible, seething, glowing load. Then furnace doors opened automatically, the heavy bars glided in, came out on the other side red-hot steel, took their places on great rollers, were passed back and forth again and again, crawling away in the distance like gleaming, monstrous serpents endowed with life. The great machines, performing their work so exactly as to seem endowed with intelligence, had taken the place, the guides told us, of fifty men. Fifty human beings crowded to the wall by one machine. These had no vote. They needed no representation. Among them was no strike, only the ceaseless stroke of lever or piston, the never-ending buzz of saw and wheel, the continuous turning of pulley and roller. As I noted their ponderous, dextrous strength; these wonderful muscles of steel and iron—these awful revolutionizers of the world's economy, I wondered where were the fifty men each had displaced, their wives and little children. Were they happy, well fed and clothed, or had they been sent in their unsuccessful competition with these iron monsters, gaunt, homeless wretches, tramping through the land? Ah, philosopher and patriot, when that throbbing human world of workers is crushed down beneath the iron heel of inanimate nature, creating fifty times the wealth of fifty men, and these are left empty-handed, unable to provide themselvs with the production of loom and mill, unable in their poverty to purchase even the necessities of existence, do you call this, O noble statesmen, progress?

The last glimpse the delegation caught of what had been at its entrance to the works molten iron, were steel rails, perfect, finished, world-renowned. Over these, or rather over those that had passed through the same process of evolution, the delegation glided into Pittsburgh again. Many of the representativs had already gone—Dr. Foote, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Mr. and Mrs. Geiger, and others from the ball. Mr. Macdonald, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Charles Watts, editor of Secular Thought, Samuel P. Putnam, editor of Freethought, together with Lucy N. Colman, whose presence had added so much brightness and interest to the Congress, withdrew early. Mr. Crow, from New Mexico, remained. He had come a long way, and intended to see it through.

Pittsburgh has many earnest workers and good Liberals. Mr. Barker made a favorable impression by his enthusiasm; and Mr. Pierce, editor of Truth—a bright little paper that should receive the cordial support of Liberals everywhere, especially of those in Pennsylvania, and which is doing an undeniably good work—will be remembered as one of the best and most generous workers for the cause of Secularism. His wife is a brave little woman, intelligent and bright, and sympathizes with her husband in his noble efforts to sustain the "Truth." Mr. Burnham, of Michigan, remained in the city, having an engagement to giv a course of lectures before the local society.

The Chicago company returned home. I wandered away into Ohio, stopping first at Farmdale. Here I gave two lectures. It rained all the time. The clouds couldn't get over crying about the Pittsburgh Congress. Once in a while the sky would brighten up a little, and then of a sudden down would come the great drops again. Mr. Dewitt T. Root conducted the "services" of the occasion as serenely as though the weather were favorable and the house packed. Mr. Root also assisted Mr. Henry, and two other gentlemen, in providing some excellent instrumental music. There were more ladies in the audience than men. I mention this because it has been so often said that the women do not come out—that they would not attend the Freethought lectures.

Among the prominent Liberals in this place are Dewitt T. Root, who is the worker, and his amiable wife, with whom I passed a pleasant afternoon; Mrs. J. Henry, at whose home I stopped; Mr. and Mrs. Emery Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Sanford Ferrel, Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Roberts, O. E. Henry, J. Burns, Mr. Griffin, Mr. Chaffee, Fay T. Root, L. G. Brockway, an old friend; Alfred Moria and wife, Jerry Brockway, and many others. It is a good Liberal community. Mr. Putnam lectured here some time ago, and I learn that they would hav had him again had they not unfortunately already made arrangements for my visit. John Remsburg a couple of years ago gave five, I think, of his logical, unanswerable discourses in this place. In Andover, only ten miles distant, I lectured twice—the first Freethought lectures ever given in the town. Dewitt T. Root and Mr. Henry came from Farmdale on Sunday evening to hear the lecture again, "Cross and Crown." Here, also, more ladies were in attendance than men. I tried to effect a local organization. In this I failed, but the promis was given that a society should be formed. I trust that the Liberals will remember this, and the necessity for organization. There is no strength in scattered forces.

The worker here is E. D. Fenkel. His intelligent wife is also a Freethinker. I had met them two years ago at Linesville, Pa. He has seven children, all Liberals—two beautiful daughters, young ladies. Among other Liberals are E. W. Morley, a successful business man; James Roberts and wife—Mr. Roberts is a distinguished young lawyer—Warren Strickland, Will Craig, Fred J. Bishop, James Morley, B. D. Morley, Henry Morley, F. L. Chapman, and Elbridge Thompson and wife. This is also the home of our own bright young lawyer C. S. Darrow, of the Chicago Secular Union. Here I found his name familiar as a household word. Dewitt G. Root closed the Sunday evening lecture with some very effectiv and pertinent remarks.

Painesville, O., is most thoroughly orthodox, as I think Mr. Putnam will bear witness, he having lectured here some time ago. Joseph Sedgebeer has stood here alone for nearly fifty years, the glorious representativ of Freethought. He is a grand old man, bright, well read, and thoroughly posted, ever ambitious to make the most of himself and his life. English by birth, he is yet thoroughly American in his sympathies and ideas. He has made several fortunes—never lost through his own speculations, only in kindness to his friends. He is not wealthy, he assured me, but has enough to liv and die by. At the last Congress he was put in as one of the vice-presidents, and among the distinguished list there is to be found no nobler name than Joseph Sedgebeer.

At the close of my first lecture one woman, Myra F. Paine, an inspirational speaker, introduced herself, offering congratulations. Mrs. Paine is a bright, attractiv woman, and if as good a talker when under influence as when out of it, is a success. A young man, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, a Mr. Baldwin, also came forward. There are a number of Liberals in Painesville, but no organization, and without this nothing can be accomplished.

Akron, O., is a progressiv town. It chooses light rather than darkness, and hence the streets are brilliantly illuminated with electrical lamps. It is soon to hav its street-cars run by electricity. John Jacques, who is also an Englishman by birth, seventeen years in this country, is a brave, outspoken Liberal. His family are Freethinkers; his wife and daughters intelligent, refined, and sensible. Mr. and Mrs. Jacques attended the mass-meeting at Kent in September, and the latter was delighted with Mr. Burnham's address, assuring me that he gave one of the best Freethought lectures she had ever heard. The hall here is owned by Mr. Moody, not of evangelical fame, but a Freethinker, and a really fine hall it is, too. I think Mrs. Moody is a Liberal also; anyway, she is too sensible to be very orthodox. Joseph Burgess, from Johnson's Corners, was present at the lectures. It needs no assurance as to his intelligence when it is known that he has taken the Boston Investigator forty-one years. He commenced taking it, he told me, just before Zach. Taylor's election. Among other Liberals are Wm. Buchtel and wife, progressiv people, generously aiding in Freethought work, not afraid to be identified with the cause of Secularism. Mr. Buchtel is the owner of the Buchtel House, the finest hotel in the place. He is not, however, its proprietor, being the president of the Akron bank.

Reuben Hackett, Thomas D. Thomas, Lyman D. Triplett, Wm. D. Triplett, Peter Hoffman, Reuben Hadfield, C. Waldsmith, Reuben Leech, and Charles Waite are other noted Freethinkers of this community. On Sunday afternoon Wm. Cunningham and B. F. Conway, from Kent, were in attendance. Kent is not nearly so large a place as Akron, and yet by organization has been able to accomplish much more work.

A very pleasant incident, the next morning after my arrival home, was a flying call from Mr. Putnam, to whom I had bidden good-bye at Pittsburgb. Mr. Putnam was well, full of hope and enthusiasm—the same genial, happy spirit, now that he had been relegated to the rank of private in the American Secular Union, as when he bore all its many honors on his devoted head. He goes to the Golden Slope filled with inspiration as to the success of "Freethought." May all the best wishes of honest, earnest men and women in our cause everywhere go with him. There is no room in the true Liberal's life for bickering, backbiting, and unholy ambitions. Ours, above all others, should be a cause of loyalty, devotion, and work.

MATTIE A. FREEMAN.

Lecture Tour Completed.

AT HOME.—I started from Waterville, Minn., October 3d, reaching Hannibal, Mo., the following day, when I immediately started on a hunt for Dr. Ayres and F. H. Rau, superintendent and secretary of the Society of Agnostic Moralists. As I anticipated, I found these gentlemen activ and earnest in advancing the cause of Liberalism. We spent the first evening visiting at Mr. Rau's. And, like most Germans, Mr. Rau and family are splendid singers, and assisted by Dr. Ayres they made the meeting of October 5th entertaining by their songs and instrumental music. The lecture at Hannibal was well attended, considering the inclemency of the weather, and that there were also two other gatherings in the city of a political nature. Much to my regret, I did not meet Mr. Trabue, treasurer of the society in Hannibal, as he livs six miles in the country and had not learned the date of the lecture.

The press of Hannibal spoke very favorably of our meeting, and very complimentarily of myself.

The Courier, of Hannibal, says: "Prof. G. H. Dawes, the Liberalist, lectured last night at Emmet Hall to a fair-sized audience. As a speaker he has admitted ability, and his address last evening seemed to interest and entertain all those in attendance. He is a licensed lecturer, and travels from place to place, talking upon the subject that is uppermost in his mind. During the evening some very creditable vocal and instrumental music was rendered by Miss Rau and others." In another column the Courier says: "Notwithstanding the inclement weather and the attractions at the Opera House and the Tabernacle last night, Prof. G. H. Dawes was greeted with a fair-sized audience and delivered an able and interesting address on the subject, 'The Mission of Liberalism,' and handled his subject in a masterly manner." The editor, mistaking something I perhaps said in a private talk, referred to the society in Hannibal as "Agnostic Socialists" instead of Moralists, and Dr. Ayres, in correcting his mistake, and setting forth the objects of the organization, concluded by saying: "I wish every honest person in the city could hav heard Professor Dawes's lecture, as I believe none could hav done so without being benefited intellectually and morally."

From Hannibal I went to Maryville, and spent a week visiting with relativs and acquaintances, and while there Joseph E. Alexander gave me five dollars to help on the work of the Secular Union. Mr. Alexander is seventy-four years old, and though with him the work is nearly done, his "race is nearly run," yet he is earnest and hopeful for the future. He is the only Liberal of means and influence in the priest-ridden town of Maryville, that I know of, that has the honesty and courage to declare his convictions. Mr. A. W. Noble, of Maryville, also contributed one dollar to the Union. Mr. Noble is a teacher of ability, and intends soon to enter the lecture field. I hav been acquainted with him for several years; we hav attended the same teachers' normals, worked together in the same county, and also lectured together at Elmo, Mo., two years ago. I hope soon to see Mr. Noble activly engaged in Freethonght work, as his heart is there.

I made my appointment at Bethany, and had the pleasure of meeting W. H. Allen, who is almost alone in the work there. He is earnest and brave, but he alone cannot make Freethought respectable or successful. What little experience I hav had in the field is that the best workers for Liberalism are the farmers and mechanics, but when we depend upon business men for support our meetings are not generally the success they should be. Too many of them will publicly support and applaud a system which in their hearts they privately despise.

From Bethany I went to Leon, Iowa, and was taken four miles in the country to the "Pine Grove Farm" of J. W. Long's, popularly known in that vicinity as "Freethinkers' Paradise." I was at once made at home with Mr. and Mrs. Long, and in the evening a pleasant reception was given me. A party of about twenty-five persons gathered there, mostly young and middle-aged persons, and I gave my lecture, "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" After the lecture the company enjoyed themselvs in a social dance. The Liberals there are mostly of the farming class, and, of course, are not afraid of Mother Grundy or their "business interests." I spent two days very pleasantly at the home of these earnest and true Liberals. And, what is to the credit of the Liberals of Leon, they hav a Secular Union organized, and are able to maintain it. Mr. Gammon, first vice-president, presided at the meeting, and, after the music and Mrs. Long's reading the minutes of the last meeting, introduced this humble missionary to the audience. An invitation was extended for me to visit Leon another fall, an invitation which I shall gladly accept, for it is a great pleasure to meet with such Liberals.

I was intending to visit Graham and Stewartsville, Mo., and after election should hav gone to Rockport, Mo., and Shenandoah, Iowa, but my health not being what it should be, and as about the only thing engaging the attention of the people in that section of the country is politics, I thought that, as numbers make respectability, if an audience could not be had, owing to the excitement of the coming election, more harm than good could be done; and I hav no desire to urge on an engagement for the mere sake of the money the Liberals are willing to contribute, unless there can be a reasonable amount of good done. So, not wishing to remain idle three or four weeks, I concluded to go home and make arrangements for lecturing in November. I hope this will be satisfactory to the friends where I had engagements, hoping to meet them in the future.

On my route home I was obliged to remain eighteen hours in Monmouth, Ill., and there found a few genuin Liberals—Mr. and Mrs. Gamble, Mr. and Mrs. Pattee, Mr. Sanford Smith and family. They hav a Liberal hall, or Unity church, and hav had a Free Religious speaker engaged for some time. When no speaker is engaged some of the Liberals read the published articles and lectures as they appear in the Freethought papers. Your humble missionary's last article that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, "The Mission of Liberalism," was read not long ago by Mrs. Little. I was invited to make arrangements to lecture there, if fate ever took me that way again. This letter is altogether too long, but I cannot close it without saying more about Monmouth. It is one of the most priest-ridden towns in America. Years ago the Scotch Covenanters and Dissenters united and called themselvs the United Presbyterian church. They hav been the controling element there for thirty years, and hav a theological college maintaining some thirty preachers under the guise of being teachers in the school. This, of course, is all right if the people want it, but then there is a strategic movement of theirs that is worthy of their Catholic mother. They so control affairs that the members of the public school board are Presbyterians, so every teacher in the public school is of the same religious persuasion, and three-quarters of an hour is taken up every morning in studying "God's word." And this powerful and influential church, with their institution of learning, established for the purpose of perpetuating their ignorance, vote down every measure for establishing a free high school, so that people, in order to giv their children an education, are compelled to patronize the theological school or send their children away from home. A thriving city of seven thousand people hav no public school of any importance! In spite of so many incidents of church tyranny that we find everywhere, we hear avowed Liberals saying there is no need of doing Freethought work, no need of an organization like the Secular Union.

I wish to thank the Liberals that hav interested themselvs in my behalf, and who are working so earnestly for Freethought generally. Upon the whole, my tour has been a decided success. I should like to make arrangements for lectures in Minnesota and Wisconsin as soon as the election is over.

Pittsville, Wis. GEO. H. DAWES.

Mrs. Besant and Her Reform Work.

Eliza Putnam Heaton in Special Correspondence of Galveston News.

Drop a penny in the slot, pull out the drawer, and get a photograph of Mary Anderson. This is the English version of the chewing-gum machine. It swallows small coin and emits the face of our Mary at railway stations, in dry-goods stores, and on street corners. Sometimes it varies its performances by turning out likenesses of Ellen Terry or Grace Hawthorne. It follows the way of the world, which talks much nowadays about women.

London has talked about Annie Besant this summer with quite as much interest as it feels in any daughter of John Bull. Where her persistent efforts in behalf of various organizations of women might not themselvs hav held the public eye, the openly manifested hostility of her brother-in-law, Mr. Walter Besant, the novelist, who has even been credited with efforts to establish a difference of pronunciation between their names, accenting his own on the second syllable and hers on the first, to obscure the family connection, has not allowed tongues to cease wagging.

I noticed a picture of Mrs. Besant one rainy morning in a shop window. While I allowed the drippings from my umbrella to fall into the eyes of a very small and very determined match-girl as I stopped to look at it, a couple of workingmen paused behind me, and seeing the face that had caught my attention, lifted their hats before the photograph, a tribute of respect which I think I never saw paid to any other woman or man.

Their action called my attention to the fact that I was in front of the publication-office of the Link, a labor paper edited by Mrs. Besant, and a moment later, acting on the information, I was climbing some very dark and dingy stairs. Mrs. Besant's desk was hemmed in by compositors' cases on four sides, and while the typos passed this way and that with galleys of matter, I studied an interesting face. It might hav been a beautiful face, with its large eyes, sweet mouth, and dark, wavy hair, if it had not been a sad face, a face that had loss stamped on its every line.

Watching the tall, slender figure in its softly falling gown of dull gold, cut in quaint, esthetic fashion, my mind went back to the tales I had heard of the girl who married a clergyman and found herself out of harmony with the church and out of her husband's favor; of the divorce suit, where nothing could be established against a blameless life; of the children taken from their mother, and of the busy years writing, lecturing, disputing with Frances Power Cobbe on Atheism, editing Socialistic papers and pamphlets since. I had heard her called a dangerous woman, a mischievous element in society, alien alike to state and creed. I had heard her children's governess call her with enthusiasm the loveliest lady in England. It seemed to me that if I looked long at her face I was more likely to agree with the last opinion than the first.

I had not had time to frame a decent excuse for my intrusion, so I asked her for the addresses of people to whom I could apply for facts about the working-women of London.

She refused to be considered an authority on that point, saying that she was far more interested in a general Socialistic propaganda than in any special work undertaken for one sex or the other.

"We shall see strange things here this winter, and one has to consider humanity, not women or men. Do you remember the Trafalgar Square and Hyde Park meetings last spring?"

I answered that I understood times were improving, and that London looked forward to a quiet season.

"Trade is better, to be sure, but the improvement won't reach down to the great body of the working people for a year to come. There will be more unemployed this winter than last, and more suffering. They call us a mob when we gather in the parks, but I hav been in and out through the densest crowds that ever had Sunday for their meeting day, and street roughs don't yield a woman the courtesy that these mobs showed me. They were hungry and houseless, and when the hop-picking and the harvesting is over London will be full of them again."

I asked her about Bryant & May's match-girls, whose case she took before Parliament, and whom she organized two months ago into the largest trades-union of women in Great Britain.

She said that the case of the women who, for an average wage of $1.50 a week, were working many hours a day at a trade so unhealthy as to make them liable to caries of the jaw, and who were fined so constantly as hardly to bring out one week's wages untouched in six, had really touched the public heart, and that the opportunity for a general organization of women workers was never better.

I asked her if Socialism was on the increase in England. She said that it was, and then she talked to me of a world without God, refusing to rest in the idea that earth's wrongs and agonies would be righted hereafter, and saying that good, the final goal of ill, could be reached only as man put aside the idea of a deity who permitted the present wrong, and set himself strenuously to cure earth's pains by the best of his own reason and skill, glad in the thought that he was creating a new earth for a happier race. Her face lighted as she spoke, and she was evidently a woman in deadly earnest, unselfish, devoted, spending herself for a cause.

Mrs. Besant is an indefatigable worker. I saw her billed for three lectures in Manchester, to be delivered morning, afternoon, and evening, on the Sunday after my talk with her in London. Much of her work is done jointly with Mr. Bradlaugh, the two forming a publishing company which sends out a good deal of Radical literature. The connection with Bradlaugh does her no good in conservativ eyes, but East London asks no questions about her creed—it idolizes her for the clear voice she has lifted in its behalf.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

There are on our books about a thousand subscribers whose time ran out some months since, and who hav not paid for the papers they hav been reading since then. The political campaign just closed has diverted men's minds from more important matters, and we are not surprised that some of our friends hav forgotten that they owe us a few dollars. Now, however, that the country is safe we hope these delinquents will promptly turn their attention to saving The Truth Seeker. Bills hav been sent to our debtors, and the amounts thereof are urgently needed here. We trust that we shall receive them at once. We need money, we need it badly, and we want it now.

The Church's Victory.

The results of the national and state elections do not, we imagin, affect the progress of Freethought or retard or advance the time when our Nine Demands shall be established law. President-elect Harrison is a practicing Presbyterian, and will, of course, favor evangelical Christianity. If President Cleveland had been reëlected he would hav done the same, and added thereto many favors to Roman Catholicism. So far as Freethought is concerned, there was no choice between the candidates for the presidency.

But there is one result of the election in New York city which must fill Freethinkers with foreboding. That is the complete rehabilitation of Tammany Hall, and its advance to power. Tammany Hall, as everybody knows, is composed of men who are Roman Catholic by education and training. It is a political organization which the Catholic church uses as it pleases. No Tammany politician was ever known to refuse his church any favor she could ask when he had the power to grant it, and the church is not bashful or modest in asking favors of the government. It was during Tammany's uncontroled reign, when William Tweed was at its head, that the Roman church obtained the vast amount of real estate which she now holds in this city, and procured the passage of the laws by which she annually filches nearly a million of dollars from the county treasury. The lot for the cathedral was given the church for one dollar, if we remember aright, and altogether the church was some nine million dollars better off at the downfall of Tweed than when he entered politics through her favor.

Richard Croker, the present head of Tammany Hall, is a devout Catholic. Hugh J. Grant, the newly elected mayor, is likewise a servant of the church. So pious is he that it is said he has been known to giv money for masses for the benefit of a man's soul when he has refused to giv that man a cent to keep him from starving. The sheriff and the county clerk are Catholics. Tammany also has fifteen out of twenty-five aldermen, counting the president of the board. The commissionerships which Grant will fill are sure to be filled from Tammany's ranks. The Board of Estimate and Apportionment will hav a majority of Tammany men, and the strings to New York's enormous purse will be untied whenever Tammany says so. The heads of nearly all of the city departments will be Tammany men, and the subordinates are sure to be Roman Catholics. The teachers in many of our public schools, the principals, and the superintendents, are already Roman Catholics, and before Tammany has been in power a year, it is likely they will all be of that faith. The Board of Tax Assessors, the Comptroller, a majority of the police justices and civil justices, the Recorder, the Register of Deeds, the Commissioner of Jurors, the Commissioner of Public Works, are, or will be, all Roman Catholic Tammany politicians. The party also controls the department of Charities and Correction, the Police force, the Fire department, the Board of Street Openings, the Armory board, the Congressional delegation, and the state senatorial and assembly delegations. Even in Tweed's time the church, through Tammany Hall, never possessed such power as she will hav for two years from next January. This is what the church worked for at this election, and what she desired when Corrigan ordered the priests to order their parishioners to support the Tammany ticket, and let Coogan (though a rampant Catholic) go to the wall. The church knew which was the winning side.

This is an alarming state of affairs, if the church shall conclude to go in for all she can get out of her success. It is true that the city owns but little land now to giv her, but there are millions of dollars raised every year by taxation, the police courts deal with hundreds of pauper children, and the school-teachers hav enormous influence over the minds of tens of thousands of coming citizens. Catholic officials can help the church in scores of ways, and priests will control the city.

What will the church do? Where will it all end? And what are the non-Catholic citizens going to do about it?

An Instance of Christian Persecution Recalled.

In the Christian Advocate of the 8th inst. is a paragraph which recalls one of the meanest little instances of religious persecution that hav occurred in this decade. Dr. Buckley writes:

"In 1885 Govinda Row Sattay, a Hindoo Theosophist, came to this country to teach Theosophy. He was a Brahman, and will be remembered as the person who went to Ocean Grove in 1886 to teach his religion, which he did in defiance of the regulations of the Camp Meeting Association, for which he was sent to Trenton jail for thirty days. He lived in Brooklyn and had a small school of followers. He practiced the Brahman abstinence from meats, succumbed to malaria, and his body was cremated at Fresh Pond, L. I., on October 30th."

This is hardly a true statement, revealing nothing of the miserable spirit of the religion which illegally put Row Sattay in jail for the longest period allowed by the only law which could be tortured to fit his case. The fact is that Sattay was the victim of the Methodists of Ocean Grove, and was imprisoned solely because he told the truth about the non-success of Christian missionaries in India.

Row Sattay went to Asbury Park, N. J., in June, 1886. He was searching for work to support himself and his son. He was intelligent, spoke English well, and speedily became popular. Public interest in him led to his lecturing in hotel parlors to small audiences, these lectures finally becoming dissertations and discussions upon the difference between Hindoo and Christian faiths. Dr. Stokes, president of the Ocean Grove camp-meeting, unsuccessfully sought to convert the Hindoo, and finding him too firm in his own faith, resorted to force to drive him from the neighborhood. He had him arrested and sentenced to thirty days, in the jail at Freehold—not Trenton.

The daily papers chronicled the outrage, and The Truth Seeker sent a lawyer down to Freehold at once, determined to help the abused Hindoo if his arrest was found to hav been compassed on religious grounds, which was found to be the case. But Sattay had been released through the efforts of the jail warden, C. A. Little, who found his commitment to be illegal. The facts were: On August 18th, by Dr. Stokes's orders, a police officer at Ocean Grove took Sattay to Asbury Park, and warned him never to enter Ocean Grove again. This warning Sattay did not heed, going back to Ocean Grove on the next day, but not attempting to speak or to in any way interfere with the Methodist services. While quietly reading a paper he was approached by a police officer, who took him before the chief of police, who read a warrant, filled out a commitment, and had Sattay hustled to Freehold and lodged in jail. Sattay was denied a hearing, the law under which he was arrested did not fit his case, supposing Dr. Stokes to hav had any case against him, the papers were withheld from the county clerk's office, and altogether the imprisonment was a proceeding reminding us of the days of the Inquisition. The sentence imposed was the full limit allowed by law, and fully evinced the malicious spirit which appeared throughout the persecution. Mr. Little, the warden, happened to be a liberal and kind-hearted man, and he knew at once that a gross injustice had been done the Hindoo. He engaged E. A. Arrowsmith, an attorney of Freehold, to defend Sattay, and on Mr. Arrowsmith's application Judge Parker of the supreme court made an order releasing Sattay on the ground of illegal proceeding. The lawyer employed by The Truth Seeker made a full examination of the case, obtained copies of the affidavits and the commitment, as well as evidence of the innocence of Sattay, and we are justified in saying that the Methodists of Ocean Grove showed themselvs to be tyrants and bigots, ready and willing and anxious to imprison a man solely because he differed from them in religious opinion.

Sattay was a nativ of Shelapore, where he received a good English education. His wife and relativs dying, he came to this country nearly four years ago, leaving his boy at Shelapore. He went first to New Orleans, where he was employed in a sash factory. The factory was destroyed by fire and he came North seeking work. His lecturing at Ocean Grove was not of his own seeking, but in response to a public demand. His imprisonment, though happily of short duration, was a disgrace to the Methodist church.

Fighting for Christ's Sake.

And now the orthodox preachers of Minneapolis are angry. Unitarian doctrins hav been preached at the State University located there, and the faculty seem to lean toward the tenets of that heretical sect. The State University is supposed to be non-sectarian, but non-sectarian to orthodox preachers means in accord with some evangelical doctrin. Unitarianism, therefore, should be barred.

The trouble all comes from the growth of heresy, or liberal Christianity, among the students. It was brought out, at the ministers' meeting which considered the matter, that the student members of evangelical churches had often complained to their pastors that they could not hold religious meetings such as they, and evangelical churches of which they are members, believed were Christian. They could only meet with those of a liberal faith and where liberal thought predominated. It was even charged that the faculty of the university urged the students to attend these meetings. "Students who are members of evangelical churches, or sons and daughters of members of evangelical churches," said one of the ministers, "are compelled to worship Christ where the divinity of Christ is denied, and where they are being constantly told that the idea of an inspired Bible is foolish." Another clergyman mentioned an instance, when in one of the commencement orations a student had made a reference to popery, President Northrop cut it out for fear that Father McGolrick would be offended. He argued that it was all right not to offend Father McGolrick, but he thought other denominations should be treated with as much consideration.

But the greatest of all grievances was the engagement of the Unitarian minister to preach a sermon there. Regarding this crowning outrage a Presbyterian minister voiced the sentiment of his colleagues in this way: "I don't believe the faculty should allow Mr. Simmons to go over there and blackguard orthodox beliefs and the Christ whom we worship." Of course it is not probable that Mr. Simmons did anything of the sort, and the expression shows only the intolerant spirit of Presbyterianism. The Minneapolis Tribune says that the discussion was very bitter, and that the ministers determined to do something to protect their Christ and their faith.

But there is no good reason why the clergy should fight over this question. The University is a state institution, for the teaching of useful knowledge, not a religious seminary, and what business hav the sects there at all? Let them all go away from the institution, and let the students get their religion on Sunday from their favorit churches, or go without, as they prefer. It would save a tremendous amount of harsh and bitter language, of jealousy and ill feeling, if there were no religion in the world, and Jesus Christ had never been spoken of in connection with man.

For the Information of Our Australian Brethren.

Some one signing, "Downes," in the Melbourne Liberator writes thus:

"According to THE TRUTH SEEKER the American Secular Union has nothing like the organization of the Australasian Secular Association. It appears they hav no settled office or paid secretary. It is only held together by the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hav an established hall, a lecturer, president, a paid secretary, an executiv council, and an enthusiastic society."

We should like to know just where Mr. Downes found his information in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is certainly news to American Freethinkers, and for the information of our Australian friends we will say that the American Secular Union has a settled office at 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois, where Mr. E. A. Stevens transacts the business of the organization, and draws annually one thousand dollars (about £200) for so doing. The Union has, besides, a very distinguished President, an honest Treasurer, a very able Board of Directors, and hundreds of enthusiastic supporters. It is probable that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER do a great deal toward holding the Union together, because the aforesaid readers are the wide-awake and earnest Liberals of the country. But the paper has no more to do with the Union than any other Freethought journal in the country can hav if it chooses.

The Liberator will oblige by giving this information to its constituents, especially to Mr. Downes.

The Masons of Missouri.

The Grand Lodge of Masons of Missouri has upheld the expulsion from a local lodge of a member who denied "the divine authority of the Bible" and disbelieved "in the existence of deity." We hav been furnished with the decision affirming the action of the lower lodge, and in it are many statements that we know Masons elsewhere will deny.

The evidence, including the appellant's statement to the lodge at the trial, shows that the expelled member does not believe any part of the scriptures as a revelation from God; does not believe in the God of the Bible, his belief being, to use his own language, "I believe God is a supreme being, and created all things and made unchangeable laws to govern the same," and he gets his ideas of God "from the works of nature and what I can see around me." When asked if he believed in the same deity as when he was made a Mason he answered, "I do not." To one of the brethren who was a witness he stated that at the time he was made a Mason he believed in God and the Bible as firmly as anybody, but after getting older he found out better.

In reply the judge says:

"One of the first acts of an initiate into Masonry is to trust in God, not the God of nature alone, not a force in nature, but the one true and living God. There could be no such thing as trusting in an unchangeable law of nature. He has advanced but little further when he is taught that the religion of Masonry consists in an unfeigned belief in the one living and true God. In the very act of being permitted to see the beauties of the lodge he is greeted with the words, 'God said, Let there be light,' etc. The god of nature does not talk, and never said, 'Let there be light.' Again, one of the great duties which, as a Mason, he is charged to inculcate, is to never mention the name of God but with that reverential awe which is due from a creature to his creator; to implore his aid in all laudable undertakings. He is taught that before engaging in any important undertaking he should invoke the aid and blessing of almighty God. At almost every step in his journey through the various degrees of Masonry he has met with similar teachings. Our teachings with reference to the holy Bible are no less at variance with the belief of the appellant. He was early taught that the holy Bible is dedicated to God, because it is his inestimable gift to man as a rule for his faith and practice. The Masonic definition of a lodge shows the necessity of the holy Bible. It is as follows:

"A lodge is a certain number of Masons, duly assembled, with the holy Bible, square, and compasses, and a charter from a Grand Lodge, authorizing them to meet and work.

"It is as indispensable to the existence of a lodge as the square or the compasses, or even the charter. Our ritual teaches that 'the furniture of a lodge consists of the holy Bible, square, and compasses.' Mackey says: 'It is a landmark that "a Book of the Law" shall constitute an indispensable part of the furniture of every lodge.' He then defines what is meant by the 'Book of the Law.' It is 'that volume which by the religion of the country is believed to contain the revealed will of the grand architect of the universe.'

"But it is urged that many Masons do not believe that all of the Bible is the revealed will of God; that, for example, our Hebrew brethren do not believe the New Testament to be a part of God's word. True, but those living in our jurisdiction are in a Christian country, where the Old and New Testaments are recognized as the revealed will of God, the Christian Bible, and the Hebrews firmly believe in the Old Testament, and devoutly worship the God of our fathers as therein revealed.

"The utterances of the Grand Lodge upon this subject hav been uniform. In 1877 the sentiments of Grand Master Ryland, so beautifully expressed, concerning the holy Bible, were heartily indorsed. In 1884 Grand Master Hall spoke with emphasis and clearness upon the same subject. He discussed a character very much akin to the one at bar, one who felt 'called upon to cast ridicule upon God's word, the holy Bible, and boldly avowed a disbelief in some or all of its essential provisions. In discussing the character of a Mason's belief, Grand Master Hall says 'his belief in God is to be taken as a declaration that it not only means more than the bare fact that there is a supreme being, the conception of whom is bounded by the physical senses, contracted to their narrowest limits, but that that belief is in God as the great creator and ruler who watches over all. It implies a belief in God's law as laid down in the great light of Masonry.'

"These sentiments were indorsed by the Grand Lodge, together with the statement of the Grand Master 'that any lodge allowing one who holds and avows such doctrins to remain among its members should be cut off with him and all perish together.'

"Throughout the ages, thousands and millions of Masons of different religious faiths hav been comforted and blessed by the great li ht of Masonry. Those of the Hebrew faith, by the manifestation of God to Moses in the burning bush, and by the glory of the Lord as it filled the Lord's house at the dedication of the temple as revealed in the Old Testament; those of the Christian faith by the manifestation of God in the person of his son, and in sweet communion with his holy spirit as revealed in the New Testament. To assail the faith of our brethren is the privilege of those who may think we are wrong and who can offer us something better, but the effort should not be permitted in the name of Masonry."

The Missouri Grand Lodge possesses, perhaps, the power to do as it pleases with the heretics who may be found in its subordinate lodges, but when the lodge speaks in the name of world-wide Masonry, it can find no authority for such sentiments as are contained in the decision quoted. Freemasonry is not religious, per se, and only when the members composing a lodge are bigots can the test of creed be applied. The Knights Templar compose the only degree in the order essentially Christian. This degree is a superimposed Christian pinnacle on the real building of Masonry, and was added for the sole benefit of the pious. The Grand Orient of France is Atheistic, having abolished entirely the oath of fealty to "God." We think the Grand Lodge of Louisiana has also removed this test. In the North and East we know a great many Freethinkers who are Masons and whose religious beliefs are never called in question. The German, Dutch, Belgian, and French magazines of the order—which, of course, reflect the views of the lodges—hav been openly charged with hostility to revealed religion. It cannot be maintained, therefore, that a belief in the Bible as a divine revelation is an essential requisit of Masonry. If it could, then the majority of the European lodges would be "cut off and all perish together."

The decision of the Missouri Grand Lodge simply marks the degree of civilization to which the Masons of that state hav attained. In speaking for Masonry in general the Lodge has run counter to facts, which bigots of the Christian variety are extremely and usually likely to do.

Mr. Walker's Answer.

In reply to our question as to whether he is in favor of allowing the vilest literature to be published unrestrained by any statute, state or municipal, Mr. E. C. Walker answers in Fair Play:

"My position upon this subject should be well known to Mr. Macdonald by this time. I hav never dodged the issue but hav always declared that these laws, whether local, state, or national, are not only invasions of natural right but are positiv hindrances to the practical moral education of the young. The argument which he quotes from me is squarely in favor of this view of the matter and leaves no one in doubt as to my real position. THE TRUTH SEEKER'S claim that parents cannot, without the aid of a statute, keep vile literature out of the hands of their children, is equally valid when made by the Christian, only he would include Freethought and radical physiological works among 'vile' publications. From his point of view he is doubtless just as sincere and just as earnest in defense of impurity as is Mr. Macdonald from his. And I am quite sure that careful and frank home teaching will just as effectually guard the young against the perils that lurk in 'obscene' literature as similar thorough teachings will guard them against the fully as great perils that lurk in Christian and imperialistic literature, with both sorts of which this country is flooded. It needs the 'aid' of law no more in the one case than in the other."

We infer from the foregoing that Mr. Walker is in favor of allowing such circulation, although, of course, he is not in favor of such literature. As we can never hope to come to agreement with this idea, our objections being founded on facts observed, we take leave of the subject. Mr. Walker is honest in his contentions, but he is pushing the "rights" of the individual to an extreme not warranted by experience and likely to lead to logical and social disaster. But he holds, we believe, that when a person's rights are invaded by another that person is justified in defending himself. If the selling of obscene books to a man's immature child is not such an invasion, we fail to comprehend the meaning of the term. Shall a parent hav no redress against the scoundrel save a warning to his child, or shall he be enabled by peaceful law to punish him as he deserves? We decidedly incline to the latter view.

For Selling a Loaf of Bread.

Last Sunday, in this city, seventeen-year-old Louis Jacob was arrested for selling a loaf of bread over the counter of his sister's bakery. The court held him for trial.

The locality where the Sunday law was thus violated, as well as young Jacob's name, shows him to be a Jew. Presumably, he had attended to his religious duties the day previous, and, if he had, the law would allow him to sell bread on the "day when the Christians hold their prayer-meetings."

But what an outrageous thing it is that for selling a loaf of bread to a hungry person on any day a boy should be put in jail! Christian civilization is sacred tyranny.

Editorial Notes.

THE Christian Advocate prints this as, we suppose, an item for the encouragement of those who like to regulate their neighbors' business: "Some 1,803 business men of Montreal hav been interviewed concerning the closing of the post-office from midnight Saturday to midnight Sunday. 1,377 signed in favor of such closing, 115 against, and 311 would not sign at all." If a census of a graveyard could be had on the same question, especially a graveyard of priests, no doubt the result would be equally favorable to the dead who wanted to stay dead. The opinion of the majority of Montrealers is no criterion for a progressiv city to heed.

THE Workmen's Advocate thinks that Judge Barrett's decision as to a man's right to affirm "is of no value as a precedent, for there might be a 'suspicion of the truthfulness' of the Atheist citizen who had not the push and determination of Mr. Macdonald." The Advocate is wrong. Judge Barrett's decision establishes a man's right to affirm without ceremony or question as to his religious belief. And the state constitution prohibits the rendering of a witness incompetent because of his opinion on matters of religious belief. So, if there were suspicion of the untruthfulness of a man, his veracity would hav to be settled without reference to what he thought on speculativ matters. However, a formal decision on that point would be valuable, and perhaps the opportunity to obtain it will occur.

THE London Freethinker, like THE TRUTH SEEKER, is illustrated by pictures on its title-page. They consist of cartoons on biblical subjects, treated as Mr. Heston treats them in the pictures which appear on the last page of this paper. A few weeks ago the editor asked for a vote from his readers on the desirability of their continuance, and the result is that he knows rather less now about the popularity of the pictures than before. Less than ten per cent of the readers hav written him, and these are very much divided in opinion upon even simple matters of fact, and the views of the ninety per cent are totally unknown. Mr. Foote fails to see, therefore, how the vote can be regarded as adequate to determin his judgment. The only positiv fact elicited is that 205 persons find the illustrations an impediment to the circulation of the paper among their friends. Some of these, however, admit that most of their friends equally object to the letterpress. Per contra, 127 persons say the illustrations are no impediment, and some say they are a positiv advantage. Then there is the fact that many, if not most, of the 231 who think it would be advantageous to discontinue the illustrations, say they like the sketches and would be sorry to miss them. Those who find the illustrations useful are 157, those who do not are 130. In answer to a third question, only 386 giv their opinion. 155 urge Mr. Foote not to drop the illustrations, and 231 advise him to the contrary. The only fact before him, he says, is that 231 readers of the Freethinker, many of whom like the sketches, think he would do better without them. Mr. Foote therefore declines to change his program at present. If the question of pictures or no pictures were put to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER we judge, from the views heretofore expressed, that nine out of ten would vote for the pictures.

MR. EDITOR: I hav made as good use of the papers as I could. I once, by request, gave THE TRUTH SEEKER to a very stanch Catholic to read, and as I gave it to him I said, "Now, James, read that very carefully, for it is an Infidel paper." The instant I said this he threw it on the floor, and wiped his hands off on his pants. It pleased me much to think how easily he got rid of that sin.

I think when you employed Watson Heston to get up those cartoons you got the right man in the right place, for let a man get a correct idea in his head and he has read a whole chapter. D. B. DAVIS.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You will perhaps permit me to allude to certain articles published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Like Mr. Bedell, I am thankful to hear that the Secular Union will soon commence proceedings against the managers of Girard College. Such important steps display the true spirit of the age and will soon entirely change the tone of society.

Next I notice the magnificent letter of J. R. Perry. I hope it will correct the impression that some entertain—that our country is of course a stamping-ground and a market for all sorts of people, whether we profit by it or not. During the last four years nothing has been ably planned for the good of the masses, but much to irritate and excite them. Another four years of misrule will of course cause a state of things resembling an old, worn, decayed country, filled with crying abuses, standing armies, and the wretched expedients resorted to by cowardly and ignorant nations, who know not or fear to put in practice the essentials of good government.

With regard to Professor Haskell's beautiful letter, although the correlation of forces stands as a dead wall before me, I am not able to believe that anything as shadowy as mind can operate as a physical cause. Thought is action, not being; a phenomenon, not an existence.

Christians hav lately invented another lie—that "Marcus Aurelius desired to be a Christian;" which, I suppose, caused him to persecute such believers in France. ALHAZA.

GLEN MARY, TENN., Oct. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been over the yellow fever territory in Florida. The claim made by scientific men that yellow fever is not coutagious, is in my judgment wrong. If not contagious, why did it ever become epidemic in Jacksonville? The whole country is sandy. Water will not stand on the surface, hence, of course, could not become stagnant. The country is, as a rule, exceptionally healthy. Now, if the fever is not contagious, why does it spread? The truth is, the plague is contagious, and should be, and as a rule is, here treated accordingly. Many, however, hav lost their lives by foolishly remaining at home, thinking the disease not contagious.

There has been much suffering at Jacksonville, and there must still, for a considerable time, be want and destitution there among the poor, especially the colored people. Many of them are yet down, and those who are convalescent are weak and unable to work. In fact, there is no work for even the able-bodied to perform.

Had the whole country not responded nobly to the appeal for aid, the suffering would hav been beyond description. The situation is still such that aid should be given these people for some time to come. Jacksonville is rigorously quarantined by sixty mounted and armed police. Those on the inside cannot get out, and those on the outside cannot get in. Mails to and from Jacksonville are very uncertain, especially those going out. We would suggest that readers of this send contributions to R. W. Russell, of Live Oak, Fla., who will see that the money sent is properly acknowledged and accounted for. ISAAC P. WILSON.

KENT, O., Oct. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot tell you how much I admire THE TRUTH SEEKER—its frank and fearless manner; the able and eloquent letters and lectures of Robert Ingersoll, his happy and courteous style when he makes a charge on the orthodox creeds or the time-serving sycophants that defend them; and the noble band of speakers, writers, editors, and defenders standing on the free platform of eternal truth, defending and upholding great natures, divine revelations, beautifully contrasting with the soul-dwindling creeds of Christian paganism. I hope every Freethinker will read Mr. Ingersoll's Reply to Cardinal Manning in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 13th. Read it to your friends and neighbors; just go to their homes in a friendly manner and ask for the privilege of reading this lecture to them. They will not deny you. It will giv you courage and confidence, and make you and them better men and women. And do so with other lectures. Do not forget that most excellent reply to the editor of the Christian Advocate by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. That reply is worth the price of the paper. It is fearless, but courteous, and, best of all, breathes the spirit of brotherly love, and is therefore so much more effectual. Some of our liberal Christians are even now beginning to admire much that appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER; while others are repelled by some articles that indulge in ridicule of what seem to them to be the most sacred things. Others are disgusted with some things that some of the letters contain in favor of free trade. I am not a free trader, but I think no less of THE TRUTH SEEKER because these articles appear in it, or of the writers. I suppose they all mean well. Every free paper must publish much that is erroneous. This is the true glory of a free press. When truth and error can meet on a free platform, I hav no fear of the result, each one being responsible for what he or she may write, and not the paper. Thomas Paine says: "So potent is truth, that all it asks is the liberty of appearing." The first act that the first Congress of this country passed that was national was the tariff act, passed 1789 and signed by George Washington July 4th. In the preamble to this act are found these words: "Whereas, it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on imported goods, and therefore be it enacted——" In 1812 the tariff duties were nearly doubled, but in 1816 the tariff duties were repealed; in short, we had free trade or nearly so. What followed? Financial ruin and depression in all branches of business. At this time our country was dotted with factories and furnaces. Says Horace Greeley: "Our manufactories went down like grass before the mower. Our agriculture and the wages for labor speedily followed. Financial prostration was general. In New England fully one-fourth of the property passed through the sheriff's hands, until the merchants of New York in 1817 united in a memorial to Congress to save our commerce and our manufactures from utter ruin by increasing the tariff duties." In 1824 Congress gave us a new tariff, much higher than that of 1789. At once great financial prosperity began. So great was the improvement that in 1828 the duties were raised still higher and business improved. Indeed, so great was the improvement that Andrew Jackson, the Democratic president, said in his annual message in 1832, concerning results of four years under the influence of a protectiv tariff of 1828: "Our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness, unequaled, perhaps, in any other portion of the world." Soon after this the protectiv tariff was repealed. What were the results? Manufactures suspended operations. Then followed the most disastrous financial ruin ever known in this country. So little money was there that good horses sold for $2 apiece at sheriff's sales and cows at $1. There was but little improvement until 1842, when Congress passed another high protectiv tariff, and immediately business revived everywhere, factories were numerous, other industries filled the whole northern part of our country, so great and grand was the improvement. President Polk in his message of 1846 says: "Labor in all its branches is receiving an ample reward, while education, science, and the arts are rapidly enlarging the means of social happiness. The progress of our country in her career of greatness, not only in its vast extension of her territorial limits and the rapid increase of our population, but in resources and wealth, and in the happy condition of our people, is without an example in the history of nations." JOSEPH HEIGHTON.

MR. EDITOR: When S. P. Putnam was here, a short time since, he made the remark during his Sunday afternoon lecture that immortality was nowhere taught in the Old Testament. A Mr. Morgan took exception to the remark. He quoted Psalms xxiii, 6: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." He said if dwelling in the house of the Lord forever did not mean immortality, then nothing could. I am fortunate enough to be the possessor of Young's Analytical Bible Concordance, and the word "forever" used in this passage is kol hayyamim (all the days). The passage then should be, "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord all the days." "The house of the Lord" always meant the temple in Jerusalem.

In Gen. xliv, 33, we hav the same word translated "forever," and the passage reads: "For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying: If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame of my father forever." It simply means, all the days of my life, nothing more.

Heston's last cartoon of the clergy shoveling brimstone suggested to my mind the following lines:

More brimstone wanted—help us, Lord.
If thou dost not thy help afford
Hell-fire will be put out,
For here's that blatant Ingersoll,
Macdonald, Putnam, Watts, et al,
Each with his water-spout.

They're pouring water on the fire;
To quench it is their great desire,
In which they will succeed.
O Lord, do thou our prayer attend,
And plenty brimstone quickly send
Wherewith the fire we'll feed.

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I was brought up a Seventh Day Adventist, and until about two years ago believed the whole Bible. When about fourteen years of age I was led to doubt the truth of the Adventist doctrin, and especially the reality of Mrs. Ellen G. White's visions, by her evident inability to decide what message to bring in regard to Adventists who had been drafted to serve in the civil war. She having previously had a vision in which God had instructed her to forbid any Adventist to vote, enlist in the army to fight, or engage in politics, after the draft she must command men to resist the laws or say God had changed his mind. I lost faith in her and began to study the Bible, with a view to understand it, if possible. I failed to understand, but continued to believe blindly, and for years struggled on in my delusion. Finally I lost my home and property through the cruelty and dishonesty of prominent church-members; death claimed my husband and friends, and in sore trouble I called upon God for help, but no answer came, "save the echo of my own wailing cry." Another struggle, and after obtaining a house and home in this city, it was again torn from me by foreclosure of mortgage and I was undermined by false friends, prominent Christians. I having lived so far a pure life before God, I wondered why he did not forbid these things. I now suppose that he was too busy numbering hairs and counting sparrows to stop to attend to me.

At my husband's funeral I had been led to compare the hell-fire sermon preached by a country Methodist with Ingersoll's orations over the dead, but still refused to read farther, until some weeks since, conversing a few minutes with the first Infidel I ever met personally, G. F. Moore, of Cleveland, I was struck with the logic of the views he held. The unanswerable arguments, and questions put with consummate skill, determined me to investigate. But I see the subject won't stand much investigation, and though I hav not got over half the ground, I conclude the whole thing is a gigantic fraud, and this old history is the most ridiculous, ludicrous, absurd, self-contradictory, and therefore not inspired book I ever read. It has made me miserable all my life, and now I will get along without it. I will conclude with another quotation:

All the world over, I wonder, in lands I never hav trod,
Are the people eternally seeking for the signs and steps of a God.
Westward, across the ocean, and northward, beyond the snow,
Do they all stand gazing as ever,
And what do the wisest know?

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At the regular Sunday afternoon meeting yesterday at Memorial Hall, the Cleveland Secular Union was favored with a lecture by Rabbi Hahn of the Huron street synagog. His subject was "The Jesus of History." The following is a brief synopsis of the lecture:

The Christians say Jesus was a great man; that he was the only perfect man—in fact, that he was more than a man—that he was God. Yes, he was a great man, but there hav been many great men. Mohammed was a great man; Buddha was a great man; so was Confucius, and so were many others.

Jesus was a member of the Essenes, an ancient Jewish order composed of people who lived the same way as certain monks in Europe and America do now. They shunned the world and did not marry. They devoted themselvs to the services of suffering mankind. Their motivs, in one respect, were noble; but at the same time they were superstitious and sentimental.

Jesus was an agitator, and he lived in an age of great commotion. The Jews were ruled by the Romans and felt very uneasy under the Roman yoke. But they thought it was better to be protected by the Romans than to be exposed to the oriental kings. If you will read Josephus you will see there were a great many visionaries then, or, as we would call them in the slang of the present, "cranks." The Jewish country was full of such people. At this time Jesus stepped forth as a teacher. He heard John the Baptist preaching of the kingdom of heaven, and he liked the idea. What do we know about the reforms of Jesus, and who established Christianity? Paul established it after him. Paul should be considered the real founder. If some do not believe this, let them read of the trouble he had with the brother of Jesus and the other disciples when he went among the heathen. He would hav been excommunicated by the brother of Jesus and the other disciples, but they and their followers were few in number, while he had the Greeks and the heathen world backing him.

Let us now take Jesus as a messiah. The Jews had ideas of a messiah, as the prophets hundreds of years before Jesus had spoken of a messiah; but they had no idea how their words would be misinterpreted. They did not mean some one to redeem the soul, but simply a deliverer from political oppression—Roman tyranny—a savior. In the same light Humboldt and Darwin were saviors, and so is anyone who does anything to free mankind from superstition and vice. That was the idea of the prophets. Jesus thought he was a messiah, but in this he was a visionary.

Why was Jesus crucified? It was because the Romans took him for a political agitator. The Romans were Atheists, and could not comprehend how the Jews could believe in an invisible God. They thought he was working up some political scheme, and used the phrase "kingdom of heaven" merely as a pretext.

If everyone who has claimed to be a follower of Jesus had practiced his principles, mankind would hav seen a different state of affairs, and a great many pages of persecution, fanaticism, and cruelty would hav remained unwritten.

632 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, N. Y., Nov. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Since some Rationalists, "Freethinkers," are ever and anon expressing admiration at the qualities of that character, or man, called Jesus Christ, pronouncing them and his teachings good, rational, and just, and in harmony with the standard by which good, just, well-educated, and prudent people are guided in distinguishing right from wrong, good from evil, and propriety from impropriety, I beg you all to bear with me a little, while I endeavor to lay before you a few of my many reasons for pronouncing him one of the worst characters that hav ever, by and through cause and effect, been foisted upon a lot of poor, blind, groping, credulous gawkies.

Christ, if he ever existed, which is very improbable and almost utterly impossible, taught that those who cannot believe on him shall be damned (Mark xvi, 16). What infamy! Can a person be blamed, justly, for not being able to believe anything that he or she cannot believe? Might as well be damned for not being eighteen feet high!

Christ taught, also, to take no thought for to-morrow. This, if obeyed, would place us beneath the beasts and birds. I hav often seen birds working away for three or four days building a nest—not to sleep in, for they roosted on a limb every night—but the little bird was thinking of the eggs that it was going to deposit in that nest. Birds don't think, eh? Admitted; but would to gracious the Mohammedan, Buddh-istic, Jewish, or Christian gawky (I mean the veritable, religion-struck gawky, not one of these hypocrits) would think half as much. Matt. vi, 25, 34. Christ also taught us to hate our friends and relations, and to love our enemies. This, again, if obeyed, would place us beneath the beasts of the field, and it would, according to all standards with which nature has endowed man and beast, by which to know good from evil, right from wrong, to establish justice and to do equity, be infamously unjust. It was the way the Republico-rebel wing dealt with the Democro-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party and with its own people, and by such villainy down fell the Republico-rebel wing. Luke xiv, 27, 28.

Christ said: "He that is not with me is against me (Matt. xii, 30; Luke xi, 23), and he that believeth not on me is mine enemy, and those mine enemies that would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27). Most unjust, damnable tyrant.

Christ said: "I come to set a man at variance against his father." Kick him out! Don't let him fool about my son! And "the daughter against her mother." And "the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (Matt. x, 35). Oh, horrors! what a hot-house! I must stop. I don't like this fiendishness, else I might go on for hours showing up this bloody tyrant. I do wish you would refer me to just one good doctrin that was taught by Jesus Christ and that was not taught, long before the time he is said to hav lived, by Confucius, Buddha, and others.

I would like the address of every Liberal watchmaker in the United States, that I may communicate to him that which will redound greatly to his pecuniary welfare.

Thine for truth, GEORGE NEWTON.

SODUS, N. Y., Oct. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You may count me as a life subscriber, and I am still young. The two great questions now agitating the country are protection and Prohibition. As others hav had their say, I, too, would like to say a few words on the latter. The former is all chaff in as far as caring for the real working men and women of this country is concerned. It is astonishing to me that so many Liberals can giv to this third party—with only one idea—their support. It is made up entirely of church people. It is but a trap to catch the votes of sincere temperance people, so that they may get control of the national government. The delegates to the Pennsylvania state temperance convention two years ago numbered eighty-three ministers, and those to the New York convention, ninety-five. This means, what? I leave all intelligent men and women to guess. Now, I am a temperance man, still I like my glass of wine or brandy when and where I please, and I don't want any pious sneak around to arrest me for taking it. The way to settle this temperance question is, take one-half the tax off liquor and put it on church property. In the thirty-seventh Congress a law was passed placing a heavy tax upon liquor. That was what first started the adulteration. Then came on the temperance crusade. The pulpit took up the cry, and the women got into the muss, and every man that kept a hotel and bar was tortured by prayers and threats to close until every respectable man went out of the business, and that left the field open to that class of people that are too lazy to work, and the consequence is that to-day the country is overrun with low groggeries. As the older ones remember, before the war no such vile stuff was sold as at the present time. Remove the poverty from the world and you remove drunkenness. I hav made this theme a careful study for years, and I am well satisfied that Prohibition does not prohibit. Take the leaders of the movement—most of them are pious loafers, Baptist and Methodist, with Rev. on the front end of their names. They will curse a young man out of the community if he drinks a glass of beer, and if he is indiscreet and gets "full" they, the parsons, will induce his girl to transfer her affections to some other party. But let him go to a church festival and they will feed him on ice-cream, oysters, and decayed strawberries with sour cream at twenty-five cents per dish as long as he has a quarter left. This is a fact, and no one that is acquainted with these festivals will deny it. These church people care not for the drunkard or his family. The good, noble woman who is unfortunate enough to marry a man that proves to be intemperate; who struggles along in life to feed and clothe her children and that they may hav a good education, who makes a slave of herself, do the church people care for her trouble? No; the parson will pray for her and some of the good-hearted will feel sorry for her, but the good deacon never offers to withdraw the plate as she puts upon its surface the silver that is needed for the little ones at home. I never could feel like a man if I had ever been guilty of such mean and detestable business as taking the poor woman's money, and carrying the contents of a contribution-box for a man that was too lazy to collect his own unearned salary. For I hav yet to find the minister or to listen to one that ever earned what he obtained. Temperance is a good quality in character, but religious teachers are not the men to recommend it. It sprang from the heart and brain of good men, and men that believed in no creed except the creed of good morals.

If this is worthy of notice, you shall hav the protection part, and as I hear from none that labor on this question, I will giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER the idea of a mechanic that has seen the protected workingman's wages go from $3 per day down to less than $1. J. E. COY.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Oct. 28, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: For eighteen hundred centuries Christians hav striven by faith and fraud to prove a future state of existence, and up to the present they hav succeeded only in proving themselvs a most contemptible nuisance. They hav at last, however, run in the two she Foxes; now we know, as it hath been divinely stated, that "the foxes hav holes," though, alas for these toe-snapping Foxes, they are in the wrong hole, it is too shallow to hide them from a frowning world. Poor deluded Foxes, thou art caught at last! If this expensiv mode of proselyting among the Jews and Spiritualists continues to any great extent, the church will soon sleep with its father and mother, old pagan idolatry. Now, my sanctified old ladies, you may snap your toes awhile for the edification of a dying and rotten church; and every old hag will cry out with grim delight, "Didn't I tell you so?" Yet think not, my godly impostors, that you hav annihilated Spiritualism, for never is Spiritualism so irresistible as it becomes when stubbornly resisted. It is to-day a power in the world that needs no prophet to predict that it has come to stay. It has permeated every grade of society from the "hub of the universe" down to the draggled tail-end of Christendom, so to speak. The woods, yea, the very churches, are alive with it. Now, to pretend that Spiritualism had its origin and growth from the toe-snapping in Hydesville, Wayne county, N. Y., is the most soul-sickening nonsense imaginable. If Spiritualism be true—and a vast majority say it is—it never had an origin, any more than life itself. Countless ages before Old Sol shot forth his red-hot spark which formed our globe, life existed, and so did spirit, if it exists at all, and when conditions became favorable on the earth Spiritualism made its appearance. And its ultimate success depends not at all upon the Foxes, or the fraudulent tricksters who all belong to the Christian church; but upon what its votaries can prove its success depends. For myself, I hav learned nothing anent a future life. The most astounding mystery to me is, that life ever got a foothold on the earth at all. One of the profoundest reasoners and greatest statesmen in this or any other age was Thomas Paine. He held that the power which gave him life here could as easily continue his life hereafter.

Yours truly, NELSON HUNT.

P.S.—Inclosed find slip from Chicago Morning News, which induced me to write. N. H.

THE ROCHESTER RAPPINGS.

Six months ago the Spiritualists of this and other countries celebrated the fortieth anniversary of the founding of their belief. They dated its beginning from the celebrated rappings heard in Wayne county, N. Y., by the family of John D. Fox. These rappings were only heard in the presence of the two younger daughters of Mr. Fox, Catherine and Margaret, the former being but ten years old. Afterward, in Rochester, the rappings made in the presence of the Fox sisters attracted wide attention. Soon there sprung into existence a race of mediums who presided over innumerable varieties of rappings, table-tippings, materializations, musical seances, and what not. The belief spread all over the world, and is now embraced by millions.

The other night the Fox sisters, who are now elderly women, appeared in a public hall in New York and confessed that their supposed spirit rappings, which brought about such surprising results, were made by snapping the joints of their great toes. Then before the large audience Mrs. Margaret Fox Kane showed how the rappings were produced.

So much for the famous Rochester rappings. But those who think this ludicrous exposure has given a death-blow to Spiritualism will find themselvs mistaken. There hav been countless exposures before, and still Spiritualism flourishes. Many of its adherents denounce as vulgar frauds certain mediums who by tricks hav imposed on their audiences. Doubtless the Fox sisters, whose great toes rapped the belief into existence, will now be placed in the same category. So far as the belief in Spiritualism is concerned, there is strong proof in the negativ of Bryant's assertion that

Error, wounded, writhes with pain
And dies among his worshipers.

MR. EDITOR: Do not think I condemn churches. On the contrary, I consider them a necessity. People must hav somewhere to go, but that they hav any saving power I deny. In my opinion they are nothing but theaters with very poor acting. Man's spirit is pure and holy and needs no salvation. I hav studied the Bible carefully and pronounce it an invention of man. God never had anything to do with it. It flatly contradicts itself in many places. Does anyone suppose God is such a bungler as that? It has been proved beyond dispute that this earth has been in existence for millions of years. Does not this show that all books to the contrary are nothing but romances? It matters little to us what people said or did hundreds of years ago; we hav just as much as we can do to attend to the wants of this generation. What we want to find out is how to liv and what to liv on. We were without guide or compass cast upon this planet. Is it any wonder that many go astray? Everything in nature is formed with the greatest wisdom and precision, showing a master workman. There is no bungling in nature, only on chance occasions, proving beyond dispute that chance did not create the perfect in nature. Now, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the laws of nature are fixed and unalterable. The wisest plan is to let people know just where they stand. Once a wrong act is committed it can never be rubbed out. Nature has set her trap and will catch us if we err. The flesh is the devil blindly spoken of in the Bible; hell, the remorse of an evil conscience. Providence, knowing the meanness and perversity of man, sent a pure spirit to abide with him. It is possessed of memory and conscience. On memory is recorded each event as it transpires. Conscience chides feebly in this life on account of disease. When the spirit is quickened, conscience will then commence her work, which will be the "worm that dieth not and the fire that is not quenched."

Any man thinking to soar above his fellow-man on the wings of pride and ignorance will come out loser in the end. A man might just as well get in a wheelbarrow and try to wheel himself up-hill. People are getting too smart to be humbugged.

All doctrins sink into insignificance when compared with goodness. Christ was a good man. There was no meanness about him. His saying "he was the son of God," was only a mistake. He was trained to think so. That notion was instilled into his mind when a child. His way was safe and sure. He lived so pure a life he had no sins to be forgiven. I will set a different type of humanity before you. Here is a man all excitement; he drinks alcohol, chews tobacco, swears, does all manner of mean actions. You might just as well feed an engin on tar and turpentine and expect it to work properly. Such a person's conscience cannot fail to sting him through all eternity. Besides, he will prove a curse to future generations. Such persons are to be pitied. A wicked man once said to me: "I would like to be good, but these infernal bumps on my head are ruining me." I said: "Friend, I am afraid your heart is wrong, too." "I know it," he said, "but how can I help it? I hav been in hell all my life and cannot enjoy myself at all." "Poor fellow," I said, "your spirit is pure and will return to the power that gave it." And when again questioned in regard to his spiritual feelings he answered: "I am perfectly peaceful."

I deny man did anything wrong in the first hours of his existence. That he was created to multiply dawned on his darkened mind gradually. His amorous proposal so shocked the modesty of the virgin that she fell into a furious rage. Thus, you see, anger had a purely natural birth. But the maiden relented, as we hav abundant proof, and in a few months the first heir made its appearance. With it came sickness, sorrow, suffering, and death, which were unavoidable. We hav countless evils to contend with in this world. If we do the best we know we will be doing well. Our physcal nature is all that needs looking after. Our spiritual nature is beyond our control. MRS. B. BURGESS.

VAN BUREN, ARK., Oct. 28, 288.

MR. EDITOR: "A perfectly civilized man can never be perfectly happy while there is one unhappy being in the universe" (Robert G. Ingersoll).

"To be nobly wrong is more manly than to be meanly right" (Thomas Paine).

All true humanitarians, whether Christian or Secular, strive for the advancement of their fellow-men and for the suppression and eradication of all things which hamper the progress of men upward toward that perfect manhood where each by doing his duty to his fellow-men shall lessen the sorrows and increase the happiness of the race to the fullest extent possible under the material conditions which environ them. The Universalist, considering the idea of hell a retarding influence, seeks to overcome that idea. The Unitarian, for the same reason, seeks to overcome the idea of the inspiration of the Bible only. The Secularist seeks to overcome the idea of any supernatural inspiration at all. And so the truth of Mr. Ingersoll's saying is demonstrated even —sometimes—by those who denounce it as ridiculous. The attainment of happiness being natural and right, it logically follows that all truly civilized persons should endeavor by all legitimate means to overcome all things which tend to prevent or retard the perfect happiness of all men.

All fair-minded persons admit that there is more unhappiness in the United States caused by the liquor traffic than by anything else. It logically follows that all "perfectly civilized" persons will endeavor by all legitimate means to overcome the liquor traffic. Temperance lectures, moral suasion, and the "blood of Christ" hav all been tried in vain. Prohibition of the open saloon has had a partial trial and has proved far more successful than any other method yet advocated and tested. It is useless to talk to the drunkard whose appetite is his master about quitting the habit while the saloon stands as an omnipresent temptation to him to gratify his master passion, the love of drink. It is an absurdity to think that a few moral lessons or temperance lectures at home or in school are sufficient to restrain the young from the use and abuse of intoxicants as long as it is possible to get them freely, and while there are brilliantly lighted and beautifully adorned saloons with perhaps a piano and string band playing in them to attract them, where they will see "respectable" men drink, and where mild drinks will be offered them free occasionally.

The greed of saloonists demands custom, and no stone is left unturned to make customers.

True, some liquor is used where Prohibition is in force; but is this any reason why we should favor license? The open saloon makes nearly all the drunkards. Is it any reason that we should favor a drunkard-making institution that those already such get liquor in violation of law? That idea followed to its logical conclusion would put a premium on vice and stifle all efforts to advance in morality, and would bring about a reign of licensed crime and vice of every description. Can a truly civilized man set the gratification of an appetite or the gaining of wealth against the well-being of the race? If personal liberty demands the open saloon, it also demands the opium joint. Thousands of men would not drink were it not for the open saloon, and vote and petition against it every opportunity. Can a true humanitarian vote to keep the struggling misfortunate continually in the vice-like grip of these infamous, crime-breeding institutions? All who are in favor of the advancement of the race should be uncompromisingly opposed to the saloon. Alcohol being a poison, and all alcoholic drinks poisonous, they should be sold as poisons. If it is just to compel the sale of arsenic or morphia under the skull and cross bones restrictions, then alcohol should be sold the same way only, for it has killed thousands to their one. My advocacy of Prohibition is purely from a humanitarian standpoint. Some may say that Prohibition is the hobby on which the clergy hope to ride into power. To this I would answer, close the saloon and thus kill the hobby, and so thwart them in that direction. Not being infallible, it is possible that I may be wrong in some of my conclusions, but, having no selfish motivs in view, I take comfort in the thought, "To be nobly wrong is better than to be meanly right." If the saloonist is right, he is meanly so, for it is only lust for the dollars that induces anyone to keep saloon. HENRY ADDIS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Advice to Children.

Liv to do good, and shun an evil act;
Do not tell a lie, lies will not fit a fact;
Be kind to all and strive to help the poor,
And joy will then your hopes in life allure.

Seek knowledge, for knowledge it is power—
Combined with industry it helps to build a tower;
A tower of fame you raise by doing so,
And your memory becomes an everlasting glow.

Let not idleness brood around your hand,
Always keep in step with the progressiv band;
Attempt the end and never stand to doubt,
Nothing's so hard but search will find it out.*

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

*Herrick is the author of the last two lines.

Old Saws in Rhyme.

Actions speak louder than words ever do.
You can't eat your cake and hold on to it too.

When the cat is away, then the little mice play.
Where there is a will there is always a way.

One's deep in the mud as the other in mire.
Don't jump from the frying-pan into the fire.

There's no use crying o'er milk that is spilt.
No accuser is needed by conscience of guilt.

There must be some fire wherever there's smoke.
The pitcher goes oft to the well till it's broke.

By rogues falling out honest men get their due.
Whoever it fits, he must put on the shoe.

All work and no play will make Jack a dull boy.
A thing of much beauty is ever a joy.

A half loaf is better than no bread at all.
And pride always goeth before a sad fall.

Fast find and fast bind. Hav two strings to your bow.
Contentment is better than riches, we know.

The devil finds work for hands idle to do.
A miss is as good as a mile is to you.

You speak of the devil, he's sure to appear.
You can't make a silk purse from out a sow's ear.

A man by his company always is known.
Who livs in a glass house should never throw a stone.

When the blind leads the blind both will fall into the ditch.
It's better born lucky than being born rich.

Little pitchers hav big ears. Burnt child dreads the fire.
Though speaking the truth no one credits a liar.

Speech may be silver, but silence is gold.
There is never a fool like the fool who is old.

Lines for Little Children.

How beautiful indeed to see
Little children all agree.
Quick their parents to obey,
Which is in truth a lovely way;
Ready ever to do right,
Bright jewels in the people's sight!
When old enough and given work
They from their duty never shirk;
But do it well, nor stop to play,
Though it may take about all day.

But when their task is fully done,
Ah, then's the time to hav some fun!
To hop and skip and "hide go seek,"
But not to do one naughty trick,
As that of pilfering things or toys—
Remember that, dear girls and boys.

It is a sin to steal, you know,
Then at such business never go;
But bear the cross and wear the crown
Of a clear conscience. Not a frown
Of disrespect will people giv
To children, dear, who truthful liv.

When others hav what you may like,
Oh, do not push, or snatch, or strike!
But asking: "Will you giv it, please?"
Thus it may come to you with ease.

If persons sick are in the house,
Then be as still as any mouse;
It makes them worse to hear great noise,
Remember that, good girls and boys.

If to the sick you would be kind,
Then bring them flowers that you may find
Out in the garden or in the field,
Such as do pleasant odors yield.

Be ever kind to dogs and cats,
And pet them when they catch the rats;
Thus make them happy as you can,
I know you know that's a good plan.

When in the school your lessons mind,
Be there in season, never behind;
Strive to please your teacher well,
And learn to read and write and spell.

Never play in time of school,
Lest you grow up like any fool;
Surely that would be a sad affair,
Indeed it would, I do declare.

Now, if you wish much comfort free,
Just learn these lines by E. D. B.—
Or Flisha D'Alembert Blakeman—
Would that not be a clever plan?
And in the Children's Corner send me a letter,
That is, if your parents think you'd better.
So good-bye, children, for this time,
Or till I write again in rhyme.

Three Rivers, Mich. E. D. BLAKEMAN.

How the Pious Rebuked the Profane Parrot.

Once upon a time, as they say in fairy stories, a wicked major in the United States army crossed the Atlantic in a steamer. In the next room to his was a spinster of a certain age, as thoroughly good as the major was wicked. Both of them were accompanied by parrots of large conversational powers. The major was taking a parrot to England to present to a friend in the English army. The spinster apparently had brought along the bird as a traveling companion. Both birds were exceptionally clever linguists, but their talents had been molded in opposit schools. The major's bird swore like a trooper most of the time, while the spinster's was given to praying with forty parson power.

And to make matters worse, the major spent a day in the forecastle with his bird teaching it to objurgate the old woman in the next cabin. The consequence was that the next evening the spinster was astonished to hear a voice stridently say: "Confound that old woman next door!"

But how can her disgust be pictured when her own bird, devoutly quoting from the Episcopal litany, replied: "Good Lord, we beseech thee to hear us?"

Destruction Wrought by Insects in America.

The annual loss to productiv industries in the United States caused by insects is estimated at $150,000,000. Here is a fair battle between man and another sort of earth-occupiers. They are smaller, but, if they can whip us, hav undoubtedly as good a right to the world as we hav. As civilization advances, new insects make their appearance, marching sometimes eastward, but generally westward. There are few, if any, forms of vegetation that hav no parasites that devour either foliage or fruit. The loss to the cotton crop is estimated at $15,000,000 a year, while that to the apple crop is not much less, and that to the potato crop at least one-half as much. But the estimate is not a fair one until into the loss is counted the time spent in fighting to secure the proportion that is saved.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Little Cora heard an older person remark that some one who was in trouble was "in a pickle." Shortly afterward her little brother attempted some difficult feat. "Oh, you mustn't do that," she exclaimed, "or you will be in a cucumber."

Little Ina, of Brooklyn, nearly five years old, set out to visit school the other day as gay as a lark, but returned after the session with rather a careworn expression of countenance. When asked how she liked school, she said: "I did not like it." "Why not?" "Oh! I had to work awful hard." "What did you hav to do?" "I had to keep still like everything."

NO DEBIT HERE.—A child may often be expected to put his or her heedless little foot in it, as the phrase goes. For instance, a youngster one day begged an invitation to dinner at the house of a little friend with whom he had been playing. At the table his hostess anxiously inquired: "Charley, can you cut your own meat?" "Humph!" said the youngster, who was sawing away; "can't I? I've cut up quite as tough meat as this at home."

Science Column.

Mr. and Mrs. Owl.

What a queer bird! Look at its hooked beak, its long, sharp claws, or talons, and its big, solemn, yellow eyes.

It is a nocturnal or night bird, and what does that mean? That it flies and seeks its prey or food by night. Yes, and it is provided with that beak and those claws on purpose to tear its food, which consists mostly of rats, mice, and other destructiv little animals.

It cannot see well in daylight, for all it has such big eyes, and during the day it hides away in caves and old barns. Its eyes are formed for night time, and when twilight approaches Mr. and Mrs. Owl are alert and all ready for a stroll. Their eyes are large, and are furnished with a sort of cover by which they are able to hear very slight sounds. Their feathers are soft, thick, and downy, so they can move about quietly. Some kinds of owls hav tufts of feathers on their heads. which stand up straight and appear like horns.

There are one hundred and fifty species, and in our country we hav as many as forty varieties—from the big-horned owl that eats ducks, chickens, squirrels, and opossums to the little owls that feed on moths, butterflies, and beetles.

They make the funniest sounds when they attempt to talk or sing or screech, owl fashion. Did you ever hear the scream of an owl? It sounds very much like Who-who-who! It sounds very doleful and lonely in the night.

Ancient people in their ignorance and superstition thought the owl was a bird of ill omen, and they always associated it with stories of ghosts, spooks, specters, witches, and magicians. Nothing would cause them to shudder with fear quicker than to see an owl on their premises. It is alluded to in the Bible as an emblem of desolation. This is very silly, for it is no more a bird of evil than the blackbird, and perhaps not so much, for it does not steal the farmer's corn, as the blackbird does.

The owl is really a friend to the farmer, for it destroys the creatures that are often a source of torment to him, eating his grain and gnawing holes in sacks, baskets, and horse-blankets.

The Greeks and Romans thought such a solemn-looking bird must be very wise, so they regarded it as the emblem of wisdom and dedicated it to Minerva, who was their goddess of wisdom.

But although the owls appear as if they knew a great deal, it is in appearance only, for they are no wiser than many other birds.

It is a curious bird, and always rivets attention, looking straight at one, and slowly winking as if in deep thought. Its plumage is handsome and striking, each family being different from every other. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Describe the owl briefly. What is the meaning of nocturnal? Why can it not see in daylight? How many species of owls are there? How many in America? Of what does their food consist? What does their call resemble? How did the ancients regard the owl? Is it a bird of ill omen? What is the meaning of omen? What did the Greeks and Romans think of the owl? Are the owls any wiser than other birds?

SUPPOSE the world doesn't please you,
Nor the way some people do;
Do you think the whole creation
Will be altered just for you?
And isn't it, my boy or girl,
The wisest, bravest plan,
Whatsoever comes, or doesn't come,
To do the best you can?

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

A Novel with an Affidavit.

BY HARRY JULIAN.

Beautifully Illustrated Covers. Paper, 12mo, 226 pp., 25 cents; Boards, 50 cents.

A lively narrativ of adventures in a country of Arcadian simplicity and general delightfulness.—[N. Y. Evening Mail.

A story of life on islands of coral, fruit-trees, and cockatoos, where all the nativ men are Apollos and the women dreams of beauty.—[N. Y. Times.

Life on the Islands of Koro-kama and Launagola—"Summer isles of Eden lying in dim purple spheres of sea"—surrounded by beckoning palm-trees, foamy cascades, bread-fruit, cocoanuts, pineapples, figs, bananas; bathing in the surf on shining sands, basking on shores of eternal summer, attending moonlight banquets, and seeing the peculiar dance called Ka-lu-lah—no more to do than the president of a life insurance company—seems very alluring to the careworn, overworked American of to-day.—Critical Review.

A CARD TO MY FRIENDS.

I desire to establish myself as Your Jeweler. I can do so if I can convince you that it is to your interest financially, not otherwise. I am aware that it is no object for you to patronize me unless I can do better by you—sell you as good or better goods—than your home jeweler, at lower prices. Can I do it? Yes. How? Permit me to explain: My establishment is phenomenal. No other store in the world, in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, has the standing, reputation, and does the amount of business, in my line, that mine does. No stock outside of few largest cities embraces the quantity of elegant Fine Gold Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver, Optical and Fancy Goods as mine. I buy the best—Watches from $5 to $300. Diamond Jewelry from $10 to $1,000, etc. Merchants who compete with me hv only in largest cities, but which of necessity, implies large expenditures and large profits. If you patronize them, this you must pay. If you buy a Watch or Diamond of them, they will and must charge you a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. If you will order of me, I will and can sell you the same quality of goods at 5 to 10 per cent profit. And if you buy of a small dealer in any other small town, he also must charge you 30 to 50 per cent. Why? Because his sales, aggregating at most $10,000 per annum, will not cover expenses at 10 per cent. To liv and come out ahead he is compelled to charge you an average of 30 per cent.

But my sales now approximate $50,000 per year. Therefore I can cut down profits—divide them with you—and yet realize a larger surplus at the end of the year than my competitors:

$50,000 merchandise sold at 10 per cent profit equals $5,000 gain; $10,000 merchandise sold at 30 per cent profit equals $3,000 gain; showing a profit of $2,000 on the goods sold at 10 per cent over and above those sold at 30 per cent. On Broadway, New York, or on State street, Chicago, Jewelers pay from $15,000 to $20,000 rent. I pay $800 and other expenses in proportion. Therefore, having been established in Rochelle thirty-one years, having always paid "a hundred cents on the dollar," being an infallible judge of every article I buy, and buying goods in large quantities, all jobbers, importers, and manufacturers are as anxious to sell me their wares at Bottom Price, as to any one in existence. And therefore, buying low and selling more goods than any other dealer in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, I can and will send you any thing you may need in my line (prepaid per mail or express, and cash back if not satisfactory) at 10 to 30 per cent lower than any other house. Order from any catalog and give me a chance to establish myself as Your Jeweler.

Poetry.

The Principles of Evolution—Slow But Sure.

O past infinitude of ages, speak!
Help man attain the hight his soul would seek!
O vast infinitude of future years,
Your tongueless silence fills his soul with fears!
The heavens confuse with million worlds to trace,
His reason staggers, lost in endless space;
So small—so weak—how can he reach some hight
With one mad bound beyond the realm of night?
Voiceless the stars! dumb, dumb the skies of blue!
O Natnre, Mother Earth, man turns to you!
His fevered cheek cools in yonr evening breeze,
Whose restful song is lost 'mid dewy leaves,
Leaves through whose tiny veins whole rivers run,
And tons of substance lifted by the sun
Form million cells, without one single sound,
Draping vast forests, carpeting the ground,
Strong in its silence, conquering without strife,
Right onward marching, nature, God, and life.
Perfecting all, no violence nor rest,
Haste is destruction, gentle ways are best.
Life came with little haste, a power abstruse,
Unnumbered cycles paved the earth for use,
Slowly advancing, filling out each plan,
From crystal, mollusk—mollusk up to man.
Through countless ages man has upward trod,
The bestial nature fighting with the god.
o slight his progress, angels doubtful scan
Each new arrival, Is it beast or man?
Strange combination, twofold in its kind,
The beast below unites with the divine.
Is virtue forced? Can legislation free
Man from his inborn, low infirmity?
Man undeveloped, ignorant and crude,
True to one nature is and therefore good.
Promote the god, call out the higher life,
Will evil dissipate without mad strife?
Resist not evil, cultivate the good,
Love is the mightiest power if understood.
What it is possible for man to be,
Is as unfathomed as infinity.

Lincoln's Oratory.

Although simple in language, Abraham Lincoln has poured from his lips eloquence that has never been surpassed by any American orator, be it a Webster or a Phillips. There are many people who do not recognize in him an orator, but I will present a little testimony and some extracts from his speeches that will prove him an orator of more than ordinary ability. Abraham Lincoln's language was always plain and simple, yet full of good eloquence and keen logic.

Hon. John D. Canton, a noted chief justice, says: "His mode of speaking was generally of a plain and unimpassioned character, and yet he was the author of some of the most beautiful and eloquent passages in our language," etc.

What could be more beautiful than Lincoln's "Gettysburg Address?" Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson says: "President Lincoln's 'Gettysburg Address' has always seemed to me the high-water mark of American oratory. It proves what so many hav not discovered, that the highest eloquence is simple."

Ex-Governor Rice of Massachusetts speaks of it as "the grandest utterance of modern eloquence." No one can read it without feeling a glow in their hearts. It inspires them with increased patriotism, and causes them to honor and glorify the name of him who uttered it.

His great speech to the Bloomington convention, May 29, 1856, was another gem of fine oratory. Hon. Wm. H. Herndon says: "I hav heard or read all of Mr. Lincoln's great speeches; and I giv it as my opinion that the Bloomington speech was the grand effort of his life." One of the delegates says: "Never was an audience more completely electrified by human eloquence. Again and again, during the delivery, the audience sprang to their feet, and by long and continued cheers expressed how deeply the speaker had aroused them." His oration in the hall of the house of representativs at Springfield was very eloquent and pathetic, and his famous Cooper Institute speech is said to be a fine piece of oratory. A gentleman who was there says: "I think I never saw an audience more thoroughly carried away by an orator." Mr. Lincoln's speech closed with: "Let us hav faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end do our duty as we understand it."

I will now quote a few extracts from some of Lincoln's speeches. The following is from a speech delivered in December, 1863:

The probability that we may fail in the struggle ought not to deter us from the support of a cause which I deem to be just. It shall not deter me. If I ever feel the soul within me elevate and expand to dimensions not wholly unworthy of its almighty architect, it is when I contemplate the cause of my country, deserted by all the world beside, and I standing up boldly and alone, and hurling defiance at her victorious oppressors. Here, without contemplating consequences, before high heaven, and in the face of the world, I swear eternal fidelity to the just cause, as I deem it, of the land of my life, my liberty, and my love.

Before I close I will quote an extract from Lincoln's second inaugural address, March 3, 1865:

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God givs us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in: To bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall hav borne the battle, and for his widow and for his orphan; to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselvs and all nations.

Abraham Lincoln's orations are gems of eloquence, logic, and beauty, and will forever stand as a monument to his memory.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

A Norwegian Poet and Radical on Church and State.

Bjornstjerne Bjornson, the Victor Hugo of Norway, who as poet, dramatist, and novelist has done so much to create a national literature, has during the last five or six years taken an activ part in the politics of his country, much to the disgust of the Conservativ party. As the following extract from his preface to a translation of one of Colonel Ingersoll's articles in the North American Review will show, he is not one of those advanced men of letters who are afraid to express their opinion on politics and religion. He declares:

A nation where Dissent prevails will not suffer any royal despotism or any attack upon its political self-government; and a nation in full possession of such political self-government will not suffer any state church, that is to say, any authority over the belief of their children, or over the affairs of their own communities. To work for independence in religious matters is to work for independence in political matters.

But a nation will not arrive at real independence so long as it maintains a state church and monarchy. The excellent, well-meaning king, the excellent, well-meaning clergymen, can do little. The institution blocks the way, because no longer life of our life. Look at the clergyman in one single aspect. The royally appointed preacher and teacher of morals is bound by oath, and by prospect of promotion, to definit formulas; to believe, maintain, and defend these. Still further, any kind of clergyman, with any sort of ability, and any kind of disposition, must "preach the word," that is to say, discourse upon a certain text at a certain time each Sunday, often twice, and officiate over every corpse whose relations require it, and before every bridal couple who so desire. . . . There are never so many lies told all over the country as on Sundays—in the towns also on week-days between 12 and 2, when bells toll for funerals, or between 3 and 5, when people are married—lies, lies, lies—I do not mean in dogmas and questions of belief; I think not of these—no, I mean lies that are being told by pious clergymen from disinclination, from want of talent, or from ignorance of those to whom he speaks and about whom he is speaking—from lazy, fat custom; from affected devotion, sorrow, or gladness; from admonitions without force, belief without power, feeling without warmth; from preaching, twaddle, and gabble; from sleepy droning, drivel, and snivel; from uplifted eyes and voice. It is this royal institution which has the morals of the country in holy keeping.

Then look at the other institution, in one single aspect: when it wishes to show itself in all its awe-inspiring majesty, paraded in a pageant, where a modest, brave king must take upon himself the most mighty and gracious we of the institution, in full style and medieval costume. Yes, just look at the institution, with its escort of past traditions and of all those who in the country hav to add their authority to that of royalty! Look at these people; what they will stoop to! Look at their gaudy dresses, their feathers, their gewgaws, their gestures, their look when "his majesty" speaks. Look at them—these people who in themselvs are truly sensible and calculating; who, as a rule, jeer a little at everything, hav respect for little else save, perhaps, ceremonies. . . . Look at them thus arrayed for the glorification of his majesty, and ask yourself if they hav lost their senses! Is it to strengthen the feeling of authority in the country that they thus conduct and parade themselvs? Then its pretensions are extremely like those of the other institution, which has undertaken to uphold morals. No wonder, then, that these two institutions occasionally embrace each other in touching recognition and mutual approbation.

I do not believe in the abolition of the state church without the abolition of monarchy, or in the dignity of man becoming a popular force until both church and crown are done away with.—Translator, J. M. WHEELER.

Obituary.

On September 30th died C. H. Saunders, of 100 S. 1st street, this city, aged seventy-one years. Father Saunders had been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and had been one of the most activ workers on this coast. He has sold many hundred dollars' worth of Ingersoll's lectures, and his home was always the stopping-place of S. P. Putnam, C. B. Reynolds, and your humble servant when they were in this city. In fact, his house was more like a hotel than like anything else, for here all Liberals found their Mecca. Mr. Saunders had not an enemy in the world. To know him was to love him, and his only religion was to do good. Nobody was too low for him to help if he was needy. In fact, he has always been so unselfish that he has never laid up any of this world's store, but remained poor to the end. A purer, more honest, more truthful, better-principled man never lived. Colonel Ingersoll was his god, THE TRUTH SEEKER his Bible, and to do good his religion. And if immortality should be the boon of all at last, Father Saunders will surely wear the brightest laurels for a life well spent in trying to make the world better. D. C. SEYMOUR.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

News of the Week.

THERE is great immigration of French Canadians into the Eastern states. We hav 800,000 population of that descent. Two of their distinguishing features are eagerness to become naturalized and form political clubs, and attachment to parochial schools.

THE Western territories apply for admission as states.

A MINE explosion a Pittsburgh, Kan., on the 9th, killed 160 men.

HENRY GEORGE has gone to England to lecture on the land-tax.

CATHOLICS of India and Australia presented $1,000,000 to the pope.

THE Samoa islands ask us to rescue them from German oppression.

IN a factory fire at Rochester, N. Y., on the 9th, ten persons were fatally burnt.

DIVINE services were held in every European capital giving thanks for the escape of the czar.

WILLIAM II. appeals for a bigger civil list, which means more spending money for himself and family.

YELLOW fever cases, nearly 5,000; deaths, nearly 400. The disease is increasing in some sections, and the destitution caused by the quarantine is severe.

SWITZERLAND recently instituted a progressiv income tax, which is watched with interest all over the world.

THE confession of the Fox sisters that their Spiritual manifestations were fraudulent, is said by Spiritualists to hav been procured by the church.

A CLASS of sons of very wealthy men is increasing in our colleges and by extravagance and pride vitiating former principles of conduct and ideals of merit.

IN the United States one man in every 200 takes a college course; in England, one in every 500; in Scotland, one in every 600; in Germany, one in every 213.

ON the 9th there was another of the mysterious murders and mutilations at Whitechapel, London, making nine in number. They are probably the work of religion.

THE subjects of the king of Wurtemberg compelled him to dismiss two Spiritualists, Americans by the names of Woodcock and Hendry, who had gained control over him and whom he had made favorits of rank.

KING OTTO of Bavaria is sinking deeper in his religious mania. If he had lived two centuries ago, instead of being called crazy he would hav been proclaimed one of the church's best sons, and utilized for extermination of heretics.

THE archbishop of Cologne, Germany, has issued a pastoral letter to the faithful defining their duty in the coming elections for members of the Landtag. The letter says they must vote for candidates who are ready to defend the rights of the church. The clergy are ordered to activly interfere in the contests, using their utmost influence to elect men who are resolved to giv to God what is God's due.

THE news of the election given last week was a trifle inaccurate. Mr. Harrison carried Indiana, but lost Connecticut. Illinois is still solidly Republican. Mr. Harrison will hav 233 electoral votes. The "solid South" was cracked by West Virginia being still in doubt. The Republicans will hav a majority in Congress, and will probably admit Dakota in two states, Washington territory, and Montana. Dakota and Washington territory are Republican, Montana is Democratic. If the Republicans behave, they hav a long lease on the country. But the world will go round just the same, and THE TRUTH SEEKER will be published every week at $3 per year, large discounts in clubs. Now is the time to subscribe.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is nothing so important in the whole world as that which it imports the priests to cause to be regarded as important. The Christian world has had for some centuries past the happiness of being constantly troubled and thrown into strife and turmoil about certain important words, important arguments, important epochs, important ceremonies, important bulls, etc.—Voltaire.

YOU are to understand that for above seventy moons past there hav been two struggling parties in this empire, under the names of Tramecksan and Slamecksan, from the high and low heels of their shoes, by which they distinguish themselvs. It is alleged, indeed, that the high heels are most agreeable to our ancient constitution; but, however this be, his majesty has determined to make use only of low heels in the administration of the government, and all offices in the gift of the crown, as you cannot but observe; and particularly, that his majesty's imperial heels are lower at least by a drurr than any of his court (drurr is a measure about the fourteenth part of an inch). The animosities between these two parties run so high, that they will neither eat nor drink nor talk with each other. We compute the Tramecksan, or high heels, to exceed us in number, but the power is wholly on our side.—Swift's Gulliver's Travels.

SWIFT by the parties of high or low heels represents the High or Low churches; . . . speculativ differences are shown to be ridiculous when the zeal with which they are opposed or defended too much exceeds their importance.—Hawkesworth.

METHINKS it well behooves merchants to consider well of the justice of a war, before they voluntarily engage a gang of ruffians to attack their fellow-merchants of a neighboring nation, to plunder them of their property, and perhaps ruin them and their families, if they yield it; or to wound, maim, and murder them, if they endeavor to defend it. Yet these things are done by Christian merchants, whether a war be just or unjust; and it can hardly be just on both sides. They are done by English and American merchants, who, nevertheless, complain of private theft, and hang by dozens the thieves they hav taught by their own example.—Benjamin Franklin.

WHEN I simply dwell on that one word "war," there comes over me a wild horror, as if men talked to me of sorcery, of the Inquisition, of anything remote, obsolete, abominable, moustrous, contrary to nature. Soldiers are the scourges of the world.—M. de Maupassant.

MODERN civilization rests upon physical science; take away her gifts to our country, and our position among the leading nations of the world is gone to-morrow; for it is physical science that makes intelligence and moral energy stronger than brute force.—Huxley.

IF, now, we demand, What has science done for the promotion of modern civilization; what has it done for the happiness, the well-being of society? we shall find our answer in the same manner that we reached a just estimate of what Latin Christianity had done. Systems of philosophy and forms of religion find a measure of their influence on humanity in census returns. Latin Christianity, in a thousand years, could not double the population of Europe; it did not add perceptibly to the term of individual life. But, as Dr. Jarvis, in his report to the Massachusetts board of health, has stated, at the epoch of the Reformation "the average longevity in Geneva was 21.21 years; between 1814 and 1833 it was 40.68; as large a number of persons now liv to seventy years as lived to forty, three hundred years ago.—Draper.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of intelligence. That is the only lever capable of raising mankind. I believe in the gospel of intelligence; in the gospel of education. The school-house is my cathedral; the universe is my Bible. Intelligence must rule trinmphant. Humanity is the grand religion. And no God can put a man into hell in another world who has made a little heaven in this. God cannot make miserable a man who has made somebody else happy. God cannot hate anybody who is capable of loving his neighbor. So I believe in this great gospel of generosity. Ah, but they say it won't do. You must believe. I say no. My gospel of health will prolong life; my gospel of intelligence, my gospel of loving, my gospel of good-fellowship will cover the world with happy homes. My doctrin will put carpets upon your floors, pictures upon your walls. My doctrin will put books upon your shelves, ideas in your mind. My doctrin will relieve the world of the abnormal monsters born of the ignorance of superstition. My doctrin will giv us health, wealth, and happiness. That is what I want. That is what I believe in. . . . I believe in the gospel of cheerfulness; the gospel of good nature; in the gospel of good health. Let us pay some attention to our bodies; take care of our bodies, and our souls will take care of themselvs.—Ingersoll.

A WONDERFUL MATERIALIZATION.

Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand.—Num. xxii 31.

Odds and Ends.

A RAILROAD is one of the things of which a little doesn't go a long way.

BLINKS: "Hello, Jinks, glad to see you at the club once more. Wife gone away, eh?" Jinks: "No; she got back."

WE are curious to know whether the members of that Washington Bicycle Club for women are all honorary or some activ.

HE: "Will you be a sister to me?" She: "No; but I will be your wife, darling." He: "That is not what I want, dear."

FROM the way in which everybody is jumping on him, Lord Sackville is probably considered more of a door mat than a diplomat.

CITIZEN: "What are you doing with that man?" Policeman: "I've just arrested him." Citizen: "But he's as deaf as a post." Policeman: "He'll get his hearing before the magistrate."

THE Western blizzard will soon be abroad in the land, and it will presently be in order for the small towns that poked fun at New York last March to appeal to their big sister for assistance.

POOR old Boston is at the mercy of a big beef trust, but she doesn't mind it much. But once let the unprincipled speculators try to form a bean trust, and the row which began at Lexington will be fought all over again.

MAGISTRATE (to prisoner): "You are charged, sir, with beating your wife." Prisoner: "Yes, sah, an' I'se proud of it, sah." Magistrate: "Proud of it!" Prisoner: "Kase, sah, she weighs twenty poun's mo'n me."

A LADY stood hanging on the strap of a street car, when a workman in the far corner arose and politely offered her a seat. "I thank you," she said, in a very sweet tone, "but I dislike to deprive the only gentleman in the car of a seat."

TEACHER (to class in natural science): "What kind of light do we get from the sun?" Scholar: "Solar light, sir." Teacher: "Very good. Now, Tommy Briggs, tell us what kind of light we get from the moon?" Tommy Briggs: "Satel-light."

BESSIE (just home from boarding-school): "I'm delighted to see you, mamma." (Kisses her.) Mamma (regarding her suspiciously): "Bessie, you didn't kiss with a burrowing motion when you went away from home. You've learned that from somebody with a long mustache!"

MISTRESS (to new girl): "What under the sun do you mean by sitting idly all day in the kitchen when I am paying you $4 a week?" New girl (recent importation): "Sure, mum, the immigrant commissioners of Castle Garden told us if we contracted to work we'd be sint back."

SHE stood upon the platform scale,
Her lover by her side,
Her dimpled cheeks were rosy red,
He murmured, "Be my bride."

With downcast eye and faltering hand,
Love's summons to obey,
She placed a nickel in the slot,
And gave herself a weigh.

"I WOULDN'T cry, little boy," said a kind old gentleman, consolingly; "you may be unhappy for the moment, but it will soon pass away. You wouldn't expect me to cry, would you, every time I'm a little unhappy?" "No, sir," responded the tearful little lad; "you'd prob'ly go an' get a drink."

MISS PENELOPE: "Before I giv you an answer, Marshal, I want you to know that I believe the married state to be simply a reinforced condition for the better amelioration of the wrongs and sufferings of women. Do you understand me?" Mr. Mallow: "I think I do; and, if you'll allow me, I'll hedge a little. Won't you be a sister to me?"

Now Farmer Oatcake comes to town
With spoil of summer boarders,
He's greeted by the bunco man's Seductiv "Here's toward us!"
. . . . . .
Back to Podunk he plods dead broke,
Snarling at "thievin' city folk."

"Now that we are engaged, George," she said shyly, "it is proper that we should hav no secrets from each other. I hav loved before, but it only resulted in a breach of promis case." "And what did you get?" asked George. "$3,000." "Ah, dear, never mind the breach of promis suit. My love is founded upon 'rocks,' and will endure."

"WHAT is your opinion of the question now occupying so much space in the papers, 'Is marriage a failure?'" asked a gentleman of a new acquaintance. "Well, I am emphatically of the opinion that marriage is a great success. Indeed, if it were not for marriage, my occupation, like Othello's, would be gone." "Ah! May I ask your profession?" "I am a divorce lawyer."

SHE: "What a grand thing it must be to be a citizen of a free country! How I wish I were a man, so I could take up the paper and see it full of appeals for my vote! Do you not enjoy it?" He: "I? Why, no; I never see any appeals for my vote." She: "You don't?" He: "No, indeed. I am neither an Irishman nor a workingman. I am only an American. It's depressing."

"KEEP away from that," said a restaurant keeper to an Irishman who was standing in front of a newly arrived box of turtles holding his finger in evident pain. "What are you doing there anyhow?" "I wor investigating." "Investigating what?" "I wor trying to see which was the head and which was the tail ov the baste over there in the corner ov the box." "What do you want to know that for?" "I've a curiosity to know whether I've been bitten or stung."

MR. J. PARKER: "There are Trimble-Hawkins and his wife. They are a handsome couple, aren't they?" Miss Charity Ball: "Oh, yes, they are quite distinguished-looking; but do you know they say that at home they quarrel scandalously, and, besides that, Mrs. Trimble-Hawkins absolutely neglects every household duty, and her children are a perfect disgrace." Mr. J. Parker: "Oh, you know her then?" Miss Charity Ball: "Yes, indeed; I am her best friend!"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 47. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. {New York, Saturday, November 24, 1888.} 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

THANKSGIVING.

Notes and Clippings.

WHEN Anthony Comstock lectured at Princeton College recently, the students, with polite consideration for his sensitivness, draped the statue of "The Gladiator" with a bifurcated garment of red flannel.

THE following advertisment appeared in an English religious paper: "Wanted, before Advent, unmarried priest (earnest evangelical High Churchman), for small country church, the congregation of which is largely composed of men. The six points. Choral services. Open-air preaching. Cricket, football, and workingmen's clubs. No mustached or lawn-tennis playing priest need apply."

THE Irish bishops hav received another papal rescript. It orders them to activly execute the former rescript, which instructs them to denounce the plan of campaign and boycotting. It also orders them to direct the priests to preach against agitation and to forbid them to take part in the boycotting and plan of campaign movements, which they must oppose with all the means in their power. The Irish bishops will probably hold a conference before reading the pope's rescript to their flocks.

THE small army of men who own Keely stock are delighted with the action of the Philadelphia courts in committing the inventor for contempt. They invested in good faith in a number of instances, and the procrastination and delay of Keely has been a source of great trial. He will now hav to explain something about his mysterious power or go to jail. It is said by lawyers that this is absolutely his last chance. The knowing ones assert, however, that the action will come to nothing, from the fact that Keely has almost become a maniac on the subject of keeping his secret, and it is really believed that he would die before he would reveal the secret of his power—always presuming that he has a power.

THE new Italian penal code provides that such an assertion as that the pope has a right to Rome as his seat of government is punishable as a crime. In the Italian senate, last week, the minister of justice, Signor Zanardelli, replying to hostil criticism of this article of the penal code, contended that similar articles dealing with the clergy were contained in the codes of almost all the European states. Greater liberty, he said, would be assured to the clergy in the discharge of their religious duties. The provisions for the punishment of priests refusing their services had been abolished. But continued conspiracy against the unity and integrity of the country could not be tolerated. The clauses on this subject must be retained. To modify them as if with an intention to abandon them, after the agitation which the clergy had promoted, would be inconsistent with the government's position, which was supported by a large majority of each house of Parliament. Premier Crispi, in a speech defending the Public Safety bill, raised the ire of the Conservativs by declaring that public almshouses would, if necessary, be supported by funds of religious associations whose revenues were habitually devoted to non-religious celebrations. A majority of the members approved the premier's suggestion.

THE Christian Leader, a Universalist journal, says: "When a Protestant undertakes to state the issue between Catholics and non-Catholics touching the school question, the retort of the politicians—those who cater for Catholic votes—is that the statement is the dictate of prejudice. But surely when the very words of representativ Catholics are cited, the prejudice—if such there is—cannot be a Protestant one. The Freeman's Journal, without the least circumlocution, puts the Catholic demand in these terms: 'Catholics ask that the state let them educate their own children in their own way, with their own share of the school tax, or else that the state itself shall provide and maintain schools in which the children of Catholic parents shall be trained in the elementary secular branches and in knowledge of their religion and their moral and religious duties.' The policy which the state is here asked to adopt is one that would permit all the denominations, each in its own way, to educate, at the state's expense, its children in what the particular denomination deems moral and religious truth and conduct. It ought to be enough to barely state what 'Catholics ask.' The state, we think, will do nothing of the kind. We might say that the thing asked for is un-American, is unreasonable; it is more to the exact point to say that it is supremely ridiculous."

AN Anarchist of this city was interviewed by a Sun reporter last week in regard to the prediction of Captain Bonfield, of Chicago, that there will be a widespread Anarchist uprising on July 14th next, and that in Paris, where their operations are to begin, the centenary of the fall of the Bastile is then to be celebrated. "It is true," the New York Anarchist said, "that there will be a big time in Paris on July 14th next at the Bastile celebration, and it is also true that they had a big time there on the same date in last July, and likewise on that date of every year since the establishment of the French republic. July 14th in France is like the Fourth of July in the United States. It is the national annual holiday, when all France, including the French government and army, unites in celebrating the most memorable event in French history. The day is also celebrated in this country, mainly by Frenchmen, and it will be celebrated here next year, as Inspector Bonfield, of Chicago, says. But there is no need of being alarmed about the celebration of next year, any more than there was about that of last year, or of the year before. The celebration is not Anarchistic, but republican, and signalizes the downfall of monarchy. As the Americans in France and other countries celebrate the Fourth of July, so the Frenchmen in America and other countries celebrate July 14th; and the sympathizers with French liberty who liv in France join hands with the people there, just as the foreign sympathizers with American liberty who liv here join hands with the nativs on Independence day. That is all the ground there is for the apprehensions of Inspector Bonfield, of Chicago, who probably never was in France. There is not the slightest danger in this country, any more than there is in France, of the Anarchists raising any rumpus on the coming French centenary. They are a hundred times stronger in France than they are here, but the French government takes no heed of them. It is too bad that Captain Bonfield should scare people about the 14th of next July."

Communications.

Christianity an Immoral Religion.

The Christian religion is upheld by its professors as the purest fountain of morals, and an eternal spring of charity and benevolence. We are continually being told what a vast influence for good the New Testament has had upon the history of the human race. All the morality we possess, all the advantages of civilization we enjoy, all that makes man great and noble, all that makes life worth living, is, we are told, the result of the teachings of Christianity. If such were the case, ill befall me if I wrote one line against it. But if, on the other hand, it is a record of falsehood, a stumbling-block to science, a bar to social progress, a deadly pool generating only the miasma of bigotry, selfishness, and superstition, then it is the imperativ duty of all who see such to be the case to proclaim it to the world, and to reiterate their denunciation with so much frequency and energy that society must, at length, take notice of the outcry.

Is such the case? Why, the very foundation of Christianity was, according to its own record, laid in adultery, while its pinnacle was capped with murder. Chri t is said to hav been born of a mysterious intercourse between his mother and the third person of the trinity, and was eventually murdered by his own countrymen, acting under the influence of his own father. Now, I assert that, from a religion which begins with social treachery, and ends with wantonly shedding the blood of the guiltless, no very pure and exalted code of morals is to be expected.

The moral character of Christ himself is by no means the perfect one that even some writers admit it to be. For he sets an example of equivocation where he tells his disciples: "That he speaks in parables, that men may not understand him, and therefore perish everlastingly." Upon what principle except that of the most cruel injustice can such a saying be explained? Could anything be more outrageously absurd and so utterly subversiv of human well-being?

Take also that astonishing exhortation to carelessness and improvidence to be found in the Sermon on the Mount: "Take no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself." I dare venture to say that through the whole range of human literature you may seek in vain to parallel this atrociously mischievous advice. Any nation that would be so foolish and confiding as to entrust its destinies to so pernicious a maxim, would, in a comparativly short time, cease from among the nations of the world, and were it to be universally adopted, the chariot wheels of progress would be reversed, civilization would disappear, and our whole social fabric would collapse, and would speedily become involved in irretrievable ruin. Christians, however, seek to evade the force of these precepts by saying that what Christ really meant was, "Be not over anxious for the morrow," but what authority hav they for saying that what Christ meant was, "Be not over anxious," for it is self-evident that Christ really meant what he said, otherwise his reference to the fowls of the air and the lilies of the field is unmeaning or grossly misleading? But what would be the result if the whole community were to act upon such principles—if all were to do as their exemplars, "the fowls of the air, and the lilies of the field, which toil not, neither do they spin, which neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns?" Imagin the agriculturist taking no thought for the morrow, making no provisions for the coming harvest, and leaving the morrow to take thought for the things of itself; fancy all men trusting to be fed and clothed by their heavenly father like the sparrows and the lilies. What would be the consequences? Why, in a few brief months our boasted civilization would vanish like a dream, and we may be thankful that the common sense of mankind, aided by their ever-pressing necessities, has effectually prevented any attempt to carry these suicidal precepts into general practice.

Another instance closely allied to one I hav just considered is that "poverty is systematically commended, and wealth systematically condemned." Poverty and humility were to be the chief characteristics of the followers of Jesus Christ. They were to arrive at the former by attending rather to prayer and religious exercises, than to those industrial pursuits which result in material prosperity, and at the latter by a painful course of self-abnegation and suppression of those open expressions of feeling which the world are generally accustomed to regard as manly and generous. Those who hav possessions are commanded to sell them and giv the proceeds to the poor; wealth is denounced as an all but insuperable obstacle to the salvation of its possessor, for "it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heeven." In one instance in particular Christ teaches plainly that poverty is an indispensable condition of salvation, that no man, however blameless his life, however lofty his virtue, can retain his riches and be saved. When the rich young man came to Christ and asked: "What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" what was Christ's answer? Was it, Believe on me? No; Christ's scheme of salvation was, "Go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast and giv to the poor."

That to the young man was the one indispensable requisit for inheriting eternal life, and unless the conditions differ for different individuals, that must be the condition for all. Poor, unfortunate sons of wealth, yours is but a dreary outlook, you hav had your "consolation" in this life, therefore there is none in the future for you. But what would be the opinion of our Jay Goulds, our Vanderbilts, and all our rich merchants, of a new prophet who should tell them that it was less difficult for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for one of them to escape the horrors of eternal damnation? Why, they would smile at him as a vulgar demagog, or would clamor for his committal as a seditious firebrand, a sort of revolutionist gone mad on religious topics, and therefore dangerous to the being of well-disposed persons. I might, if time and space would permit, proceed to show how the desire for wealth, instead of being the root of all evil, has ever been the great motiv power impelling to fresh discoveries and inventions, to useful enterprises and material improvements of every kind. But I will not pursue this topic further, only to insist on the obvious fact that, nationally and individually, wealth is a great blessing, while poverty is one of the gravest evils under which mankind can suffer, and that the religion which teaches the contrary of this is a religion of the most wicked and mischievous description.

Another pernicious doctrin, which was most emphatically taught by Christ, and quite as emphatically repudiated by his followers, is the doctrin of "non-resistance to injury;" indeed, the term "non-resistance" falls short of expressing the scope of the doctrin, for we are commanded not merely not to resist violence and wrong, but actually to encourage it; we are not simply to submit to be robbed, but to reward the robber (vide Matt. v, 39, 41; Luke vi, 30). Can anyone be found mad enough to defend these absurdities; will anyone maintain that we ought to submit calmly and patiently to personal insults and indignities at the hand of every brutal ruffian, or that we should stand passivly by while any scoundrel helped himself to our goods? Nay, more, if his modesty or forbearance should lead him to be satisfied with appropriating only our money, that we should run after him with our watch, and press him to accept an umbrella or silk hat besides? I maintain that these maxims, if carried into practice, would soon make a race of miserable, shrinking slaves, fit for nothing but to wear the yoke of tyranny, which their spiritual leaders, the priests, would take care they should not long remain without.

Again, how can this saying be explained: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away." Or this: "If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." These are extraordinary precepts to be uttered by an amiable and moral man, a stranga principle of a religion of love. Morality rightly insists on an observance of the duties of relationship; but these maxims would cruelly and abruptly sever them all, and would indeed disband society. Could anything be more hurtful, more pernicious, more immoral, and more degrading to mankind than such examples? I say decidedly not, therefore we need higher and nobler examples and purer systems of morality than those set forth by the Christian religion for the guidance of human conduct. It is known that such maxims are opposed alike both to nature and common sense, and a religion which enjoins them is simply an impracticable absurdity.

Now, I ask in all sincerity—and this is addressed chiefly for our Christian friends—what would they think of the propagator of a new religion who should say, "Think not that I came to send peace on earth, I came not to send peace, but a sword?" Every philanthropist would answer that the sooner such a person left the world, and his malignant doctrin was forgotten in the obscurity of an unknown grave, the better it would be for humanity. Yet Christ said this; and more, he plainly and distinctly told his disciples that his mission was "to set the son at variance with the father, the daughter against her mother," etc. (Matt. x, 34–37). And I assert that the sense of difference between right and wrong is greatly weakened by maxims of this kind in the minds of those who believe in them. Therefore, their depressing influence on the morality of religious society is too great to be easily estimated.

If we desire to see the people socially and morally regenerated, and able to enjoy their rights as citizens, we, as Secularists, must bestir ourselvs, or else we may soon anticipate an advent of the Dark Ages, if such a religion as this (which embodies such teachings) is allowed to take a hold upon the people. The priests are too cunning to provoke religious disputes, for they know too well at whose cost such a contest would be carried on. Therefore it behooves us "unmistakably" to speak out, until they are compelled to meet us on an equal platform; for it is chiefly by discussion that the truth can be elicited. It is cowardice and hypocrisy to shrink from speaking the truth. So let us not shrink from performing our duty because fanaticism may brand us with the name of "Infidel," for it is a glory to be an Infidel to error and immorality. I would, therefore, exhort all who wish well to the cause to commence the agitation against the church with renewed vigor and energy. Let us try to educate the people, instead of striving to keep them in ignorance, for it is only on the soil of ignorance that superstition can flourish. I hav necessarily referred to a few points rather than brought forward a multiplicity of instances.

But in conclusion, I affirm that the entire scheme of Christianity is immoral and exercises a depressing influence upon public morality. It is immoral, because it is inconsistent with justice and humanity. It is not above nature, but below it; it is not incomprehensible, but plainly and superficially false; it is not merciful, but savage; not ethereal, but gross. Socially, Christianity has passed away; morally, it has never existed. Primitiv Christianity perished in the early ages of the present era. "It is finished," is recorded as being the last despairing cry of Jesus Christ, and he and his chaotic, distempered project for the regeneration of the poor of his country expired together. However, powerful institutions were raised upon the ruins of the religious and social schemes of Christ. Powerful efforts are being made by the clergy in these days to revive it; but men cannot raise the dead, and the churches that will not progress must perish, while those who are content to sail slowly on in the rear of human intelligence will gradually assume a higher and better nature, until the preaching of religious doctrins will be lost in the propagation of good, sound moral, and philosophical teachings.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

An Old Story.

The evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen.

I do not know that this quotation should be attributed to McArthur as something original with him either in its substance or in its expression. It is as old as the hills, and with its proper limitations and qualifications may be accepted as an indisputable statement.

An old story which occasionally reappears in print will serve to illustrate my meaning.

An illiterate country justice of the peace, in a case of sheep-stealing, after a half dozen credible witnesses had deposed to having seen the defendant commit the theft, asked the prisoner what he had to say in his own defense. "Sure, now, yer honor, an' here are but six men to say that they saw me stale the shape, an' I can bring twinty as can sware they niver saw me stale that same shape nor any other." "Begorra! Pat," said his honor, "an' if ye can do that yer a free man." Accordingly twenty men were sworn and deposed that they had never seen Pat steal a sheep, or anything else, whereupon his honor, finding the preponderance of numbers in Pat's favor, as twenty to six, ordered his discharge. Notwithstanding its chestnutty flavor, this story, ever since I can remember, has furnished the "funny editor" ready matter for his column, where it often reappears. The laugh is supposed to come in at the expense of the court, but from the meagerness of the account we cannot be sure that the situation and circumstances of these twenty negativ witnesses for the defendant does not entitle their testimony to all the weight given it by his honor. If they were present at the place where and at the time when the crime was alleged to hav been committed, and altogether were in as favorable circumstances to become eye-witnesses as the six prosecuting witnesses, I make bold to assert that it becomes, in the absence of any other reasonable explanation of the discrepancy in the testimony, a simple question of veracity. But in every issue of this kind an impeachment of the veracity of the witnesses should be a dernier ressort only to be permitted when every other available hypothesis has been exhausted. It is our great confidence in the integrity of all testimony that leads us in this story to account for the seeming discrepancy by gratuitously making the discovery that the twenty were not in circumstances to know whereof they testify, either pro or con, and thereupon, in view of our own shrewdness, we laugh at the stupidity of the magistrate. But was there a real contradiction in the evidence in this case? If so, in what condition were the witnesses to make correct observations of the facts? I do not know. I do not care. It is a matter of no importance. Let us transfer these questions to the controversy between Materialists and Spiritualists, Spiritists, or Spiritologists—using whichever name is most acceptable to the party designated thereby. Are these deponents in such mental condition that their testimony is to be received without any criticism? In "Letters from Friends," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 3d, read what D. Higbee, M.D., has to advise as the proper condition of those who aspire to be witnesses of Spiritual phenomena. Read it. It is too lengthy and worthless to repeat, except for the use to which I am now putting it—to show the utter unreliableness of those who giv such testimony. It means that they must hav already ignored the difference between seeing and believing, and they are to "cherish and maintain a feeling as if some mortal friends were to call." "Then sit still, or sing some forty minutes, 'Nearer, My God, to Thee.'" They cannot do the capitalization in music, but they can get into a holy and "reverential calm," when at length—

> If to believe it you are able,
> Planchet goes skipping o'er the table.

Now, if under this hoodooing some poor fellow's brain is entirely upset, and he sees—actually sees—snakes, and ghosts, and the devil knows what, why, his testimony, "the evidence of one who has seen, has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen." Ridiculous! Absurd! That is to giv all the advantage to fools and knaves, or if this is too harsh, to persons who are abnormal, whose faculties are aberrant. I do not wish to speak unkindly of these poor creatures! I acknowledge that many of them, considered apart from their idiosyncrasies, are people of great minds and kind hearts. Still, when I come to the logic of facts, I find them, on this subject alone, disqualified from giving good testimony.

If "the evidence of one who has seen is of more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen," then not Spiritualism only, with A. J. Davis and Swedenborg, but Christianity with all its pretended miracles, and Mohammedanism, and every other fraud with supernatural pretensions, is to be received on the positiv testimony of eye-witnesses. This misapprehension of the true law of evidence is the opening of the flood-gate of every conceivable superstition. But let us consider in what does the value of personal testimony consist. Upon what does the positiv evidence given by any observer, in any case, depend for its weight? All positiv testimony is the relation of individual experiences, and depends for its value on the assumption that it would hav been the experience of any other person in the same circumstances and condition.

The witness who wanders from the field of human experience is not reliable. He must see as we all see; he must hear as we all hear, and, in short, he must be one of us—one of the genus homo. If he avowedly relates sights not to be seen with human eyes, and that none of a multitude but himself could see; if he tells of sounds that cannot be heard by the "natural man," then I say his testimony is not worth one straw. The only legitimate use of such testimony is on a writ of lunacy against the witness to prove his own insanity.

Induction is the only key to unlock the universal storehouse of facts. "Induction," says Mill, "is the process by which we conclude that what is true of certain individuals of a class, is true of the whole class; or what is true at certain times will be true in similar circumstances at all times" (Mill's Logic, i, 315). "Every observation, and every induction, draws its value from itself, and from similar ones. It is always experience which judges of experience, and induction of induction." This is Taine's construction of Mill's doctrin: "It appears, then, we need experience to inform us in what degree and in what cases, or sorts of cases, experience is to be relied on. Experience must be consulted in order to learn from it under what circumstances arguments will be valid" (Mill's Logic, i, 351). Mill, it seems to me, only elaborates into a grand system of logic what Hume epitomizes into a single sentence, of which the concluding clause asserts that a miracle is not susceptible of proof. The uniformity of all phenomena, and the unbroken chain of human experience, has effectually shut the door against even the investigation of the preposterous pretensions of ghost-mongers. J. K. P. Baker.

Irwin, Ia.

Mrs. Slenker to McArthur.

Thee asks for a "detailed statement" of the phenomena of Spiritualism which I hav experienced and believe in. I really can't mention a single thing I hav ever witnessed or experienced that I believe was done by or through spirits. I hav seen nearly all phases of the phenomena, slate-writing, making lace, spirit flowers, materialization of human forms and clothes, raps, music, and answering sealed letters, but I believe everything I ever saw or experienced was done by the mediums and their confederates. I know about half of it was, because I was told how it was done and shown the whole process, and the rest I could hav done myself with a little practice. Of some twenty or more prophecies given me not one has been fulfilled, which is not even good guessing.

I granted that probably a portion of the phenomena was real, for I am loth to believe all are deceivers or deceived. Too many tell unaccountable things to allow me to doubt all the phenomena. But psychology and kindred sciences may in time explain the why of the little that is now believed to be the work of spirit power.

I am afraid it will be with thee as it is with the Christian. Just as soon as we take the Bible away they refuse to argue. If I hav, in thirty odd years, found no experiences, I don't see how we can find any "common ground on which to stand."

If I had but one fact I could call a "Spiritual experience," then I could put at least one foot on "common ground."

But if there is a bear in the closet and thee knows it, perhaps thee can find some way of convincing me of the fact, especially as I am willing and want to be convinced.

The Darwinian theory proves life to be eternal, but not identities. Force is eternal, but forms of force are continually changing and interchanging. Probably Whitman is right when he says:

> I perceive I hav not really understood anything,
> Not a single object, and that no man ever can.

Snowville, Va. Elmina D. Slenker.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Wanship, Summit Co., Utah, Oct. 1.—This is another settlement of Mormon agriculturists on the Weber river. Weber river rises in the mountains, about seventy miles south of Echo, and empties into Salt Lake just below Ogden. The valley above Echo is very fertil and thickly settled. The settlers are all Mormons, or with very rare exceptions (apostates are increasing quite rapidly), and all, except at Coalville, engaged in farming or stock raising. Those at Coalville are principally miners, although all the lands in the vicinity are under cultivation. Every acre of the lower Weber, of any value, is owned and occupied by those who are utilizing it to the best of their ability.

The village of Wanship is a very small, insignificant place, but of late years well known on account of its being the place of residence of Wm. Reynolds, the most earnest, unassuming, self-sacrificing, indefatigable worker for Liberalism in all Utah. Brother Reynolds was born of Mormon parents; his antique sire, a most devout, polygamous Mormon, resides near him. Brother Reynolds is about the only Liberal man in the village. He dared to hav the courage of his convictions, and withdrew from the church at a time when to do so "tried men's souls" and jeopardized their jugulars.

He has a comfortable cottage, a store and post-office, and is a devotee to tree culture. Under all circumstances, at all times, all he is or has is freely devoted to the cause of Liberalism.

While enjoying the hospitality of his home, and the society of his noble wife and darling children, I realized more than ever the imperativ need of a Liberal coöperativ insurance, so that, in case of the death of the bread-winner, the loved ones of the worker in the Liberal ranks should not be left dependent on the tender mercies of church-members, who, whether Mormon or orthodox, when adopting orphans from charity, too often make them drudges without wages, exact from them constant toil, and in return dole out to them scant food, scantier raiment, but superabundance of prayers and pious exhortations.

The lecture was delivered at the school-house, and there was good attendance—much interest was evinced. One honest, lifelong Mormon lady was greatly exercised, and wept nearly all the next day. She cried, "How can I giv up the kingdom, and dwelling forever with loved and lost ones? Yet how can I believe it after what he has proved from the Bible itself?"

Peoa, Utah, Oct. 2, 3.—I rode on the mail wagon over to Peoa, quite a fair-sized Mormon village. Brothers Coosey and Corlis made me welcome. Peoa has been settled twenty-eight years, yet has no school-house, while Oakley, the adjoining town, ruled by gentiles, has a $650 school-house. Although Peoa has no school-house it has a large dance-hall, at which the lectures were delivered. Seats were improvised out of boards laid across boxes, beer kegs, etc., the only regular seats being those around the wall. It has quite a good-sized stage, in the very center of which was a small stove, the only one in the building. The first night it was quite chilly. The married ladies with their babies seated themselvs on the seats against the wall to my right so as to hav the wall as a back-rest to lean against. There was quite a fair-sized audience. The second night the interest aroused by the first lecture brought a very large attendance. The night was quite cold, and so a fire was started in the little stove on the stage. Twenty-three women with babies in their arms, and some of them with other little ones clinging to their skirts, ascended the stage and took seats around three sides of the stove, leaving the front facing the audience open. As I stood at the table about to commence my lecture I cast a glance behind and was appalled at the situation. I was the only man on the stage, while ranged behind me were twenty-three women with their babies and little ones. Could my friends of the East hav gazed upon that scene, they could only hav supposed I was a Mormon bishop with all my little family, or that I was rehearsing for the role of Turkish sultan with my entire harem on exhibition. There were about thirty other ladies with babies, who could not find seats on the stage, who were seated against the wall to the right. The unmarried ladies and those without babies sat on the center seats among the men. In Utah the baby is woman's best credentials, and Utah women are seldom found without several best credentials.

Kamas, Utah, Oct. 4, 5.—The first lecture here was not well attended, on account of so many having gone to the fair and to the semi-annual conference of the Mormons at Salt Lake City. But those who did attend were so deeply interested, they did good work as advertisers, and the second night about all the inhabitants of the township, save those away at Salt Lake, were present and listened with eager interest for nigh two hours to the evidence in regard to "The Bible: Whence It Came, and What It Really Teaches." I left the kind, good friends of Kamas with regret, and long for our next meeting.

Salt Lake City, Opera House, Oct. 7.—On account of the Mormon conference, a Sunday evening meeting at the great Tabernacle, illuminated for the occasion, the attendance was smaller than on the preceding Sunday. To H. P. Mason, the genial, stanch, and true Liberal, and his estimable wife, I am under obligations for kind courtesy and hospitality. They did all possible to make my visit pleasant. Brother Mason and Dr. Chapman most generously exerted themselvs to make my lectures a success.

GIRARD COLLEGE.

In view of the proposed new departure of the American Secular Union, to devote its energies to obtaining money to prosecute the managers of the Girard College for breach of trust, would it not be well, before sending in contributions, to first learn something of the feasibility of the scheme?

Its Quixotism will be at once apparent when the exact words of the will are known. It is not wise to commence litigation on the general impression in regard to a document. Doubtless Stephen Girard was Infidelistic. Certainly he had no love for the clergy. But in regard to the action of the trustees in the management of the Girard College, legally they are sustained and justified in their course by the letter of the will. They are not bound by any presumed intent of the testator, but solely by the intent expressed by the words used by him in his will. Here are the exact words:

> I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans who are to derive advantage from this bequest free from the excitement which clashing doctrins and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce. My desire is, that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into activ life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer.

The expressed desire of the testator is to save the orphans from the excitement which clashing doctrins and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce.

There is no expressed desire of the testator that the orphans should be educated so as to induce them to reject all religious tenets—i. e., dogmas and doctrins—but, on the contrary, on leaving the college, they, according to the letter of the will, are expected to adopt such religious dogmas and doctrins as they may prefer.

The trustees do not permit any sectarian controversies or clashing doctrins to be taught in the college, and it can hardly be claimed that the instructors and teachers of the college do not take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality—from a Bible standpoint.

Even if the American Secular Union was a real, practical, influential organization, possessing the confidence of all Liberals, and had unlimited means, is it reasonable to expect it could succeed? Would any judge or jury of the Presbyterian, pious city of Philadelphia decide against the morality of the Bible?

The only hope of a redemption for the Girard College is that the Liberals of the United States may speedily effect a thorough practical organization, and thus gain power and influence sufficient to secure the fourth of the Nine Demands, "That the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited."

When this is accomplished, we can insist on its withdrawal from use in Girard College, under the wording of the will, because the Bible instils into the minds of its readers the vilest principles of immorality (Gen. xii, 13–15; xvi, 3; 1 Pet. iii, 5, 6; Gen. xxx, 18; Deut. xxv, 5; Gen. xix); cruelty and persecution (Num. xxxi, 17, 18; Josh. xi, 6); intolerance (Matt. x, 14, 15; John xv, 6; 2 Thess. i, 7; 1 Cor. v, 5; Isa. lxiii. 3; Ps. lviii, 10; Gal. i, 8, 9; 2 John i, 10); lying (1 Kings xxii, 19–23; 2 Thess. ii, 11; Matt. viii, 20; Mark ii, 15; John i, 39; Rom. iii, 7); intemperance (Num. xxviii, 7; Deut. xiv, 26; Gen. ix, 21; xix, 36; Prov. xxxi, 6, 7); indolence and shiftlessness (Matt. vi, 25, 30, 31; Luke vi, 27–30).

Liberals hav a great work to perform, that will tax to the uttermost all their energies and funds. We hav the grandest aims and objects conceivable. Better seek the most practical means to secure them, not distract, discourage, or disgust by resorting to claptrap or Quixotism. C. B. Reynolds.

To Redeem Girard College.

ANOTHER VENERABLE VETERAN SPEAKS.

PAINESVILLE, O., Nov. 9, 1888.

DEAR BROTHER STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.: Your favor received, and in reply will say I will be one of ten to pay $100 each for the purpose of carrying out Stephen Girard's will. I am not able to write a long letter this morning.

I hope Robert G. Ingersoll will take hold of the case.

Yours most truly, JOSEPH SEDGEBEER.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 15, 1888.

E. A. STEVENS, Dear Friend: Hav been watching THE TRUTH SEEKER for responses to the proposition of "Agnosticus" to make up a $1,000 fund to redeem Girard College from the thieving clutches of the redeemed. I shall be pleased to be one of the ten to make up the fund referred to. Sincerely congratulating the Liberals of the country, as well as yourself, on your election to the office you hav so ably filled, I am, Very truly yours, N. F. GRISWOLD.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Nov. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for $10 in the Girard ammunition fund. Every man who has any love of liberty and desires to hav his last will and testament honored should help reclaim Girard College, and purge it from the thieving orthodox. Very truly yours, M. L. NICHOLS.

A Regular Romish Carnival.

For that is what the election in Cook county proved to be—an election having far more significance, to those interested in Secularization of the state, than who should be the next national political pap-dispenser.

The county commissioners—Republican and Democratic—known as the "reform" board, which succeeded the "boodle" stealers, who assisted in adding to the Canadian colony of official delinquents, and sending the majority of their predecessors to the Joliet penitentiary, had, as a board, done its duty thoroughly and well. At the head of the most important committee—that of finance—was William Williams, than whom there could be no public servant with more sterling fidelity to a public trust, whose word is as good as his bond, a veteran of the war, and who stands an unflinching soldier of the Secular cause. Unjust claims had little chance for adoption while Williams was around, and it was through his gallant opposition to the fraudulent claim of the Catholics for nearly $20,000 that the American Secular Union was, through its secretary, able to score a splendid victory, the greatest it has yet accomplished—a sweeping decision from the supreme court sustaining our third Demand. Although the supreme court merely affirmed the state constitution, that instrument has, heretofore, been a mere bagatel—for the lower courts were either under control or completely at the service of the papal power. As THE TRUTH SEEKER has already enlightened its readers as to the Chicago Industrial School for Girls, and the means this corporation employed to rob the county, it is not necessary to reiterate them.

So far as known the record of the "reform" board was creditable. They had honestly done their duty, but a majority had dared to oppose the still more potent power than state constitutions, and in consequence hav met their political punishment.

The Democrats were prevailed on to make up a ticket, in which they indorsed such of the "reform" board as had impeded its reform in the particular matter above referred to, who, like faithful followers (as Catholics always are), were willing to violate the law and connive at robbing this community for the honor and glory of God and the church.

From the majority of the candidates nominated, it could readily be seen that the issue was clearly defined—Catholic control of the county board. Of the ten to be voted for in the city, six were Romanists and one doubtful; and out of the five voted by outlying towns, three were Catholics. A certain "Mike" Hays was Mr. Williams's opponent.

Many of our friends did all in their power to avert the threatened calamity, Mr. A. D. O'Neill placing a carriage at the disposal of your secretary, and himself driving me wherever we thought a paster could be utilized for law, justice, and fair play. But the priestly bulldozers—the representativs of the ecclesiastical monarch—had sent forth their political mandate. All our efforts were vain, and the friends of freedom were badly defeated. Now for Romish raids on the county treasury, in spite of supreme court decisions! Last year the secretary could secure the cooperation of the county machinery to defeat sectarian frauds, without putting the American Secular Union to a dollar's worth of expense. Now the tables will be turned, and it will require expensiv litigation to compel the officials to enforce the law.

"A CATHOLIC MENACE TO OUR GOVERNMENT."

In this connection, let me commend your readers to the forcible and brilliant lecture, by L. K. Washburn, with the above caption, published in pamphlet form by the Investigator. That masterly and magnificent protest alone, if largely circulated, would open the eyes of our citizens and thwart the schemes of this blighting curse Catholicism. If any can read this eloquent and logical plea without feeling a tinge of shame and a determination to henceforth wage relentless war upon Romish domination, they deserve our scorn and contempt, and if sufficiently numerous, that class will soon wear the chains of superstition their ignorance and indifference hav allowed to be forged. Washburn's brave, burning words are the reveille of the advance guard of freedom—the trumpet-blast on the dawn of the battle for liberty. Buy the pamphlet, read it, circulate it.

The president of the American Secular Union has already opened the campaign by a rousing lecture before the First Society of Spiritualists of Philadelphia on "Hav We a Virtual Union of Church and State in This Country?" His discourse was highly appreciated, and largely attended by prominent merchants of that city; interest in our organization was aroused, and contributions were promised. Dr. Westbrook is determined to make good his remark to the writer: "The Union shall not be sorry for their selection of a president."

Hav had an enjoyable visit from our treasurer, Brother Wettstein, who is one of the most brilliant debaters on the Materialistic side of the house I hav listened to or read, but his affable disposition and uniform courtesy place him high in the esteem of all his opponents. However, the reason I wish to call your attention to the treasurer is on account of the treasury. Brother Wettstein has just completed another fire-proof and burglar-proof vault in his establishment, which he considers adequate to safely depo it all the funds the Liberals of America ought to furnish the American Secular Union. As nothing is so disagreeable to me as pleading to those who profess interest in our cause to support it, I hope that those who can will readily furnish funds to prosecute the work laid out for the year, and the funds can better be used now than hereafter. Now let us see if the Liberals of this land realize the situation and the surrounding dangers. If they do there will be no lack of funds.

Dispatches from Rome convey the information that the Vatican is well pleased at Harrison's election, "at whose hands the Catholic interests of America are not expected to suffer." We would like to know what interests Catholics are supposed to hav other than citizens of the United States.

Colonel Ingersoll's Opinion of "Robert Elsmere."

From the World.

In view of the widespread interest in Mrs. Ward's new book, "Robert Elsmere," which is now holding the attention of the critics of the religious and secular press, a World reporter called on Col. Robert G. Ingersoll at his house and secured his views of the book. Colonel Ingersoll has carefully read "Robert Elsmere," and he discusses it with a characteristic eloquence and boldness which points out clearly many ways in which the author might hav made a more powerful work. Colonel Ingersoll repeated the reporter's question and said:

"Why do people read a book like 'Robert Elsmere,' and why do they take any interest in it?" Simply because they are not satisfied with the religion of our day. The civilized world has outgrown the greater part of the Christian creed. Civilized people hav lost their belief in the reforming power of punishment. They find that whips and imprisonment hav but little influence for good. The truth has dawned upon their minds that eternal punishment is infinit cruelty—that it can serve no good purpose, and that the eternity of hell makes heaven impossible. That there can be in this universe no perfectly happy place while there is a perfectly miserable place—that no infinit being can be good who knowingly and, as one may say, willfully created myriads of human beings, knowing that they would be eternally miserable. In other words, the civilized man is greater, tenderer, nobler, nearer just than the old idea of God. The ideal of a few thousand years ago is far below the real of to-day. No good man now would do what Jehovah is said to hav done four thousand years ago, and no civilized human being would now do what, according to the Christian religion, Christ threatens to do at the day of judgment.

Has the Christian religion changed in theory of late years, Colonel Ingersoll?

A few years ago the Deists denied the inspiration of the Bible on account of its cruelty. At the same time they worshiped what they were pleased to call the God of nature. Now we are convinced that nature is as cruel as the Bible, so that, if the god of nature did not write the Bible, this god at least has caused earthquakes and pestilence and famin, and this god has allowed millions of his children to destroy one another. So that now we hav arrived at the question—not as to whether the Bible is inspired, and not as to whether Jehovah is the real God, but whether there is a God or not. The intelligence of Christendom to-day does not believe in an inspired religion any more than it believes in an inspired art or an inspired literature. If there be an infinit God inspiration in some particular regard would be a patch—it would be the puttying of a crack, the hiding of a defect—in other words, it would show that the general plan was defectiv.

Do you consider any religion adequate?

A good man, living in England, drawing a certain salary for reading certain prayers on stated occasions, for making a few remarks on the subject of religion, putting on clothes of a certain cut, wearing a gown with certain frills and flounces starched in an orthodox manner, and then looking about him at the suffering and agony of the world, would not feel satisfied that he was doing anything of value to the human race. In the first place, he would deplore his own weakness, his own poverty, his inability to help his fellow-men. He would long every moment for wealth, that he might feed the hungry and clothe the naked—for knowledge, for miraculous power, that he might heal the sick and the lame, and that he might giv to the deformed the beauty of proportion. He would begin to wonder how a being of infinit goodness and infinit power could allow his children to die, to suffer, to be deformed by necessity, by poverty, to be tempted beyond resistance; how he could allow the few to liv in luxury and the many in poverty and want, and the more he wondered the more useless and ironical would seem to himself his sermons and his prayers. Such a man is driven to the conclusion that religion accomplishes but little; that it creates as much want as it alleviates, and that it burdens the world with parasites. Such a man would be forced to think of the millions wasted in superstition. In other words, the inadequacy, the uselessness, of religion would be forced upon his mind. He would ask himself the question: "Is it possible that this is a divine institution? Is this all that man can do with the assistance of God? Is this the best?"

That is a perfectly reasonable question, is it not, Colonel Ingersoll?

The moment a man reaches the point where he asks himself this question he has ceased to be an orthodox Christian. It will not do to say that in some other world justice will be done. If God allows injustice to triumph here, why not there?

Robert Elsmere stands in the dawn of philosophy. There is hardly light enough for him to see clearly; but there is so much light that the stars in the night of superstition are obscured.

You do not deny that a religious belief is a great comfort?

There is one thing that it is impossible for me to comprehend. Why should anyone, when convinced that Christianity is a superstition, hav or feel a sense of loss? Certainly a man acquainted with England, with London, having at the same time something like a heart, must feel overwhelmed by the failure of what is known as Christianity. Hundreds of thousands exist there without decent food, dwelling in tenements, clothed with rags, familiar with every form of vulgar vice, where the honest poor eat the crust that the vicious throw away. When this man of intelligence, of heart, visits the courts; when he finds human liberty a thing treated as of no value, and when he hears the judge sentencing girls and boys to the penitentiary—knowing that a stain is being put upon them that all the tears of all the coming years can never wash away—knowing, too, and feeling that this is done without the slightest regret, without the slightest sympathy, as a mere matter of form, and that the judge puts this brand of infamy upon the forehead of the convict just as cheerfully as a Mexican brands his cattle; and when this man of intelligence and heart knows that these poor people are simply the victims of society, the unfortunates who stumble and over whose body rolls the Juggernaut—he knows that there is, or at least appears to be, no power above or below working for righteousness—that from the heavens is stretched no protecting hand. And when a man of intelligence and heart in England visits the workhouse, the last resting-place of honest labor; when he thinks that the young man, without any great intelligence but with a good constitution, starts in the morning of his life for the workhouse, and that it is impossible for the laboring man, one who simply has his muscle, to save anything; that health is not able to lay anything by for the days of disease—when the man of intelligence and heart sees all this, he is compelled to say that the civilization of to-day, the religion of to-day, the charity of to-day—no matter how much of good there may be behind them or in them—are failures.

A few years ago people were satisfied when the minister said: "All this will be made even in another world; a crust-eater here will sit at the head of the banquet there, and the king here will beg for the crumbs that fall from the table there." When this was said the poor man hoped and the king laughed. A few years ago the church said to the slave: "You will be free in another world and your freedom will be made glorious by the perpetual spectacle of your master in hell." But the people—that is, many of the people—are no longer deceived by what once were considered fine phrases. They hav suffered so much that they no longer wish to see others suffer and no longer think of the suffering of others as a source of joy to themselvs. The poor see that the eternal starvation of kings and queens in another world will be no compensation for what they hav suffered here. The old religions appear vulgar, and the ideas of rewards and punishments are only such as would satisfy a cannibal chief or one of his favorits.

Do you think the Christian religion has made the world better?

For many centuries there has been preached and taught in an almost infinit number of ways a supernatural religion. During all this time the world has been in the care of the infinit, and yet every imaginable vice has flourished, every imaginable pang has been suffered, and every injustice has been done. During all these years the priests hav enslaved the minds and the kings the bodies of men. The priests did what they did in the name of God, and the kings appealed to the same source of authority. Man suffered as long as he could. Revolution, reformation, was simply a reaction, a cry from the poor wretch that was between the upper and the nether millstone. The liberty of man has increased just in the proportion that the authority of the gods has decreased. In other words, the wants of man, instead of the wishes of God, hav inaugurated what we call progress, and there is this difference: Theology is based upon the narrowest and intensest form of selfishness. Of course, the theologian knows, the Christian knows, that he can do nothing for God; consequently all that he does must be and is for himself, his object being to win the approbation of this God, to the end that he may become a favorit. On the other side, men touched not only by their own misfortunes but by the misfortunes of others are moved not simply by selfishness but by a splendid sympathy with their fellow-men.

"Christianity certainly fosters charity," the reporter suggested.

Nothing is more cruel than orthodox theology, nothing more heartless than a charitable institution. For instance, in England, think for a moment of the manner in which charities are distributed, the way in which the crust is flung at Lazarus. If that parable could be now retold, the dogs would bite him. The same is true in this country. The institution has nothing but contempt for the one it relieves. The people in charge regard the pauper as one who has wrecked himself. They feel very much as a man would feel rescuing from the water some hare-brained wretch who had endeavored to swim the rapids of Niagara—the moment they reach him they begin to upbraid him for being such a fool. This course makes charity a hypocrit, with every pauper for its enemy.

Mrs. Ward compelled Robert Elsmere to perceive, in some slight degree, the failure of Christianity to do away with vice and suffering, with poverty and crime. We know that the rich care but little for the poor. No matter how religious the rich may be, the sufferings of their fellows hav but little effect upon them. We are also beginning to see that what is called charity will never redeem this world. The poor man willing to work, eager to maintain his independence, knows that there is something higher than charity—that is to say, justice. He finds that many years before he was born his country was divided out between certain successful robbers, flatterers, cringers, and crawlers, and that in consequence of such division not only himself but a large majority of his fellow-men are tenants, renters, occupying the surface of the earth only at the pleasure of others. He finds, too, that these people who hav done nothing and who do nothing hav everything, and that those who do everything hav but little. He finds that idleness has the money and that the toilers are compelled to bow to the idlers. He finds also that the young men of genius are bribed by social distinctions—unconsciously it may be, but still bribed in a thousand ways. He finds that the church is a kind of waste-basket into which are thrown the younger sons of titled idleness.

Do you consider that society in general has been made better by religious influences?

Society is corrupted because the laurels, the titles, are in the keeping and within the gift of the corrupters. Christianity is not an enemy of this system—it is in harmony with it. Christianity reveals to us a universe presided over by an infinit autocrat—a universe without republicanism, without democracy—a universe where all power comes from one and the same source, and where everyone using authority is accountable, not to the people, but to this supposed source of authority. Kings reign by divine right. Priests are ordained in a divinely appointed way—they do not get their office from man. Man is their servant, not their master.

In the story of Robert Elsmere all there is of Christianity is left after an excision of the miraculous. Theism remains, and the idea of a protecting providence is left, together with a belief in the immeasurable superiority of Jesus Christ. That is to say, the miracles are discarded for lack of evidence, and only for lack of evidence; not on the ground that they are impossible, not on the ground that they impeach and deny the integrity of cause and effect, not on the ground that they contradict the self-evident proposition that an effect must hav an efficient cause, but like the Scotch verdict: "Not proven." It is an effort to save and keep in repair the dungeons of the Inquisition for the sake of the beauty of the vines that hav overrun them. Many people imagin that falsehoods may become respectable on account of age, that a certain reverence goes with antiquity, and that if a mistake is covered with the moss of sentiment, it is altogether more credible than a parvenu fact. They endeavor to introduce the idea of aristocracy into the world of thought, believing, and honestly believing, that a falsehood long believed is far superior to a truth that is generally denied.

If Robert Elsmere's views were commonly adopted, what would be the effect?

The new religion of Elsmere is, after all, only a system of outdoor relief, an effort to get successful piracy to giv up a larger per cent for the relief of its victims. The abolition of the system is not dreamed of. A civilized minority could not by any possibility be happy while a majority of the world were miserable; a civilized majority could not be happy while a minority were miserable. As a matter of fact, a civilized world could not be happy while one man was really miserable. At the foundation of civilization is justice—that is to say, the giving of an equal opportunity to all the children of men. Secondly, there can be no civilization in the highest sense until sympathy becomes universal. We must hav a new definition for success. We must hav new ideals. The man who succeeds in amassing wealth, who gathers money for himself, is not a success. It is an exceedingly low ambition to be rich, to excite the envy of others, or for the sake of the vulgar power it giv's to triumph over others. Such men are failures. So the man who wins fame, position, power, and wins these for the sake of himself, and wields this power not for the elevation of his fellow-men, but simply to control, is a miserable failure. He may dispense thousands or millions in charity, and his charity may be prompted by the meanest part of his nature—using it simply as a bait to catch more fish, and to prevent the rising tide of indignation that might overwhelm him. Men who steal millions and then giv a small percentage to the Lord to gain the praise of the clergy, and to bring the salvation of their souls within the possibilities of imagination, are all failures.

Robert Elsmere gains our affection and our applause to the extent that he gives up what are known as orthodox views, and his wife Catharine retains our respect in the proportion that she livs the doctrin that Elsmere preaches. By doing what she believes to be right, she gains our forgivness for her creed. One is astonished that she can be as good as she is, believing as she does. The utmost stretch of our intellectual charity is to allow the old wine to be put in a new bottle, and yet she regrets the absence of the old bottle—she really believes that the bottle is the important thing—that the wine is but a secondary consideration. She misses the label, and not having perfect confidence in her own taste, she does not feel quite sure that the wine is genuin.

What, on the whole, is your judgment of the book?

I think the book conservativ. It is an effort to save something—a few shreds and patches and ravelings—from the wreck. Theism is difficult to maintain. Why should we expect an infinit being to do better in another world than he has done and is doing in this? If he allows the innocent to suffer here, why not there? If he allows rascality to succeed in this world, why not in the next? To believe in God and to deny his personality is an exceedingly vague foundation for a consolation. If you insist on his personality and power, then it is impossible to account for what happens. Why should an infinit God allow some of his children to enslave others? Why should he allow a child of his to burn another child of his, under the impression that such a sacrifice was pleasing to him?

Unitarianism lacks the motiv power. Orthodox people who insist that nearly everybody is going to hell, and that it is their duty to do what little they can to save their souls, hav what you might call a spur to action. We can imagin a philanthropic man engaged in the business of throwing ropes to persons about to go over the falls of Niagara, but we can hardly think of his carrying on the business after becoming convinced that there are no falls, or that people go over them in perfect safety. In this country the question has come up whether all the heathen are bound to be damned unless they believe in the gospel. Many admit that the heathen will be saved if they are good people, and that they will not be damned for not believing something that they never heard. The really orthodox people—that is to say, the missionaries—instantly see that this doctrin destroys their business. They take the ground that there is but one way to be saved—you must believe on the Lord Jesus Christ—and they are willing to admit, and to cheerfully admit, that the heathen for many generations hav gone in an unbroken column down to eternal wrath.

Educational.

From San Francisco Freethought.

Last year I was a member of the board of inspectors of election in the twenty-somethingth election district of the third assembly district of the city of New York. The chairman of the board had a tailor shop next door to the polling-place, and did not like to neglect his business, so it fell upon myself, in the cases of several scores of candidates for registration, to administer the oath or affirmation. My remarks on these occasions were substantially to this effect: "You do solemnly affirm that you will fully and truly answer all such questions as shall be put to you touching your name, place of birth, place of residence, and your right to register and vote under the laws of this state." Some of the applicants observed that this constituted an affirmation, not an oath, and demanded the substitution of "swear" for "affirm," and kissed the book. The policeman in attendance, who was a Roman Catholic, insisted that the board should require the swearer to remove his hat during the votiv ceremony, and that the affirmant should do the same and in addition elevate his right hand. I declined to enforce these formalities, and the officer went off to headquarters for instructions. As he did not renew the subject upon his return, I infer that the people at headquarters gave him no comfort, and he contented himself with uncovering his own head during the administration of the prescribed oath. Some discussion occurred, in which, as a minority of one, I maintained that the oath had no business in politics, it being a religious ceremony. The man who swears, as I understand it, calls in the deity to witness the veracity of his deposition, while the one who affirms simply takes a legal obligation to tell the truth.

I am reminded of these things by a dispatch which appeared in last Saturday's Chronicle, whereby I learn that my distinguished brother, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has had a victorious tussle with a board of enlightened inspectors. It appears that upon presenting himself for registration, the chairman of the board handed him the Bible and commenced the usual recitation of an oath. The applicant ignored the sacred volume and stated, respectfully, that he preferred to affirm. Thereupon the official demanded that he should raise his right hand toward heaven, and thereupon, also, the Editor again demurred. He was then asked, "Do you believe in a God?" The dispatch says that to this query the Editor replied that the inspector had no right to ask such a question, but I suspect that his answer was more emphatic than this general statement of the case would imply. The board with unanimity declined to register the recusant journalist.

From the decision of the board the Editor appealed to the supreme court, as represented by Judge Barrett, for a mandamus compelling the inspectors to register him, and in opposition those gentlemen sent in their affidavits stating that he had refused to swear or to affirm in the usual manner. The judge was a righteous one. He said that the chairman of the board had no business to ask a man to uplift his hand; a citizen had been denied his legal rights, and the board must reconvene and register the applicant. In his written opinion Judge Barrett said: "Inspectors hav no right to require a man to affirm with uplifted hand, nor was it within their province to demand the religious test. Indeed, their interrogations about the relator's belief in the existence of the deity was an impertinence to which no citizen, in the absence of any suspicion of untruthfulness, should be subjected."

I consider this case one worthy to be recorded in leaded type to the credit of our contemporary. The relator, as Mr. Barrett designates the elder brother of this writer, is a public educator. The inspectors are not to blame for their course. They didn't know any better. The secular affairs of the state, generally, are so permeated by theology that it is no wonder they thought that some higher power than the statutes should be invoked by the sign of an uplifted hand. They knew that every public officer, including themselvs, takes an oath upon being installed. Even the president of the United States so far recognizes the sacred character of the Bible as to swear upon it on inauguration day. They regard an affirmation as a mere conformance to the letter of the law, not its spirit, and look with suspicion upon a person who declines to take an oath. I learned this from two years' service on an election board. Therefore, as previously stated, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a public educator. It is as senseless to ask a man or woman to uplift the right hand as it would be to insist that the right foot should be placed on an equal elevation with the shoulder during the recital of an affirmation.

G. E. M.

COLONEL INGERSOLL is announced for a lecture in Toronto within a few weeks. It is said that he will be heard on the platform often this winter.

D. G. CROW will answer calls to organize or lecture at points between St. Louis and Denver during the next three months. State particulars and address him for terms at Sabetha, Kan. He will also take subscribers for the leading Freethought papers; this includes the G. O. P. of course.

Freethought in Texas.

Correspondence of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

"The Athens of Texas," Waco is called, because of a large and varied collection of educational institutions. A stranger, who was being shown the sights of the city by the Brazos, once said: "The name is appropriate. Waco is indeed another Athens, for she has a 'temple to the unknown God.'"

There are unbelievers in every community. But where else is there an organization of avowed Infidels with a charter, incorporated under the state laws, with a structure upon the pattern of a church, and with a leader who sustains a relationship to the flock approaching that of a pastor? Certainly there is nothing like this elsewhere in Texas, and it is doubtful if just such a society and building can be found in any other state.

In its charter, taken out in 1882, this is known as the Religious and Benevolent Association. The objects are declared to be "ethical culture and the dissemination of Freethought." There are about two hundred and fifty people identified with the society. "The temple of the unknown God," as it is sometimes called, or Liberal Hall, as it is more properly known, is a large, well-built structure, centrally situated. It was planned and built by this congregation of Infidels. The exterior is plain, and at a glance passes for a church. The interior is neatly and comfortably furnished. There is no altar rail, no baptismal font, no pulpit. But there is a raised platform and a reading desk. The auditorium will seat comfortably three hundred people.

The man at the head of this society is James D. Shaw, who was for some years a prominent divine in the Methodist church. He still dresses in black, and many people call him Dr. Shaw. "A man of intense thought," is the involuntary comment on first sight. His earnest, piercing black eyes are set deeply. The brow is furrowed as if by much puzzling over hard problems. The face is eminently intellectual; there is nothing heavy or gross about his person or manner. Mr. Shaw has no hesitation in talking of the peculiar organization over which he presides. He has an easy, pleasant manner, and evidently takes much the same earnest interest in his work that he did when he was in regular standing as an orthodox minister.

"We are simply non-creedal," he said in reply to an inquiry for information about the society. "Ethical culture is our aim. We are endeavoring to establish a system of ethical culture based upon the common sense of the race. We devote our efforts to inculcating truth, honesty, benevolence, and purity—purity without any regard to divine authority or future rewards or punishments. We leave our people free. We don't dictate to them in a field we hav no means of surveying or determining. We don't require our people to say they believe or don't believe anything. Our congregation is wholly independent. When a man speaks he is expected to speak his own thoughts, no matter whether we believe the same or not. We are not connected with any other congregation in the world. We hav no test of membership."

To the suggestion that there must be some principles in common to hold the congregation together, Mr. Shaw replied that the only thing that could be so construed was what the society calls "the Demands of Liberalism." These demands are nine in number. They are in the nature of a platform rather than a creed. They form the ground upon which the Liberals stand together.

"We do not consider ourselvs a church," continued Mr. Shaw when he had gone over the Demands; "we work under a charter, the terms of which require us to hav a board of directors. When we hold a business meeting we ask everybody to stay to it."

He was asked to define his own status and replied: "Our directors hav the right, under our charter, to license persons to lecture, and those persons are entitled to all the privileges and exemptions granted to ministers under the law of the state."

"To perform the marriage ceremony?"

"Yes."

"And what kind of a ceremony is it?"

"I use an extemporaneous form, something suitable to the occasion, in joining people in marriage. I don't say anything about 'whom God hath joined together.' I marry by authority of the state."

The conversation turned upon the character of the services held in Liberal Hall.

"You hav no ritual?" was suggested.

"No," said Mr. Shaw; "we usually open with singing. We sing anything that we think will please. It may be 'Suwanee River,' or 'Jesus, Lover of My Soul.' We sing with regard to the music rather than to the words. I kept one choir together three years."

The shadow of a smile flitted over the serious face as Mr. Shaw added: "That is a rather unusual length of time to hold a choir unbroken, you know. Our choir was one of the best in the city."

"Do you make any special effort toward training the young?"

"No; we hav nothing that corresponds to the Sunday-school. We leave education to the public schools."

Responding to an inquiry about the support and the attendance, Mr. Shaw said: "We depend on voluntary subscriptions. Our attendance varies. Last Sunday two-thirds of the chairs were occupied. Sometimes the attendance is not so good. I find that a series of lectures, say on evolution, which creates a growing interest, will hav the effect of soon filling the hall. There is one thing the church has which we do not. Our people do not think it necessary to attend the meetings as a matter of duty. We encourage people to come only when they feel that they will enjoy the meeting. If we don't see them there Sunday night we don't go round on Monday and ask why they stayed away. The churches teach people that they must go whether they feel like it or don't; they must go to please God and save their souls."

Going on to speak of the matter of attendance, which has evidently been something of a problem with the society, Mr. Shaw said: "We hav found, from an experience of nearly six years, that we do not need meetings so often as the churches do, and I don't know but we will soon conclude to hav one good entertainment a month, instead of more frequent meetings. I think people will enjoy it more than a meeting every week."

Speaking of what might be called his pastoral work, Mr. Shaw said: "I am invited often to speak at funerals. I never speculate as to the condition of a man after he is dead. If he has been a good man, I take his life for my theme and draw the lesson from it. But I find it up-hill work to say much when a man's life has been evil."

From his work, Mr. Shaw was led to speak of himself. "I was a Methodist preacher for twelve years," he said. "I preached in this city. Texas is my nativ state. I am in conflict with the denominational faiths, but at the same time they misrepresent me when they say I am trying to flaunt my Infidelity in the faces of Christian people. I teach them with consideration and I would be glad to be treated in the same way. My treatment of these issues is always sober and serious. I don't attribute anything to divine providence. I don't consider that I am blaspheming when I declare my unbelief in the various creeds. My present views are as sacred to me as those I held when I believed in Christ. I was an honest preacher and I came to my present position while trying to prove to myself what I had been taught to preach. I did not put the church to the trouble of trying me, but withdrew. The church honored me, paid me well, and appreciated my services. I hav made it a rule never to speak harshly of the church."

Mr. Shaw was asked how he classed himself among unbelievers? Was he an Agnostic? He replied: "I suppose I would be so termed, but I don't object to the term Atheist. I am an Infidel and not ashamed of it."

Perhaps the most striking declaration that fell from his lips was in regard to his work at the head of this organization. He said: "I believe in working for humanity, and I find the same enthusiasm in my work that I did when I was in the church. I feel as much called to preach as I ever did, only the call now is different in character. This call is my own nature leading me to preach."

There is one point upon which Mr. Shaw is quite sensitiv in discussing his former relation with the church. He was, in spite of his youth, put forward by admiring friends for the office of bishop. He received quite a number of votes, but was not elected. Some people hav said his disappointment prompted Mr. Shaw to leave the church. Speaking of this insinuation Mr. Shaw said with much earnestness: "There is much truth to the story. I was a member of the general conference—was present when bishops were elected and received a small complimentary vote. In point of ministerial seniority I was one of the youngest, if not the youngest, of the clerical delegates in the conference, and therefore could not hav expected such preferment over the heads of older men. While I was then struggling with skepticism and doubt on every hand, I had not lost all hope of remaining sufficiently orthodox to continue in the church and in the ministry too. I did not feel that because a few personal friends wanted to elevate me to the office of a bishop I should make known the struggle I was maintaining in my mind; and now after these years of reflection and retrospect I can not see that I acted inconsistently. I had been advanced rapidly from the beginning of my clerical career, and at the time I withdrew from the church resigned more important offices than any other member of my conference had ever been intrusted with. The little vote I had received for the episcopal office was larger than any that was ever given to a Texas preacher. I need not conceal the fact that I left that general conference with as many and as flattering prospects of becoming a bishop as any man in it. It is not egotism that prompts me to say that, in all probabilities, if I had remained in the church four more years, I would hav been elected to that office. I sacrificed more to get out of the church than I ever did to get into it, and more than my enemies would were they to come out."

Besides acting as lecturer for the Liberal congregation at Waco, Mr. Shaw publishes a monthly called the Independent Pulpit. He points to a circulation up in the thousands as evidence that Infidelity is growing. In the course of an hour's conversation Mr. Shaw never once descended to the flippant scoffing in which unbelievers are prone to indulge. From first to last he was intensely earnest. Mr. Shaw's flock, if the expression may be used, embraces some of the more intelligent people of Waco, but not all of them are so considerate of the feelings of church people as he is. They delight in controversy. They like nothing better than to lure a minister whose self-conceit exceeds his intellectual weight into a debate with their talented leader and then enjoy the discomfiture of the church people.

Roman Catholic Theory of Spiritualism.

From the Catholic Union and Times.

When we speak of the tricks and shams of Spiritualists we do not mean to imply that Spiritualism is all a delusion arising from ignorance and superstition, or that there is no truth at the bottom of it. There was never a trick or a fraud or a lie that did not rest for its existence on some truth of which it was the caricature, contortion, or pretended verisimilitude. Without genuin coin there cannot be a counterfeit, without light there can be no shadow. Hence he is a poor philosopher who, in view of the shams and frauds of modern Spiritualism, cannot see behind and back of them all something real.

Spiritualism, or Spiritism, as Dr. Brownson prefers to call it, must be considered from two points of view. It must be considered as a series of phenomena, or facts, and as a religion.

Taken as phenomena that cannot be accounted for by the laws of nature, we must admit that there are intelligences in another order of existence who can communicate—hav communion with—intelligences in this our order of existence. We must do this or reject the credibility of human testimony, for if this testimony is of no value in verifying those facts known to man as preternatural or supernatural, it is of no value for any of the facts of human life or history. This universe is larger than we can see or even imagin. While in it we are in the condition of the unhatched chick. While yet in the shell its knowledge is confined to its narrow limits, but when the shell is broken what a vast and heretofore unimagined expanse is presented to its view! When the shell of this initiatory state of our endless existence is shattered by the cold hand of death a universe will open out before our spiritual vision as much larger than this, as this is larger than the egg-shell.

Beings may be divided into three classes: the purely material, the material and spiritual combined as in man, and the purely spiritual. All these are in and of the same universe of God. They are in different departments, and the communication is limited, but it still exists.

That these purely spiritual beings, good and bad, can and do hav communication with beings in our order of existence is an ineradicable belief of the human race. Whenever we find a history of man, whether in remote antiquity or in modern times, we find this belief unchanged. It cannot be accounted for in any way but by the supposition that it is the result of an original revelation in some form.

The holy scriptures, both old and new, giv us numberless illustrations of this. The first speech was between the infinit spirit and the first man. God spoke with Adam. An evil spirit tempted Eve, and a spirit with a flaming sword drove the fallen pair from the garden of Eden. And thus on down through the Old Testament the events show an intermingling of the two worlds of intelligence. Moses forbade consulting the dead, which proves that such consultations were had, for the great lawgiver would not hav forbidden a practice that had no existence. Saul disregarded this injunction, consulted the witch of Endor, who called up the ghost of Samuel to foretell the overthrow of Saul. In the New Testament we find the birth of our redeemer announced by angels. At his transfiguration Moses and Elias appeared with him, and at his death the dead came back and walked the streets of Jerusalem. He expelled demons from those possessed and gave the same power to his apostles. That good angels can intervene in our behalf is evident from the doctrin of the communion of saints; and that evil spirits can torment and afflict man is shown by the prayers of exorcisms used by the church.

To be convinced that this intercourse between the two worlds exists to-day as in former times one need but consult those able men who hav made this department of knowledge a study—such men as Goerres, in his "Mystique Divine" and "Mystique Diabolique;" Bizuard, in his "Rapport de l'homme avec le Demon;" Gmeiner, in his "Spirits of Darkness;" Brownson's Spirit Rapper, and Robert Dale Owen's "Footprints of Another World." All these supply indisputable testimony to facts, and demonstrate that communications with extra-mundane intelligences are of as frequent occurrence to-day as in any former time.

Taking it for granted that Spiritualism as above explained is a fact, what bearing has it on us, and what should be our conduct in relation to it?

Robert Dale Owen held that the facts of Spiritualism supplemented the teachings of Christianity and proved more clearly than Christianity does the future life and the immortality of the soul. He went still further and held that Spiritualism is a higher development of Christianity, and that it stands in the same relation to the latter that the latter stood to Judaism; in a word, that it is the only means now left us to come to a knowledge of supernatural truth. Here Mr. Owen takes Spiritualism out of the domain of facts and introduces it into the domain of theory. We agree with him as to the facts, but reject his deductions as well as the theories or so-called religion he builds on them.

And, first, Does Spiritualism prove the continued existence of the soul after death? Does it prove the immortality of the soul?

Both questions must be answered in the negativ. To prove by the facts of Spiritualism alone the existence of the human soul after death, it is necessary to identify that soul with the personality of some one who has existed on earth and died. But the facts of Spiritualism do not offer sufficient data for this necessary identification. Therefore Spiritualism does not and cannot prove the continued existence of a human soul after death. Let us show this by an illustration. Suppose at a séance a spirit presents itself as that of Napoleon Bonaparte, how can it be proved that it is in reality the soul of Bonaparte? How can you prove that it is not some living spirit that never inhabited this world in human flesh? In the nature of the case you hav nothing to build on but the testimony of a spiritual intelligence whose character you do not and cannot know. Hence its identity with the soul of Bonaparte cannot be demonstrated, and without this identification it cannot be proved from the facts of Spiritualism that the soul of the great commander continued to exist after his death. This being the case, Spiritualism does not prove that the soul survives one instant after death.

Does Spiritualism prove the immortality of the soul? It does not and cannot, and for the following reasons: To prove the immortality of the soul it is not enough to prove that a soul, say that of Bonaparte, has continued to exist up to the present time. The mere fact that it has existed up to the present moment does not prove that it will never cease to exist. It may be said in reply that a spirit existing in the other world can know its own immortality. There are two answers to this. If it knows its own immortality, it can know it only in the same way that we already know it, namely, by revelation from God, in which case we do not need the testimony of the spirit. We hav that from God himself, who can speak to us as easily as he can speak to the spirit of the dead.

We hav said that a spirit, like ourselvs here on earth, cannot know its own immortality except by revelation. Let us see why. If it does not know it by revelation, it must know it by experience. There is no other way. But it cannot know it by experience, because no finite being can experience an endless experience. An eternal future life cannot be experienced, because to be experienced it must be completed, and when completed it has ceased to be eternal. Even in this life our experience extends only to the present moment in which you are reading these words. It goes no farther. We cannot experience to-morrow. That which we experience is to-day, the now. The future is nothing to us as an experience. Eternal life supposes a future ever receding from us. And that it will ever continue to recede from us we can only know from God, who has revealed the fact to us and to intelligences in the other world.

The other reason why the testimony of a spirit does not prove immortality is that we do not know the character of the spirit, whether it be a truthful or a lying spirit—a black or a white one. Experience proves that those spirits who go on exhibition for an entrance fee or gate money, are not the kind on whose testimony we would like to rest our immortality.

It follows from what we hav said that Spiritualism does not prove continued life after death; nor does it prove immortality.

The church forbids her children having anything to do with Spiritualism and Spiritualists. There is danger in it to morals as well as to sanity. We hav no means of testing these spirits, whether they are good or bad, and while this is the case it is the part of wisdom to avoid all possibility of getting under the influence of the devil.

Roman Catholic Practice of Spiritualism.

W. W. Judson in the Olive Branch.

Thomas Lahan, who livs near Los Gatos, California, recently jumped upon his wife while in bed and stamped the life out of her. Upon being examined in court Lahan talked of evil spirits having taken possession of his house and worrying him for a long time. He had taken a Catholic priest to his house to pray for his wife, and the priest had left a bottle of holy water with which to exorcise the evil spirit if it returned. He said that people told him that he had killed his wife, but he knew better—he had killed something which he thought must hav been the devil. The priest in giving his testimony said that it was apparent that the wife was not in her normal state, and appeared to be insane; she seemed to think that she could not get along with Lahan. Speaking of Lahan he said that the man was very religiously inclined; he did not appear to be insane. Thomas Lahan is a perfect specimen of what the Catholic church can mold certain persons into, and what it openly advocates should be the highest mental form of all its followers. As long as our government recognizes the institution of Christian priesthood, by making the same semi-official and consequently entitled to a part of the public funds, just so long must priestly precepts be honored by the same government.

Our judiciary deal with evil, which they designate crime, and to stamp out the same they resort to various means; among others, the taking of human life. The clerical branch of our judiciary put in their public time also eradicating evil, exorcising devils. Now, when the Catholic priest placed holy water, an emblem of authority, in the hands of Lahan, he deputized Lahan to make war upon evil spirits, consequently the taking off of Mrs. Lahan was only an incident in the maintenance of order through the clerical part of our judiciary, and any attempt upon the part of citizens or officers of the law to make out a case of murder or insanity against Thomas Lahan would be contrary to all recognized principles of compulsory good behavior and morality.

Hob-nailed, stoga boot-heels upon the feet of an unauthorized agent of priesthood to enforce rational disciplin among spirits who do not heed holy water swayism, is no worse than eight feet of greased rope in the hands of a deputy sheriff, for the purpose of terrorizing over mortals when other means fail to satisfy the blind goddess. We are bound to take this view of the case, or antagonize the majesty of national law by contending that Thomas Lahan is guilty of murdering his wife because he had no legal right to use force, either secular or clerical, against spirits or mortals; further, that any priest assuming to confer such authority is guilty of a misdemeanor, and when crime is the result of such act then said priest becomes a party in crime, and the church organization back of said priest must be held responsible by the general government. Religious institutions will never regulate themselvs. They are a tyranny in their way as much as the czar of all the Russias is in his. It is a question of authority, and a question of which is best, for the people at large to regulate all the affairs of this nation, the same being their own, or hav them regulated by this or that church sovereignty.

A precedent is already established. The Mormon church as an authority gave its followers certain laws; some of the practices under these laws not being considered to confer the greatest good to the greatest number, that church was attacked by the government, laws were passed to regulate church law, and proceedings were instituted against the Mormon church. Now, if the Catholic or any other church laws and teachings lead to practices detrimental to the general good of our people, it is the duty of our government to regulate the same. The worshiping of something or nothing, according to the dictates of one's own conscience, has nothing to do with the foolish and pernicious teachings of religious bodies which cause loss of life, and induce young girls to leave the pathway of practical usefulness, some to enter for life a convent or nunnery, others to join a Salvation brigade, pass their time thumping a tambourine, singing songs, and marching through the public streets.

The Chief Obstacle in the Way of Woman Suffrage.

From the Woman's Tribune.

At a recent reception in Chicago a gentleman asked me, "What is the chief obstacle in the way of Woman Suffrage?" I replied, "The apathy of women themselvs, due chiefly to the perversion of their religious sentiments."

The same principle that has held woman in abject slavery, in all ages, under all forms of religion, degrades her to-day. "Thus saith the Lord," has ever been a talisman by which tyrants hav held the masses in subjection.

It needs but little observation in other countries, if prejudice blinds us to the views in our own, to convince any fair mind of the truth of my assertion. It is a religious custom that dooms two living wives to the grave of a dead chief in central Africa; the widow to the funeral pyre of her Hindoo husband.

It is through their religion that women are held in the Turkish harem; and consent to polygamous relations in Utah. No other power but the religious sentiment could hold half the race in such degrading bondage. It is the perversion of the religious sentiment that crowds the convents with beautiful girls, the very cream of French society. I visited one retreat where an order, dressed in pale blue and white flowing robes, take turns to kneel and pray at the altar, where night and day their devotions never cease.

The Jew in his ritual on each returning Sabbath day thanks the Lord that he was not born a woman, while the woman is made to say, "I thank thee, O Lord, that I am what I am, according to thy holy will." The women who crowd our Christian temples are sedulously taught their inferiority in the scale of being, and their subjection to man. Paul's epistles abound with lessons of her obedience to man as sovereign, and the Old Testament represents her as a marplot in creation, an afterthought, the origin of sin, in collusion with the devil, cursed of God in her maternity, and marriage for her made a condition of slavery. "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth thy children; thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

The Pentateuch abounds with degrading expressions of everything female in the animal kingdom, women being considered too unclean to take part in the religious feasts and sacrifices.

With such lessons taught in the Bible and echoed and reëchoed on each returning Sabbath day in every pulpit in the land, how can woman escape the feeling that the injustice and oppression she suffers are of divine ordination? She is educated to reverence the priests and bishops, to believe in the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, and as both alike teach her subjection and inferiority, it is not easy to teach her terms of self-respect and equality.

Blind faith in accepted authorities, a reverence for the unknown and unknowable when enforced in the name of religion, are stronger passions in the human soul than love of country, than natural affection for family and kindred, than even life itself. The history of the race is one huge record of individual sacrifice at the supposed pleasure of some invisible power, and under all forms of religion woman has been the greatest sufferer, and has never been recognized as an equal factor in any civilization.

Her seeming satisfaction in the most degrading conditions could never hav been accomplished except through her religion. Every time I hav made this assertion Tray, Blanche, Sweetheart, and all of them hav vied with one another in barking the loudest.

In looking over some old papers, I find letters from all the good men most activ in the inauguration of our movement, expressing surprise at the indifference of women. I giv one from Thomas Wentworth Higginson. It is written in answer to an invitation to attend a convention:

NEWPORT, R. I., May 2, 1886.

DEAR MRS. STANTON: I hav been delayed by excess of writing on other matters, and by doubt what to say.

I never go to conventions now, and dislike public speaking. A letter I will try to write.

My convictions as to the political rights of woman are unchanged. My faith is clogged by two things. First, ——'s entire absorption in her own household, and admission that the mother of young children must during her prime of life be so absorbed; and, second, my deep impression, at the South, of the impossibility of a race of contented slaves. I had always taken the ground that the acquiescence of the vast majority of women was like that of slaves, but observation has taught me that no such phenomenon is to be found among slaves. The acquiescence of women—for it is not an unwilling, coerced, dogged submission—is an argument hard to answer, for a man. Certainly men can never secure women's rights vicariously for them. Hence a sort of chill of discouragement, for it is no more.

With increased respect for women like yourself who are dissatisfied, I am, Cordially yours, T. W. HIGGINSON.

I find similar expressions in letters from Garrison, Phillips, Channing, and Sargent, but none of them offer a reason for it. No one who objects to my reason offers any other.

Now, it is plain to me that woman lacks a proper self-respect, and equally plain that the religious theories in regard to her nature and status as a human being are responsible for her condition of subjection. Wherever the canon law has touched the civil law, it has made woman's condition more degraded.

It is woman's position in the church, and the holy books accepted as authority, that make political equality so difficult.

When intelligent, educated women can sit in a Methodist conference, such as was held in New York city in May last, or in a Pan-Presbyterian council such as was held in Philadelphia five years ago, and listen with patience to the contemptuous opinions expressed in regard to their sex, we need no longer wonder at the degraded condition of the masses. And these are the very women who beg continually for the charities; they get up the fairs and donation parties, work slippers and make gowns for the bishops, and as a reward for their devotion they are denied a seat in their councils.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON.

Depraved Christians.

From the Independent.

To one who believes that the Bible is the word of God, and that Jesus Christ is the only savior of sinners, nothing can be more astonishing than the careless indifference with which millions treat both. They pay no attention to what ought to be their first concern. This is one of the mysteries of human depravity.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

There are on our books about a thousand subscribers whose time ran out some months since, and who hav not paid for the papers they hav been reading since then. The political campaign just closed has diverted men's minds from more important matters, and we are not surprised that some of our friends hav forgotten that they owe us a few dollars. Now, however, that the country is safe we hope these delinquents will promptly turn their attention to saving THE TRUTH SEEKER. Bills hav been sent to our debtors, and the amounts thereof are urgently needed here. We trust that we shall receive them at once. We need money, we need it badly, and we want it now.

A Few Things to Be Thankful For.

The people of this country are ordered by the president and the governors of the various states to assemble themselvs together on Thursday, November 29th, and giv thanks. As a good many of them are unable to recollect just what they are thankful for, we jot down a few occurrences, permitted by the Lord since the last similar occasion, to help their memories. Let us giv thanks:

For a bloody fight between Roman Catholics and Orangemen at Killybean, Ireland. Ireland is particularly the home of the Lord.

That our government has had no trouble with Russia to interfere with the latter's persecution of the Jews, or to prevent their slaughter by hundreds. The Jews, it will be recollected, forced a Roman official to kill Christ.

For the conversion by the Salvation Army of Wm. Shelby, who immediately killed his daughter.

For the January blizzard in Dakota which called a thousand souls to God.

For the conversion and execution of about two dozen murderers. Their souls are with the saints, we trust, for which extra thanks should be rendered by their victims and those going the other way.

For the Roman Catholic Fenians who met in this town and decided that Irish mothers must teach their children that it is no murder to kill English officials in Ireland, and that it is no crime to apply the torch to English towns. If this country were only completely filled with such folks, one day of thanksgiving would not be sufficient.

For the cold weather and deep snow last winter in the Canadian Northwest, in consequence of which several hundreds of Indians starved to death. These Indians were not Christians, and no missionaries shared their fate. Let us thank God.

That the floods along the Yellow river in China drowned 100,000 persons and rendered about 2,000,000 destitute. These yellow-skinned folks were Confucians.

That Dr. Buckley was reëlected editor of the Christian Advocate to abuse THE TRUTH SEEKER.

For the Eastern blizzard in which many hundreds were frozen to death and many scores drowned at sea.

For the fire in a theater at Oporto, Portugal, burning up about 100 ungodly persons.

For the cyclone which destroyed the Baptist and Methodist churches of Calhoun, Ga. The faith of the brethren was thereby thoroughly tested.

For a mine explosion in Missouri which cost thirty lives.

That Talmage is still alive.

For a flood in Germany which left 15,000 persons without shelter.

That Mrs. Cleveland was made a life-member of the executiv committee of the Presbyterian Home Missions.

For the White Caps of Indiana.

That thousands of Russian peasants died of hunger. Being good Christians, they are now in heaven.

For the fire in a South African mine which burnt several hundred miners.

For Elliott F. Shepard and his Mail and Express in which to print scripture texts.

For the drunken but Catholic saloonkeeper who gouged out his wife's eyes. Her eyes offended him and he plucked them out, as it was written.

For the collision that sunk the Geiser and drowned 105 people. Otherwise they would hav gone to Europe and had a good time.

For Tammany Hall and Archbishop Corrigan.

That the floods in Spain drowned as many hundreds as they did.

For the Irish religious riots constantly occurring.

That the new German emperor hates the Jews and persecutes them.

For the yellow fever in Florida, killing 400 and disabling thousands.

For "Old Hutch," who sent the price of bread up about 20 per cent.

For the decree that sacred images may be made of papier-maché. The low price of this article will enable everybody to hav an image.

For the Anglican bishops who ordered their clergy to be very cautious on doctrinal points.

That we hav railroads to Canada for defaulting Sunday-school superintendents to travel on.

For Mr. Gladstone.

For Cardinal Manning.

For Frances E. Willard.

For Anthony Comstock.

For the preachers.

And many other things, acts, and persons too numerous to mention, let us thank God. Let the poor thank him for their poverty; the rich for their riches; the sick for their sickness; the healthy for their health. Thank him for what you hav, and for what you havn't; for what you expect to get, but won't, and for what you don't expect to get, but will. Thank him for everything, whether it happens or not, for it's all the same—he has just as much to do with what doesn't happen as he has with anything that does occur. Thank him for death and thank him for life. If he takes away your wife or child or husband or friend, thank him and praise him for his goodness because "in some mysterious way" it's for your good, and the dead can't complain of their treatment. Just imagin that you are the only thing in the world and that God does everything with reference to your special welfare, and you will hav the true Christian philosophy and be entitled to an eternal reward. Never mind the insufferable egotism and the inhuman selfishness of the doctrin—it's truly Christian, and it's better of course to be Christian than to be right.

Thanksgiving is the greatest thing out if you only know why you are giving thanks.

Bishop Chatard's Lament.

A "triduum," a three days' celebration, in honor of the founder of the "Brothers of the Christian Schools," was held in this city last week at the Roman Catholic cathedral. The sermon on the first day was preached by Mr. Chatard, bishop of Vincennes, Ind. Naturally his subject was schools, and this is the substance of his argument that parochial schools are entitled to a share of the public money devoted to the purposes of education:

"We hav a right to that money of the state. It belongs to us and we should hav it. The solution of this matter is an exceedingly difficult thing. We hav to wait till the sober sense and fair-minded spirit of our countrymen shall recognize our right in this respect, and they will, let us hope, open their eyes to the faults and defects of their cherished theory of education in the public schools.

"These public schools certainly are excellent as far as they go, but they giv an education entirely secular, neglecting the moral and religious nature of the child. The result is, a generation is growing up without God and a knowledge of revelation.

"A gentleman of observation and calmness, a man of sound ability and great ability, a priest, told me this. I will not mention the city where it occurred. There came to see him a business man, a clerk in an important establishment, and a man of education. The visitor saw the crucifix on the table and asked, 'What is that?' The priest explained, and answered one question after another. The priest showed surprise at the young man's questions, and the evident fact that he did not know the very first truths of revelation.

"'Father,' said the visitor, 'don't be hard on me. If you go out into the street you can immediately gather together a number of persons like me who know no more about Christianity than I do.'

"This is the enlightenment given to the people of the United States—a material enlightenment in matters of the world and an utter forgetfulness regarding God. These things make us understand the importance of continuing the struggle for Catholic education, no matter how hard it may be. The sum expended yearly by us is enormous. I think the number we educate is probably six hundred thousand, and at $15 a child a year that makes $9,000,000 a year we furnish which ought to come from the state to us. Therefore I hope our people will realize the injustice the state is doing us in leaving us without any help from the funds which belong to us because we will not accept the system which excludes religion from the schools.

"The thirteenth plenary council of Baltimore, whose proceedings went to Rome, says that the rector of a church who neglects to establish a Catholic school in his parish when the bishop judges it is fit there should be one there, is liable to removal from his position. These are grave words, but they are approved by the holy see, and so we are committed to this matter of Catholic education, and we do not shrink from it."

Bishop Chatard thought he clinched the argument by quoting as approvers of sectarian schools the proceedings of the Anglican bishops who met this year in Lambeth palace, London, and who were largely reinforced by American bishops. He pointed out that that conference was in favor of teaching religion in the schools, and that it sent out an encyclical letter which emphasized the necessity of supplementing the secular teaching by religious instruction. He also referred to the pronouncement of the royal board of education, who, by a vote of sixteen to four, declared in favor of teaching religion in schools. "The resolution of this board," continued the bishop, "said: 'It is of the highest importance that all children should receive religious and moral training. There is nothing in the evidence to warrant the conclusion that such religious and moral training can be improper, and provided otherwise than through the medium of the elementary schools.'"

The sober sense and fair-mindedness of the people will never, we believe, parcel the children of the country out to sects to educate in superstition. The constitutions of most states forbid such division by prohibiting appropriations of money to sectarian institutions, and in those states without such constitutional guarantees Protestant sentiment is so strong against Rome that the Protestant churches will rather forego advantages to themselvs than yield them to the church they are pleased, in Christian charity, to designate as the Mother of Harlots.

Nevertheless, the country is in great danger from the machinations of Rome on this school question. She is destroying our public schools as rapidly as she obtains a majority of voters in any town. East and West she has closed dozens of public schools, and compelled parents to use the parochial schools or teach their children themselvs. This is her aim, the destruction of public, secular, or non-sectarian schools, and the building of schools for each sect, to be supported by the state. In that event, her power and strength, her compact and obedient organization, her hordes of monks and nuns, would giv her an enormous advantage over the other sects, and the country in a generation or two would be within her grasp, did not Freethought interfere.

And Freethought is the force which Rome, as well as the Anglican church and the reactionary Presbyterians, forget. If each sect has its schools, the Infidels must hav theirs. Could any sect, or all of them, stand against these schools, in which no religion, but only scientific knowledge, would be taught? What is the use of a knowledge of "revelation," when that revelation is only the crude guesses of barbarism at solving universal questions? Does the bishop desire to go back to medieval times when the Romish catechism was the alpha and omega of the educational curriculum? Is the significance of the crucifix of any importance at all if the Bible is not a revelation from God, and the Christian religion but the clumsy work of ignorant and superstitious churchmen? Why should we pay our money to enlighten children about God, when we know nothing about him ourselvs? Is not a material enlightenment about the matters of a material world all that we can positivly teach the young? Who knows anything about an immaterial world?

What should the American people care for the legislativ decrees of the Baltimore plenary council, or for the opinion of a lot of English bishops whose bread and butter, and that of their successors, depend upon educating the coming generations to believe that bishops are officers of God? Self-interest moves the church, and her interest is not the interest of the people any more than the interest of a king or robber is the interest of his subject or of the plundered. Kings and priests hav ever been in league to keep the people down, and did the Americans throw off the yoke of one only to lock more firmly around their necks the chains of the other? Are the churches to rule us, and separate us into squads, and train our children, just as they please? Shall we let them say to us, You become a Catholic, you a Presbyterian, you a Methodist, you a Baptist, and so on? Shall they gather the children together and divide them into gangs according to the percentages of the various sects, and say, We'll make Catholics of these, Baptists of these, Congregationalists of these, Campbellites of these, and so on to the end of the chapter? That is what this sectarian division of the school fund means, and just what we should hav were the arrogant claims of the churches allowed.

Let the bishop go on with his work—educate his children as he pleases, but when his church destroys a public school, the people whose children he is robbing of an education should hav something to say, be backed up by government. The public schools must be maintained if there is never a parochial school built in this country, and the Catholics weep their eyes out over the "godless" institutions which do not instruct their pupils in the significance of a crucifix.

The Sentence of Christ.

In the New York Sun of the 8th inst. reappears an old story about the death of Jesus Christ, in which "legal evidence" is offered that it really occurred. Various religious papers since hav copied it, many of them edited by scholars who ought to hav detected the forgery at once. The same yarn appeared in a Western paper ten years ago, and only last April our correspondent "Antichrist" copied it from some journal which had resurrected it, and gave some of the reasons why it is clearly a forgery. This is the document:

THE SENTENCE OF JESUS.

A Copy of the Original Decree as Issued by Pontius Pilate.

From the London Tablet.

A correspondent of Notes and Queries extracts from the Kölnische Zeitung what is called "a correct transcript of the sentence of death pronounced against Jesus Christ." The following is a copy of the most memorable judicial sentence which has ever been pronounced in the annals of the world—namely, that of death against the savior, with the remarks that the journal Le Droit has collected, the knowledge of which must be interesting in the highest degree to every Christian. Until now we are not aware that it has ever been made public in the German papers. The sentence is word for word as follows:

Sentence pronounced by Pontius Pilate, intendant of the province of Lower Galilee, that Jesus of Nazareth shall suffer death by the cross. In the seventeenth year of the reign of the Emperor Tiberius and on the twenty-fifth of the month of March, in the most holy city of Jerusalem, during the pontificate of Annas and Caiaphas, Pontius Pilate, intendant of the province of Lower Galilee, sitting in judgment in the presidential seat of the prætors, sentences Jesus Christ of Nazareth to death on a cross between two robbers, as the numerous and notorious testimonials of the people prove: 1. Jesus is a misleader. 2. He has excited people to sedition. 3. He is an enemy to the laws. 4. He calls himself the son of God. 5. He calls himself falsely the king of Israel. 6. He went into the Temple followed by a multitude carrying palms in their hands. Orders: The first centurion, Quintus Cornelius, to bring him to the place of execution, forbids all persons, rich or poor, to prevent the execution of Jesus. The witnesses who hav signed the execution against Jesus are: 1. Daniel Robani, Pharisee; 2. John Zorobabel; 3. Raphael Robani; 4. Capet. Jesus to be taken out of Jerusalem through the gate of Tournea.

The sentence is engraved on a plate of brass in the Hebrew language, and on its sides are the following words: "A similar plate has been sent to each tribe." It was discovered in the year 1280, in the city of Aquill (Aquilla?), in the kingdom of Naples, by a search made for the discovery of Roman antiquities, and remained there until it was found by the commissaries of art in the French army of Italy. Up to the time of the campaign in southern Italy it was preserved in the sacristy of the Carthusians, near Naples, where it was kept in a box of ebony. Since then the relic has been kept in the chapel of Caserta. The Carthusians obtained it by their petitions that the plate might be kept by them, which was an acknowledgment of the sacrifices which they made for the French army. The French translation was made literally by members of the Commission of Arts. Denon had a fac-simile of the plate engraved, which was bought by Lord Howard on the sale of his cabinet for 2,890 francs. There seems to be no historical doubt as to the authenticity of this. The reasons of the sentence correspond exactly with those of the gospels.

That this plate is as much a forgery as the golden plates discovered by Joseph Smith there can be no doubt at all. Indeed, it is so transparent a trick that it would not be worth exposing, were it not that so many are deceived by it through ignorance.

1. Its date: Aquila, a fortified city of Naples, situated fifty-eight miles northeast of Rome, was built by the Emperor Frederick II. from the ruins of the ancient Amiternum, the birthplace of Sallust, some vestiges of which are still traceable. So says Lippincott's Gazetteer. Frederick II. reigned thirty-five years and died in the year 1250. Thirty years after his death, it is now said, this brass plate was found "in a search made for the discovery of Roman antiquities." But the date of discovery varies with each reprint. One copy, as published, has the date of discovery 1810, another 1820, another 1280, and another 1200, which was fifteen years before Frederick II., the builder of the city, was crowned.

2. The mistakes of the document itself:

(a) March 25th, in the seventeenth year of Tiberius, was Sunday, A.D. 31. Another copy has March 24th, which was Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath; and still another has March 27th, which was Tuesday. If Christ was crucified at all, it was on Friday, which from time immemorial has been hangman's day. On none of the dates given would there hav been an execution.

(b) The date of the crucifixion, A.D. 31, is wrong according to early Christian authorities. Clement of Alexandria says Jesus was crucified A.D. 29, and Tertullian was so sure that Clement was right that he added the very day—March 25th. This, however, was not a passover day, and so both Clement and Tertullian were wrong. Common computation fixes the date A.D. 33, but it is not pretended that anyone knows. But the date 31 will not harmonize at all with the rest of the narrativ.

(c) The document alleges that the crucifixion occurred when both Annas and Caiaphas were high priests. In this the forger had Luke for authority. But though Caiaphas held office from A.D. 18 to 36, Annas had been deposed in A.D. 14. This, however, is not the only time Luke misled his would-be supporters, for in another place he mentions a certain Lysanias as governor of Abilene in A.D. 29 (fifteen of the reign of Tiberius), when that personage had been murdered more than fifty years previously. It doesn't do to trust Luke.

(d) The document makes Pilate ruler of Lower Galilee, whereas Herod Antipas became tetrarch of Galilee when the Idumæan Herod's territory was divided up, and held it till A.D. 39, when he was deposed by the Romans and banished to Lyons. Judæa was governed by the Romans, who had their seat at Cæsarea, after Archelaus (the Idumæan Herod's son, who received Judea at his father's death), was banished in A.D. 6, and Pilate was the fifth (according to some historians, the sixth) of their governors (A.D. 26–37). Pilate was procurator, or governor, of Judea and Samaria, and never ruled Galilee. In A.D. 37 or thereabouts the Samaritans made him trouble, and he had to go to Rome to answer to the emperor. What became of him no one knows. Eusebius alleges that he committed suicide in A.D. 38. Eusebius, however, is no more reliable as a historian than Luke.

There are other internal evidences in the document that it is a forgery, though the ones we hav pointed out are the weighter and all-sufficient reasons for rejecting the monkish trick. A writer in the Evening Post, T. D. Bacon, of New Haven, givs twelve, some of which are included in the foregoing. The others are: Pilate's title was not "intendant," but procurator; the Romans did not reckon time by numbering the days of the month; a Roman official document would be unlikely to refer to Jerusalem as "the most holy city;" neither would it be dated by the pontificate of the Jewish high priests; neither would Jesus be named in it as the "Christ," this being not his name, but the Greek translation of a Jewish title, afterward applied to him; it is unlikely that the sentence would specify that he should be crucified "between two robbers;" it would either hav specified the names of the two other criminals, or more probably hav left the matter of the arrangement of the different crosses to the discretion of the executioner; that Jesus should call himself the son of God was no crime before the Roman law; the names of the witnesses do not agree with the method of naming men at that time and place; in the New Testament a man is named either as the son of such and such a man, e.g., James, the son of Alphæus, or as coming from such a place, e.g., Judas Iscariot (the man of Kerioth), or Saul of Tarsus, or by some characteristic, physical or otherwise, as James the Less, John the Baptist, or Jesus the Christ; the epithet "Pharisee" has no place in an official signature any more than the epithet Republican, or Democrat, or Episcopalian, or Calvinist would hav at the present time; it is stated that the inscription is in Hebrew; this language was not current in Palestine at the time of Christ, but was as entirely superseded by Aramaic as Latin has been by Italian in Italy; the inscription states that a similar plate has been sent to each tribe, but at that time the old tribal divisions had been entirely lost, and whatever remnant had been preserved of the ten tribes had been entirely merged into the tribe of Judah, so that in the New Testament they are all known as "Jews."

The rest of the stuff could easily be made up from the gospels, and the names given invented. In fact, in the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus, the alleged trial is expanded and embellished with much more ingenuity than is shown by the author of this. And the fact that the reasons correspond so closely with the indictment of Jesus by the mob, shows that this indictment was copied from that. Even if the brass plate could be traced back to 1280, who can tell that a Carthusian monk did not make the engraving and pretend that it was brought from Jerusalem by Frederick? Certain it is that the errors of the document prove conclusivly that it is a forgery, made by some ignorant churchman.

The story of Christ's birth, life, and death has no evidence corroborativ of the gospels, and as they are anonymous, of unknown date, and internally contradictory, misleading, and erroneous, the value of their evidence is exceedingly slight. It is as positiv as that two and two make four that no woman ever bore a son who had no father; and it is equally positiv that no one ever performed the miracles attributed to Jesus, and that the accounts of his life are lies. Equally certain is it that no one knows when he died, any more than it is known when he was born. It is too late in the day to plant old brass plates and dig them up as evidence. If this plate exists at all, it is as clumsy a forgery as the Acta Pilati which the Christians once insisted were good evidence. The interpolation in Josephus and the reference to Jesus in the corrupted or forged Annals of Tacitus are scientific compared with this bungling attempt of some ambitious Carthusian monk.

Gaining Thanks.

How easy it is to misrepresent, to put it mildly, is shown by the following from B. R. Tucker's Liberty:

"After a skirmish with the election inspectors and a short but decisiv struggle in the courts, Eugene Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has established a man's right to keep his hand in his pocket. This will gain him the thanks of loafers. If now he wishes to deserve the gratitude of workers, let him expend a little of his surplus energy in establishing a man's right to keep his money in his pocket. I fear, alas! that he looks upon this as a comparativly unimportant matter."

Mr. Tucker's drive at taxes is out of place. If there had been no court supported by taxation, the Anarchistic attempt of the election board to wrong a voter would hav succeeded, as they were four to one. Therefore, we say, hurrah for the taxes, and confound the Anarchists who don't want us to vote!

MR. L. A. LAMBERT, Catholic priest of Waterloo, and his bishop, both sailed for Rome a few days ago to hav their quarrel out with the Vatican authorities as umpires. The bishop says Lambert is heretical; Lambert says the bishop doesn't know much about Catholic theology anyway. But we notice that the Catholic Union and Times, Lambert's organ, is very silent about the affair. Is Father Cronin also afraid of a churching?

WHEN J. D. Shaw was lecturing in Goldthwaite, Tex., recently, effort was made to convert him. He was visited at his hotel by a lawyer, who endeavored to dissuade him from so wicked a course as that of opposing the Christian religion, The lawyer labored under the temporary embarrassment of being most gloriously drunk, but for which, says Mr. Shaw he might hav done the Lord better service than he did. As it was, the Liberal preacher still clings to his unbelief in Christianity and his faith in humanity.

Letters from Friends.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., Nov. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Within find post-office money order to pay or THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Accept my sincere and hearty congratulations on the victory won by you at the polls. Good! It was honor enough for one day. Three cheers and a tiger. A. L. FRISBIE.

TACOMA, WASH. TERR., Oct. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As vinegar is to the teeth, as smoke is to the eye, so is superstition to the mind of a true man or woman.

You are doing a splendid work, and it is the bounden duty of all Liberals to support you as far as they are able.

You will find inclosed $1, for which please send "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen H. Gardener, to the young lady of my acquaintance named below, and oblige,

Yours In Fidelity, R. J. WILSON.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Nov. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After reading "The Editor Trying to Vote," and the comments of the press thereon, I feel as if every Freethinker should thank you for vindicating our rights. I am glad you felt it your duty and right to follow up the case, and bring the registration board to an understanding of their duty. The axiom of, "Vigilance is the price of liberty," is as true now as ever. Your action in that matter has done more good for the rights of man than all the sermons preached last Sunday in New York. F. D. REXFORD.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Oct. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Will some kind reverend gentleman answer me the following questions, either through these columns or directly to me:

1. Has everything that has a beginning, also an end?
2. Where is the soul of the unborn child?
3. Who is to blame for the wicked (Prov. xvi, 4)?
4. Who directs the steps of the drunkard (Prov. xvi, 9)?
5. Why does God punish the just (Prov. xvii, 26)?
6. How large were those seven loaves of bread (St. Matt. xv, 36-38)?
7. Did Adam work while in the garden of Eden (Gen. ii, ?

Yours respectfully, A. B. FRIEDMANN.

IRWIN, IA., Nov. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading "The Time-Lock of Our Ancestors," as copied in your paper from Belford's Magazine. I am delighted! I am in an ecstacy of admiration! My very pen trembles from the pleasure this cunning little story has given me. Miss Gardener should hav a patent-right on that invention of the time-lock. I mean a copyright, don't I? Yes; and if she can get up any more such 'combinations," I would like to see them. Now that I think of it, I see that this article is only one chapter cut from the middle of a life story. Can't you see it? Bless me! I hav an indistinct glimpse of the scope of the whole story from beginning to end. Can't you coax her secret from her? Get her to write it all out from first to last, and publish it either as a serial or as a book, or in book form. I cannot offer much pecuniary encouragement myself, but I would take a copy of any story she might write. Has she published any work of fiction yet? If so, send it to me instantly, forthwith, at once, quick, and I will remit on receipt.

Yours, etc., J. K. P. BAKER.

VERSAILLES, MO., Nov. 4, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Will you admit me with a few lines to the Friends corner, as I feel lonely and somewhat despondent in the great political smoke and religious fog of the present, especially in this part of the country. But if the old maxim be true, "The darkest hour is just before day," I think the dawn will soon approach.

A few years ago I emigrated to the fair plains of the West, encamping the first few nights in low, boggy swamps of brush and timber, which became less dense until finally emerged into high, open prairie. So I view the people of my surroundings—they are gradually moving out from old ow-down slavery to superstition to something better, and I hope we may liv to see many reach the grand plain of liberty.

There are thousands camping in an organization called the great Agricultural Wheel in this state, which was, I tell them, suggested and started by those men that were executed at Chicago, called Anarchists. Because they were not doing their work in the name of God, Christianity hanged the men, and now the sky-pilots are reaping a rich harvest of the dupes who are passing back under their control in the churches. J. B. BOWERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read a great deal of this and that about the benefits to accrue to us from the election of either Cleveland or Harrisou. Now, if any Liberal can point out where the Nine Demands are to derive any benefit from the election of either party he can sell his eyes to Alvin Clark for a fabulous price, as he is contemplating the production of a more powerful lens than the one now at the Lick observatory. Both parties are using their most persuasiv arguments to obtain the Catholic vote. I think that Cleveland has toadied to a certain extent, but still he did not travel as far to do it as James G. Blaine did when he went to Rome to be present at the pope's jubilee. Now, it has beeu charged, and the charge not denied, that Jim Blaine, should Harrison succeed in this contest, would be secretary of state—which he would be in name, but president in fact, as all can see by going back to the Conkling affair. Now, as I hav not heard one word to the credit of the party that espouses our cause—that is, the American party—my surprise is stupendous. Liberals, what are you thinking of, fighting with your pen for the heads of two parties that completely ignore our cause and attempting to slide into oblivion the very party that puts the principal parts of our Nine Demands in their platform—total separation of church and state, the taxation of all religious property, free non-sectarian schools? Liberals, what do you want? Is not James Langdon Curtis good enough for us? I was formerly a Republican, but am now a straight American, and all the Liberals here that I know are the same.

FORMERLY A REPUBLICAN.

COALING, ALA., Oct. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I want to get the coöperation of the Liberals South for a series of lectures as soon as possible. There are a great many Infidels that would gladly contribute to such a course, but we are scattered. I am willing to help if it will only come in any Southern state, whether it comes near enough for me to attend or not. The questions need agitating so as to set people thinking. There will then soon be a host of us. All honest, thinking people are willing to investigate any theory that pertains to the general good. I think the lectures ought to be in the principal towns, as that would be more likely to reach the most intelligent of the masses. It is probable that many Eastern, Northern, and Western friends would help. The reason I make a special request for the South, and especially Alabama, is that Freethought is unknown here. I am reading several leading newspapers and hav never seen any reference to any of the doings of Liberals. That treat it all with silent contempt. I want all the Liberals South to speak out and let us come to an understanding. Will some man that is capable of organizing take up this idea and see what can be done? If a few in Chattanooga, Birmingham, Tuscaloosa, Meridian, and New Orleans will act in concert, we can accomplish great things. Yours truly, H. J. WARD.

GARRETTSVILLE, O., Nov. 1, 1888.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

A nightingale that all day long
Had cheered the village with his song,
Nor yet at eve his note suspended,
Nor yet when eventide was ended,
Began to feel, as well he might,
The keen demands of appetite;
When, looking eagerly around,
He spied far off upon the ground,
A something shining in the dark,
And knew the glow-worm by his spark;
So, stooping down from hawthorn top,
He thought to put him in his crop.
The worm, aware of his intent,
Haranged him thus, right eloquent:
"Did you admire my lamp," quoth he,
"As much as I your minstrelsy,
You would abhor to do me wrong
As much as I to spoil your song;
For 'twas the self-same power divine,
Made you to sing and me to shine;
That you with music, I with light,
Might beautify and cheer the night."
The songster heard his short oration,
And warbling out his approbation,
Released him, as my story tells,
And found a supper somewhere else.

Hence jarring sectaries may learn
Their real interest to discern;
That brother should not war with brother,
And worry and devour each other;
But sing and shine by sweet consent
Till life's poor transient night is spent;
Respecting in each other's case
The gifts of nature and of grace.

MR. EDITOR: The above is a lesson I learned when a schoolgirl, and I recommend its perusal to some of our Liberal friends who are setting bad examples for Christians. I do want to say we are highly pleased with your editorials, as well as THE TRUTH SEEKER generally. MRS. A. W. LAKE.

COVINGTON, IND., Nov. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER all the way from Paris, Ill., up to the present, and this is the first that I felt it a duty to bother you. I was just recovering from the free advertising of the Mills bill and Mr. Underwood's pamphlet that you gave us in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, when that two-column article over the name, "A Republican Before the War," struck us. That is too much for me. As to the Mills bill, we hav it, with or without the whisky clause, and as to the pamphlet, we do not need it at all. Mr. Higgins is here teaching us Hoosiers how to vote, hence we hav no need of the pamphlet. You will remember Mr. Higgins, as he was the good Christian who had charge of and sat on the food while the "Lincoln dogs" starved to death in Confederate prisons. And now we feel just a little sore that Mr. Underwood did not come to Indiana and join Higgins, as they would hav been well met.

"A Republican Before the War!" Oh, I know him; he livs near me, on my right and on my left. How I like him! he was loyal to the center; he it was that sacrificed so, so much. Other people's sons by the score, even to his wife's relations, he told to go. He it was that sympathized in a heartfelt way with soldiers' widows and orphans, and said, "I will allow you ten per cent and take the bond." Our country issued bonds to run two years at ten per cent per annum, $500 each, to be used to induce men to volunteer so that the dog-fennel Democrat would not be drafted.

By the way, he is a Methodist, and oh; how he prayed for the success of the work we were engaged in—and we were successful! Now, Mr. Editor, what proof more do you want of the efficacy of prayer? Oh, but we do love "Mr. Republican Before the War." 'Tis he who gets his breath hard and groans aloud when he reads in the local paper that some poor broken-down comrade has been allowed $2 per month pension.

Now you will please cance my subscription and stop sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address, as I get all the political slop necessary from the political papers. If I am overpayed up to date, whatever the amount, you will please accept it for the good you hav done.

Respectfully yours, SCHUYLER LA TOURETTE,
A Republican of the bloody shirt species.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Oct. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you herewith my check on the National Bank of Martinsburg, W. Va., for $14, which you will please credit as follows: To Hermann Bohda, for Girard College Fund, to establish it as directed by Stephen Girard in his will, $1; to Hermann Bohda, for the American Secular Union, $5; to Louis Wolfes, Sr., for propaganda purposes, $2; to Louis Wolfes, Sr., for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, $2 50; and also to the following named on account of propaganda purposes: Jacob Whitson, propaganda, $1; Thos. Dratz, subscription, $1; Michael Courtney, propaganda, fifty cents; John Pickens, propaganda, fifty cents; Geo. W. Bowers, propaganda, fifty cents.

Now, Mr. Editor, I am through with the little business as above stated, and desire to say a few words to some of our able and Liberal writers, such, for instance, as Manly A. Brigham, of Worcester, Mass. In his letter of September 15th, he conveys the impression that they are trying to get religion into the Constitution of the United States. Should they succeed, where would they stop? I, for one, believe that sooner or later they will succeed; and it is well to ask, Where will they stop? The great mass of American people are too indifferent, and don't seem to care a straw for such questions. I meet a great many who say that it is all right to put God in the Constitution, and others, even Liberals, say there is no danger. I wish that every Liberal man and woman would sound the alarm that there is danger for our liberty in such movements as to put God in the Constitution, and not be deluded with the idea that their liberties cannot through carelessness and indifference be taken from them by religious fanatics and bigots. LOUIS WOLFES, SR.

IN MEMORIAM.

PRINCETON, MO., Nov. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The subject of this sketch, Thomas W. Lemmax, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., May 22, 1826. His parents, James and Elizabeth Lemmax, were born in Ireland, immigrating to this country while young, and were married at Pittsburgh.

To these were born ten children, of whom only three are now living, the parents having died some time since.

Thomas W. Lemmax was married to Dorinda Osborne, of Noble county, Ohio, March 8, 1848. To this union seven children were given, four of whom, with the mother, still survive.

In the year 1851 the deceased went to California to try his fortune in the great Eldorado of the West, being six months at sea in going, and returned to his home in Ohio in the year 1853.

In 1868 he moved with his family to Mercer county, Missouri, near Princeton, where he resided until his death, caused by heart disease, which occurred Oct. 28, 1888. Deceased was once a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, but for the last twenty-five years was very skeptical upon the various ideas taught by the different religious denominations, renouncing all allegiance with any, but still confessing faith in God and heaven, and was perfectly resigned to death, and expressed great joy when he found that his dissolution was at hand.

He having previously arranged all business matters, his burial also, he requested me to write his obituary.

He expressed gratitude and thankfulness to family and friends for all their kindness in administering to his wants during his illness, and rejoiced in the fact that death would relieve him of all suffering.

At the request of the deceased no regular funeral services were held, only singing and prayer.

His remains were interred at Goshen cemetery, the funeral being very largely attended, he having many relativs and friends. All mingled their sympathy with the bereaved family. His bereaved daughter, MARY LEMMAX.

DO NOT DISPARAGE EACH OTHER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Oct. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A short time ago I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER a long letter from Mr. Gunther, of California, saying, to begin with, that most of what Father Hacker wrote was not true, and not "worth knowing," or words to that import. At the same time he thought a history of himself was worth knowing, and told us how he began to work for very small wages in England, and by economy and good management is now owner of more than his share of this world's goods. Heretics, as well as orthodox, are not all free from the disposition to undervalue the man who has devoted his life to truth and humanity, and is, therefore, poor in material things. I get my share of disparaging titles and epithets wherever I go, and often from pretended reformers and advocates of Universal Mental Liberty. A few years ago the founder of "the only Liberal [?] town in the United States" called me many hard names which, practically, applied far more to himself than to me. In this way hav I been misrepresented in this region for eighteen years past, while I hav defended unpopular truth. My test of a man or woman who makes pretensions of Freethought is, Is he or she dominated by truth and humanity? If so, I can coöperate with them, although their ways and means, methods and manner, may differ from mine.

The truth is that nature's work is boundless and endless, and she has an innumerable variety of human organisms to do her work; and, from a scientific view, the work of my organism may be as important in the grand march and development of evolution as yours, or yours, or yours, sir. "All nature's difference makes all nature's peace." Let every personality and every individuality be sacredly respected and appreciated, and allowed its free and natural action—functions, work, and manifestation, limited by the same right of all other individuals. My individuality against all other persons, or corporations, or so-called governments, that tend or seek to destroy, suppress, or absorb it. How that great somebody, that judge in Philadelphia, disparaged and ignored the personality of the honest Russian by denying him his naturalization papers, because he was an Infidel! I hav no words to express my moral indignation toward such infernal, and unmanly, unconstitutional acts. Both church and state, as they play more and more into each other's hands, disparage more and more individualities and opinions that are against their schemes and combined machinations to deprive us of what little liberty we hav. Let every man and woman who has any aspirations to liberty and selfhood, repel and oppose in every possible way this disparagement of and infringement upon their personal rights. Down with God-and-pope-and-king power, and up with the power of truth and humanity.

To him (nature) no high, no low, no great, no small:
He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all.

PROF. J. H. COOK.

DES MOINES, IA., NOV. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As it has been some time since I have written anything for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I feel impelled by the events transpiring in this great country of ours to pen a few lines to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The American Secular Congress is first in my mind, and I will say that I am highly gratified at the grand success of the Congress, and hope that Liberalism will finally win, and that the Nine Demands will be embodied in the platforms of the leading political parties of this nation. If the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States was a fact in the government of the United States, then there would be no need, or, at least, not so much need of the Nine Demands. The supreme law of the land is just as it should be, but the orthodox people, some of them, try to pervert the law for the benefit of the clergy and churches.

Our Liberal friend Hoover, of Pittsburgh, in his minority report of the Congress, seems to be a little bilious, but I guess he has worked it off and remains a good Liberal. And some of our lecturers are sparring at one another some, but I think they are all imbued with the religion of humanity. When I come to think of it, I hav a kindly feeling toward all Liberal people, however much they may differ with me in modes of propagating and advocating Liberalism.

I see by the report that I am appointed to the executiv committee of Missouri, and in the report you hav got my name G. R. Beck. My name is G. G. Beck. Please make the correction, as it bores me to get communications addressed G. R. instead of G. G. There is one more subject I wish to call attention to, and that is to lecturers and publishers of Freethought papers and magazines who send sample copies. First, I wish to thank all for favors of that kind, and state that if I was rich enough I would subscribe for all the Freethought literature I could hear of, but my financial condition is such that I "caun't do it, you know." And to the lecturers I will state in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so they will all know it, that there are so few of us that pay, that the best we can do here is to furnish the hall for lectures, which costs $5 a lecture, and I will make a home while here for all at my house. Therefore all lecturers will govern themselvs accordingly. G. G. BEOK.

Oct. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Since writing you last from this sunset land, where old Sol makes his bed in the old Pacific, I hav made a two-months lecturing tour along the coast of western Washington territory, giving fifty-three lectures—six in Astoria, Ore., five in Ilwaco, Wash. Terr., six in Oysterville, two in Bay Center, four in South Bend, four in Willipa, one in North Cove, seven in Montesano, four in Elma, three in Cosmopolis, five in Aberdeen, six in Hoquiam. In three of these places ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds had been before me, and like a cyclone had cut the center all out of the churches. The Christians look upon Reynolds as a "holy terror;" and the truth is, he cuts a wide swath. I look upon Brother Reynolds as a very brainy man, and of very fertil imagination, with wonderful talent as an actor, and as a born genius of a high order, who should never be allowed to rust out for want of calls by our Freethinkers. Brother Reynolds can do a mighty work, and will, for he has many years of wear in him yet. At Astoria I met Wm. Chonce and wife, noble, lifelong Liberals, of splendid hospitality. At Ilwaco, I met Isaac Wheeldon, J. Alexander, W. W. Ward and wife, Fred Colbert, and many others that are an honor to the Liberal cause. I had crowded houses and the best of attention. At Oysterville I staid a week, speaking in the Methodist Episcopal church every evening to full houses. Oysterville is on a long peninsula between Shoal Water bay and the Pacific ocean. About all the occupation here is digging for clams and oyster farming, which is very remunerativ, and easy labor. Oysters are about $1.25 per bushel, shells and all. They are shipped to Portland and San Francisco in gunny sacks, etc. The first friend I found here was a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the hotel where I stopped. Mr. Mathews, the landlord, is a true-blue Liberal, and never puts his light under a half-bushel. The next place was Bay Center, where it was said the whole town were preachers; but I held forth in the school-house, which was crowded full, and no exceptions were taken to my line of thought, although "God's servants" were all around. At South Bend and Willapa I had the pleasure of meeting hosts of Liberals that sustained me well, among whom I remember C. H. Foster, J. W. Hayes, the Drissler brothers, A. L. Stratton, Mr. Armstrong, etc. This is a very Liberal settlement, and Christianity is away below par. At Montesano I found an organized club of Freethinkers, with A. J. Lamb as president, C. C. Tunicliffe and wife as wheel-horses, W. Wedekin, and many more activ workers. I gave here seven lectures, in Columbian Hall, with a full house every night. Thus hav Reynolds and myself paved the way for other lecturers to follow us. If this Western coast is well worked the next ten years, the victory will be ours, for Christianity has but little hold with the people. I lectured in churches most of the time, and so will it yet be everywhere—the churches will be turned into lecture halls and academies of learning, and humanity will be taught, not to look for heaven over there, but to build a heavenly home here and now. On this coast everywhere our flag is mailed to the mast-head and truth is the watchword, while superstition is on its last legs. PROF. D. C. SEYMOUR.

WAOO, TEX., NOV. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Nov. 3, 1888, I read a paper by Mr. John Prescott Guild that seems to call for some contradiction. Certainly "the Gods must go"—the anthropomorphic Gods must go. But it is none the less true that "science has given us a new, a greater God." That new, or rather that oldest of all the Gods, is that one that was, from the most remote antiquity, understood and believed in by our Aryan forefathers, as said Burnouf. It is the "great cosmic unity," of which everything that is is only a part or a manifestation. He is not the "end of a circle," as are the other "Gods"—he is the circle itself. He is nature itself, he is everything that is. Each being, if it be "matter" or "spirit," man, beast, plant, or mineral, is to him exactly that which an electric spark is to all the electricity. The great trouble and misunderstanding in such discussions comes from the sense or signification applied to the word "God." As a distinct, or rather, anthropomorphic, individuality God is not, but as the whole or infinit or universal being God cannot be denied, and science has not only discovered him, but is every day extending more and more our knowledge of him and of his or its "holy" trinity, as said Burnouf, after our Aryan forefathers, i. e., substance, movement, and law, of which Christianity anthropomorphism has made the father, son, and Holy Ghost. As said Renan, "The scientific progress of humanity cannot destroy religion, but will develop and increase it." It is only superstition that must be destroyed. The actually standing religions and "Gods" are only "imperfect symbols," as said Renan. These symbols are the result as well as the measure of the imperfect intellectual development of humanity. The intellectual progress of man must of course reject these symbols, but that very intellectual progress, instead of bringing to man the bare and ignorant negation of the truth so grossly represented by the old symbols—that intellectual progress of humanity shall bring man closer to the perception and admiration of truth itself—of "the great cosmic unity," and of its trinity, "substance, movement, and law." Science and art shall be the rational basis of the "religion of the future," for religion is worship, and worship is admiration, and the more science progresses the more human admiration for the "great cosmic unity," as well as for the universal "substance, movement, and law." I know, Mr. Editor, the ignorant and vulgar cannot understand this, but your intellectual readers will. I hav no doubt of it. PERIOLES.

DETROIT, NOV. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read carefully and with sympathetic interest the letters of R. Gunther, to which our venerable Brother Hacker replies in the last TRUTH SEEKER, and while I feel altogether on the side of Brother Hacker, I must say that Mr. Gunther told much truth in saying that the labor of Brother Hacker had been a waste of time. But I do not hesitate to giv Brother Hacker full credit for ready, honest labor in the cause of his fellow-men, while Mr. Gunther does not even claim that he ever has cared for anyone but self. Brother Hacker has boldly fought and labored for the good of others, regardless of self, and if he had known what to do better, he would hav done it. So I hope that he will accept a few words of correction in the kindness in which they are given.

Mr. Hacker, like Mr. Gunther, has always believed that the Constitution of this government guarantees to every person the rights to life and liberty that were therein claimed as the birthright of every person born. He has believed that this government was different from those of other countries—that as they were called monarchies they were tyrannical and slavish; that this government, being called republican, is therefore free. Yet he believed that abuses and wrongs had grown up here in spite of a free government, just as millions hav believed and accepted as true the fallacy that slavery could and did exist in this country for nearly a century under a free government and a Constitution that guaranteed the rights that were claimed in the Declaration and for which our ancestors fought and died. On the contrary, while there was evidently no intention in the minds of those who were the majority in the convention that framed the Constitution to make this country free, there is no sort of resemblance between the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. The government has never for one hour hesitated to take from the people their lives and liberties and destroy their happiness, nor has it ever acknowledged or recognized the least shadow of any of those rights.

Brother Hacker in last week's TRUTH SEEKER says of the great Irish famin of 1847, after describing the conditions, that that famin and all those deaths were the beautiful fruit of that land robbery which Mr. Gunther advocates, and thinks the facts not worth knowing. This is not true. The simple statement that if there were no taxation by the English government there never could hav been any real want in Ireland cannot be denied. Taxation was the one thing which took the crops from Ireland to England, where the money-lenders lived and controled the government. No, it was not land robbery, but tax robbery—the same that has enslaved every people on earth; the same that between 1797 and 1837 dragged from the poor laborers of this country simply for the expense of a free government the nice little sum of $895,471,714 69, according to the report of the secretary of the treasury.

Again, Brother Hacker says the working classes of all the nations of Europe are in consequence of land robbery brought to living on the brink of starvation, while the robbers are rolling in idleness and dissipation on the fruits of the workers' labor, and the same terrible curse is increasing in this country every day. This is not true. I assert that only by taxation can the people be robbed of their land or home, and challenge any person to dispute it. Get these miserable cobwebs of the money-lender out of your brain, Brother Hacker. They hav been there quite too long, and you hav no more time to waste helping them to befog others. Let us work for the liberty that our fathers fought for, and a government to protect it.

Again, Brother Hacker says: "I hav a list of over twenty millions of acres that our own robber government has sold to foreigners who hav agents here establishing the same system of robbery and oppression that has pauperized Ireland, Italy, and other nations of the Old World." All wrong, all wrong. It is the policy of the money-lenders of the world to enslave every people on earth. There is one, and only one, way to do it—it is by controling every government and causing it to become their tool; to refuse to issue any money; to license as many banks as are asked for, and then tax the people, so as to compel them to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes with. This is slavery, the only slavery that ever existed anywhere, and the only way possible to cause slavery, poverty, war, vice, crime, and misery to exist. It is the purpose of these slave-owners to destroy, lock up, put out of the way, and deprive the people of everything on earth which in any way givs liberty or makes them independent of their owners. For this purpose the greenbacks were destroyed. For this purpose the people hav always been told that the government could not make money. For this purpose were banks created, and to compel the people to borrow bankers' debts as money taxes were levied upon any and all things, particularly the land and improvements. And no other purpose can be found. And for this purpose hav five hundred millions in taxes been robbed from the people and locked up in expensiv treasury vaults and in bankers' vaults—that by more stringent want the people may be compelled to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes with.

Again, in speaking of the peach harvest in Delaware, Brother Hacker says, "The paper stated there were not less than ten thousand of those Italian tramps on the peninsula," and "this is the beautiful fruit produced by that upas-tree, land robbery"—which is the same mistake again. It is not land robbery, but taxation. It has for years been stated that there are in the aggregate over thirty billions of debts resting upon the laborers of this country, and about four hundred billions upon the laborers of all civilized countries. This is about four thousand dollars upon each person, or more, upon which interest is expected. A man who has four or five children has twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars of debt upon which he is mortgaged to pay interest—which is out of the question. And there should be no question as to why marriage is a failure, if for no other reason.

These plain facts are far better reasons why Italians and Chinese, as well as tramps from all other countries, swarm to any country where the money-lenders' papers advise them they can do better than where they are. The press of this country are continually used to advertise good times in places all over the land, and most of the railroad travel consists of people who hav sacrificed some of their goods or run in debt to go somewhere in search of doing better. Nearly all foreign and domestic or interstate commerce is as much a robbery as Brother Hacker claims that land robbery is. The productions of land and labor are trundled and transported back and forth from place to place to be exchanged—mostly a pretense—for the self-same kind or similar productions brought back from some other place or country, to enhance the cost and compel the consumer to pay an enhanced price, and all people to be taxed with interest upon the values stolen or robbed from both ends of the line.

Again, Brother Hacker says: "The time is not far distant when land robbery will demand and receive as much attention as colored slavery did before the war." Not so. The Prohibition party is the one that undoubtedly will take control of the Republican party, just as the Whig and Free Soil party were married to the Abolition party, and if they are as destructiv of human life and supposed liberty as the Republican party has been for twenty years past, Brother Hacker will be glad that he has a good berth in that warm place that our orthodox friends hav assigned us to. Before that time comes Brother Hacker should look right down into the fact that this is not a free country. That is all bosh. The colored people were never slaves any more than they are still. They were in penal servitude for being black and ignorant. The colored people South are to-day in precisely the same condition that they were before the war. The evening News, of this city, has for two weeks past had six or eight correspondents down in the South reporting the condition of the colored people, and they all report that the colored people never offer to vote and are in every political respect just as they were before the war. One white man said to the reporter: "Do you see that colored man? He was once a United States Senator, but now if I was to tell him to black my boots he would do it without a word and thank me if I gave him a nickel to pay for it." We must all learn that we are truly slaves to taxation if we ever hope to be free. Yours for liberty, J. H. WOOD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Found.

A TALE OF AN OLD THANKSGIVING DAY.

Come, Teddy and May and Goldie,
And gather around my knee,
And I'll tell you a little story
Just as 'twas told to me

When I was a bright-eyed lassie,
In the time of long ago,
One night when the wind was moaning
And the ground was white with snow:

'Twas to be a grand Thanksgiving
For the harvest stored away
Safely in barn and cellar—
A time to feast and pray.

Alike in the cot and mansion
Was a hurrying here and there,
And the scent of the browning turkey
Filled, like incense, all the air.

Dear little Puritan Ruthie
Looked on in a glad surprise,
With her small hands quaintly folded,
And her blue eyes grave and wise;

And a host of eager questions
Flitting from brain to tongue,
To puzzle the busy workers
Their savory tasks among—

Until her mother lost patience:
"Ruth, 'tis Thanksgiving day,"
She said, "and we all are busy—
Do thee go out and play.

"I will call thee when I want thee;"
Then quietly little Ruth
Tripped out of the noisy kitchen,
Though she'd rather not, in truth.

But without the sun shone warmly,
And the air was crisp and clear,
It seemed to Ruth Thanksgiving
Was the gem of all the year.

The last of the trees' bright garments
Hung fluttering gold and brown,
As the wee maid wandered idly
The forest pathways down;

A-humming in baby fashion
A snatch of some quaint old air;
And laughing to hear a squirrel
Chatter at her from his lair.

Still letting her careless footsteps
Just where they were minded stray,
She wandered on in the brightness
Of that glad Thanksgiving day.

The dinner at last was ready—
The haste and bustle was o'er,
And the mother, flushed with toiling,
Swung open the cottage door—

Calling: "Come, child, now I want thee!
I want thee, Ruth! Does thee hear?'
And her face grew white that moment,
With a sudden, dreadful fear.

Where was she, her little daughter?
The forest was deep and wide;
"Ruth! Ruth!" but only the echo
Of her trembling voice replied.

She turned back into the cottage—
"The child—she is lost!" she said;
And then, to arouse the neighbors,
Down the woodland trail she sped.

The dinner was left untasted
And the search went bravely on,
Till the pale stars shone in heaven
And the daylight all had gone.

"Hav you tidings of the lost one?"
'Twas a heartsick mother's cry
To one and another searcher;
"None yet," was the low reply.

"But there soon must be—be trustful!"
And all through the darksome night
The torches flamed and flickered
Under the stars' pale light.

At last in the east a glimmer
Told of a day begun;
And the scattered band of hunters
Heard—was it the signal gun?

Found, in a sheltered corner,
In a hollow snug and deep,
All rosy, unharmed, and peaceful,
The child lay fast asleep.

Found, but the joyous clamor
Of a sudden died in air,
For the golden head was nestling
On a great black, shaggy bear.

He growled at the waving torch-lights,
Ruth's blue eyes opened wide;
"I'm glad you've come to find me—
I knew you would!" she cried.

She glanced at the leveled muskets—
Half a dozen all around;
And forth, with a cry of terror,
She sprang at a single bound.

"Don't shoot the dog," she pleaded,
Her wee hands clasping tight;
"He has kept me warm and safely
All through this cold, dark night."

"So be it!" cried her father,
As he clasped her in his arm;
"Not a single hair of his shaggy coat
Through us shall come to harm!"

Then home went the glad procession,
Through the morning, growing fair,
To the cottage in the forest,
To the mother waiting there.

Now, Goldie and May and Teddy,
All gathered around my knee,
I hav told you the little story
Just as 'twas told to me

When I was a bright-eyed lassie—
And the tale is true as truth—
By the little Puritan maiden,
My own great-grandma, Ruth.

Vegetable Poetry.

Potatoes came from far Virginia;
Parsley was sent us from Sardinia;
French beans low-growing on the earth,
To distant India trace their birth.
But scarlet runners, gray and tall,
That climb upon your garden wall,
A cheerful sight to all around,
In South America were found.
The onion traveled here from Spain;
The leek from Switzerland we gain;
Garlic from Sicily obtain;
Spinach in Syria grows.
Two hundred years ago or more
Brazil the artichoke sent o'er,
And southern Europe's seacoast shore
Beet-root on us bestows.
When good Queen Bess was reigning here
Peas came from Holland and were dear.
The south of Europe lays its claim
To beans, but some from Egypt came.
The radishes, both thin and stout,
Natiys of China are, no doubt.
But turnips, carrots, and sea kale,
With celery, so crisp and pale,
Are products of our own fair land.
And cabbages, a goodly tribe,
Which abler pens might well describe,
Are also ours, I understand.

Thanksgiving Day.

Little Katy Moran sent a letter to the editor of the Corner, inquiring the meaning of Thanksgiving.

To begin, Thanksgiving is a certain kind of religious festival that comes around in this country once a year, on the last Thursday in the month of November. Under other names it has been known and commemorated many centuries in other countries. The pagans had their seasons of festivity, festiv days wherein laughter and good cheer prevailed. These occasions were recognized after the harvest time of the year, when the fruits and grains had been gathered, and the people were comfortably fixed for the winter; and also in the early spring-time, when the little rootlets began to stir in the ground and the buds to swell on tree and shrub.

It was a sweet and beautiful tribute to Mother Nature to observe these evidences of her care and bounty, although she would move on just the same whether she was noticed or not.

Religious people engrafted their solemn ideas upon the customs of the pagans, and made their festiv days religious holidays.

Three hundred years ago, in Holland, the authorities of Leyden appointed a "thanksgiving day" on account of the deliverance of that city from a long siege. It was a great day. The Puritans, who came to this country, and settled first in Plymouth, Mass., came from Holland, having been driven from England to that country. Of course they plowed and planted, and worked hard to make the new ground productiv.

After the first harvest, remembering the old Thanksgiving in Holland, and also recalling the mention of the feasts of the Hebrews as related in the Bible, they, too, made a Thanksgiving day. The young men went out in the forests, and along the shores of Massachusetts bay, hunting for wild fowl for the dinners on that day. Governor Bradford himself sent four men hunting for his special dinner. They had samples of the vegetables that had been grown, and a dessert of pumpkin and mince pies. No doubt they had as royal a dinner on that day as was possible to hav, and they rejoiced and had a good time generally. This was in 1621. Their efforts had been greatly blessed, and they thanked the Lord for it, little thinking that had they been idle they might hav starved to death for all the Lord would care.

Two years afterward there came a dry time along in July. Not a drop of rain fell on the parched earth for many a day. The crops were in danger of spoiling. Then the governor appointed a "fast day." The people met together and prayed for rain. While they were praying the rain began to fall, and the ignorant Pilgrims thought this a special answer to their prayer. So, the next Thanksgiving day appointed by the governor was observed, by his direction, with prayer and preaching. It grew into an annual custom. The governor of the NewEngland colonies, and of the states, after the colonies became states, issued a Thanksgiving proclamation annually, copies of which would be read from the pulpit, recommending the day as one of "thanksgiving, praise, and prayer."

The custom has been kept ever since. During the Revolutionary war Thanksgiving became a national holiday, but after peace was declared there were no more national thanksgivings until Washington appointed one to celebrate the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. These days were appointed by Congress occasionally to celebrate some notable event, as the close of the war of 1814-15.

During the last war in this country President Lincoln appointed a national thanksgiving day in 1863, and again in 1864. Every year since then such appointments hav been made by the different presidents of the United States, and the custom is now fully recognized as a national one.

There is no religious meaning to the day. There should be none. It is a holiday, a day when work ceases, when boys and girls, grown men and women, with their families go home to the paternal mansion, and meet once more around the dear old fireside made precious by many sweet and tender recollections. If too far from the old home, the day is celebrated in the new home. Turkeys suffer on that day, for the turkey is recognized as the special object of a Thanksgiving dinner. Rosy cheeks grow redder still, and bright eyes sparkle, as the big, bouncing bird, brown and handsome, is brought to the dinner table. Little children are full of glee, and happiness prevails. We all know what it is, and, ah, some know too well what pathos there is in the vacant chair, and sometimes more than one, on Thanksgiving day. On that day the unbidden tear will start, the lips will tremble, and the heart ache with a great pain throbbing through it, remembering other days when the smiling faces of dear ones bent close and near—dear ones whom we miss and mourn on this day and on every day.

Nothing that we can do can bring them back again as they were. But in their names we can bless some who hav no home, no dinner, or at best a scanty one, on this day of days, and from the grateful hearts of such may rise some rays that will bring light and joy to stricken hearts and lonely homes.

Thanksgiving day is one of the best holidays. Divested of the religion that has warped it, it is a sweet and gracious occasion, and in every home, where it is possible,

May health be borne on fav'ring gales,
And bounty crown the board.

Louisa May Alcott.

In the recent death of Louisa May Alcott our country has lost one of its best-known writers. The young folks will greatly miss her, for her writings are known to almost every child in America. Her "Little Women" is one of the best works ever written for children, and it will stand as a monument to her memory long after the monuments of marble and bronze erected to her memory hav crumbled in the dust. GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Man Overboard.

One day, wind fresh and abeam, the ship staggering along under topgallant sails, the cry was heard, "Man overboard." Those only who hav been at sea know what this means. It has been written up many times, but no writing can express just what the cry and the fact convey. You stand on deck and watch the ship cutting and sheering through the boisterous waves. You smoke your pipe of peace and thank your lucky stars that you are not on shore, exposed to dangers from horse-cars, policemen, fire engins, and the like, but safe on board a good ship with a strong breeze and a clear sea. But look, if you please, beyond the lee bulwarks, and picture, if you can, the small chance a man would hav if tossed into the churning mass of fierce waves. They seem to leap up and grasp out for a victim. They would seize you, if they could, and toss and buffet you about, twist every joint and limb until it ached, and dash their mad foam across your face until no more free air could fill the poor gasping lungs, no more free action could be had from the tired limbs, and the wave-fiends would dash over you and engulf you in their mad triumph. Every sailor knows all this, whenever he goes aloft, or pursues his calling in any part of the ship, and so he is careful and alert, and tries for safety all the time, but when the running ship, towering on the crest of a lofty wave, dashes suddenly onward and down, burying her head booms in the boiling sea, and tears them out again with a terrible strain, as was the case on this occasion, no living thing can hold on, and so our poor shipmate was dashed into the sea, was struck and passed over by the ship, and was never seen more by any living man. It occurred instantly and was over in a second. It was seen, and the cry raised, "Man overboard." Sailors must act promptly at all times. In less time than I can write about it life-buoys were thrown over, the ship hove to, and a boat was overboard manned by determined men, resolute to rescue a shipmate if possible. The effort was vain; the boat returned, was hoisted again with difficulty, and we proceeded on our course, one man less.

A Cannibal's House in New Guinea.

There are two large posts in front, eighty feet high, on which rests the large peaked shade, around which there hangs a graceful fringe of young sago leaf. The front is about thirty feet wide, and the whole length of the house is one hundred and sixty feet, tapering gradually down to the back, where it is small. Our compartment is about twenty feet high and ten feet broad. The front is a common platform floored with the outer skin of the sago palm, and kept beautifully clean. The whole is divided into courts, with divisions of cocoanut leaves, nine feet high, on which hang various figures not at all good-looking. From the top of the cocoanut leaves hang graceful curtains of the young frond of the sago palm. Standing on the platform in front and looking down the whole length along the passage or hall, with the various divisions and their curtains, it has a wonderful effect. In each of the courts are numerous skulls of men, women, and children, crocodiles and bears, also many breasts of the cassowary. All are carved and many painted. The human skulls are of those who hav been killed and eaten. The daintiest dish here is man, and it is considered that only fools refuse and despise it. In the last court there are the same kinds of ornaments, and then a screen with curiously formed things of wood and nativ cloth hanging on it; also, sibis (their only clothing), belts, small bags, and other things belonging to those murdered, which hav been presented to the gods.

I desire to thank those who hav contributed to the Casey dime fund for the purchase of another cow, but I am very sorry to see so few of the readers of the noble old TRUTH SEEKER hav responded to the call of charity. Hoping they will come in a little faster this month, I am,

Yours, for humanity and truth,
MISS SATIE THORPE.

[The editor of the Corner is sorry, too, that the dimes do not flow in faster. Five dollars cannot go far toward buying a good cow. Let all try to help a little, and by Christmas time we may hav the satisfaction of knowing that the Caseys are rejoicing in good, sweet milk and nice butter from their own cow. The Caseys are worthy and industrious, but now they are aged, and fortune has not been kind to them, and hence in their old age they find themselvs unblessed by this world's goods to any extent. All should try to help worthy Liberals.—ED. C. C.]

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

A CARD TO MY FRIENDS.

I desire to establish myself as Your Jeweler. I can do so if I can convince you that it is to your interest financially, not otherwise. I am aware that it is no object for you to patronize me unless I can do better by you—sell you as good or better goods—than your home jeweler, at lower prices. Can I do it? Yes. How? Permit me to explain: My establishment is phenomenal. No other store in the world, in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, has the standing, reputation, and does the amount of business, in my line, that mine does. No stock outside of few largest cities embraces the quantity of elegant Fine Gold Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver, Optical and Fancy Goods as mine. I buy the best—Watches from $5 to $300, Diamond Jewelry from $10 to $1,000, etc. Merchants who compete with me liv only in largest cities, but which of necessity, implies large expenditures and large profits. If you patronize them, this you must pay. If you buy a Watch or Diamond of them, they will and must charge you a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. If you will order of me, I will and can sell you the same quality of goods at 5 to 10 per cent profit. And if you buy of a small dealer in any other small town, he also must charge you 30 to 50 per cent. Why? Because his sales, aggregating at most $10,000 per annum, will not cover expenses at 10 per cent. To liv and come out ahead he is compelled to charge you an average of 30 per cent.

But my sales now approximate $50,000 per year. Therefore I can cut down profits—divide them with you—and yet realize a larger surplus at the end of the year than my competitors:

$50,000 merchandise sold at 10 per cent profit equals $5,000 gain; $10,000 merchandise sold at 30 per cent profit equals $3,000 gain; showing a profit of $2,000 on the goods sold at 10 per cent over and above those sold at 30 per cent. On Broadway, New York, or on State street, Chicago, Jewelers pay from $15,000 to $20,000 rent. I pay $320 and other expenses in proportion. Therefore, having been established in Rochelle thirty-one years, having always paid "a hundred cents on the dollar," being an infallible judge of every article I buy, and buying goods in large quantities, all jobbers, importers, and manufacturers are as anxious to sell me their wares at Bottom Price, as to any one in existence. And therefore, buying low and selling more goods than any other dealer in any city ten times the size of Rochelle, I can and will send you any thing you may need in my line (prepaid per mail or express, and cash back if not satisfactory) at 10 to 30 per cent lower than any other house. Order from any catalog and giv me a chance to establish myself as Your Jeweler.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. Poetry.

Jacksonville's Thanksgiving.

"Giv thanks unto God," yet no infinit power
Gave aid unto us in our suppliant hour;
No help to our need like a benison came,
Till strong hands reached forth in humanity's name.

"Giv thanks unto God," yet no infinit pity
Gave heed to the prayers of our fever-scourged city.
These lips of petition no praises can frame,
Save those rendered now to humanity's name.

"Giv thanks unto God," "omniscient ever,"
Yet life's noblest workers met death by the fever;
Yet this terrible blight shall history blame,
As we blame it now, in humanity's name.

"Giv thanks unto God" for our fruitless beseeching,
For prayers reaching upward yet God never reaching,
While suns and while stars kept their courses the same,
We waited, then asked in humanity's name.

The cry of our need like a bugle went thrilling,
And volunteers, volunteers, loyal and willing,
Strong-armored with courage, unshrinking they came
To battle with death in humanity's name.

To the hands of our poor stretched northward imploring
The gifts of the generous-hearted came pouring—
The heart of the nation, with pity aflame,
Gave forth of its wealth in humanity's name.

Nay! Heaven is deaf to all praises or pleading,
And nature's great destiny moves on unheeding.
Brave hearts and true service from Jacksonville claim
Thanksgiving to-day in humanity's name.

For death glorified by brave human endeavor,
For life's noble service thanksgiving forever;
Ye martyrs and heroes of Jacksonville's fame
Thanksgiving to-day in humanity's name.

MARY A. WORSWICK.

Dark Lines in that Volume Called the Sun.

First Wallaston beheld the sun's dark lines,
Fraunhoffer mapped them, giving each a name;
Kirchhoff explained their meanings to our minds,
And thus the three are handed down to fame.

Eight lines Fraunhoffer found surpassing clear,
He gave them the eight alphabetic signs,
And some of them as double lines appear
And all are only few of many lines.

Lines A and B and C in red are seen,
D orange; E in yellow, F in green,
And F and G inclose the azure blue,
And H, the last, is in the violet hue.

The solar spectrum, crowded with dark lines,
Proves metals in their vapor forms appear
In sun's hot envelope, 'neath whose veil shines
The hotter mass rapt in this photosphere.

We know not if the deeper mass be gas,
For heated gases through cool strata throw
The dark-lined spectrum like a liquid mass,
Within a vapor that impedes its glow.

Many dark lines unto the iron belong,
They crowd the spectrum from its F to C;
Angstrom observed them half a thousand strong—
There gathered round the F, the B, the E.

But plainest of the dark lines is the D;
It tells of sodium within the sun—
'Tis double viewed by high intensity,
And 'twixt the two is seen a finer one.

Lines of magnesium, aluminum,
Of iron, copper, zinc, and calcium,
Of nickel, manganese, litanium;
Of cobalt, hydrogen, and chromium

Are found as perfect in the solar light
As we behold them in comparing beam:
Ere from the solar limb the lines are bright,
As with an eclipsed background they may gleam.

'Twas Young of Hanover and Langley saw
The reversed spectrum of the eclipsed sun,
To further prove the universal law
That all sidereal elements are one.

Upon the sun with Vulcan craters pouring
Their heated hydrogenic flames on high,
We find the swiftness of these currents soaring
In that far-distant cromospheric sky.

A blast is rouring out, 'tis coming nearer,
Our F is dipping deeper in the blue:
Behold the dark line waver! What is clearer
To prove the sympathy between the two?

Why does our F line vary from its station?
Do waves come swifter? yea, this must be true.
The coming torrents press in close relation,
The hydrogenic green upon its blue.

As when a whistling train is rolling nearer,
Her note is pitching to a higher key,
With quicker beats that to the ear are clearer,
Thus moves the F line that the eye can see.

Her waves are shorter, swifter she is nearing
The flame of hydrogen like to the train;
Her notes to higher amplitudes are veering,
Her tune becomes a shriller, pitched refrain.

We move the slit that lets the light ray enter,
Our teleospectroscope obeys our will;
Her tube is pointing toward the sun disc's center,
Behold, behold, the hydrogen seems still.

Our F line, steady now, shifts not its station,
Swings not from normal now to left or right;
The cloud has reached its highest elevation,
And from its summit now casts steady light.

We move the slit again, the F is veering
Deeper in green away from violet's end.
Now the great clouds are falling, skies are clearing,
As toward the nucleus the storms descend.

As when a whistling train from us departing,
By lengthening sound-waves drops the baser strain;
Thus to the light recession is imparting
A less refrangence, like a deep refrain.

We move our tube and gaze on cyclones whirling
Their grand Sierric tongues of flame on high;
At the sun's limb we see these whirlpools curling
Their wreathing domes upon the solar sky.

The dawning edge that fascinates our gazing
May light our F line till an azure green
Betrays an eclipsed towering gas flame blazing,
While the continuous spectrum is unseen.

But look! the F line shows her pitch ascending,
Nearer the violet clouds are drawing near;
High in the solar skies their courses tending,
In currents wending through the cromosphere.

The line betrays them not in their descending,
But as they backward turn from overhead,
The mass retreating longer waves is sending,
And F is veering backward toward the red.

E'en to the stars in their great orbits wending,
We find a variance in the lines they throw—
Detect from this the courses of their tending,
How swiftly toward us or away they go.

Vast is the field of study oped before us,
Vast as the broad infinity of space;
Wide as the circled concave arching o'er us,
More than can e'en be dreamed of by our race.

The million lights we see through ether speaking
Tell of the countless orbs from which they shine;
Their language index can be found by seeking,
An endless volume written in each sign.

These facts inspire us unto cultivation,
Till the ears catch a wider sweep of sound—
Till the mind reaches higher contemplation,
And the eyes view a broader space around.

Christ's Riches.

SEE MATTHEW XVIII, 27.

Ah, good Lord Christ, thou knowest we are poor.
Why should our suffering so long endure
When thou canst make the fishes yield up coin?
For did'st not thou St. Peter once enjoin
To render unto God things that are God's,
And so to Cæsar, asking nary odds:
Instructing him to hook a fish and find
Within his mouth a silver piece just coined?
Here is a chance, dear, blessed Lord, for thou
Thy ancient power to exercise just now—
A goodly chance, dear Jesus, where I stand,
Here by the creek that skirts my piece of land,
Drawing out bullheads, minnows, and black bass.
But no such miracle will come to pass.
To poor folk never come such goodly gifts;
Only to Gods and Cæsars come such lifts;
It matters not how sore the need may be—
At least I know such never came to me.
See what a mouth this bullhead has for pence,
Or that black bass now floundering by the fence!
And yet I'd search in vain for gold or dime
In either mouth for any length of time
For aught that looks like cash—not any cent
Would from the treasury of heaven be lent
To help me in the pressure of each need,
By want inspired—warm clothes and grub for feed.
What matters it to Jesus, then, my wants—
How thin my coat is or how worn my pants,
How low my wood-pile, or that this is fall,
The harbinger of winter, at whose call
Zero will leap along in whirling hosts
Of searching snows and penetrating frosts?
All Christ now offers in his up-stairs place
Is but a hashed-up dish of mythic grace;
A panacea only seen when death
Steps in to stop the struggling pilgrim's breath.
When, 'stead of placing him where saints abound,
Custom will plant him six feet under ground,
Where squirming lie, in never-ending swarms,
Man's latest mates, earth's multiplying worms.
No mausoleum, chancel, crypt, or grave,
From earthly worms can man's bacon save.
Naught but cremation's dessicating blast,
When to the flames the lifeless form is cast.
And so we grin and bear as best we may
Life's weary burden, groping down the way,
Certain of rest as we approach the end,
When death steps in, as master and as friend.

Le Roy, N. Y. 74.

When You See.

If you should chance to see
A parson, clever as clever can be,
Who tickles his flock with jest and riddle,
And worships God with flute and fiddle,
The latest clerical fad is he.

And should you chance to see
The man whose fine philanthropy
Assumes that every man's a brother,
That he's a saint and you're another,
The devil a saint at all is he.

But further; should you see
A priest grow plump on penury,
Gad zooks! don't take it for a miracle,
Or deem his diet is atmospherical—
An anti poverty priest is he.

Or if you chance to see
The man that vows that you and he
Hav equal title to all the earth
By nature's warrant, the right of birth,
Why, so hav the wolf and chimpanzee.

In short, where'er you see
The real, original patentee
Of a new crusade, look out for gammon.
His creed is self, his God is mammon,
And all his preaching is tweedle-dee.

The Retort Courteous.

Much less of a fool than you are you'll be.

A Christian Opinion.

From the Christian Register.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism. A Contribution to the Religion of the Future. By Felix L. Oswald. New York: The Truth Seeker Co.—Under the heads of "Physical Maxims," "Mental Maxims," "Moral Maxims," and "Objectiv Maxims," Professor Oswald has much to say that is extremely sound and good. The arrangement under each head is nearly uniform. We hav, first, "The Lessons of Instinct;" then, "Rewards of Conformity" to these lessons; then, "Perversion;" next, "Penalties of Neglect;" last, "Redemption," under which head we hav advice as to what should be done for the enforcement of the laws of nature. The spirit of the book is much at variance with the doctrin of nature in John Stuart Mill's "Three Essays on Religion," and with some recent theories of Frances Power Cobbe and Dr. Hedge. But Professor Oswald does not confine himself to infra-human nature as the model of virtue. He finds it also in the uncivilized and especially in the unchristianized man. One is inclined to ask him, seeing that once there was nothing but nature, and nature is so thoroughly sound and good: Whence came the various badness of the world? Whence the Bible, if Emerson was grossly mistaken when he sang:

Out from the heart of nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old?

But Professor Oswald is nothing if not Anti-christian. He never speaks of the Bible or Jesus or Christianity without contempt. Jesus is the "apostle of anti-naturalism," the "alcohol-brewing Galilean," and so on. The faintest suggestion of Christianity has an effect upon him like that of the traditional red rag upon a bull, and he begins to ramp and roar rhetorically in the most fearful manner. In short, Professor Oswald is a Radical bigot of the most intense variety. One would hav to search far and wide for a Christian book written in our time in a temper so bad and violent as his.

Church Etiquet.

From the Evening Sun.

It is not proper to smoke Connecticut-made cigars in the vestibule of a church of any denomination.

No gentleman will interrupt a clergyman in the midst of his discourse to ask for the text.

While sleep is a perfectly proper exercise during sermon time, hard snoring is to be avoided. It makes the small boy laugh, and the mirth of children is obviously out of place during the service.

A Christian gentleman will not assault the choir-master until after the benediction.

The morning paper should be left at home, and never, under any circumstances, be taken to church to be read while the collection is being taken up.

Loud laughter at secret thoughts is not decorous.

It is not proper to trip up a vestryman who is taking up the collection, however great one's provocation.

Do not glare at the stranger in your pew who has made the mistake of reading from your favorit hymn-book.

Conceal your contempt for the person who puts a meager dime in the collection-plate.

Should the church be insufficiently heated, put your handkerchief in your mouth. The chattering teeth of a congregation is apt to razzle-dazzle the rector.

Do not dissent from your clergyman's views of things by snorting or indulging in a stentorian "Bosh."

If your change drops out of your overcoat pocket, down through the register into the furnace, make an effort to keep your mouth closed. Your remarks would no doubt prove interesting, but they might be sadly indecorous.

Do not draw funny pictures on the fly-leaves of your neighbor's prayer-book.

Never attend church in Boston without a pair of spectacles.

None of the McAllister four hundred insist on standing during prayer time or on kneeling while singing hymns.

Fall in with the rules of the church you attend, and if the minister does not see fit to read the Commandments, do not demand a rebate on your pew-rent.

Don't walk up the center aisle on your heel just because your shoes squeak. Let them squeak.

Leave business behind you. Don't insist upon closing up a wheat deal with a business acquaintance who has the pew behind you then and there. If a subscription card is left in your pew don't write a promis to pay $15 a month for twenty years on it over your enemy's name.

Do not seek to be revenged upon a fellow-worshiper by kicking his beaver in front of you all the way up the aisle, and to keep fellow-members out of temptation do not place your own silk hat in the aisle where it may be kicked.

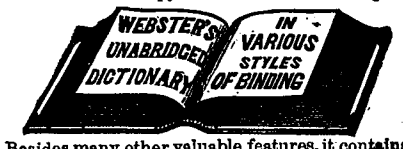
Avoid practical jokes. If your pew happens to be near the gas-nut, do not turn off the gas, no matter how facetious you may be.

Worshipers in the gallery should taboo dropping beads or marbles on the heads of old gentlemen without hair.

In singing, do not blow on the head of the person who sits in front of you. It may expose him to pneumonia.

It is not proper to put pool-checks, buttons, or poker-chips in the plate.

Do not leave your umbrella in the vestibule on rainy Sundays. It is not well that any person, however upright and pious he may be, should be subjected to undue temptation.



Be composed if you hear a fire-engin going by the church door. Walk out quietly and without excitement. Under no circumstances rush down the aisle yelling fire.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.
By WILLIAM McDONNELL,
Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE Salvation Army War Cry is published in sixteen languages, and twenty-four cities throughout the world.

JOHN BRIGHT is critically ill.

LONDON has 100,000 paupers.

ST. PAUL, Minn., has erected nineteen Catholic churches.

GEN. JOE WHEELER has been converted to Catholicism.

THE $1,000,000 needed for the Catholic University has been pledged.

IT is proposed that the presidential term be made six years, reëlection being forbidden.

THE anniversary of the hanging of the Chicago Anarchists was observed in the principal cities of the world.

MAYOR-ELECT GRANT, of New York, has given $1,000 toward the erection of a Catholic seminary in that city.

THE Italian government is having a hard time suppressing the priests who are determined on its overthrow.

THE Copley medal of the Royal Society, the most coveted distinction that society can bestow, has been awarded Professor Huxley.

FAILURE of crops, mortgages, and commencing blizzards are making Kansans miserable.

CATHOLICISM is growing in Scotland. By magnificent gifts from the marquis of Bute and others, new churches are rising in all parts of that land.

ON the "Is Marriage a Failure?" question, it is reported from St. Louis that half the divorces in that city hav their source in poverty and its attendant evils.

SAM SMALL denies that Harrison was elected, as some allege, because religious, but says: "We look for the time when a man will be elected because he is a Christian."

THERE is a continual movement westward of nativ New Englanders, and of Irish into their places in Massachusetts and French Canadians into their places in upper districts.

DR. LEWIS ascertained that of 2,000 fallen women of New York and Brooklyn, of those who before entering their present life were trying to liv by work, 230 got $3 a week; 336, $2, and 534, $1.

NEW YORK politicians are so busy intriguing for office and spoils that they forget to care for and enlarge our common schools, and many thousands of children seeking admittance are excluded for lack of room.

IN Lower Austria the 15th was observed as a close holiday, it being St. Leopold's Day. St. Leopold is the patron saint of that region; he was a count who was canonized for the building of many monasteries and convents.

PARLIAMENT in 1886 established a fund of $25,000,000 to lend to Irish tenants to enable them to buy of landlords, and now will devote to that purpose another like sum. Gladstone opposes this bill as it stands without any amendments providing immediate help for those now in arrears.

A SUIT brought by Roman Catholic taxpayers to prevent the reading of the King James version of the Bible in the public schools was decided at Janesville, Wis., on the 19th. Judge Bennett held that such reading was not sectarian instruction, the children of the petitioners not being obliged to listen if they did not desire, and the Bible having been decided upon by the authorities as one of the text-books for Wisconsin schools. There was nothing, however, to prevent the children from reading a version of the Bible accepted by the Roman Catholic church if they preferred.

THE ANGEL JAWETH BALAAM.

And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times? behold, I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me.—Num. xxii, 32.

Gems of Thought.

THE Christian dogma of the reformatory value of misery has been refuted by the most dreadful arguments in the world's history. The unhappiest nations are not only the most immoral, but the most selfish and the meanest, in every ugly sense of the word. Virtues do not flourish on a trampled soil. Genius, too, is a child of light. The Grecian worship of joy favored the development of every human science, while the monastic worship of sorrow produced nothing but monsters and chimeras.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in Physical Education.

THE stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes.—Swift.

To the mind of a devout Christian the world is the most hateful thing in the world. He withdraws himself from it, and shuns it, and concentrates all his hopes and aspirations on the world to come, and endows with all his worldly goods the priests.—Voltaire.

I LOVE joy-makers, and not those solemn, mournful wretches. Everything that buds and blossoms and breathes the breath of joy is moral. Nothing can be more immoral than to want your own life sour as well as that of others.—Ingersoll.

A DOCTRIN more convenient for the purposes of tyrants and malefactors of every description than the non-resistance teaching of Christ it would be difficult to invent.—Amberley.

THE Church of England magnified in fulsome phrase the kingly prerogativ, which was constantly employed to defend and aggrandize her, and reprobated, much at her ease, the depravity of those whom oppression, from which she was exempt, had goaded to rebellion. Her favorit theme was the doctrin of non-resistance. That doctrin she taught without any qualification, and followed out to all its extreme consequences. Her disciples were never weary of repeating that in no conceivable case, not even if England were cursed with a king resembling Busirus or Phalaris, who, in defiance of law, and without the pretense of justice, should daily doom hundreds of innocent victims to torture and death, would all the estates of the realm be justified in withstanding his tyranny by physical force. Happily the principles of human nature afford abundant security that such theories will never be more than theories.—Macaulay's History of England.

MACAULAY is Liberal in the largest and best sense of the word. He demands that all citizens should be equal before the law, that men of all sects should be declared capable to fill all public functions—that Roman Catholics and Jews may, as well as Lutherans, Anglicans, and Calvinists, sit in Parliament. He refutes Mr. Gladstone and the partisans of state religion with incomparable ardor and eloquence, abundance of proof, and force of argument; he clearly proves that the state is only a secular association, that its end is wholly temporal, that its single object is to protect the life, liberty, and property of the citizens; that in intrusting to it the defense of spiritual interests, we overturn the order of things; and that to attribute to it a religious belief, is as though a man, walking with his feet, should also confide to his feet the care of seeing and hearing.—Taine.

"IGNORANCE is the curse of God," says Milton, and undoubtedly God's book has, at this hour, more to do with the promotion and retention of ignorance than all other influences put together. There is no savage in any isle of the ocean who believes more monstrously and on weaker evidence than does the ordinary rank-and-file Christian of the English church and chapel. Fables and absurdities that, if vouched for at this day by the dearest, most judicious, and most veracious of his friends, he would reject with derision he will not only accept, but consider sacred, if they are said to hav belonged to a period eighteen hundred years ago, to an out-of-the-way part of the globe he never saw, and are vouched for by he knows not whom.—Saladin's God and His Book.

ON the plea of a corruption, therefore, of which the individual has not been himself the cause, of which neither is it given him to free himself of his own power, he is to be condemned, he and the entire progeny of a childish and inexperienced pair—not excepting even the innocent little ones who die unbaptized—to the everlasting torments of hell! It is astonishing how a conception equally revolting to man's reason and sense of justice, a conception which transforms God from an object of adoration and affection into a hideous and detestable being, could at any time, however barbarous, hav been found acceptable, or how the casuistries by which people strove to modify its harshness could ever even hav been listened to with common patience.—Strauss.

VOLUMES might be written upon the infinit absurdity of this [the doctrin of the fall and the atonement] most incredible, wicked, and foolish of all the fables contained in that repository of the impossible, called the Bible. To me it is a matter of amazement, that it ever was for a moment believed by any intelligent human being.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

THANKSGIVING day, Freddy, is celebrated at the end of November, because it is thought that those who hav safely pulled through the wear and tear of a political campaign may be in a truly grateful mood.

MRS. JASON: "Jehiel, was there ever any such person as the fool-killer?" Mr. Jason: "What idiotic questions you do ask! How the dickens do I know? I never met him." Mrs. Jason: "Oh, I know that."

"I DON'T say marriage is a failure," said Adam candidly, as he sat down on a log just outside the garden of Eden and looked hungrily at the fruit on the other side of the wall, "but if I had remained single this wouldn't hav happened."

MRS. NAGGLETON: "I see that some wretch has been writing a book called "How to Be Happy, Though Married.'" Mr. Naggleton: "I could hav told that in three words." Mrs. Naggleton: "What are they?" Mr. Naggleton: "Get a divorce."

"MAY I call on you occasionally, Miss De Lancey?" said Bjones after the dance. "We seem already as old friends. Hav I not seen you before?" "Yes," was the cutting reply, "you saw me hanging on to the car-strap one day last week while you were sitting down."

IT was a quiet Sunday afternoon, and she was reading to him the Proverbs of Solomon. He was rapidly getting an attack of temporary oblivion. "Aren't they wonderful, George?" she said. "Yes, indeed," he replied. "If he had only misspelled his words, what a Josh Billings he would hav made!"

MR. BLENKINSOAK (to the new pastor after service): "My dear sir, now that you are settled, I want you to make our house your home. Run in any time, and don't bother to giv us any notice." (The next evening, just as the pastor comes in): "I'll hav that —— wing off that —— turkey if I hav to chase it to—Newark!"

ROSALIE: "Geoffrey, why are you always calling me your flower? Can't you think of any other pet name?" Geoffrey: "I can, my love; but since the recent rise in wheat flour has seemed the most appropriate." Rosalie (coldly): "Indeed! I don't understand you." Geoffrey: "I mean that you are getting dearer and dearer every day."

MR. WALDO: "Can you explain to me, Miss Breezy, what is meant by laissez-faire, which we see so often in discussions on political economy?" Miss Breezy: "Oh, I'm so glad you asked me that, Mr. Waldo, for I asked my French professor, and he explained it very clearly. It means something like this, if I remember rightly—it's the same as laissez-faire, Monsieur Gallaghere—let her go, Monseer Gallaghere."

PROHIBITIONIST: "Ah, Jack, I am glad to hear that you hav concluded to quit the saloon business." Jack: "Yes, I hav quit it. It isn't popular and I'm tired of it. Besides, I hav got a better thing." Prohibitionist: "That's all right, Jack; that's all right. I knew you were too good a fellow to engage in such business. By the way, what are you going to do?" Jack: "I am going to run a drug store in a Prohibition town."

WOMAN (to tramp): "Hav you traveled far; you look tired?" "All the way from the Catskill mountains, ma'am." Woman: "It must be pleasant up there in warm weather." Tramp: "I found it very pleasant, ma'am. You see, there are a great many women in the mountains during the summer, but except on Sundays men are scarce."

WOMAN is the equal of man, but while cheerfully recognizing this fact, we cannot help wondering why it is that, when a woman has shouted for half an hour to her boy to come into the house and found herself powerless to make any impression upon him, she usually winds up with, "If you don't come here this minute, young man, I'll send your father to you."

SON-IN-LAW SILVERSTINE: "Mister Schaumburg, I vants you to dake back your daughter Repecca." Fatber-in-law Schaumburg: "I takes not dot Repecca pack. Ven a man comes to my house, picks out himself a piece of goods, and dot goods vas received by him in goot order, I would pe a fool to dake pack dot goods. No, sir, you shoost keep dot Repecca."

A ST. LOUIS dry goods house advertised for a "smart boy," and they got him. They put him behind the counter. The following conversation passed between him and his first customer: Customer (picking up a pair of gloves): "What are these?" Smart boy: "Gloves." Customer: "Yes, yes; but what do you ask for them?" Smart boy: "We don't ask for them at all; customers do that." Customer: "You don't understand me. How do they come?" Smart boy: "Why, they come in pairs, of course." Customer: "No, no! How high do they come?" Smart boy: "Just above the wrist, I believe." Customer: "But what do you get for them?" Smart boy: "Me? I don't get nothing for them. Boss pockets all the money." Customer (losing patience): "What is the price of these gloves per pair?" Smart boy: "Oh, that's your lay, is it? Why didn't you say so afore? $1."

ONCE upon a time a Public Necessity decided to present himself to his friends in New York. "I've been neglected a good deal of late," he said, "but I'm only a little fellow, and won't be much trouble to anybody." When he arrived in the city he was greeted by a gorgeously appareled gentleman, who said: "I am the Boss, and hav been sent to look out for you. Come, let me introduce you to Politics, and everything will get on swimmingly." So everything did for a while, and Public Necessity was astounded at the attention and the money showered on him; but, unluckily, one day the Boss and Politics fell out. Then there was a dreadful time; and between scathing editorials, searching investigations, and interminable trials, poor Public Necessity thought his last hour had come. But he managed to pull through all right, and, as he stepped into a cafe to cool his fevered blood with a lemonade, he observed his reflection in a mirror on the wall. "Bless my soul!" he exclaimed, "I've grown into a Big Fat Job!"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 15. No. 48. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, December 1, 1888 { 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

WHICH SHALL WE HAV?

Notes and Clippings.

THERE will be a biblical flavor to the new administration. Benjamin and Levi are winners and Daniel will giv way to Elijah as presidential private secretary. That office will hereafter be considered a place of prophet.

A MAINE genius has discovered that spruce sawdust is an excellent substitute for sand in making common mortar for plastering houses. He has used it in making a house in Greenville, and other masons in the state are experimenting with it.

IT is stated that the French bishops hav received a communication from the Congregation of the Holy Office strongly disapproving of cremation, and ordering the clergy not to abandon the customary Christian burial. Among Bishop Dupanloup's papers an essay on cremation was found, in which the bishop endeavored to prove that without the interment of bodies for successiv generations the earth would lose all fertility and power of reproduction.

A DISPATCH from Zanzibar says that the British consular authorities hav issued a proclamation in regard to the slave trade, in which they warn British subjects of the penalties which they will incur in making illegal contracts. The slave-owners hav united in a monster petition against the enforcement of the law against the slave traffic, which, they assert, has been in practical abeyance for many years. It is reported that the entire plan of blockade has been changed, in order to include the whole coast. It is probable that African slavery will soon be a thing of the past.

GOVERNOR SWINEFORD of Alaska reports to the secretary of the interior that the territory is getting along nicely, and has 49,850 inhabitants, of whom 6,500 are whites, 1,900 creoles, and 2,950 Aleuts. He urges that Congress make it possible for present squatters to acquire title to their land, and says if this be done the territory will develop more quickly and satisfactorily. He describes the mineral resources of the territory, and says it has fourteen public, eight Protestant, two Catholic, and seventeen Græco-Roman schools. The Alaska Commercial Company, he says, treats the people as little more than serfs where its rule is supreme.

THE news from Alabama and east Tennessee shows that Mormon proselytizing in that section is going on vigorously. In the two states, according to an elder, there are forty flourishing mission stations which are producing converts at the rate of ten thousand a year. A dispatch from Chattanooga says that in that immediate vicinity over fifteen hundred people hav become Mormons within ten months, and that from two hundred to five hundred are shipped West every sixty days. The European importations continue, and, take it altogether, it is doubtful if there has been a more determined system of proselytization pursued since the days of Mohammed. The Mormons are also colonizing Arizona, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming, and considering the fact that the whole vote of this growing body throughout such a large section of the country can be thrown as the few rulers of the church direct, the World is troubled and wants to know what is to be done about it. But why should anything be done? What business has the government to interfere with missionaries of any religion? In the same region the Methodist church has gobbled up ten millions of dollars' worth of property, all held without paying a cent taxes, but we hear no inquiry as to what shall be done with that church. Let the religion alone, but make its supporters pay their own bills, and if they break the laws punish them.

THE New Orleans States is jubilant over the discomfiture of the Puritans of that city. It says: "The district attorney and the board of health hav struck the Sunday law on the flank, and the result is a panic in the ranks of that piece of old puritanical humbuggery which may be turned into a rout all along the line of the army of worthies who seek to govern the consciences of other people. The board of health has expressed the opinion that fruit is almost a necessity to the people of this community, and hence should be placed within the reach of every citizen on all occasions, Sunday included; whereupon the district attorney repeals the Sunday law so far as the fruit-dealers are concerned. The States takes no exception to the decision of the board of health nor to the action of Judge Luzenberg. We like to see the Sunday law knocked crazy upon any and all occasions; we think everybody should break it who can. It is a wretched puritanical importation."

THE "amateur societies for the regulation of public morals," as the Sun calls Mr. Gerry's and similar associations, were shrewd as well as despotic law drafters when they had the statute passed giving police justices power to commit children to Catholic and Protestant institutions. Even a habeas corpus is unable to climb over the walls of these places when resisted by the police justice's commitment. Antonio Meastreago was sent to the Catholic Protectory some weeks ago upon the commitment of Police Justice Patterson, having been arrested by an agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children upon a charge of begging in the street. That is, he collected pennies while his father played the hand-organ. Frank Oliver, counsel for the boy's father, asked Judge Lawrence last week to discharge the boy because he had been placed in the Protectory with the understanding that he was to be released as soon as his father's trial was over. President Gerry, for the society, contended that as the commitment of the police justice was regular the writ of habeas corpus should be dismissed. Judge Lawrence said he would hav to dismiss the writ, and he did so reluctantly, because he had no power to do otherwise. He took occasion to remark, however, that the present state of the law with regard to the commitment of children was a great injustice to the people. He thought the legislature should be appealed to at once to hav this law modified. As it is now, if a child is brought before a police magistrate and regularly committed, no matter what the nature of the evidence may be, neither the supreme court nor the court of appeals has any power to review the commitment. He thought that such unlimited power in the hands of police magistrates was an unjust discrimination in favor of these societies. While it might be proper to commit some children, yet he knew of cases which had come before him when he was confident the children should hav been released, but he was powerless to act.

Bible Poetry and Evolution.

As long as human beings hav been able to express their deepest feelings in articulate and rhythmical language there hav been poets in the world. But poetry, like all other fine arts, is a development. At first it is simplicity itself, but with the varied experience of mankind it grows and changes, until as a complex and complete whole it captivates the head and enthralls the heart of humanity. The painter appeals to our sense of beauty in color, the sculptor to our idea of the beautiful in form; the musician to the same sense in sound, while the poet uses all the arts of the reason in appeal to our sense of the beautiful in meaning and form in language.

Now, the aim of all art is to giv pleasure, not necessarily to impart truth; and it is perfectly clear to the most ordinary understanding that the poet can do no more than express his own physical and mental states, and therefore such truths as may be found in poems can only be the mirrored image of natural phenomena as they appear to the mind of the writer. Works of art, however, hav this advantage over many things which afford us temporary pleasure—such as money, rank, health, sensual enjoyments, etc., for they remain behind to be enjoyed by thousands who know nothing of their authors, but who may understand and appreciate their gifts long after they are dust.

It would be manifestly absurd for any man to affirm that the Bible contains no poetry, because every reader must know that poetic expressions are scattered throughout the pages of this so-called sacred book. Every diligent student would go as far as admitting that some excellent poetry may be found in such books as Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Proverbs, or even Jeremiah.

The contention of the evolutionist, however, is this—that whatever poetry is found in the Bible is perfectly human and often of a very faulty character, both in expression and sentiment, even after it has been improved by successiv generations of revisers. For what man with a grain of sense can believe that the translations which we now hav of the Old Testament represent exactly the ideas of the ancient writers?

Even the plays of Shakspere hav undergone frequent revision to bring certain expressions contained in them more in unison with modern ideas.

Shakspere made his characters speak prevailing opinions. It would hav been folly for him to hav done otherwise, although it is quite certain that the poet himself dissented from many of the views to which his characters gave expression.

The same, however, cannot be said of the Bible poets. All the sentiments, whether good or bad, which they committed to writing must be regarded as their own. Nor must it be supposed for a moment that they wrote under the same conditions as other writers. For were they not divinely inspired?

If they had their somber moods, were they not designed by deity for the express purpose of bringing out the deeper feelings of the human soul yearning for improvement? And even in his strongest denunciations of human weakness or perversity should the inspired poet breathe the spirit of revenge? It is well enough for David to exclaim: "Oh, giv thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever. . . . Who giveth food to all flesh, for his mercy endureth forever" (Ps. cxxxvi, 1, 25). But as the poet continues, we see that his idea of mercy is a very peculiar one: "O clap your hands, all ye people; shout unto God with the voice of triumph. For the Lord most high is terrible; he is a great king over all the earth; he shall subdue the people under us and the nations under our feet" (Ps. xlvii). Or we may take exception to his wisdom or his good taste when he says: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they and hav done abominable iniquity; there is none that doeth good" (Ps. i, 3).

We may question his modesty when he proclaims: "Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Surely I hav behaved and quieted myself as a child that is weaned of his mother; my soul is even as a weaned child. Let Israel hope in the Lord from henceforth and forever" (Ps. cxxxi).

But the poet shows a bigoted and cruel spirit when describing persons whom he calls Jahveh's enemies. He says: "Set thou a wicked man over him, and let Satan stand at the right hand. When he shall be judged let him be condemned and let his prayer become sin. Let his days be few, and let another take his office; let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds and beg, let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the strangers spoil his labor. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any favor to his fatherless children. Let his posterity be cut off and in the generation following let his name be blotted out. Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord, and let not the sin of the mother be blotted out" (Ps. cix, 6–14).

These are the expressions of an inspired poet! But what a different sentiment is breathed by Shelley, the Atheist poet, in all his writings! How different these revengeful lines from the mercy speech of Portia in the "Merchant of Venice:"

> The quality of mercy is not strained;
> It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed:
> It blesseth him that givs, and him that takes:
> 'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
> The throned monarch better than his crown:
> His scepter shows the force of temporal power,
> The attribute to awe and majesty,
> Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings;
> But mercy is above this sceptered sway,
> It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,
> It is an attribute to God himself;
> And earthly power doth then show likest God's,
> When mercy seasons justice.

From the inspired Bible poet to the uninspired playwright, what an evolution!

We learn truth by contrast, and we are enabled to judge how far man has traveled along the line toward civilization by reference to his thoughts—whether expressed in poesy or prose. A low idea of human nature, an intolerant spirit toward those from whom we differ, dogmatism on things doubtful, are signs of the small and uncultivated mind. Dryden says:

> A tyrant's power in rigor is exprest.

And the imperious character of the Bible poet is shown in the cruelty and vindictivness of his appeals to deity to revenge himself by torturing his enemies.

If the poetry of the Bible were really God-inspired, we should expect not only to find it perfect in style, in expression, soaring to the loftiest hights and sounding the lowest depths of philosophy, giving us indeed the noblest truths in the loveliest dress; it would be incomparably superior to the poems of profane writers. Such, however, we do not find to be the case. Of human nature the Bible poets understood very little, and that only in its worst aspects; of natural phenomena they knew even less.

Consequently they sang not the divine song of human liberty, nor did they extol the labors of the reformer, the struggles of a people vainly striving to be free. But they sang the song of war, of strife, of passion, of hatred, of malice, and of murder. They sang of victories which their God had given them over their enemies, and composed hymns of praise in honor of a God whom Shelley describes as—

> A vengeful, pitiless, and almighty fiend,
> Whose mercy is the nickname for the rage
> Of tameless tigers hungering for blood.

Take a few examples of the crude ideas of deity which permeate the poetical parts of the so-called sacred volume: "The burden of Egypt. Behold, the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud and shall come into Egypt; and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it. And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians, and they shall fight every one against his brother and every one against his neighbor, city against city and kingdom against kingdom" (Isa. xix, 1, 2).

We hav here the idea set before us of a God who, being dissatisfied with the conduct of some Egyptians, resolves to "set every man against his brother and every one against his neighbor" as the only satisfactory settlement of the difficulty.

The unbeliever, of course, is to hav a very unhappy time of it. Observe: "Now, go, write it before them in a table and note it in a book, that it may be for the time to come forever and ever: That this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord; which say to the seers, see not, and to the prophets, prophesy not unto us right things; speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits. Get you out of the way, turn out of the path, cause the holy one of Israel to cease from before us. Wherefore, thus saith the holy one of Israel: Because ye despise this word and trust in oppression and perverseness and stay therein, therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant. And he shall break it as the breaking of the potter's vessel that is broken in pieces; he shall not spare, so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit" (Isa. xxx, 8–14).

And the following is a poetic description of the manner in which God revengeth himself against the enemies of the church: "Come near, ye nations, to hear; and hearken, ye people; let the earth hear, and all that is therein; the world, and all things that come forth of it. For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies; he hath utterly destroyed them, he hath delivered them to the slaughter. Their slain also shall be cast out, and their stink shall come up out of their carcasses, and the mountains shall be melted with their blood" (Isa. xxxiv, 1–3).

"And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness. For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion. And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up forever; from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever" (Isa. xxxiv, 7–10).

JAHVEH SUPERIOR TO A WOODEN GOD.

"Assemble yourselvs and come draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations; they hav no knowledge that set up the wood of their graven image, and pray unto a god that cannot save. Tell ye, and bring them near; yea, let them take counsel together; who hath declared this from ancient time? who hath told it from that time? hav not I, the Lord? And there is no God else beside me—a just God and a savior—there is none beside me. Look unto me and be saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I hav sworn by myself: the word is gone out of my mouth and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear."

But, despite the vigor of this declaration, there are some who hav not evolved beyond the wooden god.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Jesus Christ of the New Testament.

In this skeptical but inquisitiv and searching age, the question of the veritability of such a personage as the Jesus Christ having ever existed, is one that is eliciting the careful inquiry and investigation of a large number of minds, which are desirous of getting at the bottom of a matter which has hitherto played so prominent a part, as forming the basis of Christian belief. While there is no mention of such a name outside of the New Testament—except a twelve line notice of him in Josephus, which bears the unmistakable impress of being an interpolation—the believers in the existence of such a person put forth in substantiation of their claim the specious query: "Why may not a Jesus Christ hav existed, as well as a Socrates, a Plato, or Pythagoras?" This question is very fair on the surface, and well calculated to mislead and deceive. The difference is, in the case of Jesus Christ, a God was wanted on the theological market to fill a certain niche, and the priests of moribund paganism got together and fabricated him to order; while the sages of Greece came into the world according to the natural order of things.

Sixty years ago the writer remembers it was gravely stated that Christ probably came "in the middle of time," i.e., midway between the Mosaic assumption of the earth's creation and its final destruction. While claiming that he was "the only name given under heaven among men whereby we can be saved," no attempt was made to bridge the hiatus of four thousand and four years before he came, during which the race—like Niagara—had poured a continuous stream into hell for want of having heard of such a name; when confronted with this knotty problem it was complacently brushed away with saying: "Oh, those that were saved were saved by a belief in a 'savior to come;'" but the poor Jews especially were left out in the cold, for they, neither 1888 years ago nor since, hav never given the least credit to Christ as being a savior. It is strange that a people who were so expectant of a "coming messiah" should not hav been the first to welcome and acknowledge him when—as claimed—he did come. But no, the pretended messiah, like Noah's dove, found no place in Judea on which to rest the sole of his foot.

Returning to this "coming in the middle of time" claim of the messiah, all that can be made of it by the utmost Procrustean contortion is, the market didn't open up for just such a new God as Christ was made to be until about two thousand years ago. The scheme was incubating at Rome, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Cæsarea—but chiefly at Rome—long before the fowl came forth, full-fledged, at Nice in 325; and the new God, like Pandora, whom "every god contributed something to perfect," was the product of the jargon, "kicking and cuffing," of some two thousand attendants—according to Socrates, a contemporaneous church historian—Arius and Athanasius, both of Alexandria, being the chief moguls in manipulating the council.

Whoever will read the New Testament with a view to detecting the discrepancies with which it abounds, does not need to go outside to any concurring evidence to become convinced that the central figure and chief hero is not only a fictitious but a factitious creation, around which all the principal incidents are made to revolve, and to substantiate which all its extravagant, bungling statements are made to conform.

But inasmuch as all the claims of Liberal writers are termed "Infidel" by the sectarian world, I wish to suggest a weapon which all Liberal writers can use with fatal effect, and one which cannot be gainsaid as emanating from an Infidel source. In Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, page 59, is found the word Antilegomena, which is defined as seven books of the New Testament—their names being given—"which were, for a time, denied to be canonical, but now generally received." The question is, When, and by whom, were these seven books finally decided to be canonical? And whether the opinions of the nineteenth century people are not as competent to determin what is Bible and what is not, as were the pugnacious bishops composing the council of Nice in 325?

Papius, a church historian, informs us how the "genuin" epistles of the New Testament were tested from the spurious. According to him this (un)godly conclave of bishops took a basket and filled it with manuscripts and put it under a communion table, then they formed a circle around it and prayed; whereupon jumping-jack-like all the "inspired" documents bounced upon the table and the spurious ones remained in the basket; but the joke of the thing is, these "Antilegomena" ones, that did not take wing and fly up on the table in 325, hav since—by whose permission or authority nobody knows—crept into the Bible and figure as prominently as the rest of the New Testament.

I am aware that Eusebius, the wily "trimmer" and prince of falsifiers, who was present at the council of Nice, makes no mention in his ecclesiastical history of the New Testament canon being made at this council. Of course not; he wanted, by omitting to state the fact, to imply that this was the work of "the apostolical age," or some 280 years previous. This same Eusebius went into the council a thoroughbred Arianite; and finding the tide against him, joined with the majority in voting the expulsion of Arius from the council.

I hav not the least objection to the veritable existence of a Jesus Christ or any other man or woman; but when I am asked to believe that a man becomes his own father and his own son, with three diametrically opposit accounts of the events of his birth, then nothing more said of him until he is twelve years old, then another break until he is thirty, then a marvelous history crowded into three short years, an eclipse, an earthquake, rending of temple veils, and the dead coming bodily to life again, with no account of their ever dying again, at his death; then the hero himself rising from the dead and ascending up to heaven from two different places, the combination taxes my deglutitory powers a little beyond their capacity, and I beg to be excused from the attempt.

A Jeweler's Answer to Paley.

Paley's argument, illustrating by a watch that the apparent adaptation of means to ends, which we behold in nature, would suggest a designer, is still, though answered a thousand times, the favorit argument of many, but who, as stated, are sadly deficient in the bumps of comprehension and logical analysis.

Let us suppose for a moment that a personal God (and no other God can be a God) is a fact. We hav then the following aspect of real existence: suns, systems, worlds, trees, flowers, birds, beasts, man, etc., and God. All alike, the believer must admit, are real objects of existence. But now, ignorant of the causes which created all of them, he reasons and concludes that suns, systems, worlds, and man can not possibly "come by chance," or evolve from inorganic matter, but need or necessitate a creator, but—and here is the paradox—complacently ignores the fact that if a logical necessity exists for a creator to create the lesser beings, as man and beast, then, of course, this same logical necessity forces him to postulate another God to create the greater being, who made man.

Supposing some one in a desert should find a $2 50 Waterbury, a $10 Elgin, and a $20 Waltham watch; then, after pondering in profound meditation, should conclude that these cannot come by chance, oh, no! but such evidence of design must necessitate a designer? You say, Certainly; how profound and wise this man is! But see, here is another watch, infinitly more beautiful in design and finish. He picks it up; it is a $1,000 masterpiece of the horologer's art—the climax of perfection. He ponders a moment, thinks it kind of funny, puts it in his pocket and goes his way rejoicing, proclaiming to everyone he meets: "See this lovely watch! It came by chance—it never was designed or made—it has existed forever!"

Now, my Christian friend, what would you think of a man like this? Of course you would pronounce him insane, to say the least. Yet the condition of your mind and his are identical. You hav found the first watch and insist that the less forms of nature necessitate a designer, ignoring entirely that, like a boomerang, this logic recoils, and that it hits and kills the God you hav created, who, of course, if your reasoning is correct, necessitates a God also or a creator to create him.

This being in my line, I hav another original method to dispose of the watch argument. If a watch necessitates a designer and maker, a thousand million of watches would necessitate at least millions of makers. If this is so, how many Gods does the human race necessitate?

The problems of nature can never be solved by assuming a God until the school-boy's question, "Who made God?" is solved first. Until then the Materialist has the universe for the basis of his belief, the Theist nothing!

Thanks!

We thank thee, Lord, from whom all blessings flow—
Thou rulest the heaven and the earth below;
We thank thee as preserver of our health,
We thank thee as the giver of our wealth.
We thank thee, Lord.

Thy sun has shone upon our pretty land;
Thy moon has pierced the darkness, like a friend
That comes in hour of need; thy stars, so mild,
Hav been a joy to woman, man, and child.
We thank thee, Lord.

Thy rains, abundant, hav destroyed the grain
That was the farmer's only hope and gain;
Thy cyclones hav destroyed all that was left,
Until they are of everything bereft.
We thank thee, Lord.

Shipwrecks, railroad disasters, and so forth
Hav visited the West, the East, the North;
And in the South the yellow fever's rage
Has added to the death-roll many a page.
We thank thee, Lord.

The land that thou hast made—it bas denied
To suffering thousands food for which they tried;
Thy oceans, Lord, which were considered safe,
Hav proved to hundreds but a watery grave.
We thank thee, Lord.

The mother mourns alone a darling son;
The broken-hearted wife a husband gone;
The tearless husband, with a broken will,
Looks at the space a loving wife should fill.
We thank thee, Lord.

We thank thee, Lord, from whom all blessings flow—
Thine is the heaven and the earth below—
We thank thee, the preserver of our health;
We thank thee as the giver of our wealth.
We thank thee, Lord.

SPANIER.

The Dreams of St. John.

Of all the narrativs in that jumble of contradictions and impossibilities, the Bible, that of St. John stands preëminent as the most widely impossible of the whole.

How a man could conceive such an amount of blood and fire, angels and devils, and yet maintain his solid equilibrium, is more than I can master. In these latter days he would run a good chance of being nominated as a candidate for the nearest county asylum. But in "ye ancient tymes," when to stand upon a pillar a certain number of years, or to be afflicted with the scabies, profanely termed the itch, and show a decided aversion to water, served only to show their sanctity, people had a wonderful appetite for the marvelous, and such a little thing as revelations appeared highly credible. Even to the Christian of to-day these dreams of St. John are as lucid as the godhead itself (or themselvs).

The other day I turned to these Munchausen tales, and read in the tenth chapter of an angel who stood with one foot upon the land and another on the sea (beats the seven-league boots all to sticks). who with uplifted hand swore (and here comes the interesting part) that time was up. Well, that was simply awful, John!

He had a little book in his hand, with which he was presented. He was told to eat it up. He ate it, being short of rations, no doubt, when it proved to be "honey in his mouth but bitterness in his belly." Great Scott! did he expect it to taste like a St. Louis pie? Though, Lord knows, I would rather eat that volume than some of those said pies. Having digested the parchment, he prophesied. No wonder—I hav seen men prophesying on less.

After a time he saw a woman clothed with the sun (now, John!), seven stars crowning her head, and with the moon under her feet (if that does not beat Chicago's record for big feet, I wonder what does!), fleeing into the wilderness from the persecutions of a dragon. After fleeing to the wilderness, she in the fourteenth verse came back and got a pair of eagle's wings and fled to the same place. John says the woman got the eagle's wings to help her in her flight from the dragon, who seemingly was only a few laps behind her. Anyhow, the flight of that lady is somewhat confusing. She fled to her house of refuge, and when she got there she wasn't there at all. Ultimately, in the fourteenth verse she made a break and got there, where she abode "a time and times and half a time."

Well, simple, John. Simple as the trinity itself. To look at that arithmetical question with the eye of an Infidel, it is rather vague; but approach it with all the humbleness of a Christian, then the light breaks in upon it, and behold, it appears only as a "period of time"—one of God's days.

Well, after John had waded through rivers of blood and brought all the plagues of Egypt upon the earth, and ten times more, everything a diseased imagination could conceive, the spirit with which he was soaked, as he says himself in the beginning, began to die out, and with an eloquent appeal to the general public "to come up and hav a drink"—of water—and surely man never needed it more than did yourself, John—our hero, uttering a few curses, in which he was an adept, quitted the stage, or, in common parlance, "got." And here ended the revelations of St. John the divine. If it were not that I knew you to be the best beloved of the "young 'un," John, I would naturally think after reading your book that you were the sire of Old Nick himself, or at least his brother.

CLESHENDER BRITON.

A Kansas Breeze.

The smoke of the campaign clearing away and once more exposing an inviting field, I took my grip and started to Hamlin, where I had the town billed for a lecture.

Having prepared a campaign of my own, I propose this to be a grand opening. Accordingly, I secured the school-house, free of charges, and gave a free lecture, subject, "Secularism: Its Aims and Advantages."

Well, you should all hav been there. I tell you, the outlook was inspiring—an audience of about seventy people, and not a pronounced Secularist among them! If the character of the lecture had been fairly understood, I do not think half that number would hav been present. However, owing to the school board believing in the motto, "Hear all sides," and having matters in this town about their own way, and the fact that no one seemed to know the import of the term Secularism, I was saved the mortification of speaking to empty seats.

We used the professor's room. He kindly favored us by staying away, but left the keys accidentally at his boarding-place. Failing to find the janitor or a willing boy, I performed the janitor's duty myself.

Waiting until the appointed hour, I gave the bell-rope a pull and prepared for business. Finally, a man and boy came who were kind enough to aid me in procuring more fire and better light. I had a fine talk with this man, who said he had come to find out what was covered up under that innocent-looking word, "Secularism." When the "brothers and sisters" had about all gathered, I confidentially asked him if the Christian minister was present. "He is," said he. "I happen to be that man." Oh, horror! can you imagin my feelings when you know how well I knew that these Campbellites are after the scalp of all who dare publicly to differ from them? Well, I bounced on the rostrum, summoning all the courage I ever had from my childhood up, announced my subject, and invited anyone who dared—I mean desired—to take an opportunity to reply when I was through.

Keeping my eye upon this little giant—and now and then upon a dashing young lady on the back seat—I expounded the gospel of science and humanity until I actually felt sorry for that minister. After continuing for an hour and a half, I began to see signs of uneasiness, and after once more inviting a reply sat down. No reply came. It was too late in the night. I dismissed the audience according to the most modern style. The brothers and sisters went. I can hav no idea as to how they felt only by the long breaths they drew as they took leave. I afterward found that I had been speaking to the minister and his entire flock. I credit them with a most respectful and patient attention. I suppose I was answered in the usual style, the next day being Sunday.

I stopped at the Sweeney House, and besides finding it a good hotel, I found Mr. Samuel Sweeney a generous Liberal Secularist, as also was T. J. Matthews, a grain-dealer, and G. S. Sandusky, dealing in general merchandise. The trouble with these men is, they take no Liberal papers, hence they cannot appreciate their own condition.

Messrs. Hinton, a farmer, and Warner, an old coaster, and my friend Hoffman, who was "stuck" on the jury at court, are the driving men of the town and community.

The minister's name was O. H. Derry, and I shall always thank him for permitting me to go unpunished. I hav little hopes of reclaiming this people from their idols.

The Blair Sunday Bill.

From Fair Play.

That we shall hav ere long a national Sunday law seems probable. The danger is imminent. Between three and four million names hav already been secured to petitions in favor of the Blair Sunday bill. Do Liberals realize what this means? Do they understand that this movement is backed by organization, money, and fanaticism, and that it will succeed? Succeed? Yes, succeed, unless there is such an awakening among freedom-loving people as has never been known in this country. The enemy is upon us.

Checking Heresy in South Africa.

From the London Freethinker

There are Christian bigots out in south Africa, and Mr. E. B. Rose received from one a letter worded as follows:

BELGRAVIA, Sept. 22, 1888.

If E. B. Rose, the adventurer, does not desist in his so-called Freethought lectures after this notice, he may find himself the center of a pitiless mob. After this let him mount the platform if he dares again.

BY ORDER OF THE BROTHERHOOD.

The reply of Mr. Rose was the announcement, which his brother sends us, that he would deliver one more lecture, subject, "Who Is the Devil?" We hav not learned if the Brotherhood or the pitiless mob put in an appearance.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 27th is a letter dated October 20th, where there is one willing to commence a fund toward testing whether the will of the late Stephen Girard is or is not being carried out, by contributing $100. Illinois Sabbath Association.

I hav just returned from the pious precincts of Farwell Hall, where is being held the first annual meeting of the above association. I attended specially to hear the address of Dr. Herrick Johnson, president of the Northwestern University, whose topic was announced as, "The Sunday Newspaper," and personally having shared in its production I felt sort of particeps criminis in the indictment about to be rendered, and ready to accept such a sentence as, on general principles, could be expected from the hatchet-faced Herrick. The audience was a curious conglomerate, and afforded the anthropologically inclined a most interesting study. The good figures and bright faces were found only among the younger men present, who as yet had not reached the stage of intellectual expansion or distraction, but with youthful vigor were buoyed up with a new-born enthusiasm.

As a prelude to the speech "devotional exercises" were in order, and the "Amen" responses to the prayers reminded me of the tin trumpets at the ratification meeting—more expressiv than well-timed. It was quite an unexpected and unusual picnic which the secretary of the American Secular Union encountered. But he enjoyed it all the same.

A reverend brother read an address setting forth that the Sabbath was of divine origin and authority; that if there were one ordinance more than another which "the enemies of God" would rejoice over, it would be the dissolution of the Christian Sabbath; that this association wanted this day of rest enforced for the well-being of the wage-workers.

Knowing some of those interested in every move calculated to advance the interests of the wage-workers, I surveyed the audience to discover a few familiar faces who naturally gravitated toward any movement for the welfare of the wage-workers. Not one was present. What was the reason of their indifference? Evidently they were suspicious of their new-found friends.

Dr. Johnson was introduced, and without much preliminary began to define what a Sunday newspaper was, saying, however, that when it was first introduced its columns were well padded with moral precepts, but it soon cast away the skin of the sheep and came forth the full-fledged wolf that it was. "The Sunday paper is not a religious paper or a reform paper. It is not the Sunday paper in partnership with Sunday. If it is in partnership the newspaper gets all the profits and Sunday all the losses. It is merely the ordinary daily enlarged, but not sanctified—a mighty mosaic of information, much of it not objectionable, but all of the earth, earthy. Some of it is poisonous and corrupting—garnished to excite the palate—and, like the apostolic vision, full of all manner of creeping things—flesh and fowl, especially fowl. It never was, however, let down from heaven."

That the people want a Sunday paper is no argument with this Presbyterian bigot, Johnson, for he attempted to prove that what the people wanted was not good for them, and as he believed the ministry had a right to lead the people, the inference was that they only knew what was for their benefit. Such innocent abandon was truly refreshing. Dr. Johnson then remarked: "They say the Sunday newspaper has come to stay. I don't believe it. Not if God has come to stay, for God and the Sunday newspaper do not agree."

We were tempted to offer odds on the newspaper, but forbore, while the speaker plunged into a labyrinth of statistics furnished him by Brother Shepard of the New York Mail and Express on the number of columns devoted to crime and sports in the various Sunday papers. Then the premier pedagog of the Northwestern University, in an unguarded moment, let slip a few home truths, as follows: "The Sunday newspaper is here for the money that is in it. Men are striking at the bulwarks of our liberty because the dollar lies beyond." Now, that is just exactly what is the trouble with Mr. Johnson and men of his cloth. In his philippic against the Sunday newspaper he said—and that was evidently the sorest charge against his successful rival—"It keeps people from church." And there are no dollars in the church unless people can be got there. The church can not well advocate a law compelling a man to go to church, but it does to close every avenue of recreation and enjoyment which he would rather prefer, and thus indirectly attempts to compel his attendance. Admitting that the Sunday papers were a success, this "man of God" dramatically shouted: "So was Nero a success. So was piracy on the high seas. God pity the stockholder, editor, or advertiser of a Sunday newspaper."

The Sunday press keeps an army of workmen from their proper weekly rest. The plea that the work is done on Saturday is pueril. The Sunday newspaper thrusts itself on the community in an offensiv way on the streets. It comes in subtle, insidious, perilous ways into our homes. The saloon or theater cannot come to our homes on Sunday, but the newspaper flies on wings to our abodes. It furnishes a hideous melange for a Sunday breakfast. Nonsense, crime, lust, sensationalism, as a preparation for the sanctuary! There is no device that Satan has yet hit upon comparable to the Sunday newspaper for deadening men's souls. It keeps people from church. Ruskin said years ago that a minister on the Sabbath had just thirty minutes in which to raise the dead. The Sunday newspaper rolls another stone to the door of the sepulcher. The Sunday newspaper by its flying mail extras is turning our peaceful villages into a bedlam and introducing the worst elements of city life.

What is to be done about it? We must get and keep a conscience with the divine authority of the Sabbath law interwoven into the warp and woof. The secular Sabbath is on a level with feast-days appointed by man. If we put it on the basis of rest for the body and brain alone it is still on a false foundation. We cannot divide Sunday up and giv God a part. The divine appointment is to keep the whole day sacred. We want an enlightened public conscience which is made up of individual personal consciences. We also want a ministerial conscience. We ought to band ourselvs together in Chicago and refuse to advertise our church services in the Sunday papers. The latter is a recognition by ministers of the Sunday paper. Let us not hav the taint of questionable indulgence on our skirts. Let us refuse to take the Sunday issue to our homes. Let us urge our convictions on advertisers and legislators. We want our civil Sabbath preserved by law, and to reach the consciences also of the Christian merchants. O for a breath of the Puritan!

Had Herrick Johnson exclaimed, "O for the power of Puritan persecution!" he would merely hav given utterance to his deep-seated desire. But it will be a long distance in the future when the fanatical Dr. Johnson or the Illinois Sabbath Association will be allowed to rule the destinies of Chicago, affect the Sunday newspaper, or seriously impair the social enjoyments of this community. When ministers make their plea on behalf of Sabbath observance under the pretense of serving the wage-workers, it would be well for them to seek the indorsement of those whose cause they champion. Dr. Johnson on this point said: "I am certain that, with a Sabbath rest, we can get more out of our laborers with six days than seven." What blessed, unselfish philanthropy Dr. Johnson exhibits! He proposes to get more work out of the toiler for six days' pay than he does at present by paying him for seven. That is a sort of philanthropy which would exactly suit "Old Scrooge," but it does not particularly appeal with vigor and force to the laboring classes.

The organization of this Illinois Sabbath Association should band together the Liberals of this state in stronger bonds of unity, prepared to battle against these ministerial meddlers, and enjoy to the fullest extent the glorious Day of the Sun. Who will attend and join a state Secular Union? Write me.

E. A. STEVENS.

McArthur to Mrs. Slenker.

She hath grown cold whose kindness won me to her.
Wherefore is this?

It seems strange to me that we cannot come more closely together. My every advance is repulsed, and I no sooner see, or think I see, an opportunity for the furtherance of my object, than cold water is thrown on my efforts.

I selected you, my dear madam, for a variety of reasons. First of all, you seemed more than willing. Then, you are a prominent Freethought writer, and hav a reputation as a philosopher and thinker. Moreover, you hav witnessed countless phases of the phenomena and hav openly stated that you knew how they were done, but, as you were on honor, could not giv the processes to the public. But, above all, you are one of the most, if not the most, violent opponents of the Spiritual philosophy.

I may be mistaken, but think I am not, when I state again that you admitted the genuinness of some of your experiences, and if my memory serve me the same was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER two or three weeks prior to the issue of June 16th last.

Unfortunately, as far as the proof of this is concerned, I do not file away my papers. Having read, and possibly re-read them, I place them where they will do good, for, unlike some of the "friends," I consider Heston's pictures one of my greatest levers in the work of civilizing my orthodox acquaintances.

But if anyone who is interested in this will kindly examin his file and send me the needed quotation, I will feel obliged; otherwise I must, perforce, let the matter rest.

Still, you say: "I granted that probably a portion of the phenomena were real, for I am loth to believe all are deceivers and deceived."

Well, in lieu of something better, if this is to be a discussion, then oblige me with a "detailed statement" of that "portion," or a part of it, and let us set to work. There is no use in fencing.

You say you are anxious to be convinced that the phenomena are true, and I am prepared to do my level best in that direction. And I say I am anxious to hav the phenomena proved false, and you are the one, and the only one I hav ever met, who is in a position to offer these proofs, for, to quote your words: "I know about half of it was (done by the mediums and their confederates) because I was told how it was done and shown the whole process, and the rest I could hav done myself with a little practice."

I think you will find before we are through with this discussion, that is if I can only succeed in having it commence, that you hav done me an injustice when you say, "I am afraid it will be with thee as it is with the Christian. Just as soon as we take the Bible away they refuse to argue."

I hav neither Bible, God, nor devil to love, fear, or flatter, simply an array of "facts" supported by a philosophy.

Per contra, I openly charge Materialists with following the mode of procedure which you now condemn. When they attack Christianity it is with "facts," and Christianity, cowering in the corner, hurls back theories. But when Spiritualism is to be attacked, our Materialistic friends ignore the "facts," and deal only with theories.

"Don't let Heston picture the 'facts,' they wound the sensibilities of my Christian friends," writes one subscriber. Giv them only our theories, sugar-coated pills, and they can take them, at first, in homeopathic doses.

A "fact" is a fact, whether it has Christian or pagan origin, and it never can be successfully combated by a theory.

I hav stated before, and say again, that one fact is worth countless thousands of theories, and, notwithstanding that silly article from our Irwin, Ia., friend, I repeat that, all else being equal, the evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen.

Stories that are in the mouth of each and every clown cause a laugh from the circus audience, but before long they become chestnuts, particularly when they are pointless.

I should like to call your attention to an article in the issue of November 24th of THE TRUTH SEEKER, entitled, "Roman Catholic Theory of Spiritualism." It is evidently from the inspired Pat Cronin, crony and admirer of Waterloo Lambert. Cronin is an extremist. He believes that only in exceptional cases does water run downhill. Your theory of the Spiritual philosophy and Pat's are the antipodes of each other. What you claim to be "impossible" Pat admits as "probable," but attributes to the power of the devil, and I candidly think that Pat's method of reasoning and deductions therefrom should commend themselvs to our Iowa friend, J. K. P. Baker, for they certainly are as rational and far more conclusiv than his.

People in an "abnormal" condition and whose faculties are "aberrant," will, in that event, hav an opportunity of consulting the Iowa sage, and I hav no doubt that these "poor creatures" will feel thankful to Pat and his co-laborer from Iowa for their gratuitous advice. In regard to the Darwinian theory, we can take that up in its proper order when we hav reached it in the discussion.

To your remark, "But if there is a bear in the closet, and thee knows it, perhaps thee can find some way of convincing me of the fact." I will simply say that possibly the non-convincing rests entirely with yourself. But, if you will giv me an opportunity by coming out flatly and stopping hedging, I'll see what can be done, and mayhap show you a bare fact instead of a bear.

You see, my dear Mrs. Slenker, we Spiritualists claim that our phenomena are facts. We ignore miracles, and relegate superstition to the churches, and that portion of the Materialistic community who refuse to credit anything outside of the commonest known physical laws, or who swallow whole any theory provided it hav some scientist's name appended to it. I group these two classes together, for there is no difference between a credulous Christian and a credulous Materialist.

The former foolishly believes that there is nothing impossible to his God, and the latter, that there is nothing outside or beyond his exceedingly small brain capacity. If you do not believe this statement, write to Pat Cronin and J. K. P. Baker.

Both deal in theories. Each ignores "facts."

Let me illustrate.

Not many years ago, I had the pleasure of an introduction to an astronomer of great celebrity. He is since dead; hence will be nameless.

I was enchanted. His "facts," as he called them, were astonishing, and he quoted literally from all the best-known experts in his line, particularly Zoellner and Flammarion.

The wonderful discoveries in the heavens led us into the subject of light, its uses and abuses, and the wonderful strides made toward its perfect understanding. He enlarged on the "fact" that its waves struck the retina four hundred millions of millions of times every second in order to produce its lowest ray, and nearly twice that number for its highest. As he struck his open palm to emphasize each "fact," he looked to me as if he actually believed it.

Among his other accomplishments was a claim to a knowledge of painting, and as our intimacy increased, I felt that in return for so many "facts" he had so kindly given me, I should giv him one also.

So, one day, I invited him to my room and, among other things, showed him a small oil painting, and asked his opinion of it. He admired it greatly, spoke of the shades, stippling, etc., and pronounced it almost a work of art, or, to use his own words, "surely not the work of an amateur."

After his critical examination, I informed him that it was produced in the light, through the organism of a medium who, in her normal condition, could hardly draw a straight line, and on a piece of pasteboard that had been previously marked for identification by seven skeptics, and that the whole process did not take more than three minutes.

"Oh! it's one of those Spiritual pictures," he exclaimed. "I hope you are not one of those imbecils, as I really took you for a clever, level-headed fellow."

"Yes," I answered, "I am a Spiritualist, and the account I hav given you of this picture is correct. Moreover, if you will kindly examin these others, you will find them of the same class."

But my scientific friend declined.

I urged that the authorities, Zoellner and Flammarion, whom he had so often quoted, were pronounced Spiritualists; but he assured me in return that, though lucid on every other point—able to measure four hundred millions of millions of miles a second and demonstrate it, worthy of standing among the most brilliant minds of the world and of being quoted as among the highest authorities in astronomical science—yet they were undoubtedly insane on the subject of Spiritualism.

So, my dear Mrs. Slenker, there was the "bear in the closet." This gentleman could believe and pronounce a "fact" an improbable proposition, containing a number so inconceivably great as to cause the mind to wander while thinking of it, and yet would reject as a "fact" what he could see with his own eyes.

But neither you nor I are in this boat. We will leave these matters to professors, Pats, and Iowa philosophers. We hav other business on hand. So I hope you will now consent to giving me the items, and I will consider them properly and respectfully.

McARTHUR.

Mr. Priestley to McArthur.

Will you please let me make a short comment upon a specimen passage from McArthur? It is as follows:

> There is no such thing as mathematical accuracy. There is as wide a divergence between theoretical and practical mathematics as it is possible to conceive. Let me illustrate:
> Take two athletes and allow that one can run ten times as fast as the other, and place the slower one a hundred yards in advance. Then, at the word, both start.
> When the swifter has covered a hundred yards the other has run ten yards, and when the swifter has covered that ten the slower has advanced one-tenth of a yard, and while the swifter is covering that tenth the slower has run one-hundredth of a yard, and so on till eternity ceases, etc.

McArthur may know very much about ghosts, but if he thinks that very ancient and crude attempt at a solution is theoretical mathematics he is away off.

Of course, a mathematical problem need not be based upon historical facts, but it would be well to state it so that all the conditions would not be as absurd as the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism, especially when it is stated by one who wants to abolish the word "impossible" from the English language. It is impossible that there should be two athletes and one of them run ten times as fast as the other. It is impossible that two athletes should run so short a race as the hundredth part of a yard—.3 3-5ths inches. If they run at all, they would hav to run at least one step, and, when that step was taken, "the last would be first and the first last" by several feet.

McArthur attempts his solution apparently on the assumption that his athletes, instead of going right along, ran their race on the instalment plan, as impecunious persons buy sewing-machines. He says: "The ten-year-old boy of Mr. Roe, if he has one, knows what would be the practical result of the race." Yes, and he knows it by theory. He does not hav to try any experiments. Theoretically, the fact that the swifter athlete would overtake the slower is an axiom. The problem is to find—not by a cut-and-try process, but by a direct solution—how far each athlete has run at the time the swifter overtakes the slower.

Algebraic solution: Let A be the swifter and B the slower; and let x represent the number of yards which B runs. Then x plus 100 will represent the distance which A runs. But the distance which A runs is ten times as far as the distance which B runs. Hence B's distance, x, multiplied by ten, equals A's, which givs us the equation, $10x = x$ plus 100. Subtracting x from each member we hav $9x = 100$. Dividing each member by 9 we hav $x = 1$ 11-9ths yards, the distance B has traveled when overtaken by A, who, of course, runs 111 1-9th yards.

Arithmetical solution: When A has run 100 yards, B has run 10 yards. Hence A has gained 90 yards on B. If A gains 90 yards in running 100 he will gain 9-10ths of a yard in running one. Hence to gain 100 yards he must run as many yards as 9-10ths is contained times in 100. Thus 100 x 10-9ths = 1,000-9ths = 111 1-9th yards.

Now, will McArthur kindly point out the discrepancy between the theoretical and the practical in this problem? I claim that mathematics is a source of absolute certitude and that it will be impossible for McArthur to point out a single discrepancy between theoretical and practical mathematics. Even taking McArthur's own method of trying to solve this problem, it does not prove what he claims, but exactly the reverse. Let us take a few terms. First A and B are 100 yards apart, then 10 yards, then one yard, then 3 3-5ths inches, then 36-100ths of an inch. Instead of there being between them "as wide a divergence as it is possible to conceive," there is a very rapid *con*vergence.

McArthur seems to think he knows what condition this problem will be in when "eternity ceases," but as I don't expect to be there, and as the question of duration is not involved in the problem as he has stated it, and as I cannot form the slightest idea what will come next after duration ends, I must giv it up. In that remote period they may hav circular triangles, cylindrical spheres, and Spiritual phenomena, and nothing will be impossible.

D. PRIESTLEY.

Milwaukee, Ore.

Genius on the Stage.

Colonel R. G. Ingersoll in the World.

There is a time in the life of a man when impressions are made—impressions so deep that they remain—a time when he first hears what he feels to be real music, and those tones haunt him as long as he live. He never hears music again so great as that—so perfect—and could he hear that same music again, precisely as it was, he would feel that something was lacking.

So there is a time when he sees a supreme piece of acting. Some great actor makes an impression, givs him a series of pictures, a gallery of statuary, that he never forgets and that he always sees.

Think of the persons who were impressed by Miss Neilson. Could she now come from the dead and step again upon the stage as beautiful as ever, her admirers and her worshipers would not be satisfied. The trouble is, they hav changed; the noon of life has touched the twilight; the heart no longer responds to those deft and delicate touches; out of life's rainbow the colors hav fallen.

Every new candidate for public favor has to overcome this memory, this ideal, and it takes years to conquer a prejudice that partakes of the nature of gratitude.

Thousands and thousands feel indebted to Edwin Forrest. They remember the splendid pleasure he gave, the exaltation of thought he produced. They remember his magnificence, his grandeur, his amplitude, and to admit that he has an equal would be a kind of ingratitude.

In the world of art the dead are the great rivals, and people are always comparing the present with all the past. They select the successes of many centuries and pit them against the one person standing before them.

It is hard to overestimate the genius, the grace, the beauty, and the intelligence that hav been lavished upon the stage; yet in spite of prejudice, in spite of memory, in spite of the old ideals, when naturalness, grace, and intensity step upon the stage, even prejudice is conquered. There is something irresistible about a graceful, honest, simple, passionate personality. It is delightful to see a person lost in a character—to see a beautiful woman the instrumentality of a thought—to see her a living, breathing ideal.

We are all apt to imagin that the age in which we liv is commonplace—that it has no romance—that everything is but a variation of the multiplication table. We hav a kind of dream that the past was full of love and wonder, full of adventure and poetry. Without knowing it, we put all the past together, we take from every age its romance, its tenderness, its self-denial, its love. All that we hav gleaned we think of at once, yet these incidents cover thousands of years. We only gather a little in each field, a few sheaves in a century, and we are surprised when we see a person in these days of ledgers, mortgages, and stocks as natural as the grass that grows, as graceful as a bird in air, touched and glorified with the romance of all time, a being that you cannot associate with business, with dollars, with trades, with the ordinary wants and the selfishness of life, one who seems to hav been created by a poet's wish, by an artist's dream.

All these thoughts went through my mind while looking on Miss Marlowe as Parthenia.

We all hav prejudices. One will hav to act much better than Joseph Jefferson before I can admit that he has been excelled. My youth is on his side. It is hard to imagin that anyone can excel Forrest in the last act of "King Lear." Certainly he would hav to be almost a god to create in my heart greater or deeper feeling in repeating the words:

> Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, hav life,
> And thou no breath at all?

It is hard to imagin that any human being can excel Denman Thompson in "The Old Homestead." He is the character he represents, and everything about him is as natural as nature.

Miss Marlowe conquered my prejudices and excelled my ideal. Of all actresses she is the most perfectly natural, the most sincere, the most absolutely honest, and every emotion is portrayed.

In the telephones first invented the tone or pitch of the voice could be easily transmitted. This tone or pitch depended on simple waves of the air; but in order to transmit a voice so that it would be recognized as the voice of a certain person, the diaphragm had to transmit not only simple waves, but complex ones, and those other waves gave the quality and transmitted the voice of your friend, a voice that you recognized, a voice that you knew. Ordinary actors giv the tone, the pitch, of the character, but a genius conveys the composit result of all complexities; so that you feel that you hav seen, not a representation, but a character—a real, living, breathing, hoping, and suffering soul.

Great acting must hav the appearance of being unconscious. It must come from within. The gesture must be the outward expression of inward feeling. There is no mechanism, no matter how perfect, that can take the place of graceful, unconscious spontaneity. The schools for acting are only for persons of talent, not of genius. Genius moves in curves; talent is mathematical. Talent imitates; genius creates.

Imagin a Greek girl who unconsciously imitates all the great statues and who has the pose of Greek art in its highest form—who has the grace of movement that these statues would hav were they living. And imagin more—that this girl has within her the spirit, the genius, that chiseled those statues, and then imagin that she has been idealized by love, and you hav an idea of Miss Marlowe as Parthenia.

England's Distinction.

Saladin in Secular Review.

The Americans are always big or nothing. For every Antichristian journal we hav in this country our trans-Atlantic cousins hav nine or ten. On the Lord's side they hav the fearful Talmage; not on the Lord's side they hav the tremendous Ingersoll. The greatest cataract in the world is in America, the falls of Niagara being a river three miles in width, suddenly contracting, and plunging over rocks in two columns to a depth of 170 feet. The greatest cave in the world is in America; it is called the Mammoth Cave, and the explorer can make a voyage on a subterranean river in which the fish hav no eyes. The greatest river in the world, the Mississippi, 4,100 miles in length, is also in America, as is the greatest valley, that of the Mississippi, containing 500,000 square miles. So, too, is the largest lake, Superior, 430 miles across, and 1,000 feet deep. America owns the greatest natural bridge, that over Cedar Creek in Virginia, stretching across a chasm 80 feet wide and 250 feet deep; the greatest mass of solid iron—namely, the iron mountain of Missouri, two miles round and 350 feet high; the largest aqueduct, the Croton aqueduct in New York, 40 miles in length, which cost £3,500,000 to construct; the greatest deposits of coal, those of Pennsylvania, from which the markets receive millions of tons yearly, and which are practically inexhaustible; and the greatest liar—namely, the man who said American soil was so fertil that a vine planted in the center of a hundred-acre field spread all over the field so fast that it tripped up the man who planted it before he could escape from the spot. But there hav been bigger lies than that. The lie about the man inside the whale is larger than the whale itself. If America can tell the biggest lies, England has the proud distinction of eclipsing America at believing big lies once they are told. For instance, taking the respectiv populations into account, the whale story has more believers in England, Scotland, and Ireland than it has in the United States.

The Degeneracy of Modern Democracy.

From the Investigator.

Ministers and churches hav no doubt the right to appoint religious festivals such as fast days and Thanksgiving, otherwise there would not be religious liberty. But what right has a president to appoint these festivals? He has no right, for he is a political ruler, not a religious one. He is, or should be, governed by the Constitution, which does not recognize any religion whatever, and, therefore, he has no right, constitutionally, to appoint or recommend a religious festival.

But he knows all this as well as we can tell him, for he professes to be a statesman and to understand the Constitution; and yet, religiously, he violates it when he mixes up religion with his politics. Why is this? Apparently it is done in order to keep in favor with the clergy and the church. And if this is the fact, we are more priest-ridden in this country than many people suppose. What is wanted is what we hav not got as yet—a strictly constitutional party which shall not allow the slightest semblance of a union of church and state.

The wisest statesman and most illustrious of all the Democrats, Thomas Jefferson, did not appoint religious festivals when he was president, and Grover Cleveland, now in that office, and professing to be of the same party, ought to hav followed the good example, but modern Democracy is not of the kind that was taught by Jefferson and Paine.

A few years ago, if we are not mistaken, Governor Roberts, of Texas, had the courage and independence to refuse to appoint a religious festival, and previous to that time Governor Wise of Virginia did the same. But almost without exception, neither presidents nor governors hav dared to follow their constitutional examples.

Communications.

Here It Is!

All branches of human knowledge hav developed from the discovery of single facts, of no great significance within themselvs. but just important enough to constitute nuclei around which other facts hav been clustering. Modern geometry has thus developed from the inconsiderable value of a single straight line, and all of our mathematics, from the use of a single hieroglyphic made to represent any single object—the type of unity. A small piece of bark freshly peeled from a growing branch, and tied at both ends, may hav suggested the dugout, the ideal vessel from which has grown our leviathan steamships. Probably the whole stock of literature of which we are boasting might be traced from link to link, without a missing one, back to certain cuneiform characters first used to represent mere guttural sounds. Agriculture certainly began by inserting the bulbs of alium molly in soft, sandy soils along the banks of sylvan streams; and mere reed-huts, long ages before the birth of log-cabins, foreshadowed the colossal ruins of South America, the Babylons of antiquity, and the Londons of our day. So also do we find the great trees and animals all originating in the union of two or more invisible atoms, while foolish people can see no definition of life behind its bewildering complexity in the higher mammalia, nor learn to solve the problem of the universe through those embryonic crystallizations which are constantly building inhabitable worlds, as the countless swarms of activ masons are building inhabitable cities.

As it is very natural they should hav done, owing to this same blindness, our ignorant and barbarous ancestors looked upon themselvs as the objectiv focus of a special creation. A flat world, with an upturned rim to restrain the surging waters, surrounded by a wall of chaos, which then, as now, must hav been a subterfuge behind which ignorance hid its shame, was conceived to be the proper and necessary condition of things. It was quite rational, we must allow, from such a standpoint, for them to look upward for a supernal, and downward for an infernal, region. Up and down, to their very limited vision, certainly appeared as real, instead of relativ, points. All moving celestial objects were readily supposed to be revolving around such an important focus. The universal presence of good and evil, or rather that which affected themselvs favorably or unfavorably, suggested the necessity of different sources for these apparent contradictions. The vault of heaven, as it seemed to rest upon the horizon, could easily be mistaken by their childish simplicity, for a real canopy, studded with twinkling gems for their especial edification. Above this ideal arch was located the empyrean source of all good, while the bad was quite as rationally relegated to the nether world. Such was the intelligence from which all of our fetich worship has been derived. And such was the astronomical wisdom of Moses, and also the God whom he made to rule over Israel.

After dreaming away several thousand years in this blissful ignorance of our true celestial relations, it began to be surmised by certain heathen philosophers, contrary to all Christianity, that our world might better be round than flat. It was this vile heresy, as all truth has been considered by religionists, that subsequently induced such men as Columbus, Drake, and Magellan to attempt its circumnavigation. In a few years, however, the desired information having been obtained, many heretical thinkers—for talking was dangerous—began to look upon the sun and moon also as spherical bodies. And still all phenomenal changes were referred to celestial movements, while our world, the supposed center of a created universe, must remain perfectly stationary. But the beacon of progress was gleaming in the near future, and it was soon afterward learned that the human race had been chained by their false teachers to the dead past, where themselvs it was, instead of the world, that remained stationary.

After galling for ages under the yoke of dogmatical hypocrisy and fraud, and only about two hundred and fifty years ago, one Nicholas Copernicus, a daring empirical astronomer, ventured to scale the then strongly fortified bulwarks of ignorance and blind superstition, and kindled his balefires even in the hideous darkness of the enemy's camp. By carefully observing the heavens for a whole year he discovered that the sun had either gone three hundred and sixty-five times around the world, or that the world had gone one time around the sun. If the sun had been going around our planet to bring about the recurring days and nights, the same fixed stars must reappear at perihelion every twenty-four hours. On the contrary, the same fixed stars which a year before appeared to be clustering about the sun having returned to their former places, he was forced to the conclusion that both earth and sun must again be in the same relativ position. Nothing but the completion of an orbit at the end of each year could bring about this result. Nor could the sun's motion cause his daily rising and setting without a velocity far too great for rational credence. But by rolling on her own axis at a velocity of only one thousand miles an hour, all parts of the earth's surface can be daily turned to and from the sun, and thus cause our days and nights. Such was the profound reasoning which gave us the invaluable truths of the subsequently established Copernican system of astronomy, even before the invention of instruments, and similar reasoning must soon lead us to the very confines of the cosmical problem.

Only a few years later when Galileo, with his little telescope, had succeeded in locating every part of the actual orbit of our translating planet, it was found to hav an inclination of twenty-three and one-half degrees from the ecliptic, or plane of the equatorial line of the sun. Thus is the vertical sun made to travel north and south on the telluric surface forty-seven degrees each year, and cause alternate winters and summers in the two hemispheres. He also found the orbit of earth to be an oval or elliptical figure with two centers, in one of which the sun is incumbent, while the other has evidently been evacuated by a secondary luminary. Now, since it is well known among geometricians that an ellipse cannot be formed without the aid of two centers, we are objectivly assured that earth was once a satellite revolving around an older sphere which merged into the sun shortly after the young planet started on its present elliptical journey around what was then two centers.

But these important discoveries are now more than two centuries old and still the priests are babbling about the works of an unknowable God. Having learned so long ago that our world is wheeling through space around a self-luminous center at a velocity of seventy thousand miles an hour, and rolling on her own axis like a grindstone at the rate of one thousand miles an hour, why should we not learn what caused or causes these celestial motions? Let us hav another Copernican stride in the right direction and scale the last rampart of superstitious bigotry. Let the awe-stricken multitude gaze upon the transcendent grandeur of natural world-making. Of course orthodoxy is saying we know too much already. Evolution is robbing God of his glory in the creation of man. Science has encroached upon his prerogativs and his miraculous works almost more than the old imbecil can withstand. Having learned that the world instead of the sun is wheeling through space, these independent thinkers are already talking flippantly about the mistakes of Moses. What is to prevent the old fabric of superstition from being razed to the ground, when science can point to the natural laws which caused the world to make such appalling revolutions? When our readers hav learned that these immense velocities are simple, normal developments within the comprehension of all clear human minds, where is the evidence of fiat, where is the boasted creation? Will they not be relegated to the mausoleum of both Gods and devils?

To comprehend these grand and consecutiv discoveries set forth below, the reader must not forget that the footprints of fiat are not to be found in matter. Nature alone is doing her own work and she can speak no organism into being. From single cells or crystals to the largest animals, trees, worlds, or suns, the same laws of accretion and dissolution are ever present. As surely as that a horse has been a colt or a tree a sapling, so has every self-luminous sun in the universe been a planet or an aggregation of planets, and every inhabitable planet a satellite, and every satellite an asteroid, descending by the attraction of gravitation toward its central sun, where it must hav disappeared if not arrested by the interference of planetary attraction.

Organized matter can only grow by the accretion of atoms, which may continue until a specific maximum is attained, when disintegration steps in to reduce the accumulations to their normal level. Everything in nature grows, until each organic form reaches the maximum of its peculiar species, the babes become men, the plantlets become trees, crystals are aggregated into rocks known as aerolites, the aerolites become asteroids, the asteroids become satellites, the satellites become planets, and the planets develop into some self-luminous form, whence their substance must again be dispersed throughout the common space, to maintain the order of reproduction and decay. By the well-known rationale of reductio ad absurdum this thesis is unquestionably true, because the most familiar celestial machinery cannot run from eternity to eternity in any other way. Whoever takes issue with these statements is at war with the established law of temperatures, the attraction of gravitation, and the tangential force of all revolving bodies.

From a correct understanding of the foregoing facts, it is certain that our globe, in some past time, was the moon, or satellite, of a great and inhabitable planet, belonging to a former eon of this system. Nor can it be said that this assertion, even though it be true, rests upon a purely subjectiv foundation. The evidence supporting it is far from being confined to logical deductions. It is objectivly known that we hav eight planets revolving around our sun, and all turning on their own axis in the same manner as earth. Geology has most conclusivly shown that our planet is growing and has grown to the extent of many superficial miles of stratified rocks, which could not hav been here during the ages in which the older fossils existed as their expression of the animal kingdom. The old silurian is found underlying all of the later ages, in every continent and island on the globe, so the small fractions of it washed from mountain gorges, etc., could never hav furnished one hundredth part of the ten miles of newer and overlying strata. This fact alone, when followed to its logical conclusion, proves all that is said in this paper. Of course, it is absurd to doubt the growth of all other planets and satellites, after the growth of earth has been so thoroughly established. And her molten interior, which furnishes the lava of volcanoes and earthquakes, and the necessarily increasing temperatures for all of these stupendous explosions, is equally well known to hav been encroaching upon and melting away the older fossiliferous deposits to the extent of many miles next below the old silurian beds. Her internal heat and external surface are known to be advancing in the same ratio, and thus maintaining a uniform thickness of shell, continually renewed for the bettering of inhabitable conditions.

And it is also objectivly known that these same planets hav eighteen moons, or satellites, revolving about them, without any similar diurnal revolutions as we hav found peculiar to planets, which can be of no conceivable utility to themselvs or their primaries unless they are to develop into planets. The inhabitants of the planets around which they are revolving can only see one side of these moons, and these one sides are always the same. It is true, however, that our moon is being turned upon its own axis as often as it goes around its primary, so that an observer, watching it from any point outside of its orbit, could behold its entire circumference every twenty-nine days. The same might be said of all other satellites. But none of them hav proper axial revolutions like the planets. In reality, they are all revolving upon the axes of their primaries, so as to inherit their diurnal motions, and thus perpetuate days and nights and inhabitable conditions when the older and worn-out spheres hav passed away. By and by, we will learn how easily the slow axial motion of our moon, and her orbital velocity of two thousand miles an hour, by the inevitable concentricity which must follow earth dissolution, may be united in one useful diurnal motion like the planets.

However, before we can fully comprehend the importance of these clear distinctions between the planets and their moons, the origin of both must be more thoroughly investigated. As all space is full of a highly rarefied and elastic ether, composed of the same atomic matter which is permeating every part of the rocky crust of earth, and creeping into the hollows of geodes and the cavities of the older rocks, where crystalline growth is taking place, the intermundane regions may be regarded in the light of a common soil, wherein the mineral kingdom is reaching its highest perfection, as does the vegetable kingdom in the richest terrestrial loams. By the attraction of gravitation, the same familiar law which givs the property of weight to everything on our globe, those crystallizations abounding wherever there are no currents of water or air, cannot fail to be drawn together. They first appear to us in the well-known form of aerolites, which are constantly darting into our aerial ocean as shooting stars. These are amorphous crystalline agglomerations of solid matter, from the size of a man's fist to half a mile in diameter, and objectivly known as celestial rocks overtaken by the stupendous velocity of our globe as she is wheeling around the central sun. Of course, we are equally well assured that every planet and satellite revolving about this or any other sun, is also overtaking the same class of rocks, and constantly growing larger by such additions.

We next observe the larger aerolites, after they hav grown by further crystalline agglomerations, to the higher estate of asteroids, from diminutiv telescopic objects to nearly the magnitudes of our smaller moons. That these bodies are only still greater amorphous conglomerations of both crystals and aerolites, none but the willfully blind can fail to see. And no one can fail to see that such bodies, while falling in accordance with the law of attraction, with rapidly increasing velocities, toward our great central sun, from the confines of our system, or far beyond it, for thousands of years, might easily be lassoed, or teddered, by the intervening attraction of any of the revolving planets, and thus become their dependent satellites. Because the enormous attraction of the sun is drawing everything toward it from a hundred trillion miles in every direction, the rocky crystalline growths are all falling as heavy bodies with us fall to the ground. Their velocities, after reaching our planets, may be from one to sixty thousand miles an hour. They are concentering at the sun from every direction, and thus darting down through our system so thickly that the showers of aerolites falling into our atmosphere are these same bodies not yet having the necessary velocities, and therefore the tangential force, to resist the impinging planetary attractions. It is only the very largest of these bodies which hav been growing while falling from the greatest distances, that can thus be supposed to resist all planetary attractions, and perpetuate their velocities as satellites. Thus also is this hypothesis quite incontrovertibly supported by the abnormal figure of our own moon's orbit, which, in fact, ridicules the idea of intelligent design, and also that of utility, by the very earmarks of having been teddered to a rapidly translating planet while falling toward the sun at the rate of two thousand miles an hour—her present velocity around the earth. It is truly marvelous to contemplate the sudden arrest of a sphere having a diameter of five hundred or more miles, while falling at the rate of thirty miles per minute, but this single fact becomes insignificant in comparison with the transcendent phenomena attending the birth of a future planet. Some of our planets hav several young ones in their families, so earth need not be discouraged because she had to begin with one. The appearance of our first moon in the heavens may hav somewhat startled the listless inhabitants of earth, but let us contemplate the far grander achievements of the satellite itself. Behold a falling sphere wheeling suddenly about a planet for protection, as it were, and instantly finding itself dashing headlong around the glowing center of a system at the rate of seventy thousand miles an hour! Otherwise it must long ago hav disappeared in the flames of our great luminary.

We now find Mother Earth with her infant Diana in her embrace, just as the grandmother, long, long ago, embraced our infant world. Because all consequences evolve out of relativ anticedents, nature makes no mistakes. Earth is known to be growing, and so is her moon, consequently it is altogether impossible for the eternal future ages to roll by without ending the existence of our globe, and leaving her satellite revolving around the sun, with conditions similar to ours. The number of satellites which may thus become planets can scarcely be limited, because there is ample room for a hundred more such spheres to revolve around our sun. The sizes of all such orbits can only be limited by the correlation of magnitude, density, and velocity, so that growth may increase, and increasing temperature diminish them.

Now let us return to the history of our own planet. Since it has been shown to be growing by the accretion of crystalline matter gleaned from the common domain, it is not necessary to reiterate that which is settled among the faithful students of nature. By serially connecting these consequences of terrestrial growth with their inseparable antecedents, we are translated back to a time when earth herself was a satellite, and when in conformity to the laws governing such bodies, she could hav had no true axial or diurnal motion. If this nucleus of earth—for all satellites must be regarded merely as planetary nuclei, of no conceivable value in the cosmos, unless, like children in our families, they are to succeed their departing ancestors—was revolving around some now extinct planet, which, in a glowing state, at some very remote period of time, was buried in the sun, is it not easy to see how the little terrestrial nucleus, with its far greater density and tangential force, could escape the threatened conflagration? In this way alone could our planet hav derived its elliptical orbit, with two centers, one of which is now blank and the other occupied by the sun. Such is the only possible scientific explanation of the well-known elliptical orbits of all planets. In the absence of any conceivable utility, all phenomenal irregularities must be referred to the law of necessity in the infinit differentiation of development.

But we must not forget that our terrestrial nucleus, while in its fetal, or satellitic, state, had no such diurnal motion as now givs us days and nights. Before the conglomeration of its two primaries, the old extinct planet and the sun, it had already acquired an orbit around the sun in company with its expiring companion. It had also a much smaller orbit around the said companion, as our moon now has about this world, which was causing it to turn slowly on its own axis. Both of these last-named motions were in the same direction, and were the consequences of the same antecedent force—the attraction of gravitation which caused it to fall toward the sun at the time it became a satellite and derived this orbital motion. Now, if the central object of its smaller orbit consolidated with the central object of its larger orbit, certainly the larger orbit would be continued in some elliptical form, without acceleration or retardation around the two approaching centers. But the smaller orbit must hav been adjusted to the changed conditions. Having lost the focal point around which it was revolving as a moon, and already having a slow axial motion in the same direction, and resulting from the same force, it is easy to see how their energies could coalesce into one movement. As fast as the excentric cycloid curve of the larger orbital motion was forced by tangential resistance into a concentric line about the great central source of attraction, the two minor motions must become centered in the young planet itself. Thus do we find that the greater velocity, and consequently greater force, of the outer half, over that of the inner half, of the former satellite, as it was then revolving around its primary, and wheeling around the sun, was correlated with the slow axial revolutions of the new-born planet, to giv it the alternate periods of light and darkness required by cellular organisms.

Since this is the most intricate and important point in the development of worlds without the assistance of fiat, the reader is requested to test it by the following illustrations, thus: Take a small ball, with a convenient hole through it for the insertion of a reed one or two feet long. While the ball is secured at one end of the reed, hold the other end on a table with one hand, while with the other hand the end on which the ball is secured is being turned round and round on the table, to represent a satellite going around its primary located relativly as your hand and the ball are on the table. By having a mark on the ball, you can carefully observe the fact that each time the reed, with ball attached, goes once around, the ball is also turned in the same direction one time round on its own axis. After this operation has been satisfactorily performed, let it be tried by slipping the ball down on the reed closer and closer until it actually touches the hand, and turning the reed around on the table at each stage to represent the force which must continue to revolve the ball. And finally slip the ball to the end you were holding on the table, and turn it with the reed as before, to prove objectivly how the orbit of any moon will become diurnal whenever the axis of such secondary coincides with what was the axial line of its departed primary, and thus incontrovertibly demonstrate the unerring character of certain natural laws capable of building these satellites and planets, projecting them around their self-luminous suns at enormous velocities, and rolling them on their own axes, so as to make it possible for us to hav an existence. This is the only conceivable explanation of the diurnal motions peculiar to all planets, and the suns which can be nothing more nor less than aggregations of planetary remains, while the satellites and asteroids hav developed no such rotary motions. If Mother Nature were some giddy-headed thing depending upon vicarious assistance, we might call in the hired help, but she is a model housewife and does all her own work, so that we find the worlds themselvs eternally wheeling around in obedience to her behests.

Any number of satellites having independent orbits about the same expiring primary in this same manner, may be started on elliptical, but never circular, orbits around the same central sun of any system in the universe, and regulate the sizes of their respectiv new orbits by their own several magnitudes, densities, and velocities, without disturbing the relations of each other, or any revolving spheres in the same system. All of the solar systems are limited only by the counter attractions of other systems, and, therefore, cannot be circumscribed by boundary lines. Thus may their relativ magnitudes vary as do the sizes of trees in our forests. The larger suns having the stronger attractions must be drawing the aggregating crystalline masses from greater and greater distances, with greater and greater velocities, as these masses are approaching their respectiv centers, so that the orbital motions of all satellites and planets, which are these same falling velocities circumvolving these or other centers, may never fail to hav the tangential force required for resisting such greater attractions. In a non-resisting medium, any growing body of matter, by falling from the incalculable hights of space toward any very great source of attraction, might derive the most stupendous velocity, either direct or orbital, without the slightest supernatural assistance.

It must be obvious to the intelligent reader that the smaller bodies of crystalline matter, known as aerolites, in a system like ours, must be simply legions, and all moving westward in company with the planets, while falling with very different velocities toward the sun. The larger bodies of this same class, known as asteroids, are here by thousands, also wheeling around the sun, and more or less rapidly descending toward the greater center of attraction. If not arrested by any of the revolving planets, all of these bodies must ultimately, by diminishing spiral curves, descend into the sun which is furnishing their constituents. But it is quite possible for any one of the larger asteroids, after having fallen for ages from the most incalculable distance, and all the time growing, to escape planetary attraction, and to derive such a very high velocity, and such great tangential force, as to resist the attraction of the sun himself long before he had grown to his present magnitude. And any such sphere might easily hav become a young plant in our system at some very remote time, without the possibility of ever revolving upon its own axis. It could never hav days and nights, because, like our moon, it must keep the same side toward its primary. Its inner hemisphere must hav one continuous day, with the sun on the meridian, while its outer hemisphere remains in perpetual darkness and gloom. Such a sphere would continue the process of growth by accretions, like the other planets, and pass through all of the planetary stages, except such cellular expressions as we hav on earth, where regular days and nights are indispensable. It would lasso some of the falling asteroids by its greater attraction, and thus hav its share of the moonshine, and finally, in a self luminous condition, coalesce with the central sun, and leave its moon, or moons, revolving as planets with the necessary diurnal motions for inhabitable conditions. In this plain, natural manner any newly developing self luminous center, appearing in any part of the infinit universe, where there may be room for another system, certainly evolves first the barren planets, without days and nights, capable of protecting and rearing families of satellites, whose double motions develop into those regular diurnal revolutions which distinguish the inhabitable planets from all other celestial forms.

By carefully studying and applying all of these now well known scientific facts, and also the final effects of developing temperatures upon these growing organisms, anyone can become as familiar with the natural processes of world and sun making, as are the better class of farmers with the rational processes of agriculture. Creation is a continuous process of developing new expressions, as life is a process forever renewing the cellular expressions on the myriads of inhabitable planets, so that nothing but stolid ignorance and willful bigotry can hav any further use for the supernatural. If the common people must longer endure the barbarous inflictions of false preaching and false teaching, let it be known that these wrongs are being done willfully, despite the truthful lessons of philosophy and natural science combined, while man is evoluting away from his fabulous fall, and therefore equally fabulous redemption. Let all true friends of human progress raise the hue and cry against the useless and wicked propagandism of barbarous fables. Everything in nature is teaching the lessons of evolution, and if man does not improve he can hav no supernatural personage to vicariously shoulder his responsibilities.

A Service to the Cause of Justice.

From the Galveston News.

Judge Barrett, of the supreme court of New York, overruled the refusal of inspectors of election in the Fourteenth district of New York to register the name of Eugene M. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, because he refused to swear on the Bible or to hold up his hand. The judge decided that the inspectors had no right to insist on any religious test. It seems strange that officials will disregard the intention both of the Constitution and of the law which provides for affirmations by persons who object to taking an oath. Their action constitutes a species of bulldozing which must appear the more odious when it seems to be the result of a perverted sort of Christian faith. No man is converted by treating him with unfairness or illiberality. There is no just inference that the man who refuses to swear is an untruthful man. Indeed, such a man might be a more faithful Christian than those who override the law itself to persecute him. There is a Christian sect and there are individual Christians of other sects who take no latitude in construing the command of their master, which stands written in these words: "But I say unto you, swear not at all." It is indeed well known that learned divines hav exercised their casuistry upon this notable text, and drawn the inference that Christians might take an oath when the law required it. Even upon this view of the case it would not be evident that they should take an oath when the law does not require it. The laws of this country which provide for affirmation are made in the sober and reasonable spirit of this injunction, and those officials who seek to override them are doing more to advertise their bigotry than their understanding of either gospel, law, or right and justice. Mr. Macdonald is not a professor of Christianity; quite the reverse, he is the Editor of an Ingersollian paper. But he is a gentleman, a citizen, and a man of untarnished honor. The country would be better off if it possessed more such honorable citizens, and fewer officials so illiberal as to try to cheat him out of his vote, contrary to the Constitution and the law, in the name of Christianity. Men as well as trees are known by their fruits. Their professed beliefs are often the result merely of education. They are liberal and fair or prejudiced and bigoted according to the quality of their minds. In resisting a piece of official misfeasance, Mr. Macdonald rendered a service to liberal institutions and the cause of justice everywhere.

Crisp Squattucks.

At the unveiling of the monument to the memory of Crispus Attucks, in Boston, yesterday, the historical oration was delivered by John Fiske. I understand that the late Caleb Cushing ascertained that the real name of the victim of the Boston massacre, Ma ch 5, 1770, was Crisp Squattucks; and it is not disputed that Crisp was a Natick Indian. The Church's Speculation in New Zealand.

At one of the Annual Congresses of the American Secular Union (1886) Colonel Ingersoll spoke of the injustice of tax exemption of land belonging to the church. "Do you know," he asked, "that if church property is allowed to go without taxation, it is only a question of time when they will own a large per cent of the property of the world? . . . The church builds an edifice in some small town, gets several acres of land. In time a city rises around it. The labor of others has added to the value of this property, until it is worth millions."

This picture is easily recognized. Scarcely a city has arisen in this country without carrying with it the value of acres and acres of land held without taxation for speculativ purposes by the various churches. Hundreds of magnificent church buildings hav been erected from the proceeds of the sale of such lands, and many a pastor's salary is paid from rents of buildings erected on lands bought for a song, and held, free of taxes, till the town built up around them. The sacred speculation is going on now in the newer portion of the country, and the holy land is doubling the dollars of the canny pietists, simply because it is not taxed. From Dan to Beersheba the game is being played, and, as the earth fills up, the injustice is more keenly felt.

In this city to-day a church is realizing on one of these fortunate speculations. St. Luke's church, on Hudson street, was built in the early part of the century, when the site of the present city hall was a cow-pasture, and Hudson street was a road in the village of Greenwich, where land could almost be had for the taking. Since then New York has grown, Greenwich is solid brick and stone, and land is worth a fortune a lot. The land around St. Luke's has been covered with houses. Toward none of these improvements, save by the building of one or two dwelling-houses, has the church contributed. It has paid no taxes. It has added absolutely nothing to the common stock of wealth. But the worshipers at St. Luke's hav grown wealthy along with the church, and moved away uptown, and the church must follow them. So the land acquired for almost nothing, and held without cost, though sorely needed for business and homes, is to be sold for enough to build a large and fashionable edifice uptown. The dead even are not respected by the speculating Christians, for the graveyard around the church is being depopulated of its silent tenants, and the church will wax fat and fashionable and hire a side-whiskered rector on the proceeds of the sale or lease of the land. Thinking of this fortunate speculation of one church, a writer in Henry George's paper reflects to some purpose. "We Americans," he says, "are fond of boasting that we hav no state church. We point to the fact that in England dissenters are forced to pay tithes for the support of an ecclesiastical organization for which they hav no use nor liking; and we boast ourselvs that in this country such injustices are not perpetrated. But the English tithe is simply a tax upon the privilege of occupying land. And when we consider that residents of Hudson street, who hav so little use for St. Luke's church that the church actually has to move away from them, are going to be taxed, in the way of ground rents or purchase money, for the support of a new St. Luke's to be situated miles away from them—when we consider all this, why really it seems as though we may not be so very far from having an established church of our own after all."

The latest country to suffer is New Zealand, according to another of the Standard's correspondents, who writes:

"But the greatest and most crying evil is the land that is held back by religious bodies. There are many thousands of acres of good land in New Zealand belonging to missionary societies, which are lying idle as a speculation, and if they were utilized I would guarantee that in six months you would not find a bona fide unemployed workingman in the country. This is simply because the land is near civilization, and a man who produced anything, even if it were 'taties,' would find a sale for them, and could earn an honest living. But no; that man, if he be poor and desirous of tilling the ground, must go miles away from civilization over as rough a country as man ever traveled—over swamps, mountains, thick bush, rivers without bridges. I say he will hav to drag his poor wife and children into the desert, whilst there are thousands of acres of unoccupied land near to the towns lying idle."

Here is the unused, untaxed missionary land lying idle near the towns, waiting for a rise in value, while the poor devil of a workingman is starving for the lack of the use of it. Tax this land and the societies could not hold it. The missionary fund would giv out, and they must sell or lease it to those who would utilize it to increase the food supply of the country, and reduce the sum total of the misery of New Zealand. Filling empty stomachs is a thousand times better employment than preaching hell and damnation. New Zealand will see the day when she will wish that the Christian missionaries, equipped with Bibles and barrels of rum, had never landed on her shores. The church never givs up a dollar, and she will get the highest market price for the land she holds, even if two-thirds of the Maoris starve to death. She seems to think that when the devil offered Christ all the countries of the earth, Jesus accepted the bribe, and has handed them down to his hypocritical followers, to possess and enjoy forever, together with the improvements and rise in values since that time.

Sensible Dr. Greer.

The chamber of commerce of New York city has a habit of dining collectivly once a year, though individually it is to be presumed that it dines oftener, else the members could scarcely present the rotund and prosperous appearance that they do. The annual habit has been kept up now for one hundred and twenty years, beginning at Fraunce's tavern at Broad and Pearl streets, and eating the one hundred and twentieth dinner at Delmonico's last week.

From talking business at first the chamber has got to discussing politics and religion, and the notable thing about the last dinner was the sensible remarks, for a minister, on Sunday observance, of the Rev. Dr. Greer, who spoke for "A Free Church and a Free State." He said:

"The observance of Sunday must be maintained not so much by legislativ enactment as by the energy of the Christian church, producing a voluntary conformity thereto upon the part of the people at large. Of course, it is competent for the state to pass certain laws for the observance of Sunday, but not, it seems to me, on religious grounds, or for religious reasons, but on the ground of the public welfare, for the state in this country is not the organ of religion, and one day to the state is just like any other day. Some of our fellow-citizens do not believe in Sunday as a religious day—they believe in Saturday. Others, again, do not believe in either Saturday or Sunday; they do not believe in any religious days. And the state in this country is just as much for them and for their protection as it is for us and for our protection; not only for those who are Christians, but for those who are not Christians; not only for the orthodox, but for the heterodox; for the Seventh Day Baptists and the Jews; for Catholics and Protestants and Friends and Quakers and Spiritualists; for all who come here with all kinds of religious belief, and with no religious belief at all. And from all quarters of the globe they are coming—a little too numerously, I venture to think, still they are coming, and will continue to come crowding into our cities, settling upon our prairies, cultivating our soil, taking part in our commercial, industrial, and professional pursuits, and in many ways, as farmers, as merchants, as mechanics, as politicians, as miners, as laborers, as capitalists, are becoming absorbed and incorporated into our social organism. And the state will not interfere with their religious beliefs, will not take cognizance of one more than another, but will, with just and equal laws, treat them all alike."

No one can find fault with the "voluntary conformity" of action by the churchmen to their doctrins. It is only when they try to force involuntary conformity thereto upon those holding different doctrins that we must revolt and denounce the ecclesiastical despotism. Sunday should be a non day, made so by law, that business may be suspended by all without injury to any. But no law should apply to that day that does not apply to other holidays, and no law should ever hav religious significance, or take cognizance in any way of religious reasons for its being. The pious hav just as good right to go to church on Sunday as a Freethinker has to not go. And if the "energy of the Christian church" can, without the aid of law, induce all the people to go to church, why, let them go. When, however, the church calls in the aid of the state to enforce her ideas of a proper Sunday observance upon others, she becomes the most intolerable tyrant on earth. Then we hav the Inquisition and a theocracy, and freedom is a thing unknown.

A united church and state has everywhere meant that the church ruled. Ecclesiastics are the most arrogant of men. They hav claimed the right to regulate the whole life of man—his birth, his education, his marriage, his thoughts, his words, his death, even the clothes he should wear and the food he should eat. To maintain their claim they hav cursed and burnt and tortured and murdered right and left. In doing this they hav used the state as a tool. They must be deprived of power, their laws must be repealed, and they must be made to pay their own bills. Then if they can induce people to go to church, they are welcome to do so.

The Wage-Workers in the Churches.

In answering a Methodist minister's question, "Why do not the wage-workers of New York attend church?" the Sun says:

"It is undoubtedly true that our German-American fellow-citizens furnish the smallest complement of church-goers in proportion to their numbers, and the reason for this is the widespread prevalence among them of Agnosticism, which is to be found more especially in the ranks of the wage-workers. In this respect the German-born citizens of New York are merely in line with their brethren in the cities of Protestant Germany."

Of the wage-earners of other nationalities the same authority thinks that a larger percentage are found in their churches every Sunday than are found in any other city of the so-called Christian world—far larger than in London, Paris, Berlin, or Vienna.

We think this is true, and pity 'tis 'tis true. The great trouble here in New York is the unreasoning superstition of the laborers, which makes them the easy prey of priest and politician. The Germans, among whom Agnosticism is widespread, are the only independent class, and the only reasoning class of laborers in the city. The Italians, the Irish, are mere tools of Rome. And this is the reason why the Catholic church gets such enormous sums of money from the city treasury; it is but repayment by the politicians of their debt to the church for having given them votes. The triumph of Tammany Hall at the polls on the 6th ult. will be followed by at least two years of prosperity for Roman Catholicism.

It is a great pity that so many wage-workers are found in the toils of the church. We wish the interrogativ complaint of the Methodist minister had a more substantial foundation.

The Knights of Labor.

T. V. Powderly's surrender of the Knights of Labor to the Roman church has bankrupted the organization, as was discovered last week at their convention in Indianapolis. The membership has decreased three hundred thousand during the past year, and the Pennsylvania miners, forty thousand strong, threaten to go out of the order if more attention is not paid to their trouble.

T. B. Barry, who was expelled from the executiv board because he opposed Powderly and his friends, was at the convention, and he openly declared that "politics and the church of Rome dictate Powderly's policy, and the Protestant element of organized labor is in revolt." Barry has appealed from the board which expelled him to the convention of delegates; but a leading delegate, when asked if the appeal would be heard, answered in this churchly style: "No; he is not a member of the Knights of Labor, and therefore has no right to appeal. His petition would hav no more effect than a Protestant preacher's appeal to the pope." Under the circumstances, the comparison was apt.

The treaty between Mr. Powderly and Cardinal Gibbons by which the Roman church "tolerates" the order is now known. Simeoni, speaking for the pope, decrees that the "association of the Knights of Labor can for the moment be tolerated," on the condition that the "necessary modifications should be introduced in the rules of the society to make clear whatever might seem obscure or might be interpreted in a bad sense." That is, that anything in the rules which the church objects to shall be taken out. Simeoni specifies some general statements in the preface to the rules governing the establishment of local associations, and "some words savoring of Socialism and Communism" must be "corrected in such a way that they shall only affirm the right conferred by God on man of acquiring property, using legitimate means and respecting the proportionate rights of all others." Simeoni also approves of Cardinal Gibbons's determination to see that no more heresy creeps into the order, and that it shall in everything conform to the standard established by the church for societies composed of Catholics. How the Freethought and Protestant element in the order will like this sale of themselvs to Rome remains to be seen.

The Knights of Labor organization is being ruined in the interest of Roman Catholicism. The church cannot bear a rival in the affections of her dupes, therefore she has swallowed the order, and in her capacious stomach it is now undergoing the process of digestion. The anaconda gets rid of its small enemies in the same way.

Editorial Notes.

One of the funny things of politics was discovered in San Francisco by George Macdonald during the recent hustling for president. A political procession passed his office one evening, wherein was displayed the customary banners with the war-cries and party mottoes painted thereon. One conspicuous display was a big wagon having upon its transparent covering the words, "Protection for American Industries forever!" This reminded Mr. Macdonald of another scene. Last summer, while journeying to Lake Chabot, back of Oakland, he passed a fruit-canning establishment, in the fields surrounding which were swarms of Chinamen gathering berries and fruit. The canning factory back of Oakland and the wagon in the political parade bore the name of the same firm!

The Catholics hav a rival in arrogance in the Hardshell Baptist church of Alabama, but the Knights of Labor no emulator in subservience in the Farmers' Alliance in the same state. The story is, coming from Birmingham: "Several weeks ago sixteen churches and eighteen ministers were suspended from communication for allowing members to join the Alliance. This increased the bitter feeling, and has materially weakened the church. The opposition of the Hardshells to the Alliance is based on their opposition to all secret societies. Sunday a Hardshell preacher named Purifoy went to Chambers county from Selma. He denounced the Farmers' Alliance from the pulpit in the most bitter terms. This was continued for several days, when a committee from the Alliance ordered Rev. Purifoy to leave the county at once. The threats of violence which accompanied the order caused him to leave in great haste." If the Knights of Labor possessed a small portion of the independence of the Alabama farmers, the Roman church would hav fewer slaves, and Mr. Powderly a good opportunity to turn his talents to some useful purpose.

C. C. O'Donnell, a pious gentleman of San Francisco, ran for mayor of that city on the 6th of last month, and was beaten. On the Sunday following he made a speech, in which this gem of oratory shines conspicuous: "It is my prayer, so help me God, that whoever voted against me may be paralyzed, and his soul go down to the infernal regions, where be belongs." The manner of defeated candidates for office forms a curious psychological phenomenon. Some cry, some curse, and some call names. They imagin that the world revolved around their candidacy for some public situation, and that with their own obliteration went the sun and stars also. Warner Miller, for instance, who ran for governor of this state, boasting that the churches were with him, thinks, to judge by his speeches since the event, that he and God were snowed under together. President Cleveland, it is pleasant to note, accepts his retirement gracefully, and will thereby retain much more respect with the people than if he sat up nights hunting through his Thesaurus for alliterativ adjectivs and epithets to hurl at Mr. Harrison in the splenetic columns of the opposition press. Mr. O'Donnell hould get him a cake of ice upon which to sit and cool off.

Cardinal Gibbons issued a sort of supplementary Thanksgiving proclamation a few days before the day appointed scarcely less pious than that of the president. After mentioning a few things of a bright nature he said: "It is true, ndeed, that disasters by floods and storms in the West and hat pestilence in the South hav darkened and afflicted many home. But even in those visitations of sorrow we should humbly bless our heavenly father, whose mysterious dispensations we cannot fathom, but should always adore. We should kiss the hand that strikes as well as the hand that caresses, for whether he smites or fondles he is always a loving father. And these occasional calamities are but the shadows that bring out in bolder relief the bright picture of our national prosperity." That is precisely as we defined the Christian creed in last week's Truth Seeker. Thanks, blind, ignorant, shallow, empty-headed thanks, for favors not received, and for injuries felt, to something not known and unknowable, to a phantom of the brain, to a figment of the imagination, to a shadow cast by Nothing in the dark—this is the Christian creed. Of all the irrational documents in the world, a Thanksgiving proclamation is the most idiotic.

Passengers on the Third avenue elevated railroads can now do without their regular church-going. Some philanthropic pietist has framed and hung up in the cars some scripture texts calculated, in his opinion, to make an impression upon the worldly-minded folks who get up and down town on the railroad in the air. One of the texts is, "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but hav everlasting life." Another is, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" The first, we surmise, is a statement intended to enlighten the general public on a matter about which they are supposed to be ignorant. The second must be intended solely for the benefit of the managers of the elevated railroad itself and of their advertising agents, who charge publishers $10 a week and the profits on the sales for placing a newspaper or book on the stands in the stations. These fellows are the only people we know of who stand in even the remotest danger of gaining the whole world. Their danger, however, is imminent, and if they lose their own souls for it, the general verdict will be, Served them right!

The Troy High School Record, from which we learned of the refusal of Judge Fursman to naturalize a man because he would not "swear," prints an explanation by the judge as follows: "When the judge was administering the usual oath, 'You solemnly swear in the presence of the ever living God,' he was interrupted by the applicant, saying, that he was not satisfied there was 'any ever living God,' and thereupon the judge refused to proceed until the applicant consented to take the necessary oath, which he thereafter did." The Record, on this, apologizes. But, as Judge Barrett said on a similar occasion, "This won't do; it is no answer at all." The statute in this state is clear and plain as a lighthouse. Section 846 says that a man may lay his hand upon or kiss the Bible, or may "swear in the presence of the everlasting God." While so swearing he may or may not hold up his hand, at his option. All these are forms of oaths. Section 847 says: "A solemn declaration or affirmation, in the following form, must be administered to a person who declares that he has conscientious scruples against taking an oath or swearing in any form: You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm." The Record has apologized too soon.

The Cleveland, Ohio, Christians are rather sore just now over a preacher who came out of the backwoods of Michigan to exchange pulpits with a Cleveland pastor. The subject of his sermon was Christianity in general, and in particular the advent of Jesus upon earth. He said that he did not think it was a good way for the Lord to start a new Christian era by having an illegitimate child born to Mary to be the teacher of the faith, and he condemned the state of things that existed owing to Joseph and Mary not being married. The Cleveland Sunday World thinks that if the preacher had said this in his backwoods pulpit, "the simple-hearted lumbermen would hav strung him up to the nearest tree," and intimates that such a fate would be appropriate. "A pretty pass," the World exclaims, "when a man from the backwoods of Michigan, or from any other place on earth, can enter a pulpit and tell the people that he, a miserable, sinning, mortal missionary, dares take upon himself the right to criticise the ways of the supreme being!" We condole with the Clevelanders. It was an uncouth way of reminding the members of a somewhat finicky social club that the basis of their organization was an occurrence of dubious morality.

In the Great Book there is something about a vaulting ambition which o'erleaped itself and fell down upon the other side, hurting itself badly. This, we take it, was a Shakspere cipher reference to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Macon, Ga. We quote from the Macon Daily Telegraph of November 6th: "At the council meeting to-day the committee on relief submitted a report upon the resolution of Councilman Woodward 'that the appropriation of $100 per month heretofore made to the Woman's Christian Association be discontinued from this date and said sum be appropriated under the same conditions and limitations to the Home for the Friendless.' The report was unanimously adopted. The cause of the removal of the appropriation is supposed to be the action of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which joined the Christian Home Society in a body and attempted to control it. This naturally created considerable stir, and the conservativ element, who opposed the mixing of politics with charity work, resigned their membership. Agitation sprung up, and the city council felt bound to take action on the matter and remove their appropriation to the Home. In the investigation of the condition of affairs some very racy evidence was submitted, and it is said that the committee found that Rev. Sam Small, the third party mogul of Georgia, had advised the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to capture the Christian Home by joining in a body." This is retribution righteous and complete, though we fail to see wherein the taxpayers of Macon are materially benefited. The Woman's Christian Association is admittedly sectarian, while the Home for the Friendless is admittedly religious. The council has punished the ambition of the Rev. Sam Small and his female dupes, but it has not helped the city much. A Christian in particular, unless he be a Calvinist or a Catholic, is no worse than a Christian in general, if he practices what he preaches.

The following list of officers and honorary members of the Nineteenth Century Club were elected on the 14th instant without opposition: president, Daniel Greenleaf Thompson; vice-presidents, Mrs. Courtlandt Palmer, Parke Godwin, Mrs. John Sherman, Rabbi Gottheil, Mrs. Colden Murray, Anson P. Stokes, Charles H. Stobbins, Dwight H. Olmstead, Brander Matthews, Mrs. Dudley Field, Andrew Carnegie, Marquise Lanza, R. J. Cross, H. J. Hayden, William Lloyd, Moncure D. Conway, F. A. P. Barnard, Miss Amy Townsend, Henry M. Day, Mrs. Vincenzo Botta, Edgar Fawcett, Mrs. Henry Draper, and Henry A. Oakley; secretary, William Travers Jerome. Honorary members: Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Prof. W. G. Sumner, James Parton, President Eliot of Harvard College, Professor Fiske, Noah Porter, George W. Cable, Dr. C. Waldstein, of Athens, Greece, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, ex-President McCosh of Princeton College, Edward Atkinson, and Edward S. Moore, of Salem, Mass. The club held its first meeting for the season last Wednesday evening, the subject of the discussion being the club and its Founder. The speakers were M. D. Conway, T. B. Wakeman, Revs. C. H. Eaton and Wm. Lloyd, Mrs. Clara Lansing, and Mrs. John Sherman.

The Christian Inquirer givs this interesting bit of news: "It is said that a clergyman of Delaware county is at his wits' end to know what to do in the very singular case in which he finds himself. The people of his neighborhood, he says, are all converted and all church members and attendants, so that there remains nobody who needs really to be preached to. When it was suggested to him that the children might be expected still to provide occasion for his labors he answered, with a slight tincture of sadness, that they were so well brought up that they, too, without exception, became church-members as soon as they were old enough. If the dear brother, having so lovely an ecclesiastical patch, is desirous to do some good, it is evident it might be safely left while he labored elsewhere. If, from his surroundings, he dreams that the millennium is close at hand, he might get a thorough awakening by working as an evangelist in the lower wards of New York." It is well, perhaps, that the Christian Inquirer did not locate this paradise any more definitly, else it might hav been under the necessity of substantiating the story—a necessity at all times painful in the highest degree to religious gospel-spreaders. But, supposing it true, will the Inquirer tell us if there is no jail in the town; if there is no poorhouse, if there are no church-going hypocrits, no pharisaical scandal-mongers, no folks who are just a little south of the line of strict honesty in a horse-trade; no grocers who file their weights and no butchers who weigh their hands with the meat? Are there no dry-goods merchants with yardsticks just a little short of thirty-six inches, and no deacons who put the best apples on top of the barrel? Does no one in this Eden-like neighborhood try to get anything for just a little less than it is worth and sell it for just a little over the market price? Does everybody hav all he can eat, and warm clothes and a comfortable house? If not, then the preacher has plenty of work at hand, but we fancy that that work is not preaching a gospel of preposterous theology, but rather in doing that which his hand findeth to do to bring about the desired result.

New editions of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," and "The World's Sages and Reformers," both by the founder of The Truth Seeker, hav just been issued. The first is in two volumes, written while Mr. Bennett was confined in the Albany penitentiary—placed there by Comstock in his efforts to destroy the paper, and kept there by the marital cowardice of the despicable R. B. Hayes—and is the most voluminous work ever composed under like circumstances. It is a veritable storehouse of information concerning the gods men hav feared and worshiped, and the religions they hav constructed around these mythical personages. The price of the two volumes is $5. "The World's Sages" is composed of biographical sketches of the prominent men who hav championed reform in religion and politics, and is a necessity as a work of reference to all Freethinkers. Price, $3.

Lectures and Meetings.

Mr. John R. Charlesworth announces that he will lecture for Freethought societies during the winter months for the expenses of his journeys. Mr. Charlesworth is a young Englishman who has done some talking for branches of the National Secular Society, and reports in the National Reformer speak well of him. His address is 242 East 77th street, New York city.

W. F. Jamieson writes: For a long time I hav wished to be better able to do my duty to our aged brother, J. Hacker, and his wife. I derived great benefit in reading his famous Pleasure Boat nearly thirty years ago. He deserves better than he ever received at our hands. As he benefited me through his publications, I propose to benefit him by a "Benefit Lecture," to be given in every place I visit after January 1st, at the close of my regular course in each place. I do not feel able to more than divide equally the proceeds of that lecture, after paying hall and advertising expenses. My offer will hold good for three months. Either one of three subjects may be chosen: 1. "John Milton, the celebrated blind poet, clear seer, and free-speech Christian." 2. "Thomas Paine, the far-seeing friend of America, and liberty-loving patriot." 3. "Roger Williams, the banished Baptist."

Letters from Friends.

BARRE, MASS., Nov. 10, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I want to thank you for your grand work in the matter of registration. It is the best thing to show the enemy where we stand and where they stand that has been done in New York city for a century. It was a bold, practical, decisiv, successful blow. Every part was admirable. Such things tell ELLA E. GIBSON.

LUNENBURG, MASS., Nov. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I need not tell you I am afflicted with the wandering gout in ny hands. You will easily guess that, or something worse, is the cause of these crow-tracks addressed to the inhabitants of 28 Lafayette place, New York, near by the shambles where honest men are made over into political villains.

I will acknowledge to the country my thanks for electing the worst men they could find. You know it was rattlesnakes that saved a certain family. It is hastened monopolistic oppression that will save the people.

With many good wishes, I am, Truly yours,

A. H. WOOD.

RED BANK, N. J., Nov. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I find the following example in the New York Tribune. and the paper says country readers are troubling their heads over it, but that neither of the answers given is correct:

If a hen and a ha'f lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days?

Now, I cannot get any other answer than twenty-eight eggs, and conclude, as the paper says it is not the right answer, that there is some catch in the wording which I hav been unable to discover. Will you kindly help out of this mire a poor truth seeker, who looks to you for light on all brain-puzzling subjects? CONSTANT READER.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Nov. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent McArthur has taken a bold enterprise in hand—nothing less than to refute mathematics. He says (the puzzle is an old one) that if two competitors, say a pig and a railroad train, run a race, the pig having a hundred yards start, and making ten while the train makes the hundred; then, when the train has made the ten, the pig will hav made one more; when the train has made one, the pig will hav made a tenth of a yard; and so on ad infinitum; therefore the train will never catch the pig. Which, of course is false. Therefore there is a "divergence between theoretical and practical mathematics." The divergence is simply between wrong calculation and right. If the pig ran, say, a yard in a second, and the train ten yards, the time the train would require to catch the pig would be 11.1111, etc. seconds, a circulating decimal, whose figures may, indeed, be extended to infinity, but whose sum is always less than 11.2 seconds. The ten-year-old boy should be able to work such a sum in arithmetic as that. The fallacy consists in forgetting that the time which you chop into infinitly small pieces is not itself infinit but finite.

C. L. JAMES.

LE MOORE, CAL., Nov. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find inclosed money order in renewal of subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for ensuing year. Our family are much interested in the paper, and the positiv firmness with which Liberal ideas are pressed. I wish you and your able corps of contributors success in defining Secular truth. Am well pleased that general satisfaction obtains relativ to the selection of able officials for the coming year carrying forward the good work of the Secular Congress. And may Mrs. Colman liv these many years, with other efficient women workers that meet in your councils, well worthy of place and confidence, and wearing many laurels as humanitarians in the broadest sense of the term.

Yours truly, SARAH GREGG FOX.

P.S.—Find inclosed $1 for Father and Mother Hacker. I hope that Liberals will not be delinquent in the matter of aid to our aged couple, or any other in real need, for to whom may they look for means of support in poverty? You one and all know that we stand responsible, and if each one would contribute his mite the arrow pointed toward us would fall powerless, and it could not be said that Infidels hav no interest in their class, but suffer them to die with hunger and cold. Mr. Editor, print this as a reminder of what we owe to humanity in general, and oblige S. G. F.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week the story of the Rgt. Rev. James Morill that they hav converted fifty thousand Jews, and that three thousand of them are Christian ministers. I am very sorry indeed that I must call a minister of the gospel a ——, but I cannot help it, it is not my fault. I must believe that the Rev. Mr. Morill had never read the history of the Jews, and how much the Jews were persecuted in holy Spain, Portugal, and in the blessed Bible country—England—and to-day in Russia, and there was never a time that there were converted in one year ten thousand Jews. I am very glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER got to know the falsehood of the Rev. Mr. Morill. He can make his church-members believe because they ask no questions. When a poor, ignorant Jew comes to this country homeless, helpless, friendless, your good missionary, A. Jacob Freshman, buys him with some money and gets him converted. Not for the love of Christ, but only for the love of the money, Mr. Freshman makes a business of the poor Jew. The Christian people are spending millions of dollars, and I do not believe to-day that there are ten honest Jews that believe in Christ. I believe Mr. Morill believes in being born again. I wish he shall be born again a Jew and get converted to a Christian, then he could make more money than now. I will answer all the Jewish missionaries—Dr. Crosby or Freshman—any questions on religion in the Bible or Talmud. RUSSIAN JEW.

LEON, IA., Nov. 9, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Our bit of love for fair play consummated in securing Geo. H. Dawes for a lecture the 18th of last month. His subject was, "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" We were well impressed with his effort. He is a student, and well informed in history; and, like all our Freethought advocates, appeals to the reason. Wit and sarcasm hav their place to keep the hearer from getting wearied. There is nothing repulsiv about him. He is clean and pleasant. We hav invited him to call on his tour next fall, and hav dubbed him the blond John E. Remsburg.

We received a copy of H. H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" about a year ago. We read it, and thought we were in good company, and hav been loaning it ever since The last time we loaned it was to my wife's intimate friend, a Christian lady, and we asked her what she thought of it, and her reply was that she "thought Miss Gardener was a smart woman."

We are not making any wild demonstration, but are proud to say that the Leon Secular Union is not a thing on paper, but has a corps of officers that will compare favorably with the national organization for ability. Mr. A. E. Hall accepted the office of president at the very first, and showed he was not a moral coward; and he is away from home so much that we hav lately elected Mr. A. Hamilton to lead us and aid in organization. He is a man of refinement, and has devoted his life to the sick, being a doctor and a man of ability. J. W. LONG.

ALLIANCE, O., Nov. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The friends of Geo. W. Thornburgh, president of the Secular Union of Alliance, O., were invited to meet himself and family at the residence of R. G. Smith on the evening of the 6th inst, the occasion being a farewell party, as they are removing to Longmont, Col. The evening proved to be very unpleasant with rain and mud. However, about forty-five Liberals were present, who passed a most enjoyable evening, during which a nice collation was served. The friends had prepared a little surprise in the shape of a valuable gold chain and seal or charm. Also the ladies gave Mrs. Thornburgh some choice toilet articles. She in receiving them remarked that though pleased she would hav preferred all their pictures. The presentation was made by J. F. Kryder, one of our stanch young Liberals, in a neat little speech, which was feelingly responded to by Mr. Thornburgh for himself and wife. After this Mrs. Haines read the following lines which were sent by the writer, who was unavoidably prevented from being present, as in a measure expressing our appreciation of Mr. Thornburgh's work:

To-night we greet and clasp the hand
Of one we claim as friend and brother,
And for an hour in sweet and social converse
Meet as comrades true.
Yet on the morrow he shall speed away
To other friends and duties.
We meet to say good-bye to-night.
And while we gather here 'tis meet
To cast a backward glance o'er memory's page.
What find we there recorded of our friend?
Forever foremost in the vanguard for the right,
He bears aloft the standard of Freethought;
He will not bow to dead and useless creed,
Nor will he aid to bind the chain of superstition;
He will be free to think and act
And aid the cause he loves.
For this we giv to him this meed of praise,
For this our reverent recognition
As friend and brother in a cause most true.
And we would giv to him
The full assurance of our grateful hearts,
That he has ever served the cause
Of mental liberty and of equal rights
So nobly in our midst.
Farewell.

You hav our best and earnest wishes for your health and happiness, and we are sure that in your Western home the light of mental liberty will shine abroad to cheer and bless as it has us. Good-bye.

Mr. Thornburgh has been prominently identified with the Liberal work here for many years as one of a quartet of singers, and also as president of the Independent church. which is composed of the Liberal element of the place of all shades of belief and all degrees of opinion on all subjects among which are the Liberal and conservativ Spiritualists, the Materialists, and Agnostics, etc. His absence will be deeply felt and regretted, but another locality will be benefited in a like ratio. And we hereby recommend our friend to the Liberals of Longmont and vicinity as a gentleman of sterling qualities, and a valuable acquisition to their ranks. Also we shall miss with regret his wife and family, who hav a warm place in our hearts, for Mrs. Thornburgh is as stanch a Liberal as her husband, and we bespeak for her a cordial welcome as well as the young people.

MRS. S. S. ROCKHILL.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Nov. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Meeting a friend whose leaning is mildly orthodox, he said, "Your patron saint, Colonel Ingersoll, has been swearing again—swearing at Jo Cook." No, no!—stoop to that!—that would be a condescension! Anything more? "He is reported as saying, 'Damn such religion!' or, 'such a doctrin!'" Let me read what he did say, and honestly answer if he was not right.

Only a savage—and that is doubtful—would charge the creator with what your doctrin, which you call religion, does. It must degrade, demoralize, and brutalize any and all but a man of wood with a heart of stone.

We hav no saints, but hav some martyrs. I once heard an estimable lady, good and kind, as the world goes, say she "would like to see Colonel Ingersoll served the same as Servetus was by Calvin"—by your St. Calvin. She thought and said it because under the influence and bondage of that damnable doctrin. She ate of the body and drank of the blood at the altar Presbyterian.

And, my friend, this is a single illustration of many, proving the demoralizing influence of that doctrin and that kind of religion.

Years ago I was living in a centrally located city in the state of New York—this apropos of the profanity of a distinguished citizen of that state. On the occasion of the death of Horace Greeley, two resident clergymen, one young, the other past the meridian, both ranking high in the line of their profession, improved the opportunity by delivering memorial sermons. The first was somewhat noted as having seceded in a very independent way from a leading and influential Baptist church, and at that time with fitting propriety might hav been called a monk of the order Unitarian. Both discourses were eloquent tributes in memory of the distinguished editor and great journalist. But the younger clergyman had accepted as a fact, what so many were saying, and hardly anyone believed, that on occasions he was very profane. He said that Greeley would swear—not, as the less discreet had it, like the devil—but, like a pirate. The other, and older, was then pastor of a Baptist church in the same city. Meeting him soon after, I said: "It is apparent from your discourse that you were personally and familiarly acquainted with Mr. Greeley." And calling his attention to the remarks of his younger associate in relation to the alleged profanity, etc., requested that he tell what he knew about it. His reply was substantially this: "I hav known him long, and my intercourse with him has been of such a nature that I can bear testimony from personal knowledge that few nobler, truer men hav benefited the world by living, and that the time has yet to come when a true estimate can be made of his worth and endeavors in behalf of progress and humanity. About the profanity, you know when a lie is once started the newspapers make public property of it, and others are anxious to repeat it. All there is of it is soon told. On some occasions when coming to the office and disorder was manifest, in a mild way he would say, 'Boys, why the devil can't we hav system and order?' and, 'Damn it, you know these things annoy me!' Now, there is no swearing in that; but there is no necessity of our saying or using words of that kind." I think now, as I then did, that it was pretty good authority, and the definition correct. The religious opinions of Mr. Greeley were almost identical with those of Paine, Parker, May, Phillips, Garrison, and Gerritt Smith.

In a city on the western border of the state of New York is living a bishop, of the church Protestant Episcopal, who said that if the reporters were not mistaken, the followers of Paine were following a hyena, and those who worshiped at his shrine were worshiping one. The occasion was the erection of a monument, or some demonstration of the kind, in memory of Paine, not many years ago, in St. Louis.

There may be some romance in this: It is told that during the Reign of Terror in France, a ship was loaded with priests and bishops, scuttled, and sunk, cargo and all, beneath the waters of the English Channel. If true, it is possible greater mistakes hav been made. They may not hav deserved that fate, and again they may. We don't know what crimes and outrages they were guilty of, or what vile things they may hav said. But this we know, if that bishop had been living in France at that time, he would hav been tendered a ticket and free ride in that excursion. J. VAN DENBURGH.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Oct. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: With pleasure I occasionally read a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER procured from the newsdealer, but at the same time often wonder why so much hypocritical superstition prevails in the midst of apparent intelligence and where such truths are expounded as are contained in your most valuable journal. But I well remember that I once was also one of priestcraft's deluded dupes, believing that hell was a literal lake of fire and the home of the damned.

But since reading Freethought and Liberal literature I am perfectly cured of that disease, and am more convinced of the fact that priestcraft has deluded all nations of the earth. Freethought is now undermining its foundations, and will bring about its final overthrow, which will most surely bring about a new era and one of peace and joy to the inhabitants of the earth.

I am perhaps over-zealous, like Paul after his reputed miraculous conversion. I am turned with all my might against religious dogmas and delusions and priestcraft humbuggery, which twenty years ago I believed and advocated, and am now one of your number, discarding not only religious humbuggery but political as well, and am a thorough seeker after the whole truth. For twenty years I hav worked hard with those miners who are digging out the rotten and abominable foundation of priestcraft delusion and political shysterdom, and as I do not know of any better instrument to work with than THE TRUTH SEEKER'S extensiv circulation, I will state to you what I am impressed to do, if agreeable. Now, in St. Louis religious prejudice is very great, but at the same time a Liberal sentiment is on the rise amongst many of the citizens, and if at present several hundred or a thousand copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER were distributed at a small price, or even given away free if the Truth Seeker Company can afford it, an immense number of new subscribers might be the result. Besides, it would be a powerful stimulus to the rise of Freethought in St. Louis. I am, as I previously stated, very anxious that there shall be such an advance of Liberalism in St. Louis. I believe it will be the result that the Truth Seeker Company will be the gainers by such distribution, regardless of such local agencies as your company may now hav for the distribution of TRUTH SEEKERS. One reason I hav for making this suggestion is, I am at present working for Freethought, published in San Francisco, and also for the Alarm, of your city, but a more powerful lever than these, such as THE TRUTH SEEKER, is required in St. Louis, and as I am devoting part of my time in spreading the Freethought gospel I will also work for THE TRUTH SEEKER. If your company deems it advisable to make such a step toward the further advancing of THE TRUTH SEEKER I will make the distribution of any number of copies and make such terms as will be agreeable to the company.

Yours fraternally, L. HARTER.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to call the attention of all truth seekers to a book the perusal of which I hav lately enjoyed. It is a work by Edgar C. Beall entitled, "The Brain and the Bible," in which the author, with sound and incontrovertible logic, shows the irreconcilability of science and religion, the brain and the Bible, and proves satisfactorily and conclusivly, to my mind at least, that the substance called brain is "the soul of man," and that the mind, "soul," or "spirit" is great or small just in proportion to the size and quality of its organ. The book, I am sure, will prove interesting to all Liberals whether Spiritualists, Agnostics, or Materialists. It is nicely bound, beautifully printed, and the price is only $1. That it is prefaced by Colonel Ingersoll ought not to be the least inducement.

I feel convinced that phrenology—a science yet so little recognized and understood—is the instrument that shall in time uproot and do away with all superstition in regard to the great and perplexing "soul" question. The theory of "total depravity," as taught by the church, held up in the light of reason and science appears unsound and unreasonable, for science and the history of the human race show that, instead of declining, mankind, in spite of the degrading influences of religion, is steadily advancing and growing, intellectually as well as morally. It is the law of evolution.

The soul is a trinity,
Intellect, will, and emotion in one;
This man's affinity
Is to divinity,
This is the sainthood by manhood outdone.

A writer in the Phrenological Journal some time ago, under the heading of "Evidences of a Spiritual Body" advances some very peculiar statements as "proof of the existence in man of a spiritual body," and quotes scripture in support of his views. He says: "The human body is triune—body (matter), life, and spirit." But what constitutes life outside of body (matter) and spirit? Paul says: There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body. From this we must assume that the "spiritual body" is not natural. What is a "spiritual body," and how can we conceive of a body un- or super- natural? Again, he says:

Matter cannot feel.
" " think.
" " sin.
" " act.

These assertions are ridiculous, and do not reflect much credit upon their phrenological (?) promulgator, for what else than matter has the sense of feeling? That matter can think has been conclusivly demonstrated by the science of phrenology. That brain is matter and the organ of the mind, and that thinking is done with the brain, is universally conceded.

He further goes on to show that the lower animals hav not a spiritual body, as they are only "acted upon by their life and the laws of their being," and as they do not possess many qualities bestowed upon man, "such as love of family, love of the beautiful, pity, calculation, cause and effect, provision against coming want, protection," etc. Now, science has demonstrated, and we know from experience, that many animals hav these instincts as a consequence of corresponding cerebral developments, even if some of them are but very small and hardly noticeable; for instance, the St. Bernard dog sets an example to many human beings in regard to benevolence and pity, and many birds lead a model domestic life and provide for the coming day. One of his principal "evidences of a personal spirit" is, "the general belief by savage and by civilized in such a spirit." This proves nothing but ignorance of the laws of nature, as we know that the more civilized and enlightened a people, the more broad and liberal are its views on this and all subjects; and I believe that as the heavy fog which covers the earth vanishes for the sparkling rays of the morning sun, so will the dark clouds of superstition and ignorance giv way to the mighty influence of science and common sense. I believe that in the far distant future there will be a time when people will no longer hav faith in myths, ghosts, and gods; when they will look back with terror even on this our enlightened nineteenth century; when the human race will hav reached such a state of intellectual development that, by the aid of science, they will be able to show every myth, every mystery, and every phenomenon to hav a natural source.

It is asserted that there exist, even to this day, savage tribes who hav not the faintest conception of any deity whatever—who, in common with the brutes, simply recognize the existence of natural beings or forces more powerful than themselvs, and who know no higher God than their chief.

I hav no doubt, however, that we shall liv on forever—in the language of Courtlandt Palmer:

And so when the birth of us
Shall to the death of our bodies giv place,
Then all the worth of us,
Freed from the earth of us,
Deathless shall liv in the life of the race.

C. HANSON.

MILWAUKEE, ORE., NOV. 6, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Ritchey thinks I greatly overestimate her articles. If controverting nearly all her statements and showing them to be blunders and mistakes is doing her too much honor, she is quite welcome to the compliment. It does seem to require a great deal of moral (?) courage in a young person who is "naturally of a retiring disposition" to offer the intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER those old alleged facts and arguments with which all of us who were readers of Buckland, Pye Smith, Hitchcock, and Hugh Miller were perfectly familiar, and, in the course of our intellectual evolution, had outgrown before she was born.

If Mrs. Ritchey did not know that what was offered in THE TRUTH SEEKER would be likely to be subjected to rigorous criticism, she will probably ascertain that fact, whether she takes in any scientific or exegetical lessons or not.

The publications in which pious people print effete inanities purporting to reconcile scripture with science and then shut off controversy are all Christian. Freethinkers hav a different way of transacting business, and if Mrs. Ritchey thought that was their method, she will find herself not only in the wrong pew, but in the wrong church.

Mrs. Ritchey still insists that "there is such a thing as an expanse" between the waters above and the waters below. Her proof is that she has been gazing at the "fleecy clouds so perfectly balanced in mid-air as if upheld by some strong, invisible hand," and "thinking of the wonderful works of him who is perfect in wisdom." Most of us hav looked at the clouds. The other morning I was going to Portland on the Willamette through a thick fog. The particles were large enough to be visible to the naked eye. This fog gradually rose up the hillsides and formed clouds. About noon some clouds were resting against Mount Hood above the timber line, up in the region of perpetual snow. Toward night a cloud was resting on the very top of the mountain, and high above this were some "fleecy clouds." The rise of vapor depends upon the fact that the particles, which form in globules, present surfaces proportioned to the squares of their diameters, while their weight is as the cubes of their diameters. The minuter the division the higher they rise. Those "fleecy clouds" come as near to nothing as can well be imagined except the God who can exercise his muscle by holding them up with an invisible hand. In thinking of such an immense exercise of power one can almost evolve enthusiasm enough to exclaim with the Salvation Army, "Hurrah for God!" So long as it is simply a matter of fancy, would it not be better, instead of putting God to the trouble of staying up in the intense cold to hold up the fleecy clouds, to let the clouds float along with the wind that "bloweth where it listeth," and this God retire to the region which Lucretius has assigned to the rest of the gods:

The lucid interspace of world and world,
Where never creeps a cloud or moves a wind,
Nor ever floats the least white star of snow,
Nor ever lowest roll of thunder moans,
Nor ever human sorrow mounts to mar—
There sacred, everlasting calm?

Mrs. Ritchey says that "Gen. i, 14–19, states that the light of the sun did not shine on the earth until the fourth day." It does not state anything of the kind. It says God made sun, moon, and stars on that day. It says that he "set them in the firmament." ["A second purpose which the rakia served was to support the heavenly bodies—sun, moon, and stars, into which they were fixed as nails." Smith's Bible Dictionary.] The account says that he made the sun, moon, and stars on that day, and if that day was a geological period then there were three preceding periods, during the last of which there were grass, herbs, and fruit-trees, and no sunshine. That was the biggest day's work of the whole week, but Mrs. Ritchey tells us that all that God did on that day was to brush away the clouds and let the sun shine upon the earth. Of course we understand now that God is taking a rest and we can't expect him to do much. He just holds up the light clouds and sits on the heavy ones when he wants to rest. But in those days when he had his working clothes on, and before ten-hour laws were enacted, and when days were longer than thousands of years, one would hardly expect to find him spending a whole "day"

Waiting till the clouds roll by,

and then claiming in his inspired history that he made the sun, moon, and stars on that day. What a humbug such a God is, and what intellectual weaklings it makes of his followers who are compelled to offer such trash as this, which bears not the slightest resemblance either to the account in the Bible or the facts of science, and repeat it over year after year, calling it a reconciliation of scripture with science! Horace Mann, in commenting upon Dr. Pye Smith's scheme of harmonizing Genesis with geology, and contemplating the intellectual inanity to which these attempts at reconciliation inevitably lead, makes this pointed comparison: "Everybody knows the effect of continuous intermarriages among persons related by consanguinity. The cognate blood, unenriched and unstimulated from other fountains, soon breeds weakness, disease, and imbecility. Just so it is with a sect that shuts out truth because it was not embraced in the scheme of its founders. The ideas of such a sect hav no alternativ for their continued existence but to breed in and in, and this by a psychological law as immutable as the physiological, soon begets a progeny of faith erroneous, absurd, imbecil, and idiotic."

Mrs. Ritchey uses the present tense in describing God's resting day instead of the past tense, which is invariably employed in the Bible. It says God rested on the seventh day—not that he is resting in the present period. "In six days God made the heaven and the earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed" (Ex. xxxi, 17).

Mrs. Ritchey knows all about God's sleeping and waking hours. She says: "The seventh day has lasted some six thousand years, and no one can tell how much longer it will last." I should think not. When Gabriel blows his trump maybe God will rouse up with the rest of the sleepers. Let him rest. So long as the devil is wide-awake and doing business at the old stand we shall get along very well.

Mrs. Ritchey says this is no time or place to discuss the genealogy of Jesus Christ. No. There is no time or place for honest discussion on that subject. It stands simply thus: Matthew says Jacob begat Joseph. Smith says Jacob was the father of Mary. Luke says Joseph was the son of Heli. Mrs. Ritchey may be right in regarding Smith's article as "a most excellent treatis" from a theological standpoint, but from the standpoint of honesty and truth it is a roundabout way of telling a lie.

Mrs Ritchey says that "never within the range of man's observation has a variety been produced so essentially different from the order of animals from whence it sprang as to produce steril offspring by cross-breeding." It seems, according to Mrs. Ritchey's classification, orders are made up of varieties without any intermediate families, genera, or species. I suppose she means to say that no varieties hav come to differ so much from each other as to constitute what she calls species. The English rabbit was placed on the island of Porto Santo about four hundred years ago. It has become so different in size, shape, color, and habits, that it will not mate with the English rabbit. We might refer to numerous instances like this, but owing to the fact that several phenomena occurred before the present generation was born, we can understand this subject better by studying archæology and paleontology. Rütimeyer says that the ancient European bison, the remains of which are associated with those of ancient man, was identical with the American bison; and that the modern auroch is descended from it, the remains of intermediate varieties being numerous. Nothing is more certain than that the men whose remains are associated in Europe with those of the cave bear, the cave hyena, saber-toothed tiger, and numerous other extinct animals, preceded very nearly all of the existing species of mammals. The remains of the varieties which connect present species with those of paleolithic man hav been found in great numbers. It has been proved that domestic dogs are descended from different species of wild animals.

It is not because the years of Mrs. Ritchey's life hav been few, but because she has not even a rudimentary knowledge of the subject she is trying to talk about, that she doesn't "happen to know" how I ascertained in what particular manner the eohippus walked. Any intelligent child of ten years can easily be made to understand the difference in structure between the foot of a plantigrade and a digitigrade. Does Mrs. Ritchey see how it can be known to a reasonable certainty that the eohippus didn't walk on his ears? What she "doesn't happen to know" would evidently fill a large volume, but she will not make much progress in acquiring knowledge till she ceases to make that the entire basis of her discourse.

Mrs. Ritchey wants to know why the change from eohippus to equus "ought not to hav taken place by the gradual diminishing of all the toes at once instead of a sudden dropping off of one or more toes in the particular manner which has been described." That beats any scientific proposition I ever met. I simply stated the facts, and now she wants to know why they were not different from what they were—why something didn't happen entirely different from what occurred. If old Mrs. Collar, who used to talk of "the secret will of God," was alive, we could refer it to her, but it is entirely out of my jurisdiction.

If I ever described "the sudden dropping off of one or more toes" I am an idiot. Substantiate the charge and I will at once retire to the asylum and trouble THE TRUTH SEEKER readers no more forever.

Mrs. Ritchey has modified her statement and concedes "four or five" instead of "five or six" kinds of "hippus" between eohippus and the horse. I had just told her there were more than thirty. Does she dispute my word? Professor Aughey in a lecture before the Nebraska legislature on the geology of that state, in the winter of 1872-3, said: "Nothing is more difficult than to tell the difference between the horse and the ass by their teeth alone. I recollect, when studying comparativ anatomy in Philadelphia, I procured some teeth of a horse, a mule, and an ass, and mixed them together. I found I could not tell them apart. I submitted them to a celebrated comparativ anatomist, and, to my delight, found he could not tell them apart either. But there are more than twenty species of these ancestors of the horse found within the limits of Nebraska, Kansas, and Wyoming, so different that I can easily distinguish them by their teeth alone." The varieties are very numerous—so much so that after examining Professor Marsh's collection in Yale College, Professor Huxley considered the proof of the evolution of the horse as complete as that which establishes the Copernican system. The pliohippus differed slightly from the horse, excepting that it had little hooflets on the ends of the "splint-bones." History describes the celebrated horse of Alexander the Great, Bucephalus, as having these rudimentary toes. Several instances of this kind hav occurred in modern times. Prof. Oscar Smidt tells us that a horse of that kind was for a long time on exhibition in Germany. These cases of reversion to ancestral types are of common occurrence throughout the animal kingdom. They are explicable only in the light of evolution. The problem of the evolution of the horse has been worked out both ways.

Mrs. Ritchey does not like nature's way of getting up frogs, by absorbing their tails, evolving their swim bladders into lungs, aborting their gills, and adding another auricle to the heart. Yet this is the way it is done, and it is worked out by evolution, and the result is "such a useless thing as a frog." I agree with Mrs. Ritchey that it does look about as foolish as anything can; but I can't see that it looks any better when considered "as the unfolding of an intelligent plan" and as the work of him "who is perfect in wisdom.' And God has been making amphibians ever since the carboniferous period, and has not yet discovered any better way o making "such a useless thing as a frog." D. PRIESTLEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Time to Hate.

I hav a friend—I mean a foe—
Whom cordially I ought to hate;
But somehow I can never seem
To lay the feud between us straight.
When apple boughs are full of bloom,
And Nature loves her fellow-men
With all the witchery of spring,
How can you hate a fellow then?

And then when summer comes, with days
Full of a long and languid charm,
When even water-lilies sleep
On waves without a thought of harm,
When underneath the shadiest tree
My hammock hangs in idlest state,
I were an idiot to get up
Out of that hammock just to hate.

The harvests come. If mine is big,
I am too happy with my store;
If small, I'm too much occupied
With grubbing round to make it more.
In dim recesses of my mind
I hav no idle hour to spend
In hunting up the bitter foe
Who simply ought to be my friend.

In winter! Well, in winter—ugh!—
Who would add hate to winds that freeze?
All love and warmth that I can get
I want in such dull days as these.
No, no, dear foe; it is no use;
The struggling year is at an end;
I cannot hate you if I would,
And you must turn and be my friend.

When the Frost is On the Punpkin.

When the frost is on the punpkin and the fodder's in the shock,
And you hear the kyouck and gobble of the strut-tin' turkey-cock,
And the clackin' of the guineys and the cluckin' of the hens,
And the rooster's hallylooyer as he tiptoes on the fence!
Oh, it's then the times a feller is a-feelin' at his best,
With the risin' sun to greet him from a night of peaceful rest,
As he leaves the house, bareheaded, and goes out to feed the stock,
When the frost is on the punpkin and the fodder's in the shock.

They's something kindo' hearty like about the atmosphere
When the heat of summer's over and the coolin' fall is here—
Of course, we miss the flowers, and the blossoms on the trees,
And the mumble of the hummin'-birds and buzzin of the bees,
But the air's so appetizin', and the landscape through the haze
Of the crisp and sunny morning of the early autumn days
Is a p'ictur' that no painter has the colorin' to mock—
When the frost is on the punpkin and the fodder's in the shock.

The husky, rusty rustle of the tossels of the corn,
And the raspin' of the tangled leaves, as golden as the morn;
The stubble in the furries—kindo' lonesome-like, but still
A-preachin' sermons to us of the barns they growed to fill;
The straw-stack in the medder, and the reaper in the shed;
The hosses in their stall below—the clover overhead—
Oh, it sets my heart a-clickin', like the tickin' of a clock,
When the frost is on the punpkin and the fodder's in the shock!

Somebody.

Somebody crawls into mamma's bed
Just at the break of day,
Snuggles up close and whispers loud,
"Somebody's come to stay."

Somebody rushes through the house,
Never once shuts a door;
Scatters her playthings all around,
Over the nursery floor.

Climbs on the fence and tears her clothes—
Never a bit cares she—
Swings on the gate and makes mud-pies—
Who can somebody be?

Somebody looks with roguish eyes
Up through her tangled hair;
"Somebody's me," she says, "but then Somebody doesn't care."

A Good Memory.

A good memory is an excellent quality. He who possesses it, with a quick mind, is sure of victory in the battle of life, that is, if morally strong.

Some are born with defectiv memory. We come into being with certain gifts from our ancestors in our hands—or heads, rather. If they did not present us with a large memory, there is so much loss charged to our account. In reality the loss should be charged to the one back of us. With the gift of a great memory, school-days are never tiresome, business is almost amusement, and success is very certain.

There are some who are born with wonderful memories. Elihu Burritt, the "learned blacksmith," was one of these gifted persons. Were it not for his great powers of memory he would always hav remained a blacksmith instead of rising to the positions of editor, lecturer, professor, reformer, author, and publisher, as well as a consul to Birmingham in England. He was master of several languages, in which he could speak and write fluently.

Cardinal Mezzofanti, it is said, knew a hundred languages, and never forgot one word that he ever learned.

There are instances, however, where people hav possessed excellent memories but were deficient in powers of reflection and ability to generate new ideas. In such cases, memory does not serve any great purpose. Partial idiots hav been known to remember and repeat everything they ever heard, but all the words were meaningless to them. Unlettered negroes, as a rule, hav very good memories, and, sometimes, the more ignorant they are, the greater is the memory. It may be that, being unable to read, they are led to pay stricter attention to that which they hear, for they sometimes seem to hear with eyes as well as ears, and thus matters are placed with greater exactness upon their minds. Dr. Moffatt, the African missionary, once preached a very long sermon to a company of negroes. After the sermon was finished, he observed a crowd gathered around a simple-looking fellow, listening intently. Drawing near, he discovered that the young negro was just preaching his sermon again, repeating word for word the whole discourse, and even imitating his every look and gesture.

Memory is valuable always, and the more valuable when it leads to new thought and exercise of the reflectiv faculties. We should read, ponder, reflect, and remember.

Correspondence.

TUSCALOOSA, ALA., Nov. 16, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would like to join the happy band of Liberals. I liv in the country near Coaling, Ala., but I am going to school in Tuscaloosa. I am fourteen years old. Father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I enjoy reading it, but hav missed it very much since I left home. I enjoy reading Liberal papers and books. If some of the Liberals will write to me I will gladly answer them. I will close my letter.

I remain, Your true friend,
FLORENCE WARD.

HEATHSVILLE, ILL., Nov. 13, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write a few lines to the Children's Corner for the first time. I am six years old. We do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. My uncle takes it, and I hear him read from it, and I like it very much. I always like to hear the Children's Corner read. I hav never been to school; we liv so far from the school-house. I am not large enough to go so far by myself, so my mamma teaches me at home.

I never believed there was a God, for I never hav seen him or heard of anybody that ever did see him; and I do not see any reason that there is a God.

I would like to correspond with some of the little girls of the Corner.

I was named Elmina after Elmina Slenker the writer.

For fear I am making my letter too long for the first one, I had better close. Hoping to see this in print in the next paper, I am,

Your Freethinker friend,
ELMINA ODESSA FULLER.

Emma K.—It must be of the very highest order to receive compensation. Only the best quality is paid for.—ED. C. C.

Lewis Morris, Palatka, Fla.—The "darling little girls" who read the "Nantucket Anecdotes" in the Children's Corner are bright enough to understand that these occurrences were in the old, old time, before women, or men, either, were familiar with any except the plainest cooking. One knowing nothing whatever of the properties of chocolate, and never having seen the article, might readily fall into such a mistake. So of the tea and the corn-bread. Any added explanation our friend may choose to make will be gladly welcomed to the Corner. Please write with ink, as the letters from Florida are so fumigated as to render pencil-marks almost illegible.—ED. C. C.

For Reviving Persons Apparently Dead.

At a meeting of the last congress of German scientists this subject was discussed, and Dr. H. Frank mentioned that there are but two ways to stimulate the heart—electricity and mechanical concussion of the heart. The first is considered dangerous by him, as it may easily destroy the last power of contraction remaining in the organ; but what is termed "pectoral concussion" is decidedly preferable. Dr. Frank's method is as follows: He flexes the hands on the wrist to an obtuse angle, places them both near each other in the ileo-cæcal region, and makes vigorous strokes in the direction of the heart and of the diaphragm. These strokes are repeated from fifteen to twenty times, and are succeeded by a pause, during which he strikes the chest over the heart repeatedly with the palm of his hand. In favorable cases this method is early successful, and sometimes a twitching of the lids or the angles of the mouth appears with surprising rapidity as the first sign of returning life. As soon as the symptoms are noted, the simple manipulations above described must be earnestly continued, and persevered in for from a half hour to an hour, for with their cessation the phenomena indicating beginning return of life also cease. Generally the face assumes a slight reddish tint, and at the same time a faint pulsation may be felt in the carotids. By this method Dr. Frank has seen life return in fourteen cases, amongst which were such as had hanged themselvs, drowned, and asphyxiated by carbonic oxide, and in one case by croup. In three cases of asphyxia by coal gas, and in one case of apparent death by chloroform, the method described alone succeeded.

Barometer and Thermometer.

The barometer or weather-glass is an instrument for measuring the variations in the weight of the air. On the approach of moist and stormy weather the air is heavier than at other times.

The thermometer, on the other hand, is an instrument for showing variations in the temperature of the air, that is, for telling us the degrees of heat or cold.

Barometer strictly means weight-measurer; while thermometer means heat-measurer. The barometer is a column of mercury inclosed in a glass tube, which is open at the bottom. This column rises or falls as the air which presses on it grows heavier or lighter. The thermometer is a column of mercury inclosed in a glass tube which is sealed up from the air both at the top and bottom. The mercury rises or falls as the varying heat or cold of the air expands or contracts it.

Names of the Months.

The Roman names of the months, as settled by Augustus, hav also been used in all Christian countries excepting Holland, where the following set of names prevails:

January	Lauwmaand	Chilly month.
February	Sprokelmaand	Vegetatioa month.
March	Lentmaand	Spring month.
April	Grasmaand	Grass month.
May	Blowmaand	Flower month.
June	Zomermaand	Summer month.
July	Hooymaand	Hay month.
August	Oostmaand	Harvest month.
September	Herstmaand	Autumu month.
October	Wynmaand	Wine month.
November	Slagtmaand	Slaughter month.
December	Wintermaand	Winter month.

These characteristic names of the months are the remains of the ancient Gaulish titles, which were also used by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors.

Thunder Defined.

Thunder is understood to be the result of the sudden reëntrance of the air into a vacuum. This void is supposed to be generated by the lightning in its passage through the air. The electricity givs a powerful repulsiv force to the particles of air along the path of its discharge, thus making a momentary vacuum, into which the surrounding air rushes immediately, with a violence proportioned to the intensity of the electricity.

The Two Dogs.

Two dogs one day went lion-hunting, one of them being a smart dog with a classical education, and the other being very ignorant and unsophisticated. Pretty soon they struck the track of the lion, and the educated dog started off in the direction of the royal beast, while his ignorant companion, making an absurd mistake, took the back track and started off in the opposit direction. In a few minutes the educated dog was serving as an inanimate free lunch for an enormous lion, while the ignorant dog escaped unhurt.

MORAL: This fable teaches that classical lore should be plentifully sprinkled with practical knowledge.

First Things.

The American flag was first used by Washington at Cambridge, Jan. 1, 1776.

The first fire insurance office opened in America was at Boston, in 1724.

The first life insurance company established in America was at Philadelphia, 1812.

Sugar cane was first cultivated in the United States near New Orleans, in 1751.

The military academy at West Point was founded by Congress March 16, 1802.

The United States Naval Academy at Annapolis was opened October 10, 1845.

The first American express was between New York and Boston, 1821.

The first American library was established at Harvard College in 1638.

We hav made arrangements whereby we can offer these magnificent prose poems of Mr. Ingersoll's at greatly reduced prices. The Tributes are printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22 inches, illuminated border, large clear type, suitable for framing. The titles are:

The Vision of War.

The Grant Banquet Toast.

The price of these heretofore has been 50cts. We offer them at FIFTEEN CENTS EACH; THE TWO FOR TWENTY-FIVE CTS. Mailed secure from breakage. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE

FIELD-INGERSOLL

DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Books, Pamphlets, and Papers.

"Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," is the title of an essay by T. E. Longshore, of Philadelphia, which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER lately, and has now been printed in pamphlet form. It is intended by Mr. Longshore as a document to be handed to Christians to start their thinker into motion. It is, as the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember, a brief history of the trinity, exposing its pagan origin and its impossible nature. Mr. Longshore writes calmly and forcibly, and the pamphlet admirably fulfills its purpose. Price, 5 cents.

"Catholic Menace to Our Government," is one of L. K. Washburn's lectures printed in neat pamphlet form by the Investigator. Mr. Washburn is one of those who clearly see where the success of the Catholic church would land this nation, and he sees also that the church is making progress toward her goal. This lecture should be put into the hands of all anti-Catholics in the country to wake them up. Price, 5 cents.

"Religious Problems," is another of L. K. Washburn's lectures, printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER and made into pamphlet form, with a cover. It is full of epigrams, wit, and sound philosophy, and will in this shape be highly prized by Freethinkers. Price, 10 cents.

"A Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem." A poetic story connected with a trial at that place which has since become famous because of the factitious importance of the criminal. The present writing is an inquiry into the motivs of one Judas, said to hav betrayed one Christus, and a quasi defense of the traitor, with incidental condemnation of some other persons called apostles who followed Christus—

A strange, mad set, and full of fancies wild—
A little crazed.

Published by Colby & Rich, of Boston. Price, 10 cents.

"Beliefs about the Soul," is the title of an article by R. A. Oakes, in the December Popular Science Monthly. It is full of curious traditions of civilized and savage peoples, relating to immortality and to plurality of souls.

The National Liberator is a new paper started to defend the medical profession from the orthodox school who would imprison a physician for curing his patient by other methods or medicin than those prescribed in the old school creed. Among the editorial staff appear the names of Dr. E. B. Foote, of this city; Prof. J. R. Buchanan, of Boston; Dr. Alexander Wilde, of Newark; Professor Ross, of Toronto, and other eminent men. The National Liberator is published in Boston by the National Constitutional Liberty League, Hotel Glendon, Columbus avenue. Eclectic physicians everywhere should support this paper stoutly. Price, $1 per annum.

The Christmas number of the New York Mirror is announced for early publication, Saturday, December 1st. The editor, Harrison Grey Fiske, has engaged a numerous body of contributors, including celebrated actors, playwrights, and dramatic critics. The list of writers includes M. Constant Coquelin, W. J. Florence, E. H. Sothern, Kyrle Bellew, Clara Louise Kellogg, Rosina Vokes, Mary Fiske, "Bab," Henry C. De Mille, Sydney Rosenfeld, William Gillette, William Winter, A. C. Wheeler (Nym Crinkle), Joseph Howard, Jr., and the Hon. A. J. Dittenhoefer. The number will be profusely illustrated, and it promises to be very attractiv. Price, 25 cents.

F. Berger, of 853 Broadway, this city, has printed a little pamphlet of "French Conversations, and Idiomatic Expressions and Proverbs," to illustrate how badly the French language is usually taught in this country, and how well Mr. Berger can teach it. Price, 25 cents.

"The Excellent Religion," is an essay "on the relations existing between Agnosticism, the Polar Theory of Being, and the Higher Theism," by G. C. Griffith-Jones, who writes for the London Secular Review over the name of "Lara." Mr. Jones attempts to answer by the Excellent Religion the questions, What am I? Whence do I come? and Whither do I go? To the first he says, "Thou art, for thyself, all that is, all that has been, and all that ever shall be." He finds that we come "from the infinit abyss of unconditioned absolute being," and go back into these depths or ascend still higher—which, he does not explain. Mr. Jones has a god, purely and wholly Good. This god is not responsible for evil. The Christian God he regards as an infernal deity, and shows it by this question: What would you think of a man who sent a child into a powder magazine with a box of matches, and then damned it to all eternity because it blew itself up? The cost of this pamphlet is 25 cents.

"The Sabbath Imposture," by Harry Hoover, is published by Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearney street, San Francisco, Cal. It is a consideration of Sunday laws from religious, moral, and legal points of view. The Bible, the Christian fathers, and the founders of this republic are brought to oppose the seventh-day tyranny of the church, and after perusal unprejudiced persons will conclude that Sunday laws hav no business on the state or national statute-books. The work consists of 24 pp., is neatly printed, and sells for 10 cents. It is a good document to distribute in Sunday-ridden communities, and nowhere is it more needed than in the home of its author.

"When Age Grows Young," by Hyland Kirk, is another romance intended to uphold a serious subject, which in this case is that physical immortality may some time be attained by the human race. We hav not read the book, and will therefore take Sunset Cox's word for it that it is interesting both in plot, description, and colloquy. Published by C. T. Dillingham, and sold at this office for 50 cents in paper covers.

"The Story of an African Farm," by Ralph Iron (Olive Schriener), is a book of the same sort as "Robert Elsmere" and "John Ward, Preacher," only more so. The writer is the daughter of a deceased missionary, once employed in South Africa as a governess. The book is said to be largely her personal experience. It is, however, more radical than either of the two others mentioned, and not a whit less powerfully written. No one can read it without perceiving that its author is a woman of mature reason, strong love, and great literary ability. Few, perhaps, will commend her heroin, but people with human sympathy will find it hard to condemn her. The story is of a young girl among the Boers of South Africa. As she grows up she grows away from the rude people around her, and craves love and sympathy to match her ideals. This she partly finds in an uncouth youth who would be an artist if educated, but he does not satisfy the other side of her nature. Another man, cynical, worldly, stronger than she, commands her, and with him she runs away. Another lover pursues her and finds her after a while, alone and dying. The world has been a bitter failure to her, so misunderstood, yet so admired, so lonely among many who would hav sacrificed themselvs to help her; whose despairing cry was for love and sympathy, for something great and pure to lift her to itself. The charm of the book is in the tender and dramatic relation of the story. Miss Schriener seems to hav seen or experienced all the emotions which move hypocritical preachers, coarse Boer women, aspiring but uncultivated artist natures, commonplace people with no ambitions but cattle and potatoes, strong, worldly, cultivated men, and girls in whom Boston culture, German metaphysics, ideality, and love contend for the mastery. Pathos, cynicism, common sense, metaphysics, beauty of description, are all here; and the novel must be classed among the powerful literary efforts of the day. Published by Roberts Brothers. Price, 75 cents.

The "Agnostic Annual" for 1889, edited by Charles A. Watts, published by W. Stewart Ross & Co., of London, is at hand. The list of contributors is of a very high order, and no series of essays that we hav seen is better worth reading. Samuel Laing discusses Mr. Gladstone and Colonel Ingersoll's recent papers on Christianity, Mrs. E. Lynn Linton writes of Women and Agnosticism, Charles Watts describes the Sublimity of Nature, W. Stewart Ross contributes a poem on Immortality, and other writers fill out the 48 large pages. The "Annual" is now in its sixth year of publication, and has been one of the very few annual publications of which enough were called for to pay expenses. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"A Strange Conflict," by John M. Batchelor, is a book evidently written to draw fifty-cent pieces into the pockets of Messrs. Ogilvie & Co., who are the publishers. It is of the Jules Verne order, with Anarchist and Nihilistic arguments and refutations thrown in to fill up.

"Buddhism and Christianity Compared," is by O. Alexander A. Jayasekere, F T.S., Galle, India. It is astrological and Theosophical, but useful in comparing the life of Buddha with that of Jesus.

When E. H. Heywood writes a pamphlet he puts a whole essay on the title-page. It was one of these much be-titled books that got the Founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER into trouble. Therefore the last one he sent us we will call "Free Trade," and quote the balance of the page as an epitome of the work. "Free Trade" shows (so Mr. Heywood alleges) that medieval barbarism, cunningly termed "protection to home industry, tariff delusion, invades enterprise, defrauds labor, plunders trade, and postpones industrial emancipation." Mr. Heywood is nothing if not vehement of statement, and he imagins that in the 24 pages following this title he has proved his assertions. Those who desire to know whether he has or not can send 15 cents and get his pamphlet. We never tell secrets.

"Principles of Moral and Political Economy; or, The Republic Besieged by a Grand Sitting Army of 2,222,000 Men," is the contribution of Mr. O. D. Jones, of Washington, to the literature of the labor question. Society, according to Mr. Jones, has two prospects spread before it: "It is on the confines of the red sands and lurid sunset of the ashy desert of Anarchy; or, by a baptism of blood and fire to enter through the gates of a civil revolution to a nobler civilization." It strikes us that the blood and fire of a civil revolution are somewhat akin to the red sands and lurid sunset of Anarchy, and that the average American, like the beleaguered darky, would do well to take to the woods. The book contains 190 pages (octavo), and is probably held at 75 cents.

"Queer People with Paws and Claws," is a book for children of from six to ten years. It is written by Palmer Cox and published by Hubbard Brothers, Philadelphia. It is profusely illustrated with some of the best pictures of animal antics that the children ever saw. Every page has a picture; some pages two or three. The text is in poetry, simple and pleasing, and will, we imagin, make the children laugh out loud. The pictures certainly will. Parents will earn their children's thanks by getting the book.

The German Freethought almanac for 1889 is at hand. It contains over 120 pages (12mo), and, besides the calendar, has some two dozen prose and poetic articles by eminent German writers—Hugo Andriessen, Conrad Ries, Paul Carus, Maximilian Grossman, Rudolph Buchner, Heinrich Stern, Otto Soubron, Schunemann-Pott, Herman Rosenthal, Herman Boppe, and others. Readers of German will find the almanac a full 25 cents' worth. Freidenker Publishing Co., Milwaukee.

Another attempt to identify the lost tribes of Israel is made by the Rev. W. W. Bowyer, in "The Mysteries of Prophecy Unlocked," to which he adds a treatis on "The Millennial Kingdom, or the Glorious Reign of Christ on Earth." As we don't care where the lost tribes went to, and don't believe that Christ ever will reign anywhere, the book is of little value to us. Readers desiring it may send 25 cents to W. W. Bowyer, 24 Kelley street, Cleveland, O.

"The Science of Thought. By F. Max Müller. With an Appendix which Contains a Correspondence on 'Thought Without Words,' between F. Max Müller and Francis Galton, the duke of Argyll, George J. Romanes, and others." The main portion of this book is made up of three lectures—"The Simplicity of Language," "The Identity of Language and Thought," and "The Simplicity of Thought," delivered at the Royal Institution, London. The central idea of these lectures is an attempt to show that language, reason, thought, are identical—no reason without language, no language without reason. "Because we reason," Professor Müller says, "that is, because we reckon, because we add and subtract, therefore we say that we hav reason, and thus it happened that reason was raised into something which we hav or possess, into a faculty, or power, or something, whatever it may be, that deserves to be written with a capital R. And yet we hav only to look into the workshop of language in order to see that there is nothing substantial corresponding to this substantiv, and that neither the heart nor the brain, neither the breath nor the spirit of man, discloses its original whereabouts. It may sound violent and revolutionary to you when I say that there is no such thing as reason, and yet no philosopher, not even Kant, has ever in his definition of reason told us what it is really made of." The professor then throws down this challenge: "Try to reckon without numbers, whether spoken, written, or otherwise marked, and if you succeed in that, I shall admit that it is possible to reason or reckon without words, and that there is in us such a thing, or such a power or faculty, as reason, apart from words." The book is an elaboration of this idea, in Professor Müller's clear and patient style, and to his own satisfaction he proves by philology and philosophy, philologists and philosophers, that he is right. Locke's statement that "most men, if not all, in their thinking and reasoning within themselvs, make use of words instead of ideas," he holds to be in his favor, and he adds that philosophers generally "are ready to admit that it is almost impossible to think without words, but where this almost begins or where it ends, they never tell us. Leibnitz said: 'It troubles me greatly to find that I can never acknowledge, discover, or prove any truth except by using in my mind words or other signs.'" Other philosophers are quoted pro and con, and the discussion is one which will need much argument, and more understanding of facts to settle. The book is published by the Open Court Co., Chicago, and sold at this office for 75 cents.

A very ambitious young author is Daniel Webster Groh, who contributed to the recent Educational Campaign a book which he called "The Tariff in a Nutshell; Containing the Whole Question of Protection, Tariff Reform, and Free Trade." Mr. Groh is a free trader. The book is a general argument for tariff abolition, clearly stated, and plainly reasoned. There are, however, a good many objections to this policy which Mr. Groh's book leaves untouched. Both free traders and protectionists overlook the fact that neither of their policies is more than a temporary makeshift to help the industries and people of a particular country, and that the real remedy for poverty and unequal distribution of wealth must be something far deeper and more radical, if not revolutionary, than the levying of toll upon imports or their admission free. Protected and free trade countries are all filled with poverty and discontent, and suffering from industrial injustice, and this fact alone is sufficient to show that our educational political campaign was to a large extent a warring with a windmill. Free traders will like Mr. Groh's book; protectionists can find in it abundant material for refutation. The price is 30 cents.

Messrs. Watts & Co., of London, hav printed "Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics," by John Wilson, M.A., of Trinity College, Dublin. The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. Part I is devoted to defining science, and explaining its use and methods. Part II defines ethics, tells its object and scope, investigates the origin and nature of the moral code, and discusses the means by which it is sanctioned or enforced. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. A close study of it will enable the student to detect a fallacy in reasoning a mile off. Mr. Wilson points out the difference between theory and fact, and never allows the two to be confounded. Science and revelation, or what is accepted as revelation, he shows do not speak the same language, because truth to science means a statement giving a correct representation of facts; whereas to theology truth means a statement supposed to be in accordance with the revelation "accepted" and the creed "clung to." Mr. Wilson's examination of the theological objections to the assumption of invariable order in phenomena, an assumption on which science itself is based, and which destroys the theological dogma of "free will," is a good sample of his clear-headed reasoning. Very few nowadays will dispute that material facts are governed by invariable law, and that miraculous interference with the orderly procession of phenomena never occurs; but that the facts of the mind, equally with the facts of matter, are subject to invariable law, is, and necessarily must be, objected to by the advocates of supernaturalism. The arguments most often advanced by the theologians to uphold their dogmas are these: 1. If mind were under law, free will could not exist. 2. If mind were under law, moral responsibility could not exist. 3. If mind were under law, man would be degraded to the character of a mere machine. "In examining the first objection," says Mr. Wilson, "we shall hav specially to remember the caution of science as to the use of words. We hav seen that the inaccurate use of language is a frequent cause of error. When one considers the immense amount of mental energy that has been expended in discussing 'free will,' one cannot help thinking that a great deal of this labor might hav been saved had the disputants made sure of the exact meaning of the words used. The confusion of thought upon this subject has, in a great degree, arisen from neglecting to ask the question, What is the meaning of the words 'free' and 'will?' Had this been done, it would hav exposed the uselessness of the dispute whether free will exists or does not exist. Let us now examin this preliminary question. The word 'free' is applicable only to an organism or machine. A machine is free when its functions can be exercised without impediment. A clock is free when it can, by the unimpeded movements of its different parts, tell the hours. If its pendulum is tied, the clock is not free. A piano is free when nothing prevents it from giving forth the sounds of the vibrating strings; it is not free if its keys are jammed or its strings covered with cloth. A man as an organism is free when he can exercise all his functions. The eye, as a separate machine, is free when it can see; it is not free when bandaged. The arm is free when it can move; it is not free when it is tied. Wherever the word 'free' is used correctly there are two things suggested—viz, (1) an organism or machine, and (2) the absence of any impediment to the exercise of its functions. Next, what is the meaning of the word 'will?' Will is a word used as the name of a certain state of consciousness, as are 'wish,' 'desire,' 'anger.' Will is the state of consciousness that is the immediate antecedent to an act, as wish is a state of consciousness immediately antecedent to will. All we know of will is as a state of consciousness.

"Now we understand the meaning of the word 'free' and the meaning of the word 'will.' The first, 'free,' denotes absence of impediment to organic action. The second, 'will,' is a state of consciousness. But what is the meaning of the expression, 'free will?' or has it any meaning at all? Is it translatable into thought? Let us see. If we say that a piano, as an organization, is free, the meaning is plain and intelligible; we assert that the piano is in such a condition that its functions can be exercised without impediment. But if we say that the melodiousness of the piano is free, applying the word 'free,' not to the organization, but to a condition of it, the expression is unmeaning and unthinkable, or nonsense. The melodiousness exists or does not exist; but it is absurd to speak of it as free or not free. It would not be more incorrect to say that it was square or oblong. It is correct to say of a clock that it is free, our meaning being that its wheels and other parts are unimpeded in their motion. But it would be ridiculous to say that 1 o'clock—a mere condition of the clock—is free. We might as well say that 1 o'clock is polite. Such a combination of words is mere sound, not intelligible language. So, when we apply the word 'free,' not to the organization, but to a state of it—the state of consciousness called 'will'—and say that the will is free, we are using the word 'free' incorrectly, and really talking nonsense, The sentence, 'The will is red,' would not be more unmeaning or more unthinkable than the sentence, 'The will is free.' We can think of the state of consciousness called 'will,' and we can think of the color called 'red;' but we cannot form the mental picture of the two together—a 'red will.' Free will, then, we see, is simply an unthinkable expression, totally devoid of any intelligible meaning."

We recommend this book to the careful study of all Freethinkers. It will help them a great deal in coming to impregnable conclusions from scientific premises, and in clearing away the mud of metaphysical and theological false reasoning. Price, $1.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

In the pre-Christian (Roman) religion, the grand office of the priesthood was the discovery of future events by oracles, omens, or an inspection of the entrails of animals, and by the offering of sacrifices to propitiate the gods. In the later, the Christian times, a higher power was claimed; the clergy asserting that, by their intercessions, they could regulate the course of affairs, avert dangers, work miracles, and even change the order of nature. Not without reason, therefore, did they look upon the doctrin of government by unvarying law with disfavor. It seemed to depreciate their dignity, to lessen their importance.—Prof. Draper, in The Conflict Between Religion and Science.

Calamities: Sinister events permitted by the divine will to afflict humanity to the greater honor and profit of the priests. Nations, like individuals, are never so devout as when they are frightened or very miserable. In order that the clergy should hav a real subject of satisfaction, calamities, especially those in the form of contagion, should happen a little more frequently than they do, for then they might fall into real good things, or at least hav the pleasure of burying everybody.—Voltaire's Pocket Theology.

Priests saw with grief the appearance of men who, cultivating the powers of reason, ascending to first principles, could not but discover all the absurdity of their dogmas, all the extravagance of their ceremonies, all the delusion and fraud of their oracles and prodigies.—Condorcet.

If our own country should be divided, if an empire should rise upon the ruins of the republic, it would be very easy to find that hundreds and thousands of people had foretold that very thing. If you will read the political speeches of the last twenty-two years, you will find prophecies to fit any possible future state of affairs in our country. . . . The fall of every nation under the sun has been predicted by hundreds and thousands of people. The prophecies of the Old Testament can be made to fit anything that may happen, or that may not happen. They will apply to the death of a king, or to the destruction of a people—to the loss of commerce, or the discovery of a continent. Each prophecy is a jugglery of words, of figures, of symbols, so put together, so used, so interpreted, that they can mean anything, everything, or nothing.—Ingersoll.

By reading history with a little attention, we shall perceive that Christianity, at first weak and servil, established itself among the savage and free nations of Europe by only intimating to their chiefs that its religious principles favored despotism and rendered them absolute. Consequently, we see barbarous princes suddenly converted; that is, we see them adopt, without examination, a system so favorable to their ambition, and use every art to induce their subjects to embrace it.—D'Holbach.

The ethics of Christianity or Antinaturalism include the Buddhistic doctrin of self-abasement, as an indispensable condition of salvation. That salvation meant extinction, the utter renunciation of earthly hopes and desires, the mortification of all natural instincts, including the instinct of freedom. Abject submission to injustice, the subordination of reason to dogma, the sinfulness of rebellion against the "powers that be," were inculcated with a zeal that made the church an invaluable ally of despotism.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

Nations oppress their own people at home, to furnish means to murder and destroy other nations abroad! And this is glory! England might do more good, and carry the blessings of her knowledge and arts to charm more lands, than any other nation whatever, if the Howards and Owens of her land had more influence at home; and if the principles so eloquently advocated by Jeremy Bentham, and by the immortal Paine, were acknowledged and felt in her councils. Her flag instead of bearing, as it now appears to bear, the words "military glory" over a death's-head, would bear this healing motto to all nations: "The greatest happiness of the greatest number, for the greatest length of time;" or this, "The world is our country, and to do good our religion."—Gilbert Vale's Beacon.

Christian nations are the warlike nations of this world. Christians hav invented the most destructiv weapons of war. Christianity gave us the revolver, invented the rifle, made the bombshell; and Christian nations here and there had above all other arts the art of war; and as Christians they hav no respect for the rights of barbarians or for the rights of any nation or tribe that happens to differ with them. See what it does in our society; we are divided off into little sects that used to discuss these questions with fire and sword, with chain and fagot, and that discuss, some of them, even to-day, with misrepresentation and slander. . . . It does seem as though the most zealous Christian must at times entertain some doubt as to the divine origin of his religion. —Ingersoll.

THE ANGEL'S PARTING ADVICE TO BALAAM.

Money can slip through a pretty small hole sometimes. A Brooklyn man lost a considerable sum lately through a pew-rent.

Hobbs: "What do you think about it, my dear; do you think marriage a failure?" Mrs. Hobbs: "No, I don't; but I think men are."

Shakspere was slightly mixed in his "seven ages." It is the "whining school-boy" whom the maternal eye has detected in some flagrant act of disobedience that "shifts into the slippered pantaloon."

Tommy: "Is that a lion or a lioness, papa?" Pater: "Which one, dear?" Tommy: "That one with its face scratched and the hair off the top of its head?" Pater (with a sigh): "That must be a lion, my boy."

"Can you tell me what the 'Golden Rule' is?" asked the Sunday-school teacher. "Yes'm," promptly replied the jeweler's offspring. "It's 24 grains make 1 pennyweight, 20 pennyweights 1 ounce, 12 ounces 1 pound."

There was a young lady of letters,
Who got far more fame than her betters;
For everyone read
"The Quick and the Dead,"
By this cyclonic lady of letters.

"I'm somewhat astonished, Carper," remarked Bigbee, as he looked around the room, "to find that so great a bookworm as you are should possess so small a library." "Ah, my boy," returned the other; "it takes a great deal of reading to find out what isn't worth keeping."

Doctor (passing a stonecutter's yard): "Good morning, Mr. Jones. Hard at work, I see. I suppose you finish your gravestones as far as "In memory of," and then wait for some one to die, eh?" Stonecutter: "Why, yes—unless somebody's sick and you're doctoring 'em; then I keep right on."

It was a quiet Sunday afternoon and she was reading to him the Proverbs of Solomon. He was rapidly getting an attack of temporary oblivion. "Aren't they wonderful, George?" she said. "Yes, indeed," he replied. "If he had only misspelled his words, what a Josh Billings he would hav made!"

"The movements of men are most certainly queer,"
Sighed Dolly, who'd only been married a year;
"When lovers they always till one o'clock stay,
And when they are husbands till one stay away!"
"Most trying," said Belle, "but we hav no redress;
It's the law that they call compensation, I guess."

Skinner Weetpit (to art dealer): "An' how much d'ye say this 'ere pictur's worth?" Art dealer: "Eight hundred dollars, sir; and you can, of course, select any style of frame that you may think appropriate." Weetpit: "Eight hundred dollars! Why, man alive, at that rate o' figgerin' any decent kind o' frame would cost fifteen hundred! Come on, Mariar; I can't stand this foolin'."

An actor in Oliver Doud Byron's company had the weakness of getting rattled easily in his lines, yet he never lost himself so completely as to stick dead. He could always keep talking, even though he went wide of the actual text. On one occasion he had the line, "O merciful providence, how wonderful are thy ways!" He became excited over something and exclaimed: "O God, how peculiar you are!"

"Young man, do you use tobacco?" The speaker was a hatchet-faced female, with her arms full of tracts, and the youth happened to be waiting at a corner for a street-car. "No, mum, I don't," said the young man with a questioning glance, as she did not look like a person who would want to borrow a little fire. "Do you drink?" "No, mum." "Play cards?" "No, mum." "I am delighted to meet you, sir. In these degenerate days, young men of your correct habits are scarce, very scarce. If I send you an invitation to my next party, will you come?" "Yes, mum." "Thank you. I should like you to meet my friends and family. Where shall I send it?" "To Plugugly's saloon. I'm bartender there."

Moses Iklestein: "Repecca, I vonder vhy it vos dot some mans vas porn lucky vile udder poor tevils like meinselluf vas left to go py de vorld trough mit out striking a pudding." Rebecca: "Ach, Moses, vat vas you komblaining aboudt now? You vas always kicking against your luck and already dis year you haf made quite a poodle." Moses: "Yah, das is so, and I know dot it vas wrong for me to kick, but I leaf it mit you, Repecca, now, vouldn't it be a big poodle in our pocket uf der people vould run me fur mayor! Tink uf der advertisment to our pisness. I vould run a cut uf meinselluf in der baber und say: 'Moses Iklestein, de beoble's choice, sells all kinds uf new und second-hand clodin' at popular prices. Come und shake hands mid der beoble's choice, vedder you vant some clodin' or not; it vill cost notings to look at him.' Bud dere vas no such luck in store for me. I vas porn on Friday."

PASTORAL.

Chloe tapped at Daphne's door,
All the woodland sweet of summer;
Roses lent her cheeks their store,
Dryads decked their latest comer.

"Stupid Strephon courted me,"
Caroled she, in clear voice, gayly;
"Foolish as his flock is he,
Foolisher and fonder daily.

"There he stood in shy surmise,
Trembling like a wind-tossed feather;
Dared not raise to mine his eyes,
In this blithe and sun-glad weather.

"Up I rose and boxed his ears
(Birds were singing in the beeches),
Told him faint heart never nears
Goals that courage surely reaches.

"Then my handsome oaf at last
Took me in his arms and kissed me;
Daphne, he shall rue the past,
When, through fear, he well-nigh missed me."

WHEN REASON RULES.

Notes and Clippings.

ENGLAND'S prime minister, Lord Salisbury, has declared in favor of woman suffrage.

THE London Jewish Standard says: "We hav always held that Mohammedanism and Buddhism did as much for their followers as any other religion could possibly do for them."

ONE of the iconoclasts of the day, says the Sun, is a very worthy clergyman of the name of Smith, who has collected alleged facts and printed them in the Episcopal Record, showing that Washington was never a communicant of the Episcopal church, and that he never prayed in the woods at Valley Forge.

A. L. COLE, of Wellsville, N. Y., has discovered a "new agriculture" by which he maintains that an acre of ground can be made to yield an incredible number of times what it does under the old system. His idea is to convert the ground to a depth of fifteen or twenty feet into a sponge, with water flowing or percolating through it constantly.

THE London Echo prints this: "Americans undoubtedly take the presidential election very seriously. The amount of personal enthusiasm they import into it is shown by the following fact: A few days back a notice was posted outside a church door not many miles from New York, fraternally exhorting the congregation not to wipe their foreheads during service with bandannas—bandannas being the colors of the Democratic party. The reason assigned was, that the sight of a bandanna 'encouraged Democrats to cheer for Grover Cleveland, and proved a serious interruption to divine service.'"

EUGENE FIELD, the well-known newspaper man of Chicago, Ill., has become interested in esoteric Buddhism. He has a temple to Buddha in his apartments, and, it is said, pays his devotions to that oriental deity. They say in Chicago that Field is likely to take the place of Mme. Blavatsky in this country before very long.

THE Boston Budget says: "Galton has pointed out some very curious facts concerning the children of professional men. He found, from a study of the heredity of the members of some of the largest scientific societies in London, that the legal profession presented the most eminent men and the fewest idiots. The medical profession came next, and lastly clergymen, who produced the smallest number of eminent men and the largest number of idiots and feeble-minded. The lawyers gave origin to six times as many eminent men as the clergy. The clergy gave origin to six times as many idiots and feeble-minded as the lawyers."

THE Persian public decided the other day that the railroad is an enemy of the human race, because a man who jumped off a train while in motion fell under the wheels and was killed. They accordingly tore the cars in pieces and would hav wiped out the train employees if the latter had not taken to their heels. The Sun rebukes those who are disposed to laugh at the Persians by reminding them that our own great-grandfathers declared that it was utter nonsense to suppose that steam-cars could carry passengers faster than ten miles an hour without smashing everybody up, and, besides, all the horses would be scared into fits and permanently ruined.

ENGLAND had in 1882 5,500 students in her universities, out of a population of 23,000,000, and Germany, with a population of 45,250,000, had 24,000 students. In that same year, with a population of 60,000,000, the United States had 66,437 students in colleges, 4,921 in theological seminaries, 3,079 in law schools, and 15,151 in medical schools; total, 89,588.

MR. ISRAEL LAZARUS, a petty shopkeeper at 80 Henry street in this city, received a visit on Sunday last from Policeman Herrlich, of the Seventh precinct. The officer told the shopkeeper that he wanted to start a fire at home, and had no matches with which to light it, and by this statement, which appears to hav been false in fact, the officer induced Lazarus to sell him some matches. Having effected the purchase, he arrested the shopkeeper for selling merchandise on Sunday in violation of the penal code.

THE women suffragists of Boston hav been criticising Mrs. Lucy Stone Blackwell severely of late. She cannot vote on the school question as other women may, because she will not use her husband's name, and her sister suffragists call her stubborn. But Lucy stands by her principle, which is that a woman's name should be her own, married or single, and that she should not be required by law to take her husband's name if she does not desire it. Miss Lucy Stone married Mr. Henry Blackwell many years ago, and the couple hav a daughter who calls herself Miss Alice Stone Blackwell. Her mother left it for her to decide when she grew up, and the young girl added her father's name to her mother's.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Intelligencer says: "Last Sunday a well-known Kalamazoo divine, pastor of a wealthy church, in the course of his sermon alluded to 'Robert Elsmere' as a dangerous book. Yesterday a city dealer, who had advertised the work in Saturday's Telegraph as on sale by him, closed out his entire stock and had orders for several more copies."

THE result of a meeting of four hundred teachers at Eisleben, in Saxony, for the purpose of discussing the use of the Bible in schools, may be summed up thus: Arguments against the use in school of the whole Bible or the introduction of a special schoo Bible: (a) The Bible contains more matter than can be gone through at school; (b) it contains much that is not fit for children, because (1) they cannot understand it, (2) it is without educational value for children, and (3) it stands in the way of their moral and religious development; (c) the holy scriptures were not intended as a school-book; (d) the use of the Bible as a school-book detracts from the veneration in which it should be held by children and by the people. Arguments against a special school Bible: (a) In order to impart as much biblical knowledge as possible, the unrestricted use of the Bible is necessary; (b) a familiar knowledge of the scriptures can only be obtained by their constant use; (c) to banish the Bible from the school would diminish its value in the eyes o the pupils; (d) extracts from the Bible would be the work of man, whereas the Bible is God's work; (e) the introduction of a special school Bible would hav many practical difficulties; (f) would lead to schism and foster distrust of the school and the church.

The Altar—The Arms.

It is part of the moral machinery of Christianity to deceive, and for the same reason that the liar tries to gloze over his trickeries. Founded on fables, it has needed perpetual propping; and instituted as it was by amalgamation with before existing beliefs, it has labored through all the centuries with the crushing conviction of not only having so much of what is untenable in its tenets, but burdened besides with the ever-present presence of a power so independent of its faiths and assumptions as to find it necessary, in order to keep itself intact, to be ready to concede when concession became unavoidable. This has been the history of the altar from the beginning, so giving the lie to its God-inspired origin.

The established for the time being has at all times stood like a bull on the highway, with head couched ready for battle, while Progress, confronting him, shook the red flag before his bloodshot eyes.

What is truth? has been the conundrum of the years, a question the men of the altar hav assumed to be the chosen expounders of, but succeeding only in rendering the inquiry still more complicated; a question, at last, to be solved by cutting the Gordian knot tied by the sciolist of the past; a sciolism, the result of a lack of the wisdom that comes through the revelations of modern science—not the Bible.

The teachings of the altar and the practices of the state hav still sought to be in harmony—the one backing the other, from Constantine to the present czar of Russia, inclusiv. Force has been the center on which both hav swung—a force sought to be justified by revealments made by prophets and "holy men" of old, men God-inspired, their pretensions sealed by the attestations of martyrdom. As if a man, merely because he had been soused in a caldron of boiling oil, or had been throttled by a lion in the amphitheater at the command of an emperor, could be more worthy as authority than one who had lived thoughtfully and walked worthily among men through life, affecting only to know the good from the bad by the effects of conduct on individuals in society; a man willing to labor and to wait, but not without a show of indignant manhood against fraud; a friend to all unions organized for protection against rapacity of whatever sort—the rapacity of the layman as well as the craft of the priesthood.

There is nothing that so much givs the lie to the basic theory of Christianity as is found in its sanctioned national governments. All of them, whether imperial, kingly, or republican, being posed on the Bible standard of man's disobedience to God by Adam's fall, giving a tendency to humanity to rebel against good in whatever form it might present itself, a falsity which experience has proved to be the stumbling-block of all noble effort, and the chief obstacle to political and social advancement—the history of the race proving the very opposit to hav been the truth, showing society at all times inclining to betterment in defiance of altar denunciations, papal bulls, encyclical letters, and pastoral interferences.

Christianity in high places has been a jackdaw tricked out in the plumage of the turkey-cock, when, with tail erect and expanded, he gobbles to the lookers-on of the barnyard. Its history, in respect to its status, has been the antithesis of its putativ founder. Clothed in fine linen, it has fared sumptuously every day. Christ had not where to lay his head—not even a 6 x 8 room in a tenement house. Poor Jesus!

Fraudulent from its inception, the entire régime of the church has been a series of high-handed usurpations of man's natural rights, still vindicating the power of the ruler against the popular will. While devoutly claiming to worship the "prince of peace," the dignitaries of the altar, in full canonicals, hav hailed the emperor or king in martial uniforms, so honoring the profession of arms over all other classes, while they unctuously rolled out the biblical text, "Our God is a man of war"—whether a ship of the navy or a sojer is left to conjecture.

There is no feature in the construction of national governments so essentially barbaric as the army—barbaric in design, barbaric in organization, barbaric in constituents. And yet the object, so transparently barbarous, is sought to be presented to the moral eye of the nation as not only a preserver of the degree of civilization already attained, but a barrier opposing all influences favoring relapses into barbarism—as palpable a fraud as was ever practiced upon the unquestioning masses. The tendency of humanity is onward and upward, not retrogressiv, as the church would hav us believe, and the army, conjointly with the priesthood, has always been less conservativ than retrograding. As an organization the army should e the antithesis of the spirit of the church, which hey claim is love—a claim only adding to its fraudulent character. Love! There can be no love but between the sexes. A sharp discrimination must guide the discussion of the word love, relaxing only to embrace helpless infancy. Pause in this discrimination, and we sink to tender regard; from tender regard to respect and admiration for individual character founded on good deeds, generous dealing, and maintained integrity. Love is a force independent, volcanic, sovereign, exclusiv. My neighbor's daughter says she loves new potatoes. Another neighbor says: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that they who believed on him might hav eternal life," an assertion which, in view of the facts of life, and the original cause of the sacrifice, I am inclined to sneer at. My neighbor, on the other hand, sees in the announcement unlimited cause for thankfulness. The love expressed by the maiden for new potatoes is merely a rhetorical error; the other is of the kind alluded to by Burns:

> Ev'n ministers they hae been ken'd
> In holy rapture,
> A stunnin', rattlin' whid to vend,
> And nail't wi' scriptur.

The ostensible design of the army is the defense of the nation against all assailants; the duty of the soldier to wallop the assailants—the chaplain justifying all murders by texts from holy writ: "And they smote them from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same." Hard work for the boys, I know.

By no means the exclusiv work of the army is the defense of the nation, however; that most Christian of all the nations of modern times sending her army thousands of miles from home to wallop. What the poor soldiers will do when government no longer recognizes the right to interfere with other nations it is easy to imagin. After beating their swords into pruning-hooks and recasting their big guns into shapes more in harmony with civilization, they will set to work on the hitherto exclusiv acres of his grace the duke of Noodledum, and others of that ilk, raising grain and fruit to feed the hungry—work nearer "the mark of the high calling which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, whom ye ignorantly worship," as Paul told his hearers on Mars Hill, in reference to Roman gods. The army won't object to the change. I know the rank and file. When there is no desperation in the circumstances of individuals in society, army life will hav no attraction for even the thriftless, particularly when the profits of the work they will perform will be their own, as Socialism demands, a system toward which all the nations are gravitating.

I claim to know the army; hav fingered the thing all over from spur to nodding plume, and hav found it to be an enlarged nuisance; a nursery for all vulgarities of aristocracy among officers, and an arena for all indecencies of treatment among the men of the ranks, the files punished with a severity out of all proportion to the offense; besides having used toward them vile epithets such as are bandied by the lowest bullies of the stews, and not unfrequently accompanied by shameless indignities of kicks and blows—I speak of the American army—treatment such as the British soldier is never subjected to; nor would he bear it, the traditions of the ranks demanding personal resentment in such cases. Punish with authority, but hands off, is the legend of the British army.

The American soldier is better paid than his English brother in arms; is more generously fed; but that is all. In garrison life, the American is subjected to degrading restrictions, he is denied the freedom of range enjoyed by the Englishman. The American army is governed by the same spirit as was "nigger" slavery in days gone by. The private is not permitted to leave the barracks without a pass. In a word, the Briton is not made to compromise his manhood by being visited by ignominious treatment.

"I gave my men hell on the Pacific," were the first words I remember hearing from an old captain of infantry, on joining my regiment at the commencement of the late Rebellion. And that sentiment I continued to find to be the ruling principle of army usage; annoy, harass, abuse the enlisted man; he is a slave.

The bare fact of regarding a body of armed men as a needed feature in the organization of the government of a nation is, to the advanced thinker, an assurance of weakness on the part of the organizers, or showing the presence of a factor in the mass refusing to acknowledge the influence of ordinary justice; an anomaly in society only to be found among citizens more sinned against than sinning; a mad spirit to be exorcised by the wisdom of justice, not the folly of brutal force. Then, a standing army for international mediation is the veriest bummery of statesmanship and the standing scandal of our century.

The masses hav been like driven cattle, and, like those of Crœsus, hav left such filth-heaps behind them that Socialism has truly a herculean task before it. Let it begin by giving the Pinkerton thug a less infamous task than he now has. Let the same treatment be meted to the army; also to the custom house gang; convert the navy into a commercial marine. Dismiss all ex-officio judges of the courts; all hangers-on of municipal headquarters, all heelers, bummers, mayors, boodlers, et hoc genus omne. Good treatment alone can neutralize their inborn tendency to vicious work.

Had the race proved itself but half as solicitous about the bodily comforts of the individual as it has about the salvation of one another's souls, the word army would hav found no place in our dictionaries. Man, as far as heard from, is a failure. The fauna—leaving the genus homo out—and the flora only hav proved hits. How long will it take Socialism to seduce mankind into social and industrial harmony?

The initiativ in the process of redemption from the prevailing falsities has been taken; shaking errors through the sieves of public discussion; voice and type alike forcing thought through the meshes of the sifting screens, and the best minds of the community superintend the winnowing. Thus far in the work it has been found that religion furnishes the worst residuum of the years; transfusing its impregnations everywhere, corrupting air and lungs, blinding the sight and clogging the hearing; combining the fetor of the grave with the miasma of the plague; defiant, malevolent, yet coated over with coleur de rose. Through the thick ascending smoke is seen the cross, with its deceptiv letter-trinity—I. H. S, while angel voices commingling chant the tricky invitation, "Come to Jesus." At the same time the organ, with vox humana, pours its affluence of harmony on ears of wealthy worshipers and their tools. There sits the millionaire of whom the poet sings in his shabby hut by the O-at-ka:

> The millionaire sat in his easy-chair
> After his dinner of roast and broiled;
> And he thought of the scanty, humble fare
> In the tenement house of the men who toiled.
>
> One of a syndicate rich was he;
> Owners of many a rood of mines;
> A far-famed coal monopoly
> With mile upon mile of railroad lines.
> "Ah, well-day!" he said with a sigh,
> "Six dollars a week is a sorry wage;
> No wonder is it that the fellows try
> To better themselvs in our stirring age.
>
> "Six dollars a week! I pay my cook
> Almost double that sum each day;
> I saw his account in my steward's book
> On his office desk as it open lay.
>
> "I wish from my soul they were better paid;
> And I know that our set all wish so too;
> But then, we think what our parson said,
> 'The poor ye shall always hav with you.'"

And under the soporific influence of the textual anodyne our modern Dives folds his soft hands over his capacious front and is comforted.

The altar has been to the moral world as the shabby gambler, with his thimble and "little joker," has been on the fair grounds when gulling the swarming greenhorns by his dextrous maneuvers, while he promised to double all sums put down to catch the "little joker" below the thimble. By shuffling, artful moves he shows the pea, and apparently covering it with the thimble, he holding it the while below his finger-nail, he repeats again and again to the gaping crowd his promis of doubling their money by finding it. At length, one of his pals, to stimulate the lookers-on, puts down a new half dollar, and the manipulator, covering the coin with another of equal value, raises the thimble, discovering the "little joker," the pal pocketing both pieces. "Who else wants to win a half?" cries the gambler, adding, "Sometimes the luck is one's, sometimes the other's. Come, here's another half, who'll cover it?" The next is a fool, and the joker isn't there, and so the next, and so each is fleeced till another pal succeeds. With the church the same tricky management keeps the little joker from sight. Let the victim try through all his life, he sees the divine pea but in fancy, the gambling mania all the while increasing; till at the last he finds his "soul" the pawn for which he plays.

Sometimes a stupendous lie is told when a heavy stake is risked: "By this sign ye shall conquer," said the pious thimble-rigger to Constantine, one of the earlier churchman's pals—the little joker being the cross.

Another pal was King Clovis. He covered the churchman's lay, and succeeded in picking up a pardon for all his sins; embracing scores of murders and minor delinquencies without number; the pardon, signed by a "divine hand," saying: "The pardon granted to royal offenses which might not be revealed," a courtesy for which his royal majesty loaded the church of Saint Eleutherous with precious gifts of booty won by his army—his army, remember.

Why Deny?

How often do we see those who doubt and even deny everything that they cannot understand or that cannot be demonstrated by actual proof! Many of our public speakers fall into this (to me an) error, as well as those less informed.

Doubt is said to be the mother of investigation, but are there not things even beyond investigation that we are bound to admit as true, even though they cannot be demonstrated or understood? What do or can we know, beyond a doubt, except such as one or more of our five senses givs us a knowledge of? Who could know of sound-waves, of the beautiful chords and agreeable harmony in classic music, of the soul-cheering words uttered by those we love or are in sympathy with, were it not for the delicate organs of hearing? Who would know of the beautiful spring-time when the sun and rain combine to spread the carpet of green under our feet—who could tell of the majestic mountain-peaks, of the golden glitter of the setting sun, or the more lovely and innocent smile that plays hide-and-seek upon the cheek of our little darling, only to be kissed away by mother's lips—had he not the wonderful sense of sight? What could giv us a lasting impression of a loved one who steps ahead of us to try the reality or falsity of a future existence better than the remembrance of the last look of the material that has been cherished in our affection? Our optics giv us impressions of admirable beauty that fills our souls with delight as nothing else can do. But I wish to ask how we could know or understand all this if we were not endowed with the sense of seeing.

So with all of our senses; they giv us additional knowledge of the vast resources of nature, that we could not know of were it not for them. It is claimed by some scientists that some members of the animal kingdom hav not been blessed with all of the five senses given to man, but hav instead certain other senses better adapted to their needs.

This, as well as many other things, some object to and seem to deny, simply from the fact that it is not easily demonstrated as true, but only proved by applied logic. We know of existing laws and forces that none of our five senses can explain, and that we know of only by the never-failing results of their agency. Attraction, repulsion, etc., also the law that brings into action the centrifugal and centripetal forces, are of this character. We see their effect and say such and such forces exist, but we cannot explain them. If I should ask, What is attraction? who could tell? If it is anything, it must be something; and if something, what is it? If of a material nature, we could demonstrate it, and if not material in some one of the different forms of density, then there must be something besides material. We can see its presence in power, but not in form.

This, then, must prove the possibility of the existence of something that our sense of actual knowledge cannot demonstrate as a tangible something, and it opens the door of possibility for a thousand and one things that may exist and of which we could understand if we were endowed with additional senses not now known to us. We know of animal instinct found in some quadrupeds, that far surpasses the greatest knowledge to be obtained by man. A kitten or a pig a few weeks of age, if carried away from home in a sack, on a dark night, over a road with many turns, if turned loose will find its home in less time than it was in being taken away. What is instinct but a sense of natural unthinking knowledge given by nature? Why has not the same and all its benefits been given to man? Why hav we not such senses as will giv us a knowledge of creation? Simply because we are finite and not infinit. Many deny the existence of deity because they cannot conceive of such. Why not deny the existence of attraction, when we can see the work done by one as well as the other?

A being in form or personality having the attribute of individuality cannot be omnipresent in all places at the same time, but may be omniscient, omnipotent, and all-wise. This, to us, with our understanding, may be true, but with either of the claims for deity as set forth in the scriptures left out would prove the Bible false, at least in that particular. But if we lay aside the ancient mythological ideas and theories of deity, and undertake to fathom the cause of creation or our existence from a reasonable or scientific standpoint, we must take into consideration that we as finite beings are trying to understand infinit things, and must turn every leaf in our cabinet of knowledge to see what there are of a possible nature, in order to giv us light on things of a probable nature, and which if we had additional senses or powers of perception we might easily understand. What would a man born blind, with no one to tell him, know of the beautiful "hit-and-miss" carpet of yellow and brown that nature's forest weaves in autumn, making warp and woof of the once green leaves that mantled the branches in summer, but which hav since changed color and been spread by nature over the feet of the lofty slumberers in their winter quarters?

This we only know or gain a knowledge of through the agency of our senses. Our eyes see the stately trees, our ears hear the rustling of leaves under our feet, our cheeks are fanned by the breezes of autumn, and experience tells us that winter is near. We pull our garments closer around us and ask, From whence come all these? No answer follows our call, and we are left to reason—to conjecture—to conceive of the great cause that has brought to light all the grand achievements of nature. We at once find ourselvs in the dark, and as we begin to unravel the great ball of mystery, we find knots and snarls that impede our progress, and we begin to say, it is impossible, it cannot be done, no one ever wound the ball and no one can unwind it. As a child is foiled in the seeming impossibilities of a puzzle, seeing no way by which it is possible to work it, it begins to say it can not be done, even papa cannot do it.

What are we but children—born in ignorance, rocked in the cradle of superstition, nursed at the breast of bigotry, and left to grope our way in the darkness of undeveloped nature—for certainly nature itself is daily changing our conditions and placing before us new evidence for us to decipher?

Look back but a few centuries and see the ignorance that haunted men like a nightmare, when less intelligence than that of to-day was writhing to be freed that the doors of investigation might bring it relief from the dungeons of superstition, but was forced back by ecclesiastical persecution and monarchial power. No railroads, no telegraphs, telephones, or steamboats, as to-day, but instead, every advanced idea was smothered by persecution from priest and king, the originators pronounced heretics and Infidels and made to pay the penalty for thinking for themselvs. Even to-day those who dare express an honest thought or an advanced idea are held in contempt and ostracized from society. Thanks to the patriots of investigation who hav outlived the sneers of the ignorant, for through them we hav gained many an intellectual battle, and to-day we hav guns that cannot be silenced; and those who would rob the world of the dearest tie that binds us to the future will soon be powerless, and scientific law will raise man nearer perfection. The smoke of the dying embers of persecution will be seen only through the vision of history. Amid all these cheering thoughts of progress let us remember that we are still in the dark recesses of ignorance, and but few rays of flickering light hav as yet lighted up the intellect of man, and that at some time we shall see new developments in our nature that may help us to more fully solve the great problem of our existence. Better plead Agnostic to what we do not know than deny what we cannot prove. A. D. Swan.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Grantsville, Utah, Oct. 8.—I took the early morning train on the little narrow-gage railroad from Salt Lake City to Stockton, Utah.

That right royal Liberal, A. C. Fenstermaker, met me when the train discharged its vast load of Mormons returning from the conference at Salt Lake City, and gave me a glorious, exhilarating drive across the valley to Grantsville, which is quite a large Mormon village.

All Mormon cities, towns, and villages are located on some stream near the base of the mountains, where the waters can be turned into canals and ditches for irrigating purposes. It is vain to attempt to raise anything in Utah without irrigation.

Each place has its meeting-house. In small places the school-houses are used, and each place is presided over by its bishop, who has his two counselors, besides elders and teachers. Every city, village, and hamlet has its branch Z. C. M. I. store, where all good Mormons trade and sell their products, and thus help the bishop to sure knowledge if they pay their full tithing—one-tenth of their increase. Every tenth egg, chick, lamb, calf, bushel of grain, must be carried to the tithing-house.

Brother Fenstermaker's ranch is some ten miles distant, so he secured board for me at Grantsville in a prominent Mormon family. The man had served his sentence in the pen, for, as they call it, "living out his religion," i.e., practicing polygamy, following the example of the blessed saints of the Bible. At present he abjures plurality of wives, preferring only one and liberty to none and confinement in the penitentiary. Among his wives were two sisters, the younger of which he now livs with. I learned much of the true inwardness of the cross, the heavy cross, Mormon women hav to bear for Christ and the kingdom's sake.

Brother Fenstermaker is a live Western, Liberal, jovial, independent man, and although an apostate a great favorit with the people. He is a great rustler, and his zeal resulted in a large attendance at the lecture, which was delivered at the school-house. A very great interest was aroused and many expressed a desire for more lectures. Yet this is decidedly the most exclusiv Mormon settlement I hav found in Utah.

Brother Fenstermaker paid the rent of the school-house and all other expenses, and the next day took me to his ranch. He has a cosy, picturesque home, surrounded with choice fruits and flowers. His ranch runs up through a wide cañon that is abundantly supplied with water, so his farm and stock are fruitful and thrifty. He has been obliged to purchase large tracts of mountain land to keep away the great flocks of sheep. The once rich grazing lands or cattle are almost entirely destroyed by the numerous immense flocks of sheep owned by men who hav no claim to a foot of land. These wealthy sheep-owners feed their sheep on what they call the public domain, and thus deprive the real settler, the farmer, of pasture for his stock, only as he buys the land and carefully fences it in. Where large flocks of sheep—often one to two thousand in a flock—graze for any length of time, they destroy even the roots of the grass and leave a barren, sandy desolation.

Stockton, Utah, Oct. 9, 10.—Brother Fenstermaker took me over to Stockton, where I had the pleasure to meet that practical, earnest worker for Liberalism, W. O. Williams. This is a mining camp. It has experienced many ups and downs, but is now on the upward tide of fortune. The mines are making good returns, and the large increase of capital invested givs promis of generous results.

The first lecture not being well advertised, the hall was only about half filled, but the second night, even with additional seats, accommodations were insufficient, many standing for two hours and patiently listening to "The Bible: Whence It Came, and What It Really Teaches." I sold a large quantity of books and pamphlets and obtained a number of new subscribers to The Truth Seeker.

Murray, Utah, Oct. 11, 12.—This is a Mormon village, seven miles from Salt Lake City. Andrew Cahoon, now an earnest Liberal, was for seventeen years the Mormon bishop of this place. There is no more intelligent, honest, kindly-hearted man in the territory, nor one more thoroughly posted in all the true inward and outward workings of Mormonism. From long association he has tender regard for the Mormons personally, and desires to insure their being awarded full credit for their industry, sobriety, and spirit of self-sacrifice in behalf of what they regard as the only true Christian faith. He earnestly desires their best good, but the scales having fallen from his eyes, he frankly declares the truth. He says all Mormons believe that the Mormon church is the kingdom of God; that it was established by divine revelation for the express purpose of breaking in pieces and supplanting all other governments on earth. Through the teaching of the Mormon church during the last fifty years their people hav become alienated and opposed to the government of the United States; they are Bible believers, and, like the Bible, are opposed to a republic. A government by the people for the people is directly contrary to every text of the Bible and the revelations of God. The kingdom of God must be established, and therefore the government of the United States must be destroyed. No man can be true and loyal to the government of the United States and at the same time be a faithful member of the Mormon church—one is antagonistic and at war with the other, and always must be. There can be no reconciliation or harmony between a kingdom of God and a republic of man.

The pretext of Mormons when applying for statehood, that they hav abandoned polygamy, is, to those who hav studied the Book of Covenants and Doctrins, or who are acquainted from every-day intercourse with the Mormon people, a most absurd falsehood. Would any sane person believe the Baptists would renounce baptism, yet cling to their denomination? Immersion is practiced by Mormons as a sacred rite, enjoined on all Latter Day Saints by direct revelation of God and the teaching of the holy Bible. Polygamy is practiced by Mormons as a sacred rite, enjoined on all Latter Day Saints by direct revelation of God and teaching of the holy Bible. They will abandon the one quite as readily as the other. While they believe and practice the one they will never really abandon or renounce the other.

Ex-Bishop Cahoon had long experience in polygamy—no one can attain to a position of honor, influence, or emolument in the Mormon church who does not enter into and indorse polygamy. He has eight brave, handsome sons born in polygamy, but to-day every one of them is an outspoken Infidel—all men of more than ordinary intelligence and business capacity, and all doing well in life. I had the delight of making my home with one of these sons, J. P. Cahoon, one of the most successful, enterprising, honored business men in the territory, a model Liberal, in home and business alike living out the ennobling principles of Liberalism.

Andrew Cahoon, J. P. Cahoon, Harry Haines, the merchant prince, philanthropist, and prince of good fellows, and Geo. A. Bingon, the popular real estate agent, are the trusted leaders here in the cause of Liberalism, and are ever in the lead in every good work.

Lectures were held in the school-house, the spacious and handsome grounds of which were donated to the town by that true friend of progress and education, ex-Bishop Andrew Cahoon. With Harry Haines for school director, there is no chance for any Bible or religious instruction in that school, Harry Haines's one chief injunction to teachers being: "Teach the children what you know. Leave them to do the guessing in regard to the unknowable."

It was a labor of love, a very joy, to declare the truths of Liberalism to such appreciativ and intelligent audiences as greeted me at Murray.

Sugar House, Utah, Oct. 13.—This is one of the outer wards of Salt Lake City. Disappointment in obtaining the school-house, lack of advertising, and a social of the church at the school-house resulted in an audience of six persons in a private house, where it was finally decided to hav the lecture. Instead of berating those present because of the absent, I realized my obligation to those who had come, and did my level best. I am encouraged to believe my labor was not entirely in vain. Another visit under favorable circumstances would insure a large attendance.

SALT LAKE CITY, Opera House, Oct. 14.—Quite a good attendance; parquet and dress circle filled with a most attentiv and appreciativ audience; subject, "Trial of Satan," and it gained a unanimous verdict for the accused. Heretofore at the lectures there has been music—superb singing by an able choir under the leadership of the accomplished Dr. Chapman, of itself an immense attraction—and the lectures well and liberally advertised. Without any aids or help other than the simple announcement from the stage of the subject of the next lecture, with no advertisment or local notice in any of the newspapers, and consequently an adverse press, the attendance was remarkably good. True, there were more dimes than dollars in the collections at the door, not leaving a very large surplus for the lecturer after the rent of the Opera House was deducted, but the willing burden-bearers came to my rescue.

Taking all the conditions into consideration, the lectures were a success. I was well pleased with my sojourn in Salt Lake City.

Would it not be more satisfactory if the able, wealthy Liberals of the city, say twenty of them, would subscribe $100 each and with this fund secure a hall for the year and engage a succession of able lecturers—engage the lecturers for three or four months, with the understanding that they are to work up interest and giv their whole time to this object—and hav lectures every Sunday evening the year round? A mighty work would thus be accomplished among the Mormons, and the cause would be self-sustaining before the end of the first year.

Why Don't Men Go to Church?

Last Sunday the Chicago Tribune printed four or five columns of interviews with the pastors of twenty-two leading Protestant churches of this city, also recording the actual number of men, women, and children present the Sunday previous at each of God's (?) houses. Having figured up the totals, I find that this great antiquated host who made such a noise the week before as the Illinois Sabbath Association, invoking the aid of the law—the strong, vigorous, and rigorous law—to regulate Chicago society, stop Sunday trains, Sunday newspapers, and turn our Sunday into a day of lamentation, are not so numerous nor so important a part of the community as they would hav us believe. They are loud in demanding the law to enforce "the Lord's day." Now, if the Lord doesn't care to enforce it, why need they care for him? Surely the Lord ought to be able to enforce whatever he wants on Sunday. These clerics hav in the past clucked around with the stride and importance of a well-fed gobbler prior to Thanksgiving. And, like the gobbler who begins to feel that the time is not far distant when he too must go, tail-feathers and all, they begin their cackle of alarm.

As an exposé of their pretensions the total attendance was shown to be:

Men	3,087
Women	4,109
Children	1,106

Each minister was interrogated as follows:

1. Do men go to church? If not, what is the explanation of their non-attendance?
2. Do ministers still believe in hell?
3. Is orthodoxy dying out?

Below I giv a partial symposium of the brilliant answers to the first conundrum:

Dr. Henson: "Men were never as good church attendants as women. Women are more ready to accept things by intuition. They grasp truth quicker than men; they walk in the light before men can see it."

Dr. Lawrence: "Men feel the church is a restraint upon their personal liberty and prefer the Sunday paper, which has done much—more than anything—to break up church attendance."

Dr. Lorimer: "More men attend our services than women. This is not the day to discuss this question. I will not hav the sanctity of the day and my privacy broken in upon in this way." The attendance at Dr. Lorimer's church was 97 men, 213 women, and 19 children. This divine, let me remind your readers, formerly acted on the stage—now he confines his performances to the pulpit.

The Rev. Robt. McIntyre seems frank and honest: "I am not enough of a preacher to suit the men," but he had just as many as Lorimer.

Dr. Mandeville: "Woman is by nature better than man. She has more time for the consideration of spiritual subjects."

Dr. Bristol: "Men are tired out from their secular labors. Women are more keenly conscientious, more devout, more sensible to moral and religious impressions."

Dr. Goodwin: "The carnal mind is enmity to God; men love an easy life."

Dr. Noble: "Hav no reason to suppose men are less regular in attendance on divine service than women." Reporter counted 198 men, 341 women, and 81 children.

Dr. Gunsaulus: "There is no falling off of men. The ushers estimate the regular attendance at 1,200 to 1,400—the latter oftener than the former. The proportion is, men 600, women 700, children 100."

Dr. Lillie: "Women are not so troubled with doubts and skepticism. The average pulpit teaching commends itself to woman's judgment more fully than man's." It seems almost time the church should adapt itself to man.

Those answers are sufficient. To the second, and all-important question, they replied:

Dr. Vibbert: "For reporters."

Dr. Barrows: "I believe in a biblical hell."

E. P. Goodwin: "Certainly, if the scriptures teach anything they teach there is a hell. I believe in a hell just as taught by the Bible."

Dr. Noble: "I certainly do. Christ taught there was a place of eternal torment prepared for the incorrigibly wicked."

Dr. Henson: "I do, yes sir, I do sure. What it is like I don't know. Don't want to know."

Dr. Lawrence: "I do, as a condition in after life punitiv in character."

The Rev. McIntyre: "Most certainly I believe in hell."

Mandeville: "Every man must believe in a hell. An innate sense of justice compels every reasoning being to recognize the fact that punishment will be meted out for the sins of this life." "Justice" is a new basis on which to consign mankind to hell.

Dr. Bristol: "I believe in a condition of loss, remorse, mental suffering, spiritual degradation, consequent on a life of sin. In the separation of the pure from the impure, the virtuous from the vicious, the wicked from the righteous. I pity the mental make-up of a person who does not believe it." What a consolation hell is to the preachers!

Dr. Gunsaulus: "Certainly."

Dr. Locke: "Emphatically believe in hell."

In regard to the second question the Chicago clergy appear to form a separate, distinct, and concinnate family, for they all unanimously believe in hell of some sort, and seem to consider it the most precious and indispensable appendage for their spiritual exaltation and intellectual aspiration. It is a sweet morceau that these professors of religion and self-constituted regulators of society seem to roll with extreme satisfaction under their tongues. We can scarcely be cruel enough to deny them the experience on which they laid so much store, and only regret they will not be apt to hav their anticipations realized.

To the third interrogatory they nearly all replied with cheery persiflage that it was booming, although some were willing to undergo a new interpretation of what orthodoxy meant. THOS. E. GREEN, who is just leaving the city, admitted that "orthodoxy is on the decline—sadly so in the Protestant world."

Secularists hav a chance to count the cost of this tremendous display of ministerial moonshine, and how much these enormous edifices, entirely exempt from public burdens, can be considered a public benefit, when only three thousand are receiving the dropping from the sanctuary.

While I scarcely approve the growing practice among adopted citizens of adding their nationality as a prefix to their citizenship, believing American citizens should be that and nothing more, however, as long as the practice is prevalent among one nationality, others cannot be blamed for following suit. Too much commendation cannot be given the British-American Association for their efforts to counteract the pernicious influence—moral, political, and religious—which has so long been banefully exerted by the Irish element. At a recent meeting of the Illinois state council the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, A certain policeman in the discharge of his duty in an English city was foully murdered by three members of the Fenian Brotherhood, who for said crime expiated the full demands of justice; and,

WHEREAS, Certain Irishmen of Fenian and dynamite proclivities in this city hav engaged Central Music Hall for the 23d inst. to commemorate the atrocities of the murderers, whom they call martyrs;

Resolved, That the British-American Association cannot distinguish the difference between our brave policemen who fell at the Haymarket and a brother policeman in the city of Manchester cruelly murdered for performing his duty.

Resolved, That the Anarchists hav the same tangible rights as Fenianism. We deprecate such gatherings as being subversiv and dangerous to our enlightened civilization, and call on American citizens to stamp out Fenianism, dynamiters, and Anarchists in our midst.

To say that an eruption of Hibernian bile broke loose is entirely superfluous, and a two-column address was prepared in reply—a regular windy rodomontade—but completely failing to answer the brief resolutions.

But it remained for the ferocious dynamite feeder at the public crib, Oil Inspector Finerty, to respond in the style so characteristic of and befitting a true Irish gentleman. Hear him howl:

The combination of cranks, fools, bigots, and liars known as the British-American Association of this city—an association, by the way, which does not contain a single self-respecting British-American citizen—met and passed a series of resolutions intended to insult the memory of the Manchester martyrs, and to revile the men who will commemorate the twenty-first anniversary of their judicial murder at Battery D, on Friday evening, November 23d. The real purpose of the fellows who compose the association is to stir up race feeling in this city. They dare to liken the man who bravely rescued their chiefs in the heart of Manchester to the Anarchists. It is true that Sergeant Brett was killed in the melee which preceded the rescue of Colonel Kelly and Captain Deasy, but it happened by mere accident. He refused to unlock the door of the van, and the rescuers were obliged to fire a shot through the keyhole to break the lock. The shot was fired and Brett fell dead. His cowardly comrades of the police force fled at the moment of the attack and left the sergeant to his fate. The Manchester rescue was an act of war. The habeas corpus act was suspended in Ireland, and that country was occupied by an overwhelming British military force. The leaders of the people were being arrested by the hundred, and many conflicts had taken place in which several Irishmen were slain. The Irish in England determined to strike a counter blow, and they did it well. No braver act was ever accomplished by revolutionists than the rescue of Kelly and Deasy in the heart of a hostil city. Any other people than the hybrid human rubbish that composes the British-American Association would hav respect for such gallant foes. But there is not a noble instinct in the creatures. Their blood is gall, and their brains are mud. They are foul factionists—an English Tory garrison planted in American soil. They will be as powerless against American interests and Irish-American patriotism as were their base progenitors in the days of the Revolution.

Our Young People's Society hav an open meeting once a month. Of the last the Inter-Ocean says:

The Secular Mutual Improvement Society of the west side gave a very creditable exhibition at the Forum, corner of Sangamon street and Washington boulevard, last evening. The object of the society is for literary improvement, and judging by the ability displayed last evening the object is well carried out. The young ladies were attractivly attired for the occasion, and their companions of the sterner sex were equally well dressed. The program consisted of a piano duet by Misses Mary Deninger and Bertha Piper, a recitation by Samuel Lehnberg, a paper, "The Secular Review," by Miss Laura Lee; a poem by George Borst, an essay by A. W. Wineman, a duet, piano and violin, by Messrs. Stillman and Steadman; a recitation by Jessie Wineman, an essay by B. H. Marlett, a poem by Henry Borst, and a vocal solo by Miss Annie Borst. After the program an hour was happily spent in a social way with an occasional song, and the meeting dispersed for home.

E. A. STEVENS.

Dr. Foote and the Modern Ishmael.

From B. R. Tucker's Liberty.

FRIEND TUCKER: Am sorry to see your Liberty of November 10th (page 5) marred by unnecessary untruth and meanness.

V. Yarros credits Henry George with getting $500 a night from the Democrats for stump speeches; not in so saying directly, but every reader will retain that impression; while I hav been in position to see that he and his party were snubbed, rather than favored, by the Democrats, were obliged to pay their own way, and were ruled out of the Democratic procession.

The meanness appears in your slur about Eugene Macdonald's skirmish with election inspectors, in saying "this will gain him the thanks of loafers." Contrast this with the following sentence, which appears in the last five lines of same column: "A man, from the very fact that he refuses to bend under the yoke to which everybody submits, and has the strength and courage to remain erect when others bend their knee, renders a service to his fellow-citizens by setting them an example of resistance. Even though such resistance hav its source in class or religious prejudices, it is none the less precious; the main thing, in fact, is not the end which it has in view, but the example which it furnishes."

Both Henry George and Eugene Macdonald are as deserving of admiration for energy, perseverance, and ability, as is Mr. Labadie, whose loftiness of motiv you do not question. At least they both deserve not to be lied about or slurred in a Liberal journal, for, as a constant reader of their writings, I hav yet to see reason to suspect any lack of honesty of motiv or consistency in course in either of them. Liberty cannot afford to be unjust to Liberals of other faiths.

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE, JR.

New York, Nov. 19, 1888.

Mr. Yarros's article was written to show, not that George was paid by the Democrats, but that his course had been such as to inspire a belief in the minds of many that he was so paid. The passage which Dr. Foote complains of was an actual quotation from William Morris's Commonweal, showing the impression made on that paper by George's policy. Having seen him to be guilty of mean and treacherous dishonesty, it was ready to see dishonesty in every act of his life wearing the least doubtful look. For my part, I do not believe that George was in the pay of the Democrats, principally because I do not believe that Democratic folly has yet reached the depth of stupidity necessary to determin upon such an expenditure of funds. I believe, as Dr. Foote says, that they did not welcome his coöperation. On the other hand, I am perfectly convinced that George does not hesitate and has not hesitated at things much worse than the acceptance of pay from Democrats. I am sure that he has been treacherous to men and false to his convictions, and that he is afraid to face any statement of truth that clashes with his pet ideas. I hav asserted this repeatedly and in many ways, and I hav cited facts and given reasons. I hav challenged Mr. George or any of his friends to make an explanation consistent with his honesty. This has all been done under Dr. Foote's eyes. He has never attempted to refute my statements. But suddenly, because I charge Mr. George, not with accepting a bribe, but with conduct that leads others to suspect that he is bribed, Dr. Foote becomes highly indignant. I answer him that, when he has successfully defended Henry George against any direct and open charges, I will then apologize publicly for the appearance in Liberty of even so slight a trace of innuendo as some people may think they hav found in Mr. Yarros's article.

Now as to Eugene Macdonald, that other victim of my meanness whom Dr. Foote, with generous chivalry, takes under his sheltering wing. It is true that as a center of resistance he is to be prized. It is true that even such resistance as his is a service to his fellows. It is true that his readiness to kick at trifles is far more to be valued than a spirit of tame submission. But when the editor of Liberty is addressing his readers, with whom he has spent several years in laying a foundation and coming to an understanding, all this goes without saying. And it does not in the least alter the fact that, when a man professes to teach and lead rebels with much ado against a wrong that damages him but little comparativly while he not only submits to but vigorously champions those giant wrongs that inflict fearful damage both on him and others, he makes himself a fit subject for ridicule and sarcasm. When these weapons are directed against such a rough and-tumble combatant as Eugene Macdonald, any wincing, by him or his friends, is a confession of weakness.

Of Macdonald himself, it is only fair to say that he does not wince, but attempts an answer. Here it is:

> Mr. Tucker's drive at taxes is out of place. If there had been no court supported by taxation, the Anarchistic attempt of the election board to wrong a voter would hav succeeded, as they were four to one. Therefore, we say, hurrah for the taxes, and confound the Anarchists who don't want us to vote!

Something less than a severe logician can see that if there had been no court supported by taxation, there likewise would hav been no election board so supported, and that Mr. Macdonald, if he had been wrongly treated by an election board acting for a voluntary association, would doubtless hav been able to appeal as successfully for justice to that voluntary association's court. But in suggesting that he now try to establish a man's right to keep his money in his pocket, I did not "drive at taxes" simply. If he will only join in the campaign against money monopoly and thus do what he can to enable men to keep that part of their wages in their pockets which is now abstracted from them in the form of interest, profit, and house-rent, I will applaud him to Dr. Foote's content and keep mum on the tax question for some time.

Meanwhile shall we see, I wonder, a letter from Dr. Foote in THE TRUTH SEEKER protesting against the meanness and dishonesty of classing as Anarchists election inspectors who try for partisan reasons to prevent one man from voting, on the ground that Anarchists are opposed to voting (under a compulsory régime) as a matter of principle? Probably not, inasmuch as he has heretofore veiled with his silence many such meannesses from the same source. Is he so tender of THE TRUTH SEEKER because it is strong and well patronized and successful, and so regardless of Liberty's feelings because it is weak and struggling for a foothold? Or is it because he feels that THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the weakness of its error, needs a helping hand, while Liberty, having the strength of truth on its side, can fight its own battles? If the latter is the explanation, I appreciate the compliment that he pays me in leaving me to my own resources, while devoting himself, true physician that he is, to pouring balm into my victim's wounds. T.

The Roman Catholics.

MR. EDITOR: Whatever difference of opinion may exist among your readers as to the propriety of the illustrations that weekly appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I think there can be no dispute as to the great merit of the patriotic illustration which appears in the last number of your paper.

In showing the encroachments of Catholicism upon the public schools Mr. Heston is doing good work, and in this instance has hit the nail squarely upon the head. How charmingly his drawing illustrates the brave words spoken yesterday in this city by the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Eaton, in the Thanksgiving service at the church of the Divine Paternity:

> There are at work now hidden forces which may break forth with volcanic energy to destroy that civil and religious liberty we now enjoy.
> Roman Catholic parochial schools are undermining our republican theory of free government.
> The Roman Catholic theory of government is in direct opposition to our republican ideas. They say that nationalities must be subservient to the church. I do not deny that the laity of that church is sincere in its attachment to our form of government, but I do claim that the priesthood is opposed to it. One of the popes said that the pestilential ring of religious liberty is one of the most pestilential evils to the advancement of his church, and that no man had a right to choose his religion.
> I say there should be no religious test for American citizenship, and the history of the republic shows that it recognizes the right of every citizen to choose his own religion. No church has a right to demand any peculiar rights or privileges in ecclesiastical matters as the Roman Catholic church of America is now doing. The founders of the republic saw with far-seeing wisdom that if any sect was given special power or exclusiv privilege, it would, in time, seek to dominate and seize the very reins of government. Religious liberty is one of the corner-stones of the republic.
> "An ignorant people cannot be free," was what Washington said, and if we accept the Catholic parochial schools we must put our system under the direction of the church, which is bound to undermine the republic.
> The free schools are thus imperiled, because the Roman Catholic clergy is opposed to them. They seek to break down the system because it is a barrier to their ends.
> I call upon all citizens, of all creeds, or no creeds at all, to stand up unitedly and firmly in defense of the public schools of America.

The above extract is cut from the New York Herald of Dec. 1, 1888, and shows a remarkable resemblance between the artist's picture and the pastor's sermon. This can readily be explained, I think, from the fact that the artist drew his picture to illustrate THE TRUTH SEEKER—an Infidel paper, and the pastor preached his sermon to illustrate that good old Infidel text from Isaiah i, 17, "Come now, and let us reason together." Lectures and Meetings.

BEFORE the Friendship Liberal League, at the Philadelphia Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, on Sunday evening, December 9th, at 7.30 P.M., Dr. Westbrook, president of the American Secular Union, will deliver a special lecture. Subject: "Hav We a Practical Union of Church and State in this Country?" The Liberal public are cordially invited to hear this free lecture, as it will prove to be an eye-opener.

THE following are C. B. Reynolds's appointments: Omaha, Neb., December 1st, 2d; Seward, Neb., 5th, 6th, 7th; Aurora, Neb., 8th, 9th; Dorchester, Neb., 10th, 11th, 12th; Yankton, Dak., 13th, 14th, 15th; Sioux Falls, Dak., 16th, 17th; Madison, Dak., 18th, 19th, 20th; De Smet, Dak., 21st, 22d, 23d; Huron, Dak., 24th, 25th, 26th; Watertown, Dak., January 3d, 4th, 5th; Milbank, Dak., 6th, 7th, 8th (dates subject to change on account of time and duration of an expected discussion at Milbank, Dak.); Big Stone City, Dak., 9th to 15th.

Converted.

Charles Watts in Secular Thought.

Prof. William Seymour, of Phi'adelphia, Pa., has announced his conversion to Christianity. For some time past he has been lecturing in Toronto. His subject last week was, "The Fallacies of Atheism." We attended this lecture and were truly amazed at the exhibition of lack of knowledge upon the subject announced. A proper title for the discourse one heard on that occasion would hav been, "The Fallacies and Assumptions of Theism as Propounded by Professor Seymour." It was evident that the philosophy of Atheism had formed no part of his intellectual research. The interesting portion of the lecture was that in which the professor avowed himself a thorough believer in God, Christianity, prayer, the divine inspiration of the Bible, and its perfect harmony with science. Knowing Professor Seymour's former associations with the Freethought party in the States, this avowal was to us somewhat startling. He attended Science Hall last Sunday evening, and after the lecture publicly stated that his "conversion" to these views had not been sudden, inasmuch as a change in his opinions upon these subjects had been going on for some years past. In fact, he informed the audience that he never professed to be a Secularist. This acknowledgment, we presume, will rather surprise the Secular friends in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, for whom he constantly lectured "as one of them." When he first arrived in Toronto, in a personal conversation with us, he never hinted anything about his "change," but gave us a very different reason for his association with the orthodox party here. A gentleman to be president of a Secular society, as Professor Seymour was, and a public representativ of its principles, and not to be a Secularist is, to say the least, very peculiar. His is not the only instance on record of persons in our ranks accepting official positions and "sailing under false colors." Secular societies cannot be too particular as to whom they select to occupy prominent positions in their associations. This is another proof of the truth of our former statement that in the Secular movement there are persons with us who are not for us. While Freethought proclaims the fullest freedom, it certainly enjoins that such freedom should be accompanied with truth, honor, candor, and sincerity. If it is not, true liberty is sacrificed at the shrine of personal aggrandizement and hypocritical license.

Our Next President.

From the Chicago Daily News.

The people who are figuring on what General Harrison is going to do are all anxious to get some close details about the character and the inner life of the man. For these some of the following facts will be interesting and valuable.

All his friends agree that his most prominent characteristic is on the religious side. He is a Presbyterian of the severest school, and he is intensely interested in questions of doctrin. The only books that he reads for pleasure are those concerned with the development of the Calvinistic system, and others touching upon the Cromwellian period. He is said to fancy that his own character is like General Harrison of the English revolution, and he knows more about the life and time of that Roundhead trooper than he does of his grandfather, the president. But he reads few books and has little sympathy with book culture. The only novel he has ever been heard to praise is Lew Wallace's "Ben Hur." He reads the newspapers as part of his day's work, but for pleasure he takes the Presbyterian Herald. He prefers, however, neither to read nor to talk about reading, but in the evenings he sits around generally, and, like Walt Whitman, loafs and invites his soul.

He does not play cards, checkers, chess, dominoes, or anything of the sort, and has a horror of gambling and gamblers. Neither does he drink, and when in 1884 he gave a formal state dinner to Blaine and other notables wine was conspicuous by its absence from his table. He has declared, however, that he will not depart from the usual state custom, and that wine will be served to those who wish it at the White House. The general's Danville speech has been often quoted to show that he had leanings toward Prohibition. He is absolutely destitute of a sense of humor, and, it is said, when in a company where merry tales are told, his laugh is rather a concession to his idea of the demand which public opinion makes upon him than a symptom of enjoyment. When men are gathered together and a story which might be described as unfit for publication is told, the general does not laugh, but he does not leave the room.

Mrs. Harrison, on the other hand, has a fund of spirits which sometimes finds expression in practical jokes. For instance, there is a Dr. Newcomer, a great friend of the Harrison family, who is a practitioner of the old school and a deadly enemy of all quacks and all who advertise in any way. This doctor is the owner of a white dog which he regards as the apple of his eye, and which, like Mary's little lamb, follows him about wherever he may go. The two are inseparable. One day Mrs. Harrison and a lady friend, not having the peace and dignity of the doctor before their eyes, decoyed this dog off into a secluded place, and there and then painted upon each of his sides in indelible aniline colors the legend, "Try Newcomer's Pills," and the dog trotted off to his master with this most unprofessional and unethical recommendation where he who runs might read. Nor was his decoration discovered by his owner until after it had been displayed along the whole of the doctor's route. The doctor had to hav his canine friend shaved to get rid of the request, and there was a tension between the Newcomers and the Harrisons for some time.

Mrs. Harrison is a most voracious reader. She is a lady of fine culture, elegant in her tastes, and fitted by both character and education for the honor which has come to her. She is very fond of Browning, of company, and of amateur theatricals. They had in Indianapolis some time ago a coterie of friends who went in for mimic performances, and Mrs. Harrison herself adapted the plays that were used and wrote the charades that were acted. Some of these latter were very clever, and one that excited much attention was published in St. Nicholas some years since. She keeps thoroughly abreast of the literature of the day, and the only point where her husband's character and her own touch is in their deep and common religious convictions.

A Good Word for a Truth Seeker.

From the Ironclad Age.

Mr. C. P. Somerby, business manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been West a couple of months looking after the interests of his paper and its publications. He made this office a pleasant call November 27th. Mr. Somerby is a sincere man, a Liberal of broad views, and a gentleman who is willing to stand up at all times and be counted on the side of justice, right, and square dealing.

A Religious Journal on Its Contemporaries.

From the Catholic Review.

Why should honest and sincere men, like the well-informed editors of the Christian Advocate and the Independent, no sooner begin to talk on Catholic matters than they lie like sons of Beelzebub, pouring out falsehoods so fast that no refutation is possible? You can take up scarcely a number of the respectable journals here mentioned that does not contain some brilliant or stale falsehood against the Catholic church. And as for the inferior journals, the Churchman, the Observer, those published throughout the states, the air they breathe is chock-full of lying microbes, and their editors are in a perpetual fever of fury against Catholicity. Is it really necessary for the existence of these papers that they should so act, and must all their attacks on the one true church hav the strong flavor of falsehood? Would not it be well at times to attack with the truth? Even the devil occasionally appears as an angel of light, and as such scores his best successes.

This is a Nation.

From the Ironclad Age.

It is highly offensiv to American pride and patriotism to hav our country constantly referred to as "the States!" In no sense is the American government "the states." The United States (with a big IS) is a government—a country, composed of integral parts (as all countries are), but united in one consolidated, continuous, and indissoluble whole. We hav been at trouble and loss of life and wealth to impress this great fact upon men and nations. And after all this to hav our country still flippantly referred to as "the states" (meaning a slip-shod conglomeration of petty principalities, held together with a rope of sand), may not be meant as an insult, but it is that same, nevertheless—an insult to our nationality, which is a unit, and to American manhood, which recognizes no separating lines.

The Generous West.

From San Francisco Freethought.

California makes a good showing, comparativly, among the contributors to the funds of the American Secular Union. The Freethinkers of this state are upon the Roll of Honor with over $150—a sum exceeded only by the contributions from New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, either of which states has more than thrice her population. Oregon is not far behind, and with her $147 is fourth on the list. When we consider that the population of Oregon is not much above two hundred thousand, this makes a remarkably good showing. If every state should do as well as these two, the subscription would hav been nearly $20,000.

The West will continue to lead the way in good works, and will wait patiently for the rest of the procession.

What Secularists Must Do.

From Secular Thought.

The rapid progress of Secular views in Canada within the last few years fills us with hope for the future. The churches are "in arms," and more activ than ever in their efforts to discover some means to counteract the "skeptical tendency of the age." As Secularists we must continue our determination to war vigorously against orthodox pretensions; to separate the truth in Christianity from the errors that hav become allied with it; to urge the necessity of adhering to sound practical morality in daily life, and to vindicate the right of personal freedom and mental liberty.

Infidelity in Wales.

From the National Reformer.

The Rev. J. Morgan Jones, Calvinistic Methodist, speaking at Cardiff, is reported by the Western Mail to hav said that "science and Infidelity were spreading, and he himself had been compelled to expel from his own church more than one or two young men in consequence of their having become Infidels, and having learned to deny the existence of God and the truth of the Bible." And this occurs in a district where Freethought lectures are rare in the extreme.

The Infidel Observatory.

From the New York Herald.

LICK OBSERVATORY, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
MOUNT HAMILTON, Nov. 21, 1888.

The end of the astronomical season at the Lick Observatory is fast approaching. The winter fogs are creeping closer and closer to the summit each night, and occasionally they envelop it even now. In a few weeks, perhaps in a few days, some storm will surround the whole mountain range near us, and from that time forward we can no longer count on the almost uninterrupted succession of clear days and nights which make Mount Hamilton a veritable paradise for the observing astronomer. 113 days out of 153 hav been wholly clear, 20 more hav been fair, and another 20 hav been cloudy or partly cloudy.

It is a source of satisfaction to all here that the observatory has earned a reputation already, both from the general public, which is concerned only with results, and from astronomers, who are concerned about methods as well. We feel sure, with the experience gained during this year, and especially with the thousand and one improvements which are now being made in the instruments and means of observation, that the next year promises even better results than the five months just passed.

To most readers the great equatorial is the Lick Observatory. The other fine instruments on the mountain are seldom considered, or if thought of at all, are remembered much as one would recollect some barometer or thermometer. In fact, each one of the instruments is as perfect in its way and for its own especial work as the great equatorial is in its especial field. I hav no doubt that many of our visitors pass the humble-looking comet-seeker, which one man can lift in his arms, and think that the whole thirty-seven tons of the great telescope were used in the discovery of the two comets which were first seen here on September 2d and on October 31st.

But the general idea is the correct one, notwithstanding. The whole instrument equipment of the observatory was chosen so that each part is auxiliary to the great telescope, just as the cutlasses and Gatling guns of an ironclad are auxiliary to the hundred-ton gun in her turret.

Each part has its appropriate work, but if it were not for the great telescope Mr. Lick's observatory would not be there now.

We hav made a thorough trial of this magnificent instrument. There is no doubt that the Lick trustees hav carried out the provisions of Mr. Lick's deed in this respect, and hav set on this mountain "the most powerful telescope in the world." In nearly every one of the various fields of observation we hav repeated and striking instances of its superiority over other instruments, no matter how perfect or how large they may be.

To the professional astronomer this superiority is even more striking than to the casual observer. The moon viewed in a small telescope and as a picture merely, may, and indeed does, appear as well as in the great equatorial, but for the examination of the surface markings of the planets, for the examination of the structure of the nebulæ, for the discovery of new double stars, there is no comparison between this instrument and any other that I hav used. Even the splendid twenty-six-inch telescope at Washington is far surpassed in every field in which we hav compared the two. The foregoing remarks apply, of course, to the visual object glass made by Alvan Clark & Sons, the only one which was contemplated by Mr. Lick when he made the deed. The photographic objectiv (also made by the Clarks) has been tested in making photographs of the moon, and it has produced capital results.

The mounting of the telescope requires some changes before it is fitted to photograph stars and objects requiring long exposure. These changes should hav been made while the makers of the telescope were on the ground waiting for instructions and suggestions what to do. In justice to them, it should be said that they did their work as well as it could be done in the workshop, and after it was erected at Mount Hamilton waited from November to May for criticism and suggestion as to its completion in the observatory. As the telescope was not in the hands of the astronomers till June there still remain several material changes to be made. These hav been taken in hand by the regents of the University, and it is confidently hoped that by the opening of the next observing season everything about the great telescope will be in perfect condition, and that it will be quite ready to begin its work of astronomical photography, from which we may reasonably expect so much.

All the other instruments of the observatory are in activ operation and in complete order, and the buildings are now fitted for their purposes. Much work has been done in this direction during the summer, and the result is that the Lick Observatory now stands as one of the most capitally fitted for its uses that can be conceived.

Especial mention should be made of the excellence of the large dome which covers the great equatorial, and which was built at the Union Iron Works of San Francisco. Since the ventilation of this dome has been improved by a few days' work it has performed admirably, which is no small advantage. The great telescope requires perfect conditions to do its best work, and it appears that these hav been secured.

The preceding remarks upon the means of observation were needed as a preface to an account of what has actually been done, and to show that the work of the astronomers has not been simply to use their various instruments, but also to fit them and the complicated machines auxiliary to them for their most perfect work.

To the casual summer visitor who takes one of the most beautiful drives in the world over a capital road, who spends a few hours looking at the many things to be seen here, and who then goes away pleased and interested, the life of the astronomers at Mount Hamilton appears one of the most delightful in the world. And so it is. We are all comparativly young men, each absorbed in his profession, and provided by Mr. Lick's unparalleled generosity and by the liberal grant of the regents with every appliance and facility for astronomical work. All this, too, in one of the most romantic and beautiful situations in the world, under a climate which is most delightful.

It is certain that every one of the corps of observers fully appreciates this and that no corresponding opportunity elsewhere would tempt him away. But there is another side to all this which the casual visitor does not see, which I certainly am not going to set forth at length, but which ought to be mentioned in passing.

Let anyone fancy for himself the necessary obstacles to living on the summit of a high mountain in the winter snows. How is the food for the colony to be brought over a road which no longer exists? Where is the fuel to be had, unless indeed it is cut on the reservation? Where are the children of the colony to go to school? How are city servants to be induced to share the enthusiasm of the observers? Just at present there is no water for any domestic uses except such as has passed through the hydraulic engins. Astronomers can stand the trifling drawback of a film of machine oil over their drinking water, but how about the rest of the community?

These are only a few of the practical questions that hav to be considered and met by all of us here. They do not weigh at all in any real sense, and yet I think they ought to be just mentioned in passing to giv a true idea of our existence and to show that life at Mount Hamilton is really a different thing from life at the level of the sea, where snowstorms of ten days long are unknown and where the necessities of life are next door and can be fetched by a district messenger boy.

No observations of the sun hav been made with the large telescope for fear of the effect of the sunlight in changing the transparency of the glass of which the objectiv is composed. With the six-inch telescope, however, a constant watch has been kept on the solar disk by one of the students of the observatory for the detection of large or remarkable spots. Elaborate preparations hav been made also preliminary to the observation of the total solar eclipse of January 1, 1889. A book of suggestions to observers of this eclipse has been written here and will be distributed without cost to those who apply for it.

Venus was frequently observed during the early months of 1888 before the observatory was completed and transferred to the university. Such observations are most advantageously made in the daytime while the planet has a high altitude and is free from the fogs and mists near the horizon. Unfortunately the daytime is precisely that part of the twenty-four hours which is least fitted for delicate observations at Mount Hamilton, and these visual observations hav added nothing material to our former ignorance —I cannot say knowledge—regarding this planet.

The surface of the moon can be and has been well studied with small instruments, but there is a most important field open for the very largest in the examination of her special features. The pressure of other work has interfered in this direction, and our chief observations upon the moon hav been made by means of the photographic lens. During the month of August satisfactory and often splendid photographs were obtained on the following dates: August 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 26th, 27th, 28th, and 30th.

It is safe to say that no photcgraphs of the moon hav yet been taken to equal the best of this series, and there is no observatory in the world where so many satisfactory pictures could hav been secured in a single lunation. This series will be repeated on future occasions until a perfect negativ of every phase of the moon is obtained, and then our chief attention can be given to the production of enlarged pictures of single craters.

It is in the memory of all that the scientific and unscientific press has been full of accounts of discoveries on the planet Mars. Discoveries there hav been during the past decade, and important ones, but before I giv any account of these I wish to convey, if I can, some accurate notion of what it is we are observing and what we may expect to see.

Under the most favorable circumstances the planet Mars presents a disk of about thirty seconds. This is about the angle that a foot-rule would subtend if it were viewed at a distance of one and one-quarter miles. Such are the conditions under which we hav to view the planet. During our observations in 1888 the disk was never more than ten seconds.

Now, when the disk of the planet is examined, we see on it various markings, which hav been called land and water. The prevailing color of the disk is a brilliant salmon-red, and features of this color hav been called land. The various "continents," etc., are separated by darker portions, and these hav been called seas and straits. The edges of the planet are viewed obliquely and show few markings. These are lost in the prevailing lemon-yellow tint, which goes nearly round the border. At the poles of the planet are brilliant white caps, which are reasonably supposed to be the snowy regions. They wax with increasing cold; they wane with the approach of the Martial summer.

If there are snow and ice on Mars, as the observation just cited seems to show, then there must be water. The spectrum of Mars, too, proves that watery vapor exists in its atmosphere, but no certain proof has ever been given as to which portion of the visible disk really corresponds to land and which to water. This is one of the important problems of the future, and one we hope to examin, at least, during the next few years.

Now, this planet, with its markings, turns on its axis in twenty-four hours and thirty-seven minutes, and presents us different faces at different times. Astronomers hav patiently drawn the various aspects at various times, and from the drawings made hav constructed maps of the whole surface, just as maps of the earth are constructed.

There are six different maps of the land and water of the same planet by six different observers. They are all on the same scale, and they ought to agree exactly. So far are they from this that it is with difficulty we can make out the similarity of a few special features. General likeness there is none. Of these charts that of Schiaparelli is the most exact and also the most detailed.

The "canals" (so called) which hav been steadily seen by different observers from 1875 onward, were discovered by him to be frequently doubled, paralleled by other lines. These double "canals" hav been, so far, seen by only one other observer—namely, by M. Perrotin, director of the great observatory at Nice. M. Perrotin has also announced the submergence of a "continent" on Mars in May of this year.

The two hemispheres of Mars shown by Schiaparelli are full of detail, which has been verified by very few observers, and the particular point which astronomers are now considering is whether these "canals," which few hav seen at all, are doubled, and if so, what is the meaning of it. The season for making such observations was in April and May of this year. Owing to the delays in completing the Lick Observatory no observations could be made here until the middle of July. From that time until the latter part of August the planet was diligently followed, over forty careful drawings having been made. These drawings show at least twenty of the principal "canals," but no one of them was seen doubled.

The submerged "continent" had reappeared also, and was seen by us here essentially as it has always appeared since 1877. It was most unfortunate that the Lick telescope could not be used for this purpose until so late a date; but it has shown its great power in such work by following the fine details on the surface two months later than other instruments, and it has conclusivly proved that whatever may hav been the condition of the "continent" previous to July it was certainly in its normal condition from that time onward.

It is impossible to discuss such questions as these without taking more space than can be allowed here, but enough has been said to show that the observatory has, even under the most unfavorable conditions, made important contributions to the study of Mars, and that at the next favorable opportunity we may confidently expect from it more light on these questions.

Only two of the minor planets hav been examined—namely, Vesta, the brightest one of the group, and Iris. The disks of these are clearly and definitly seen, and are easily measurable under good conditions, and the quality of their light serves to instantly distinguish them from the neighboring fixed stars. I need not say that in ordinary telescopes no difference can be perceived. Their very name—astercids—indicates this. The light of Vesta is yellow and mild, with none of the rays which surround a star of the same brilliancy. It resembles one of the moons of Jupiter as seen in a smaller telescope. Iris also has the same mild light; its disc is smaller than Vesta's, and its yellowish color is not so marked and intense.

During the summer of 1888 Jupiter was very unfavorably situated for observation on account of its extremely low altitude.

It was carefully followed, however, and many suggestions for future work were derived from the examinations which it was possible to make.

The phenomena attending the transits and eclipses of the satellites were highly interesting in particular, and certainly deserve further study under more favorable conditions. These satellites usually appear as bright points in the telescope, not stellar in character, but with a disk which is not always steady and perfectly defined. Here, on the contrary, we see them steadily as well-defined and large disks. So far we hav not been able to see any of the markings which hav been reported to exist on these disks. A more favorable opposition may allow us to go further in this direction also. The eclipses of these satellites can be followed phase by phase like an eclipse of the moon.

As the satellite enters the shadow of the planet one sees first the edge obscured, then the satellite half illuminated, and finally the thin crescent disappearing.

The unexampled opportunities for observation here may some day lead to a solution of the enigma of the different rates of revolution of the different layers of the globe. Certainly much remains to be done in this direction.

There is nothing so interesting in the whole solar system as the planet Saturn, with his eight satellites and his magnificent ring system. On every suitable occasion during the past month he h s been carefully examined from 3 o'clock in the morning—a beautiful hour of the day here—until sunrise. Many new details are made out on the surface of the planet and on the rings, and the present opposition will giv us satisfactory evidence on various unsettled points. As these observations are still in progress it is better not to giv any summary of results for the present. In general, it may be said that the immense power of the telescope really does giv great advantages over other instruments, even with a bright object like Saturn. The dusky interior ring, for example, and the complex shadings on the rings, are far better seen here than elsewhere.

The planet Neptune is the outermost of the known planets, being thirty times more distant than the earth, and taking 164 years to make its revolution round the sun. Its real diameter is more than 30,000 miles, but its apparent angular diameter is not 1-600 of that of the moon. Nothing is known of the time of rotation on its axis and but little of its physical condition. It has been carefully examined here on many nights for the detection of equatorial belts or bands and for markings on its surface, but the net result so far is that no such markings can be certainly seen.

It can be pretty safely said, too, from our own observations, that there is no unknown satellite to this planet nearer than the one already known. The search for a satellite more distant than this one should be made by photography, and the equipment of the telescope in this respect is not yet complete. Trials hav been made, but they hav not led to entirely satisfactory results.

Mr. Barnard, who is indefatigable in such work, has discovered two comets here, on September 2d and October 31st, and has made a long and valuable series of observations on the comets of Olbers, Sawerthal, Brooks, and Faye. The comet of Olbers was observed here about four months later than at any other observatory, and Faye's comet is still under observation, though, I believe, it is no longer observed elsewhere.

A very singular conviction has been forced upon us in our observations of the nebulæ particularly. In examining these objects with small telescopes of six and eight inches aperture, one gradually comes to a sense of the similarity of certain species of them, for example, of the whole class of planetary nebulæ, so called. Each one of these is very like its fellows. As one employs larger and larger apertures, say of twelve to twenty-six inches, the sense of similarity among the planetary nebulæ is lost in the multitude of new particulars discovered in each new object examined. I had supposed that in the use of the great telescope a similar process would go on, and that the many new details which we see in each new planetary nebulæ would separate each one more and more from its fellows and place it in a class by itself.

This is not the case. It is certainly true that each new object examined discloses multifarious new details so varied, in many cases, as to quite set it off away from many or indeed most of those that Herschel classed with it. But it is also true that our increased power really seems to be sufficient in a great number of instances to bring out the law according to which these details were developed, and to enable us to reclassify the subjects by veritable resemblances, and to separate them off into new species according to the new features developed.

Sir William Herschel and Sir John Herschel showed that starting from a circular, faint, uniformly illuminated nebula, every gradation up to a bright, round nebulosity, with a strong central nucleus, could be represented from actual examples; or, again, starting from the same faint uniform circular disk other nebulæ could be chosen representing every step in the series up to a type where the circumference was very bright and the center was devoid of any nebulosity—up to a true ring nebula, in fact.

These two series suggest that these different types may hav been formed by two different laws of force which resemble each other in being strictly central—that is, directed toward a fixed center of attraction. A single force like gravitation acting upon matter suitably disposed might suffice, however, in both series.

The argument derived from the arrangement of the nebulous matter is very much strengthened when we take into account the situation of the faint stars which frequently accompany such nebulæ. As Sir William Herschel pointed out and as has been amply confirmed by Lord Rosse's and by our own observations, the critical positions of such stars on the edges of the oval rings of nebulosity, etc., put the theory that the system of stars and nebulæ are veritably connected in space, and that the forces compelling the observed forms are truly central forces, beyond all doubt.

In classifying the nebulæ the Herschels hardly could hav gone beyond this point. A great additional step was taken when Lord Rosse showed the prevalence of spiral forms in many nebulæ, and it appears that at least one nebula observed here (37 H. iv. Draconis) is not only spiral (in one plane), but a true helix (in space). If it is not in fact a helix (a point which the eye alone cannot settle) it certainly appears to be such, and it seems to be an important addition to previously known classes.

In nearly all the nebulæ which we hav hitherto examined we hav found, as has been said, a multitude of new details of structure which separate it totally from most of the nebulæ classed with it by the Herschels. These specific differences do not, however, lead us to the conclusion that each nebula must be placed in a class of itself, but rather that a number of new sub-classes must be formed to include such nebulæ as still keep strong (though new) specific resemblances based on the new peculiarities of structure which hav been disclosed.

For nearly every form which we hav seen, no matter how bizarre, some parallel case has been found. In all these the idea of a central force is strongly suggested, and we seem to be approaching new problems in the world of nebulæ.

Are all these central forces the same? Are they all one force, and that gravitation, and are these varied forms only different results of this universal force? Or, on the other hand, are there several or many kinds of central forces acting in space? Is each one of the several sub classes of nebulæ which are indicated by our observations here an index, so to say, of the action of a different central force?

If this is so we know at least that the number of such central forces is not indefinitly large. There is too marked a tendency of the nebulous forms to fall into distant groups, each group indicating a common origin. The fact that we now seem to be face to face with such problems as these appears to me to mark a distinct step forward in this province. It may be that by and by we may expect to classify correctly and according to real law such infinitly complex forms as those of the Orion and the Omega nebula, of the Trifid and the Andromeda nebula, etc. The power to correctly classify the simplest forms will giv a secure basis for the hope that even these marvelous structures may finally fall under simple law. At least, the first step has been taken.

A large number of new double stars of the most interesting class hav been discovered by Mr. Burnham, and the list of them will shortly be printed.

Besides these Mr. Burnham has measured the relativ positions of many difficult doubles which are too close for measures to be made with instruments of less power than the great equatorial. This interesting department of astronomy is fully cared for here.

Prompt publication of the results of certain kinds of astronomical observations doubles their value. Certain other kinds, on the other hand, must be worked over and over again until something as perfect as possible is brought out from them. In the first class we must include the preliminary orbits of new comets and of binary stars.

Such preliminary orbits hav their immediate use and serve as first approximations to more elaborate investigations, which often require years to complete.

The orbit of the comet discovered here by Mr. Barnard on September 2d was at once computed by Mr. Schaeberle, and was printed in the same number of the journal which gave the observations upon which it was based. The same is true of the orbit of Mr. Barnard's second comet, discovered Oct. 31, 1888.

The binary star 85, Pegasi, was discovered by Mr. Burnham in 1878, and all the observations of this very difficult double star hav been made by him. A late observation with the large telescope made possible the calculation of a first approximation to the orbit of this star, which also was made by Mr. Schaeberle. His results, though preliminary, are of much interest. He finds the period of revolution to be twenty-two years only (less than the period of revolution of Saturn round the sun) and the mass of the two stars taken together to be about eleven times the mass of our own sun. Future observations will change these figures slightly, but this binary pair now takes its place among the most interesting of such objects.

The observatory is not primarily designed as a meteorological station. Its exceptional position, however, creates the duty to carry on a certain set of meteorological observations. These are regularly made and transmitted to the chief signal office. In the same way a regular set of observations of the slight earthquakes which are common in California is kept up in connection with other observers in various parts of the state. The observations will be of value in connection with seismic investigations, but they are indispensable to us in keeping an accurate account of the position and constants of our astronomical instruments, which are slightly disturbed with each shock.

The series of photographs of the moon secured in the month of August has already been mentioned. The other photographs taken hav been mostly experimental, to determin what changes and additions to our equipment must be made in order to make our photographic outfit thoroughly efficient. These experimental photographs were mostly of stars, though the planets Jupiter and Neptune and a nebula were included in the series.

Nothing has yet been done in the direction of spectroscopy beyond preliminary experiments with the great star spectroscope and preparations for observing the total solar eclipse of Jan. 1, 1889, by this means.

A party of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey has been engaged in determining the difference of longitude between Mount Hamilton and San Francisco, and in connection with this work our meridian circle has redetermined the position of the stars employed by the Coast Survey observers, and has made independent determinations of the clock correction on the nights of exchange of signals.

As is well known, a railway time service is maintained. which gives the hour to every railway station from San Francisco to Ogden and El Paso, in the East, and to Portland in the North.

. . . . . .

In the foregoing brief summary of the season's work I hav necessarily barely touched upon many important series of observations. It will be evident, I think, that work so varied in so many important fields proves that the observatory has been fully activ, especially when it is remembered that this work has necessarily been much interrupted by the presence of the workmen engaged in completing the observatory and by the necessity of laying out plans for them, and also for providing the necessary materials for the long siege of winter. Several important departments of astronomy, as spectroscopy and stellar photography, hav hardly been entered upon. It has been our aim to do thoroughly all which we attempted and to follow out the spirit of the excellent saying of the veteran observer Argelander that the attainable in astronomy is often missed by ill-directed efforts after the unattainable. The six observers here hav been fully engaged and hav already produced valuable work and shown that more will be forthcoming. If we had twenty astronomers all could be profitably employed.

I remark with pleasure that the observatory is already attracting to itself a class of advanced students, who would otherwise hav gone to Eastern or European university observatories. We hav applications from three such advanced students already, and we may look forward to the creation of a California school of astronomy which shall do credit to the State University.

The observatory is specially hospitable to students of all the California colleges and has been visited by the higher classes of several such. Even the children of the neighboring district school hav made a visit here on one of the public evenings. At least four thousand visitors hav come here since the 1st of June, and about two thousand hav looked through the great telescope.

The attitude of the observatory on the subject of visitors has attracted no little attention abroad. From the Atlantic Monthly for October I extract the following, which shows the puzzled state of mind of the reviewer. Speaking of the Handbook of the Lick Observatory he says: "The fact of this book is the most interesting thing about it. Here is a great academic observatory and a book is actually prepared, with close attention to particulars, for the use and encouragement of visitors. The candor o f the hospitality is remarkable. Instead of 'No ad - mittance,' the motto seems to be 'Walk in.'" Exactly so. And not only seems to be but is.

I think there is no doubt that this great observatory with its double duty of advancing pure science and diffusing knowledge is going to be, and is now in fact, a powerful factor in the progress o f our state and country.

The Mission Humbug.

Canon Taylor has supplemented his paper on "The Great Missionary Failure" in the Fortnightly Review of October by one on "Missionary Finance," in the November issue of the same magazine. Mr. Taylor selected two societies as subjects of his investigation, one of them the greatest of the Protestant missionary organizations of the world.

Of the operations of this society the canon could learn but little, as the accounts published are "remarkably illusiv" and unsatisfactory. For instance, a sum of $330,000 is excluded from the balance sheet for various fictitious reasons, and there are other omissions and discrepancies, leading Canon Taylor to say that "it is as much as if a railway company made up its expenditures to one date, its financial position to another, and the accounts of the passengers carried and of the train miles run to a third." Vast sums raised on the mission grounds do not appear at all on the books of the home society, for the reason, Canon Taylor thinks, that the money is used "in paying converts, those 'rice Christians,' or 'rupee Christians,' as they are called, whose existence so seriously discredits the genuin results of the labors of the missionaries." The amount used in this way he estimates at $340,000 at least. And of the amounts of which account of the reception is kept, no accounts of the disbursements appear, the secretary of the society telling Canon Taylor that "no account of the actual expenditure on the missions has ever been printed."

Of the million and a half of dollars collected by the church missionary society, over eleven per cent went for collections and management alone. It cost over five hundred dollars to simply collect and disburse the funds for each missionary employed. And the total expenditure of the society, divided among its missionaries, averaged about five thousand dollars apiece. That is, this is what the home officers spent to send money to the East to be wasted by the agents in the field, for Canon Taylor's first article showed that when the money was finally got upon the ground it produced no tangible results.

Just as Canon Taylor's article reached this side of the water the Methodists were holding the annual meeting of the General Missionary Committee. The books of this committee show that the Methodists are slacking a little in zeal, though goaded on by the officers. In 1887, under the stimulating cry of "A Million for Missions," the society raised $1,044 795.91. This encouraged the society to ask for twelve hundred thousand, and appropriations were made on that basis. But only $1,000,581 24 came in, and the society found itself about $160,000 worse off than it was a year ago, for at the beginning of last year the society had enough in its treasury to pay all outstanding drafts, with a balance of $80,746.61, while this year the society owed $78,340.13. Therefore the treasurer recommended that the appropriations be diminished fifteen per cent.

In the discussion which arose over this proposition some very instructiv remarks were made. One member of the committee affirmed "that the churches were being unduly pressed, and that there was ground for the supposition, indulged by some, that the great end of the churches was to raise money rather than to save souls." Another member confessed that "nothing can be used next year to increase the collections that has not been used this year." In other words, the churches had been bled for all they were worth. Secretary McCabe thought the society would better let some of their building enterprises wait. Dr. Buckley remarked that last year "the committee was intoxicated with a surplus, and under the excitement produced by such a remarkable state of affairs they rose in their appropriations $200,000. Unquestionably the committee made a great mistake in making a leap of twenty per cent after the church had been strained, as all knew to hav been the case. What has been the result? We appropriated and asked for $1,200,000; the church gave us $200,000 less. Some said last year that the normal growth of the giving of the church for missions would be $100,000 a year. This prediction has not come to pass. To say in an off-hand way that it is 'a small thing' for the church to giv $1,000,000 for this cause is a delusion and a snare; and the common calculation of fifty cents per member is misleading. He did not believe that the church could giv $1,200,000 this year. While there is great competition between presiding elders in the collections of their districts, the pastors are feeling and calling out under the burden laid upon them." Bishop Thoburn was alarmed at the proposed fifteen per cent reduction. "Never before," he said, "had the society undertaken such sweeping reductions as were now contemplated. At a crisis like the present no mission, of course, should undertake new work involving expenditure of the society's funds, and all building enterprises should be suspended as far as possible; but to reduce as largely as is proposed means in India the dismissal of nativ preachers, the closing of schools, and abandonment of promising work." Other members spoke to the same effect, but the deficit in the collections had frightened the committee, and the aggregate appropriations for home and foreign work were reduced fifteen per cent.

Secretary McCabe, during the discussion, said that the society had, since Abraham Lincoln's proclamation was issued, accumulated property in the South amounting to $10,000,000. If this is the case, and it probably is, an interesting question for Southern taxpayers is, How long before the society will hav a monopoly of the land of the South? No Methodist society ever pays taxes on its property, and all the Southern states exempt religious institutions. Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation (presumably the one to which McCabe referred) was issued in 1862, to go into effect January, 1863. Ten millions of dollars' worth of property acquired by only one church society in twenty-six years, is an alarming showing, and fully justifies the member's remark that people were thinking that the object of the church is not so much to save souls as to make money.

The result of the society's foreign work so far is, on its own showing, but meager. The reports show:

Foreign ministers	141
Nativ preachers	477
Members	23,073
Probationers	9,733
Sunday-schools	1,226
Scholars	56,595

These are scattered over India, Africa, China, Germany, Switzerland, and South America, and some of the missions hav been running for forty or fifty years. The population of these countries aggregates hundred of thousands of millions. It looks, from this, as though it would be a good many years before the Methodist Episcopal church conquers the world!

The missionary business, from top to bottom, home and foreign, is a stupendous fraud upon the people who pay the bills. It affords the home officers a fat living, a chance for unscrupulous missionaries to make money, and does the people to whom they are sent no good. There is no hell to be saved from, no heaven to go to, and all the energy and money spent on religion is simply wasted.

The Janesville Decision.

The ground taken by the attorney for the Roman Catholic parents in the suit at Janesville, Wis., to prevent Bible-reading in the public schools was solid as a mountain. The plaintiff's case was based on the admitted facts that the Bible was read in the Edgerton schools; that the complainant's children, being members of the Roman Catholic church, were taught and believed that the King James version of the Bible, which was the one read in Edgerton schools, was incomplete and unauthorized; it was taught by the church and believed by those interested that reading the Bible without guidance and interpretation from the church was likely to lead to irreligious belief and faith. Arguing from this it was held that to daily read the Protestant Bible in the presence and hearing of the children in question necessarily controverted their belief by word and example, although against their will. "It was not claimed," said the attorney, "that the Catholic Bible should be read in the schools, but that so long as the schools are supported by taxation all pupils should be treated equally—no doctrins taught or practice followed which infringed upon the belief of any subject, and that it would be for the benefit of the public to remove all such questions. Unless Protestants be entirely willing that the Catholic Bible be introduced into the schools, they ought not to introduce their own."

Judge Bennett decided against the plaintiff, holding that the reading of the King James version of the Bible, without comment, was not sectarian instruction, and that if the Catholics were aggrieved thereby their children could retire while the reading was going on.

It is hard to properly characterize such a decision as this without contempt of court. Roman Catholics comprise one sect in Christendom, Protestants another. The different versions of the Bible which they use are edited to support their different creeds. And not only are these two sects at war over the meaning of the Bible, but Protestants themselvs are also widely divergent in their interpretations of the New Testament. Universalists and Unitarians do not desire to hav the scriptures read "straight" to their children. And the sprinkling and immersion Baptists hav fought over the words commanding this rite ever since the two sects existed. But what about the Freethinkers whose children attend the Edgerton schools? Is there any version of the Bible that to them is not sectarian? Let Judge Bennett find such version, and report.

Probably, however, Judge Bennett would say, the Freethinkers' children could retire along with the Catholics and shiver in the entry till the Christian children had read their daily dose of theology. But this brings up another difficulty. The Catholics must hav their religious book read, and the Freethinkers might also desire to hav some religious work read—say, Felix Oswald's "Bible of Nature," wherein are set forth moral and physical truths calculated to make the child moral and healthy. The morning program of the school would be something like this: The teacher would send the Catholic and Freethinking youngsters into the entry, and the Protestant Bible would be read. Then the Catholics would be called in and the Protestants sent out to cool their heels while the Douay version was read with comments. Then the Catholics would go out again to join their Christian brothers and sisters and fight over their different creeds, while the young heretics obtained their instruction from the "Bible of Nature." This course would giv the children lessons in marching and strengthen their little legs, while the teacher would get an eclectic lesson in religion. If any time remained, the children might then be taught to write and cipher.

The rank injustice and ignorance displayed by Judge Bennett in deciding that the King James version is not sectarian, and the pueril plan by which he gets over the difficulty, if it is, mark him as one of those judges whose decisions are influenced by his own desires.

The Milwaukee Sentinel, in commenting upon the question raised by this suit, concludes that the problem of how to get religion in the schools without offending any of the sects is a very hard one. It is, indeed, and the more the Sentinel thinks of it the harder it will appear. We believe the problem to be utterly unsolvable, and the only thing remaining to do is to conduct the schools without any religion at all, leaving the supernatural part of a child's education to the various Sunday-schools which the parents patronize. Certainly, the Sentinel's statement that "the Jew and the Agnostic hav no objection to the Bible-reading, as long as it is not associated with dogmatic instruction," is very wide of the truth. The Jew does not wish his child taught that Jesus Christ was the messiah, and that only by belief in him can man attain to a comfortable place in another world. Neither does the Agnostic. In fact, the latter individual is emphatic in his opposition to Bible-reading in schools for many reasons, chief of which is that he claims that no one should attempt to teach that which he himself does not know. Religion is a theory, a speculation, a guess, and no Agnostic will consider that it is wise to teach guesswork as fact. The Sentinel appears to be about as ignorant of what the Jew and the Agnostic want as Judge Bennett is of what constitutes sectarianism.

Affirming.

In sending in his subscription for another year Mr. John Maley, of Boonton, N. J., inquires:

"Is the law in New Jersey on affirming the same as in New York? and can you put your hands where you please while affirming?"

The constitution of New Jersey declares that no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust, and that no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles. The laws relating to oaths provide (sec. 26), "That every person who shall be permitted or required to take an oath in any case where by law an oath is allowed or required, and who shall allege that he or she is conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath, shall, instead of the form of an oath, be permitted to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration, to wit: I, ———, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm." "So help me God" shall be omitted.

This is the New Jersey affirmation, and in taking it a witness need not raise his hand, because such raising is part of an oath, and is the ceremony substituted for kissing the Bible. Our New England ancestors did not kiss the Bible, but swore and raised their right hands to heaven. They obtained the ceremony from England, and our courts hav taken it from them and tacked it on to the affirmation, when it has no business anywhere, unless the use of the Bible is omitted, and the witness is afraid he cannot tell the truth unless he swears.

Non-religious affirmation is permitted in the following states and territories: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Dakota, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Indian Territory, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. In all of these a man can affirm without raising his hand, if the judges adhere to the law. California, Idaho, New Mexico, and Utah put "So help you God" to the affirmation, but nothing is said about uplifting the hand. Connecticut, besides providing an unornamented affirmation, declares that no person shall be disqualified because of disbelief in a supreme being, and Minnesota goes farther and givs a form of affirmation for "an Infidel," leaving out even the word "solemnly." Georgia compels an oath or "affirmation according to the religious faith of the witness." We should like to see an affirmation framed on the "religious faith" of an Atheist! Indiana must allow such affirmation because the law declares that it may be administered in the manner most binding upon the conscience of the affirmer, and want of belief in a supreme being or the Christian religion cannot render a witness incompetent, though the want of such a belief may be shown upon the trial. Massachusetts has the same insult to unbelievers, the evidence of such person's unbelief being received to affect his credibility as a witness. Oregon stands out conspicuous in this matter, her constitution declaring that no witness or juror shall be rendered incompetent because of his opinions on religious matters, nor be questioned on the subject to affect his testimony. Maryland compels a man to believe in God when he desires to affirm as a witness or act as a juror, and the manner of administering the affirmation "ought to be" that which his denomination esteems the most effectual. A Marylander, according to his state constitution, cannot tell the truth unless he belongs to some church. North Carolina will not let a man hold office unless he believes in "almighty God," and he must, when he swears, "lay his hand upon the holy evangelists of almighty God, in token of his engagement to speak the truth as he hopes to be saved in the way and method of salvation pointed out in that blessed volume," after which he must "kiss de book." If he desires to swear in another way he can "stand with his right hand lifted up toward heaven, in token of his solemn appeal to the supreme God." Pennsylvania allows Quakers to affirm, but others must swear by kissing the Bible or uplifting the hand. In South Carolina the affirmation must be according to the witness's "religious belief or profession." Tennessee debars Atheists from office, and swears her citizens upon the evangelists. Affirmation in that state is really an oath. Texas protects her unbelieving witnesses from disqualification, but insists that office-holders shall believe in a supreme being. Vermont, in addition to providing a plain affirmation, will not allow inquisition into a witness's religious belief. Washington territory takes its forms of oath from the United States statutes, which allow affirmation. Wyoming allows the affirmation, unornamented, and her form of swearing is the ancient form of uplifted hand, instead of laying the hand upon the book or kissing it, and ends with the words, "So help you God."

It is plainly seen from these examples that there are three forms of oaths in use: 1. Laying the hand upon the Bible without kissing it; 2. Both holding on to the Bible and kissing it; 3. Raising the right hand toward heaven (or at least toward the ceiling). Affirmation is simple assent to a promis to tell the truth, subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. Freethinkers can require the affirmation to be used in all the states that the law provides it, and if ignorant or bigoted officials refuse it, can compel it by recourse to a court of law. Where a man shall carry his hands is his own business, and is generally determined by his early training. The allegation of an election board that a Freethought Editor insisted upon keeping his in his pockets, is an amusing falsehood. The Editor did not contradict their affidavit, because it was of no consequence except in the eyes of Anarchist editors, and the judge had decided the point before an answer could be made. The Freethought Editor did refuse to remove his hat because it was demanded as a part of the affirmation ceremony and a mark of respect to an alleged supernatural being, while he regarded it as only a matter of etiquet, which does not require a man to uncover upon entering a tailor shop whether he enters for the purpose of registering or to buy a suit of clothes. Had it been a court the case would be different, as there hats are removed from respect to the tribunal.

One man esteemeth one way above another: another esteemeth every way alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. But I say unto you, Swear not at all.

Girard College.

Would it not be advisable for those people who are afraid to begin proceedings against the Girard College directors for fear of defeat to obtain Dr. Westbrook's book and study up the subject? The result would be that they might at least write intelligently on the matter.

The supreme court upheld Girard's anti-sectarian will, but when did it ever uphold the sectarian conduct of the directors? The facts are that the present teaching in the college fairly reeks with evangelical sectarianism, and admitting for the moment that Girard did not prohibit the teaching of the general principles of Christianity, he clearly did prohibit the teaching of such dogmas as the trinity, which is not a general principle but a sectarian speculation. Even the Bible itself is not accepted alike by all Christians, and consequently any particular meaning which the instructors in the college may giv to any chapter is sectarian. Who has ever seen any summary of the doctrins of Christian belief in which all the sects concurred? As against Roman Catholicism and non-evangelical Protestantism, the conduct of Girard College is to-day as sectarian as it is possible to be. John Calvin himself could not hav preached narrower sectarian sermons than do the peripatetic lay preachers who occupy the pulpit of Girard College every Sunday.

But the intent of Girard's will has been carefully ignored and viciously frustrated by the management of the college. Girard intended that all religious dogmas should be kept out of his college. Webster, in his attempt to break the will, argued further that Girard intended to exclude all religious tenets. And this is evidently the fact. Webster then argued that the will could not stand, as Christianity was a part of the common law, and such a bequest must therefore be void. The court did not coincide with him, holding that Christianity was a part of the common law only with qualifications, and that an educational bequest which omitted to provide religious instruction could not be void on that account. Had Girard provided for the teaching of Judaism or Deism, or "other forms of Infidelity," as the court called these theologies, the judges allow us to surmise that they might hav felt called upon to interfere. The court evidently was composed of thoroughgoing Christians.

Both the letter and the intent of Girard's will hav been broken, and if these violations do not constitute a case, what shall a court ask? Dr. Westbrook has the assurance of many eminent jurists that the points he raises are in their opinion invulnerable, and it seems more reasonable to take the opinions of qualified men who hav investigated the subjects than of those who hav not studied the matter and are not fitted by legal training to decide such points though they had. But even supposing the courts should uphold the managers, nothing but good can come to Freethought from making the attempt to secure justice. There will be less danger of the California Christians turning the Lick Observatory into a missionary society to reconcile Genesis and Astronomy if they see there is some one looking after thefts of that kind.

The Modern Ishmael.

"He digged a pit; he digged it deep—
He digged it for his brother:
But it so fell out that he fell in
The pit he digged for another."

Mr. B. R. Tucker seems to be in the predicament of the first gentleman described by this touching bit of poetry. Mr. Tucker digged a little pit for the TRUTH SEEKER Editor, lining it with sarcasm and abuse of our present social system, and now he's down in the bottom making faces at the brother who wouldn't fall in. His sarcasm had no basis of fact, which spoiled the effect, and his circular reasoning leaves him working around in the pit, with small prospect of getting out.

When that election board stuck to law and their official duties for which the taxpayers paid them, they were all right, and committed no injustice. But when they ignored law, and "voluntarily coöperated" in an Anarchistic manner, they at once began to do injustice, just as mobs and lynching parties usually do. Then the law stepped in and sat down on them. But had we had no law the inspectors could hav managed things to suit themselvs and according to their ideas of right. By four of them voluntarily coöperating against one citizen, the citizen would hav lost his right of participating in the selection of our Public Servants. That would hav been Anarchy. Judge Barrett, through the medium of law, restored that citizen's right. That was civilization.

Before we can get along without law the breed of humans in the world will need to be very greatly improved, not only in New York but in Boston.

Editorial Notes.

MR. ALFRED M. SOALES, governor of North Carolina, takes the prize for pious Thanksgiving proclamations. This is the way he talked to the people of his state: "God is recognized in the constitution of our state, and should ever be honored as the supreme ruler of the universe in the hearts of our people. To him we are indebted for our country and her institutions, for civil and religious liberty, for our holy religion and its adaptation to man's wants and happiness, together with numberless mercies and blessings which hav crowned our daily lives." It occurs to us that once upon a time a large proportion of the inhabitants of North Carolina did not possess civil liberty. Were the colored North Carolinians indebted to God for their state of slavery?

If Consistently Applied.

From the Galveston News.

The latest declaration against the Mormons is found in a New York World editorial. It says that even if polygamy were eliminated, they should not be admitted to Congressional representation, because of their submission to a hierarchical system. The principle enunciated will go a long way if consistently applied—quite too far for a comfortable life in this country where the Presbyterian must try to get along with the Catholic and Episcopalian.

Letters from Friends.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Nov. 16, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: I am working very hard to get a cow for the old Mr. and Mrs. Casey. I hav already sent $5, and hav $5 more on hand, for Mr. Casey said he could get a cow for $25 if he paid $5 every month. I hope the Liberals will continue their contributions till this cow is paid for. And the names of the donors I will forward to Miss Wixon for the Children's Corner. SATIE THORPE.

CAIRO, ILL., Nov. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to thank you for your flattering review of my book, "Our Uncle and Aunt." Freethinkers can surely indorse what I say, and will, I hope, help me out in my work by patronizing it. It has received many excellent notices from the press, and a few bitter and bilious ones. I could not expect anything better when my subjects are so unpopular. Well, I hope it may do good.

Yours truly, AMARALA MARTIN.

FLINT, MICH., Nov. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER by far the best paper published in the United States. I am heart and soul in sympathy with its teachings. I should like very much to continue right along with it while I liv, but cannot, as I hav been an invalid for over six years, and it has cost me everything trying to get my health. I dislike very much to tell you to discontinue, but must for the present. Please accept thanks for favors bestowed. M. J. PUTNAM.

TRUXTON, N. Y., Nov. 13, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Within you will find my subscription for the good old TRUTH SEEKER, which has come to me weekly for many years, we will say twelve or thirteen—but you know best, as you can find out by looking at your book if you think well of doing so. I hope that you and all connected with the above-named paper are well, and will be so for many years to come—not forgetting Watson Heston and his cartoons. I think they are good and grand. As ever,

A Liberal, JOHN DEAN.

MOODY, TEX., Nov. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is one amongst the best of papers published. There is more true knowledge in it for $3 than anyone can get any other way. I see lots of people are bragging on Mr. Ingersoll's eloquence, which of course is true, but the old hero, D. M. Bennett, was as learned in almost anything as Ingersoll. He was not the orator that Ingersoll is; but the pen sows the seed of truth and righteousness, and has been the greatest foe that orthodoxy has received for these many years. JOHN M. SIMMONS.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Nov. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see some one by the name of "Downes" has written the Melbourne Liberator that our Secular Union is but a weak institution. I hope you will not suspect me of the vile slander; as I am the only one of your subscribers of that name I know of, I thought you might. The Secular Union is not as large in numbers as I would like to see it, by millions, but it is growing, and under the direction and guidance of our splendid president, secretary, and able lecturers I hope to see its membership at feast doubled the present year. Yours truly, JNO. DOWNES.

SEDALIA, MO., Nov. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 postal note, for which please continue THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address for six months. As our friend W. J. Klein has taken his departure for the unknown regions of the dead, I will continue on his subscription when it expires, having been reading the paper for the past year and having got attached to it too much to do without it. We hav a good number of Liberals here in our city, and we intend to get together soon and see if we cannot get into an organization of some sort, so as to work in unison for the good of Freethought and Liberalism.

Yours fraternally, WM. MATTHEWS.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 23, 1888.

MR EDITOR: At the regular semi-annual meeting held November 4th, the following officers were elected by acclamation: president, E. A. Stevens; vice-presidents, Mattie A. Freeman, Sherlie Woodman, James Gruber, Prof. Chas. Orchardson, and Prof. James Milleson; secretary, A. E. Hutchinson; financial secretary, Miss Mary Mand; treasurer, Jehu Barr.

Mr. Stevens is so well known to the Liberals generally that it is unnecessary to say why he was elected for the tenth time president of the Union, by acclamation. Mesdames Freeman and Woodman are ladies well known to readers of Liberal literature, the former as the foremost lady lecturer, and the latter having earned considerable distinction as a contributor to the Radical Review and other publications.

Prof. Chas. Orchardson is well known as a philosophical reasoner and a keen satirical demolisher of shams.

Prof. James Milleson has given us some excellent lectures on scientific subjects.

Mr. Gruber has long been an activ member. His amiable better half is our charming alto singer. Miss Mary Mand, a beautiful Danish blond, was the president's choice for financial secretary, as "she would be irresistible and the members would pay promptly." Treasurer Jehu Barr knows more about the scriptures than most orthodox preachers. He has studied them, and consequently has evolved out of their fetichism. He will be a safe guardian of our funds.

On the re-election of Mr. Stevens he gave us a very spirited address, which could not fail to arouse the most laggard. He referred to the treatment received by the Liberals at the hands of the local press in Pittsburgh, and spoke of the Sunday laws of that city in his most cutting style. He outlined the work to be done the following year, speaking of Girard College and many other assumptions of power by the church. Considerable old-time enthusiasm was awakened.

The Union starts in this year's work with an improved business management, and promises to surpass even its aggressiv labors of the past. Chicago is a Liberal city. Everywhere you go you will find men who hav grown away from creeds—and splendid women, too, who hav long since dropped the errors of the past. We are more than confident in Chicago; we are enthusiastic.

At some later date I shall be able to giv your readers some points of interest with reference to the Young People's Society, which is growing in favor and developing some splendid talent.

A. E. HUTCHINSON, Secretary Chicago Secular Union.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As THE TRUTH SEEKER, as its name indicates, is in search of truth, whether religious, political, or otherwise, I hope it will not hesitate to publish the following truths, of which some of its correspondents seem to be ignorant:

1. Instead of the tariff on cut iron or steel nails (building nails) being five cents per pound, as stated by Mr. J. L. Tompkins, it is only one and a quarter cents per pound.

2. That our forefathers fought because England protected them with a tariff (in those days called properly a tax) on tea, printers' colors, etc., and the result of that revolution was American Independence.

3. That during the low tariff decade from 1850 to 1860 the assessed valuation of taxable property in the United States doubled, growing from $6,024,666,909 in 1850 to $12,084,560,005 in 1860. Till 1870 it grew to only $14,178,986,732; till 1880 it reached only $16,902,993,543.

4. That twenty years of Republican rule has not yet remedied the much lamented suppression of the negro vote in the South.

5. That imports are our pay for exports, and about as much labor is required to produce the latter as the former.

A truth lover, D. WEBSTER GROH.

FORESTPORT, N. Y., Nov. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I expected to bring in one or two other subscribers, but they were not ready. I cannot afford to part company with the galaxy of friends that come to enliven and instruct me every week through the pages of your journal.

There are certain phases of extreme Liberalism that were rather displeasing to me at the beginning, but now I find it interesting and somewhat amusing to know that among so-called Freethinkers there are a good many individuals as fanatical and cranky as any to be found in the churches. Giv them a hearing, but do not let them crowd you out of your place.

Now or never is the time for those Spiritualists to show that they hav not been chasing another jack-o'-the-lantern.

The tide is setting strongly in our favor all over the country. Liberalism, Secularism, and skepticism are advancing rapidly every day. That was a powerful and well-directed blow you struck at the registering business; but if some poor, obscure individual had attempted it he would hav failed ignominiously. That was worth more to our cause than all the obscenity trials we hav had or will hav for years to come. JERE. O'BRIEN.

NEW YORK, Nov. 20, 1888.

After a skirmish with the election inspectors, and a short but decisiv struggle in the courts, Eugene Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has established a man's right to keep his hand in his pocket. This will gain him the thanks of loafers. If now he wishes to deserve the gratitude of workers, let him expend a little of his surplus energy in establishing a man's right to keep his money in his pocket. I fear, alas! that he looks upon this as a comparativly unimportant matter.

MR. EDITOR: The above paragraph, which we clip from Liberty, has a savoring of littleness about it unexpected to us, emanating as it does from a Radical reformer, with decidedly cultured attainments. Furthermore, it is not logical. Mr. Tucker cannot be so obtuse as not to know that if superstition can be obliterated from the minds of the masses the industrial question is settled at once. Mr. Macdonald, with much trouble and expense to himself, has practically destroyed one of the "Dianas of the Ephesians," for which every true reformer owes him gratitude. It is a landmark of progress. It will not gain him the "thanks of the loafers," for there can be no greater loafers than the generality of the election inspectors, the politicians who make the electoral laws, the priests who teach the obeyance of these laws, or the lawyers who expound them, and it is they who insist upon the raising of the hand, the kissing of the book, and such tomfoolery generally. And it was these whose hatred he long since gained. It should gain him the thanks of every opponent of force. GEO. M. DAVENPORT.

MR. EDITOR: I can't get you a single subscriber in this benighted wilderness of orthodoxy. I hav repeatedly offered to lend THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they refuse to take and read it. One of my nephews asked me to giv him a copy, as he was going West and wanted it to read on the way. I complied with his wishes. He was reading it one night before he started, several persons being present, as there was a protracted meeting going on in the neighborhood, when his father, quick as lightning, jumped across the fireplace, snatched THE TRUTH SEEKER, and instantly consigned it to the flames, and exclaimed, "Nobody but a fool would hav any such papers about them!" The son said he "would hav another or die." This is a fair sample of the intelligence of this country. They say they don't want to know anything else but Jesus Christ and him crucified—which I am certain they don't know. The adults of this country cannot be taught Freethought, their brain is so marred by the orthodox preachers by cramming hell-fire and brimstone into them. I hav tried several of them. They cannot understand Freethought. It would run them crazy to charge them with Freethought. The only chance for this vicinity is to teach the young Freethought, so that the brain may form accordingly; and the only way to do this is to let that unruly member loose on Freethought and Infidelity in every crowd of young people you get into, as I am doing, and it will "tell" in the future.

The clergy of these backwoods are afraid of an Infidel, and will dodge and hide if they find out I am in the crowd. I sometimes run on two or three at once, but they don't stand long. They are afraid some one will hear what Infidelity is and what the Gods are not. I hav time and again offered to debate on the subject with them, but they say, No. I say, "Why?" They say, "It will giv notoriety to Infidelity and injure the church." I hav offered to lecture if they would come out and hear me. They say they won't come or let their children come. So you see it is hard to teach Freethought down here in east Tennessee.

Maybe some Freethought lecturer could come this way and make a run on them and get out a crowd. This is all the chance. T. H. BULCHER.

N. B.—Don't publish this, unless you want the Infidels to know what a hard knot Christianity is down in this country, and thereby dishearten them. T. H. B.

COALING, ALA., Nov. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Ritchey's last letter is as pleasant as I could wish. So we are friends again. She says the Israelites suffered from the plague because one man married a Midianite woman. God got mad at this and killed twenty-four thousand Hebrews, yet he allowed them thirty-two thousand of the same nation and never killed any for that. That is consistency for a God. She denies Noah's being a drunkard. If I should kill one man and stop I would not be a murderer, and so on of all the catalog of crime—more logic.

The next is the question where the pagan got his knowledge of heaven, hell, and a future life. She wants me to tell where he got it. It is not necessary for me to know. I know it was a myth the same as the Christian's, and just as good. It cursed them and caused them to persecute and murder one another the same as the Christians.

> Now bid the heralds sound the loud alarm,
> And call the squadrons sheathed in brazen arms.
> Now seize the occasion, now the troops survey,
> And lead to war when heaven directs the way.—Homer.

Mrs. Ritchey quotes Herbert Spencer, that "religion, present everywhere as a weft running through the warp of human history, expresses some eternal fact." Yes, that is so, and the history of one is the history of all. But she infers from this that as man has always had such a belief God impressed it on him, and that it is proof of an eternal fact. Man in all climes and all nations has believed in witchcraft, astrology, and magic. Now, according to her reasoning witchcraft, astrology, and magic are eternal truths.

Mrs. Ritchey points to an inconsistency—that if the Hebrews had got their Bible from the Greeks they would hav incorporated their future life. When the old myth was written they did not know of the Greeks, so the new myth, that of Christ, is all that they borrowed from the Greeks and Romans. Can Mrs. Ritchey see no likeness between Prometheus and Christ? Does Mrs. Ritchey think that Solon and Socrates had communication with heaven? Socrates was a better man than Christ, but he never claimed to be more than man.

Now, what shall we say of the next: "It will be readily admitted that the Mosaic laws were not perfect?" God talking to men and telling them his laws, and they not perfect! Mrs. Ritchey refers me to Heb. viii, 7, 8. I refer her to the same chapter and tenth verse, and the balance of the chapter, and ask her if God has filled his promis.

"The United States of Israel is the first republic we hav any account of." Then we hav the republic of Utah! It was a theocracy, a government by the priest, and worse, if possible, than the government of the pope.

I fail to see how the modern slavetrader would be severely dealt with. "Thou shalt buy bondmen and bondwomen from the heathen round about, and they shall serve you forever." "Servants, be obedient unto your masters."

I fail to see of what good the Bible has been to man. We got all science from the pagan, with painting, sculpture, poetry, comedy, tragedy, history, geometry, rhetoric, and practical arts and inventions. The Bible has never revealed any of these things. It has revealed only: Fear God and honor the king.

Mrs. Ritchey says: "Wherever the God of the Bible has been sought after and seen man has been gradually rising in the scale of humanity." The time when the Bible was most honored and sought after was called the Dark Ages. Then they tied women up and burnt them, and this and like practices never abated until the pen of an Infidel appeared on the scene. The nation that honors the Bible most now is the most tyrannical on the globe.

"In Abraham's seed hav the nations of the earth been blessed." I should say, cursed. "I come not to send peace but a sword;" and well the sword has filled its office, for it has shed more blood and caused more suffering than all other religions I ever read of. And then, he said, Only a few would be saved and the many lost.

Will Mrs. Ritchey explain how the devotees of other religions feel just as good as the Christian does with his?

There has been a nine days and nights' revival meeting in half a mile of me, and they only roped in six children, not one of whom could read a column in a newspaper intelligently; which to my thinking proves that religion is adapted to the child's mind, and to the unthinking and the ignorant. We hav lots of negroes down here. I hav talked to several hundred of them on religion, and I hav never found an Infidel among them. God shows himself to them and talks with them as of old. Some see him riding one horse and leading another for them.

If Mrs. Ritchey was accused of some crime and was innocent, after it was talked over the neighborhood I could take a sentence here and a word there and convict her. That is the way the Christian refers to his Bible.

If John knew Christ and saw a dove descend on him, why did he send his disciples to ask if he was the Christ?

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find amount due on paper, $3, with an additional $2.25 for books. Please excuse delinquency in not sooner adjusting indebtedness. Accept thanks for the generous continuation of your valuable and ever-welcome paper, the worthy and fearless TRUTH SEEKER. Regretfully I hav not, owing to absence, been able to see a copy for some time past. However, aside from current news, its columns are mainly taken up by articles of a logical and scientific nature, which are as interesting and instructiv after a little age as when first printed.

From observation in general, I think that, considering the impediments, a rapid evolution is being made toward greater mental freedom and a nearer realization of truth and reality; and for the happy and beneficial change the world is indebted to you and such principles as are set forth and defended throughout your publications. I venture to say all that is required of those professing Christianity and believing in the so-called holy Compilation of Mistakes commonly known as the word divine, is an action and determination on their part to rationally and candidly examin, in order that they may come forth properly regenerated, not by fire, water, and credulity, but by common sense, reason, and truth. It is lamentable to investigate the Bible and still be compelled to recognize the fact that its teachings, however absurd and contrary to all reason and consistency, hav exerted such tremendous influence over thronging multitudes and still hold many in subjection. And all because of a false, pernicious doctrin being disseminated among the ignorant and credulous by a horde of dishonest, selfish priests and other interested parties as a true and beneficial faith, that they, a small minority, might gain an ascendency over a vast number of unthinking, superstitious people, thereby securing wealth and power in exchange for imposition and hypocrisy. We find at the present day, by a little attention to facts and conditions, that the most ardent and numerous supporters of the church are those least qualified to espouse and defend a cause bearing a logical stamp. Amid the somber gloom of midnight darkness the Christian faith thrives more luxuriantly than in the bright gleams of intellectual sunshine. The Christian, as other religions, is based on a pedestal of superstition, which is as surely being undermined and destroyed as the intellectual grandeur and efficiency of modern times transcends and exceeds in power and energy the mental stupor and decline of the Dark Ages. Then Christianity predominated, ruled, and waved aloft the scepter of authority. Now science and philosophy hav taken upon their majestic hands the cause of truth and virtue, and it becomes fully evident that the otherwise degenerate and barbaric state of humanity is indebted to science for its brilliant success and mental brightness. Therefore all who are truly interested in elevating and improving the world in mental, moral, and social conditions, must undoubtedly stand on the side of science and liberty. Science, liberty, and progress—these three form the grandest triumvirate, the holiest trinity, that ever was conceived. This godlike trinity, the morning light of all good and noble lives, commands, and will ever receive, the support and approbation of all truly loyal men and women.

DEFIANCE, O., Nov. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The evolution theory is one that cannot be readily grasped by the common mind. A person must be well versed in physiology and anatomy, the science of reproduction and continuation of species, the logic of positiv and negativ forces and cause and effect, in order to fully comprehend the broad scope embraced in the term evolution.

Our knowledge of evolution has been gained mostly by observation. We arrive at the conclusion that evolution is the invisible, unknown law that controls the universe, and is manifold.

Evolution is physical and mental. Physical evolution teaches us that all animal life, as well as all vegetable life, has sprung from one general head during the early age of the universe. A close examination of embryos will seal as a truth that the embryos of all species are at one stage of existence the same. Different conditions evolve new forms, just as a kaleidoscope presents new geometrical forms to view by the position in which it is placed.

Evolution teaches that all life-matter sprung from one general head either by spontaneous generation or natural growth, and that condition caused the changes of form.

Every stage and phase of life evolved by a recognized law of production and continuation from one form to another till a perfect form was attained. This is the "survival of the fittest." That this is the case can be easily proved by referring the doubting Thomases to the geology and zoology of the world. They will find uncouth, ungainly shapes which can now be seen in a perfect form in the bird, fish, or other kinds of the animal family. They threw off all the incongruous parts during the progress of development until the culminating point was reached.

That man has developed from a lower form of animal life cannot be fully established beyond dispute, but by following up the embryotic presence of similarity of construction and continuation, as well as the existing animal propensities of man, we must inevitably arrive at the conclusion that man is the highest type of animal life. That evolution is still at work in man can be seen by looking over the world and the world's history and observing the great advancement that has taken place in the general life of man.

As for evolution in a spiritual sense, well-read persons know that the human mind is capable of being continually educated—that a man knows more to-day than he did yesterday, and will know more to-morrow than he does to-day, and that evolution of the mind or intellect is just as perceptible as evolution of the body.

The spirit or soul progresses from one stage to another, else a man would be as ignorant as a week-old babe. As the body livs always in one form or another, we know no reason why the mind or soul should not liv.

Suppose there is a God? He knew when he made the universe what was to inhabit it and what was to be the final end of it, and if he did not know from the beginning the history of the universe as it has been, is, and will be, we would like to hav some kind theological friend rise and explain why he didn't. He is not an all-wise, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient God, and should not be called such. If God is everywhere, we know of no one who has ever met the gentleman, as we regard the Bible as not being a reliable authority on anything. We believe that whatever is, is, and was intended to be such from the creation of life and matter from crudity in the millions of ages past, and that it was to be so or it would hav been different. We recognize evolution as the true foundation of creation, and reproduction and continuation of a species, made so by itself, the unknown law.

If there is such a thing as a personal God, we are inclined to believe that he has made a ponderous failure of himself, else he would do some of his work over again. More Christians are becoming evolutionists than evolutionists turning Christians.

ESTELLINE, DAK., Nov. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I do not know that more need be said on the appendix vermiformis question, were it not for the intrinsic interest attaching thereto in the minds of those who are really seeking the truth, of whom I am one, and hope Mrs. Ritchey is another. A statement of the manner in which this peculiar structure is believed by evolutionists to hav been formed, I presented briefly in the issue of September 22d, but without adducing special proofs, being content at that time with the remark that such a view was sustained by scientific researches. What some of those proofs are, I purpose now to notice more at length, if the kind Editor will permit.

Evolutionists hold that the life history of a species is epitomized in the embryonic development of each individual member of the species. The organism passes rapidly through the stages of life reached by its early ancestors, and thus presents to the eye of modern science a beautiful panorama of its life history, the wonderful fact being brought to light that each organism passes through an orderly succession of phases representing the forms of life beneath it. Thus the higher form presents the characteristics, first, of an aquatic animal, then of a reptil, a mammal, until it finally reaches the special form by which it is known in the adult state. These undeniable facts must mean something, and evolutionists hold them to mean genetic descent through the several forms observed in the development of the embryo.

From this general statement, upon which it is unnecessary to enlarge here, we pass to an investigation of that particular structure, the purpose of which has long been held a mystery, and which forms the basis of the present controversy.

An eminent biologist affirms, in a number of the Scientific American supplement, published several years ago, that the human cæcum, in the early stages of its development, presents the same characteristics as the cæcum of a horse; namely, greater proportionate length, and the entire absence of a worm-like appendix. The end of the blind pouch, he further says, gradually becomes reduced in size, the process continuing until nearly the entire length of what was once the cæcum is transformed into what is described in text-books on human anatomy as the vermiform appendix. If the organ always existed in the adult homo as it is found at the present day, what is the meaning of the atrophying process in the embryo? Why was it not formed as an appendix at once, instead of being produced by a modification of a portion of the cæcum? If the explanation I hav given of these facts is not satisfactory, what theory will Mrs. Ritchey substitute to harmonize with, and at the same time account for, the known facts? Or is she content to dismiss it with the epithet, a "knotty question?" Such is not the method of science. It appears to the eye of the biologist as though we inherit first the structures of our earliest ancestors, then the structures of our ancestors in the ages successivly following, the earlier being gradually transformed into the later. I cannot believe that nature is a deliberate liar, or that this wonderful phenomenon is the work of the evil one, planned to deceive the very elect. I believe that the true story of living beings is often to be learned by the aid of development alone. The investigation of vermiform appendices as they are reveals very little about vermiform appendices as they were in the long ago. When the atrophying process is observed to occur during certain stages of embryonic development, "growing small by degrees and beautifully less," until nothing but a worm-like, yet still tubular, structure remains, who can doubt that it is one of the ancient landmarks of the human species?

To my statement that the organ had ceased to perform a useful function, else it had not atrophied, it is objected that this fact, if fact it be, "ought to furnish a clue as to what that use was in the lower animal that has disappeared in the man." Upon the point here raised I do not know what view is taken by men of science, but, as Paul says, will "giv my judgment," and venture a suggestion of my own. On the use of the cæcum in the lower animals, Chambers's Encyclopedia says: "In many of the mammalia, however, and particularly in most of those which are herbivorous, it is comparativly large, and is found to secrete an acid fluid resembling the gastric juice. It therefore appears that where the nature of the assimilatory process is such as to require the detention of the food for a considerable time, this provision is made for it, in order that digestion may be more completely accomplished."

From this its function may be described as that of a secondary stomach. Now, we observe that, in the case of animals going on all-fours, the cæcum, together with the adjoining portion of the large intestin, lies in a horizontal position. Observe, further, that when, on the evolution hypothesis, man learned to walk erect, the position of this organ became vertical instead of horizontal. In this position a difficulty would be encountered which under the old economy was neither met nor provided for, namely, that of forcing the intestinal contents out of the cæcum upward. It seems probable, therefore, that the cæcum was shortened to meet the emergency. At the same time the assimilating power of the small intestin may hav been increased so as to obviate in large measure, the necessity of a cæcum.

Mrs. Ritchey thinks if the appendix had been formed as I hav stated, "it would undoubtedly hav presented such an appearance of gradual enlargement as it approached a gradually diminishing cæcum, as would render it difficult to determin just where the latter ended and the former began." Why would it undoubtedly hav done so? We hav seen that it was formed in the embryo, as I hav stated, and upon this fact I rely in expressing my belief that the transformation in the species was brought about in a similar manner; and if the object in shortening the organ was to prevent the falling down and prolonged retention of the fæces, as I hav above suggested, there would be the best of reasons why it should not diminish gradually to the end, but rather should close abruptly near the valve, as it actually does.

My antagonist lays great stress upon the supposed fact that the appendix is found only in man. I am aware that a statement to that effect has been palmed off for scientific truth, but later researches hav demonstrated its utter falsity. Whoever first circulated the story, as well as those who continue to giv it currency, should be confronted with the following from the English naturalist, Prof. Andrew Wilson, whose remarks, it will be observed, sustain my position on other points involved in this discussion: "At the junction of the small and large intestin of humanity there is found a pocket-like portion, forming, in fact, the first part of the large intestin, named the cæcum. Attached to and opening from this pocket is a small tubular appendage, which, at first sight, suggests a nature of rudimentary and useless kind. That the cæcum itself is of rudimentary kind in man is readily provable. In the hare or horse it assumes an immense size, and it is very large likewise in that near neighbor of the kangaroos, the koala. The explanation of the small cæcum of man and its tubular appendage appears to be readily found, when we take into consideration the development of this structure in lower life. Even in some lemurs, these lower kith and kin of the monkeys, the cæcum is large and yet possesses the tubular addendum, a fact showing us that probably the extremity of the cæcum first degenerates, and that the cæcum itself lastly becomes rudimentary as a whole. Occasionally, in man, the tubular appendage of this part of the intestin may present us with a tolerable development; nature in such a case reverting to the primitiv condition. But as it exists normally in man and the apes, we simply see in this modified part of the digestiv apparatus an additional proof of the work of variation as that process has operated in the production of the highest forms of quadruped life."

This, as far as it goes, lends support to my theory that the partial or complete assumption of the upright position has been a factor in reducing the cæcum to a rudimentary state.

I said nothing about how long the transitional period has lasted, yet the "hundreds of thousands of years" which Mrs. Ritchey pretends to quote, I should judge to be a not unreasonable estimate. One difficulty with our creationist friends is that they fail to take the facts in their true perspectiv. If we divide fifty million years into one thousand epochs of fifty thousand years each, and imagin the amœba gradually transformed, within the limits of the entire period, into man, the change necessary to be effected during any one of the fifty-thousand-year epochs would be so slight as to be scarcely perceptible. Yet Mrs. Ritchey objects that, "from the first time the surgeon's knife laid bare the mysteries of the human form until now, the vermiform appendix has stubbornly maintained its original size, shape, and position," etc. When did the surgeon's knife first lay bare these mysteries? Not more than a few hundred years ago at the farthest; and not more than one hundred years ago did it do so with anything like scientific precision. We should not expect to detect a change in one hundred years, scarcely in a thousand years. Here is a specimen of parallel reasoning: Ever since the thermometer first registered the degree of heat in and on the earth's surface, the general temperature has stubbornly maintained its original intensity, as if it served not to teach man the lesson of the earth's former high temperature, but instead that the modern nebular hypothesis is an empty dream, unsupported by any fact in nature rightly seen. The logic is as good in one case as in the other; it is worthless in both, the facts not being taken in their true perspectiv.

In conclusion, I shall be grateful to anyone who will adduce facts on good authority, either for or against the theory I hav ventured to propose, as to what has led to the wasting away of the cæcum in man and the apes. I hav no interest in presenting the theory further than that the cause of truth may gain by the discussion of it.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Life Lesson.

There! little girl; don't cry!
They hav broken your doll, I know;
And your tea-set blue,
And your playhouse, too,
Are things of the long-ago;
But childish troubles will soon pass by.
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They hav broken your slate, I know;
And the glad, wild ways
Of your school-girl days
Are things of the long-ago;
But life and love will soon come by.
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They hav broken your heart, I know;
And the rainbow gleams
Of your youthful dreams
Are things of the long-ago;
But earth holds all for which you sigh.
There! little girl; don't cry!

Biographical.

TOUISSANT L'OUVERTURE.

In the early history of this country people at the North as well as the South were owners of slaves. It was thought nothing to kidnap black people from their homes in Africa and the islands of the sea and bring them to this country for slaves.

In Somerset, Mass., there lived in colonial times a man of great wealth by the name of Henry Bowers. It is said that he was controling owner in one hundred sail of vessels, yet before his death he became quite penniless, so changeable is the course of fortune. Well, this man owned, or pretended to own—for, as the immortal Paine has said, "man can hav no property in man"—a young boy who had been kidnapped from his nativ land and brought to Somerset. He was an uncommon lad, of great physical strength, and a strong, but, at that time, an uncultivated intellect. He could not bear the thought of being a slave and continually strove against the bondage in which he was held. He became a terror to all the people in the village, so much so that his "master" concluded to ship him to Hayti or San Domingo, where he came from, after which the villagers breathed easier.

It is of this boy that I am going to tell you.

While in Somerset he had learned to read, and, after returning to Hayti, he became a coachman, and from this was promoted to be an overseer of a sugar plantation. He was a pure negro and very black. In 1791 there was an insurrection in Hayti, an uprising of the mulattoes demanding their rights as human beings. The man of whom I write, whose name then was Francois Dominique Touissant, joined the insurrection, after first securing the safety of the family in whose employ he was. He was soon made a brigadier-general in the army, and captured Brandincourt, the French leader, and his forces, without shedding a drop of blood.

In 1793 the island was invaded by the British and Port-au-Prince was taken by them. Touissant, with shrewd foresight, saw that the only hope for Hayti was in declaring in favor of France, because its national legislature had made the island a part of France and at the same time had proclaimed freedom for the slaves there. He had great powers of nativ eloquence and convinced all that his way of thinking was right. Then he was given by the French commander the name of L'Ouverture, which means in English the opening. At that time commenced a real strife, but Touissant was equal to all emergencies, and with his men took twenty-eight Spanish batteries in four days and finally conquered the English forces. Then came trouble between the mulattoes and the pure blacks. This, also, he settled, and in 1801 Touissant L'Ouverture became emperor of the island. A constitution was prepared in which he was declared president for life, and a system of free trade was established.

Bonaparte, proud and imperious, who at that time was first consul of France, regarded Touissant as but a slave who had revolted and led others to revolt, and resolved on his punishment. War vessels and soldiers came again to Hayti, but the island could not be conquered while its brave president remained thereon. So, one night he was seized with his family, put on board a French frigate and carried to France, and placed in a dungeon.

His wife and children he never saw again. In vain he asked for a trial. His pleadings, his questions, all remained unnoticed, and he was subjected to gross neglect.

The keeper of the place where he was confined went away, leaving Touissant without food or fire for four days. On his return the poor sufferer was dead and the rats were gnawing his feet. This occurred in 1803 and his age was sixty years.

How he must hav suffered in that loathsome dungeon! How his proud spirit must hav chafed at his captivity—he, who had felt the power of an emperor, who once rode through the streets of Hayti in great state, attended by eighteen hundred mounted men in brilliant uniforms, a prisoner in a dark, damp, living grave, left to starve and to die, alone and forsaken! It was terrible. He had a great mind and wonderful abilities, and was too noble a personage to suffer the indignities that were heaped upon him.

It is related that sea captains who sailed from Somerset to Hayti saw Touissant after he was proclaimed emperor of Hayti, as he rode in his magnificent state carriage dressed in princely robes, surrounded by his followers, who seemed to emulate each other in doing him homage. The captains could hardly believe the evidence of their own eyes, but they were convinced that he was none other than the little black boy who so independently and fearlessly walked through the streets of the village of Somerset, defying all efforts to keep him a slave.

Avery P. Slade, Esq., historian of Somerset, says Touissant was the first man who ever left that village to sway a scepter over a conquered people. S. H. W.

Thoughts on Thanksgiving.

Having promised you to write something for the Children's Corner, I suppose I shall hav to do so. A year ago I wrote to the Corner and expressed my feeling regarding the national farce—Thanksgiving day—and since then I hav not changed my opinion. Why, does it not seem to anyone who knows something of the outside world—of the misery and starvation, crime and vice—that there should rather be a day appointed of national sorrow than thanksgiving? The majority—the great, vast multitude of humans—what hav they to be thankful for? Shall they fall on their knees and thank Gods that coal is $7.50 a ton; flour, $8.50 to $10 per barrel; sugar, 8 cents per pound; and that so in proportion the bare necessities for living cost nearly double their value?

Oh, they ought to be thankful they are living! No, Mr. Preacher, of the Presbyterian sort; rather no living than such an existence of daily war for a comfortless life! Why should they be thankful? Had they been asked before they were born as to their choice never to exist or to liv a life of shame and starvation, there is no doubt that they would hav preferred rather the eventless nirvana than the sort of a life led by the great multitude of human beings. But this is a rich, a wealthy, prosperous country. Yes, it is prosperous and enriching for the few; but under the cover of sueh prosperity there is hidden a ghost of misery and depravity of which but few who never lifted the veil hav an idea.

Yes, this is a wealthy, industrious, progressing, prosperous country at the expense of the millions of starving and shivering human beings. Mr. President may hav cause to be thankful—at least, before election—at his Red Top, with $50,000 a year sure, $200,000 a year snug bank account, and prospects of a reëlection—yes, I don't doubt but he felt thankful, for such is not the fortune of every human being—but how about the miners in the Hocking valley, who work for ninety cents a day? how about the negro in the Southern saw-mill, who works for seventy-five cents to $1 a day, who hardly ever sees anything on his table but hog and hominy? Don't you think he, too, likes turkey? Oh, it is not for him, is it? Yes, but then why does not Mr. Cleveland appoint a thanksgiving day for the rich and wealthy?

Does it not seem like ghoulish spite to tell this to a poor woman, sewing garters for $1.25 per gross, taking about a week to make two gross? Yes, indeed, she might be thankful, having three or four children to support on $2.50 per week! Or how about those poor women who sew overalls for sixty cents a dozen, or wrappers for fifty cents per dozen? O you great and kind father!—yes, indeed, we ought to be thankful, at least, that you gave us brains to understand your own actions, for otherwise, indeed, we might believe you better than you are, if you really exist. Glorious day—Thanksgiving day!—relic of the Middle Ages—well intended to quiet down the rebelling minds of the crying mass of humanity.

Why, then, this farce? If we all know it is pure hypocrisy to hav such a day, why, then, not abolish it? What is it the business of the president whether I thank God for what I received during the year or remain silent in ingratitude? I should not object if the United States government would send into the house of every citizen a turkey, roasted and stuffed, including all the other little dainties that fill the tables of the wealthy and proud. I would not object, if the times were such that the people had real cause to be thankful, that the government should order a day of universal enjoyment and thanksgiving—thanksgiving not to a heavenly father, but to the prudent and economical government that had caused such a state of things. Till then, away with what every honest man and woman must call a national farce! FRED. L. HOFFMAN.

Correspondence.

GIDEON, KAN., NOV. 21, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter after so long a time. I am a boy thirteen years of age and liv on a farm. My grandfather has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nine years. I go to school every winter, but I am not going to school now, for my grandfather is sick with the malarial fever.

I will close for this time, hoping to see this in print.

Your friend, as ever, HENRY WATKINS.

CASTROVILLE, TEX., NOV. 20, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I do not see any letters from this part of the world, I will pen you a few lines. I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not a subscriber, but a kind friend loans me his TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, which I enjoy reading very much. I hav a large family and do not hav much time to read, but I always find time to read all Liberal papers and books that I can get. There are not many Liberals in this country—most are Catholics here—and we few Liberals do not hav a host of callers. The Christians here, I think, carry their religion too far. In the last election, November 6th, my husband was supporting a man for the office of sheriff; the man's family are all good Catholics, though he does not attend church himself. And these Christian idiots could not find any fault bad enough to bring against him only that he was supported by my husband, and all they had against my husband was that he was an Atheist. And no Atheist, they said, ought to be allowed to hold an office or work in an office. They could not call him dishonest. He was not religious. But for all that an Atheist now has full control of the sheriff's office here, and they are eagerly watching to see how he will treat the Christians. They will be treated the same way that he has always treated them the last eight years that he has worked in the office of sheriff and collector.

I sent for and received a volume of Father Hacker's papers, and Mr. White, a friend, bound them, and now I hav a beautiful volume of the Pleasure Boat which the children take great pleasure in reading. It is full of useful reading. I think all Liberals ought to send for a volume. Nothing is nicer for a present for children than Liberal books and papers. I wish you all the joy this world affords for your kindness and nobleness of heart.

With best wishes for the Corner,

MRS. M. I. GALBREATH.

J. W., the generous friend who has sent us two barrels of apples, finer fruit than any that ever grew in paradise, and a barrel of vegetables, will please accept our thanks for his great kindness. The beautiful fruit and vegetables show that they hav developed under the care and culture of broad and wholesome Freethought, and hence are without flaw or blemish. No one has more loyal or truer friends than the editor of the Corner. May they all liv long and prosper.—ED. C. C.

A Dog's Suicide.

A subscriber at Bank Head, Bay St. George, Newfoundland, writes as follows: "A friend of mine had a dog whose name was Bon. Bon was a great pet with his master, who taught him tricks, among others teaching him to count. "Count eleven, Bon," his master commanded, and Bon obediently nodded his head eleven times. No matter what number he was asked to count, he never made a mistake. On one occasion his sagacity was the means of saving a life. A man had fallen through the ice, and as no person could get near enough to render him assistance, Bon's master sent him to the man with a rope, which he managed to tie around his body; by this means he was brought safely to the shore.

Time passed on, and Bon became more intelligent with every year that added to his age. But at last old age came, his coat lost the gloss of which his master had been so proud, his eyes became dim, his teeth to the last one fell out or decayed away. In the olden time Bon's master would hardly sit down to dinner unless his pet was curled up on the rug in the dining-room. Now all this was changed. Bon's uninviting appearance caused him to get much less petting than usual. One day, while the family were at dinner, the old dog entered and approached the master's chair, but instead of being greeted with some word of endearment, he was ordered out of the room.

That evening he could not be found. On search being made, his body was discovered in the water, near the house. He committed suicide very systematically, so said those who were looking on at the time. Having reached the landwash, he waded outward till the water reached above his back, and there he remained till the rising tide came in, and inch by inch crept upward, until the last vestige of him had disappeared from the onlookers on the shore.

Home Instruction.

A little five-year-old girl who lives in northwest Baltimore, the pride of a jolly papa and a devoted mamma, was sent to a kindergarten the other day. It was her first experience at school, but her composure was remarkable under the circumstances. The teacher asked her what she had been taught at home, and she replied:

"I tan ting."

"What can you sing?" inquired the teacher.

"Oh, lots! My mamma and papa make me ting lots of hymns."

"Then let us hear one," said the teacher.

The five-year-old didn't hesitate a minute, but began as follows:

If a body meet a body
Tramping through the snow,
There are no flies on Gallagher
Because he let them go.

The teacher was dumfounded. On inquiry she found that while the mamma tried hard to teach her offspring such melodies as "Beulah Land," the wicked papa's instruction proved more effectiv.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Tommy: "My father is a church-member." Johnny: "So's mine." Tommy: "But my father says your papa ain't, 'cos he don't never come to church, nor put nothin' in the collection box." Johnny (bravely): "Well, my papa is an honorary member, and honorary members don't chip in."

A little girl was walking the other day with her governess. They met a man with a club-foot, at whom the child looked a little wonderingly as he passed, and then laughed. "You must not laugh at him," said the governess. "Why not?" "God made that man." "Humph!" said the child, "it must hav been the first man he made!"

A little daughter of a family on Alfred street was teasing her mother, who at last said, hastily: "Do be patient, child. Be patient." "I don't want to," retorted the little girl; "that's what they put in the ambulance."

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Poetry.

The Cannibal Maid and the Love-Sick Missionary.

From the Chicago Mail.

A cannibal maiden loved too well
A missionary good,
And he loved her, but dare not tell
His love—for thus it stood:
A cannibal she and a clergyman he,
And their creeds were wide apart;
And how could he take, for sentiment's sake,
A cannibal to his heart?
Oh, 'twas a problem vexing, very,
For the cannibal maid and the missionary—
Indeed it was.

But the cannibal maiden's love grew bold,
For she was a simple thing;
And thus her love to her love she told:
"Oh, marry me! Be my king!
For I love you, my sweet, well enough—Oh, to eat!
'Tis a terrible thing, I know;
But I must be your bride, or encompass you fried—
Oh, I must, for I love you so!"
Oh, 'twas a problem vexing, very,
To the maid, but more to the missionary—
Indeed it was.

He looked in the depths of her dark-brown eyes,
With their wealth of love and trust,
And he cried, in the flush of a glad surprise:
"Ah, well, if I must, I must!"
They were wed on that day; for 'tis ever the way
That passion must conquer creed,
And a happier pair it's remarkably rare
To discover—it is indeed!
And so 'twas settled nicely, very,
For the cannibal maid and the missionary—
Indeed it was.

Lurid Hymns.

From the Christian Register.

The New York Independent, in a recent issue, in a notice of Mrs. Deland's striking book, "John Ward," fell into two or three inaccuracies. It describes Mrs. Deland as a Unitarian, and regards her as a child of New England, when the fact is that this lady was born in Pennsylvania and grew up under the influence of a Presbyterianism which is powerfully described in her book. But the Independent goes further, and ventures to assert that the hymn,

My thoughts on awful subjects roll, has not been sung in any church within the recollection of anyone not over seventy years of age, and that the author took it from some "Unitarian anthology of exploded horrors."

Unitarianism has indeed done a good deal to explode the horrors of which the Independent speaks; and we rejoice that, largely through its influence, such horrors, metrical or sermonic, are becoming rarer than ever. We are especially glad that our contemporary is willing that this monstrous belief should die out, even if it does not feel called upon to contribute to its extinction. Nevertheless, it must be said in support of Mrs. Deland, that she does not need to go back a hundred years to find hymns as lurid and horrible as that which Alfaretta is described as singing. This very summer a lady attended an orthodox church not many miles from Boston. The sermon was on "Hell," and the text, "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." In the course of the service the following hymn was sung:

HELL.

"Hell!" 'Tis a word of dreadful sound;
It chills the heart and shocks the ear;
It spreads a sickly damp around,
And makes the guilty quake with fear.

Far from the utmost verge of day
Its frightful gloomy region lies;
Fierce flames amid the darkness play,
And thick, sulphurous vapors rise.

The breath of God, his angry breath,
Still fans and still supplies the fire.
Here sinners taste the second death,
Longing to die, but can't expire.

Conscience, the never-dying worm,
With constant torture gnaws the heart;
And woe and death in every form
Inflame the wounds, increase the smart.

The wretches rave, o'erwhelmed with woe,
And bite their everlasting chains;
But with their rage their torments grow;
Resentment but augments their pains.

Sad world, indeed! What heart can bear
Hopeless in all these pains to lie,
Racked with vexation, grief, despair,
And, ever dying, never die?

Lord, save a guilty soul from hell,
Who seeks thy pard'ning, cleansing blood.
Oh, let me in thy kingdom dwell,
To praise my savior and my God.

At the close of the service, the lady went to the sexton and purchased a copy of the hymn-book, which proved to be a "Selection of Seven Hundred Evangelical Hymns," by John Dobell, the motto, "None but Christ." The following verses are taken from the same volume:

In vain for mercy now they cry.
In lakes of liquid fire they lie,
There on the flaming billows tossed,
Forever, oh, forever lost!

But saints, undaunted and serene,
Your eyes shall view the dreadful scene.
Your savior lives, the worlds expire,
And earths and skies dissolve in fire.

The following, in which the judgment is described, is as bad as anything that Watts ever achieved:

JUDGMENT.

Lo, he comes arrayed in vengeance,
Riding down the heavenly road.
Floods of fury roll before him,
Who can meet an angry God?
Tremble, sinners.
Who can stand before his rod?

Now, despisers, look and wonder;
Hear the dreadful sound, "Depart,"
Rattling like a peal of thunder
Through each guilty rebel's heart.
Lost forever,
Hope and sinners here must part.

Still they hear the awful sentence,
Hell resounds the dreadful roar.
While their heart-strings tune with anguish,
Trembling on the burning shore.
Justice seals it.
Down they sink to rise no more.

How they shrink, with horror viewing
Hell's deep caverns opening wide,
Guilty thoughts, like ghosts pursuing,
Plunge them down the rolling tide.
Now consider,
Ye who scorned the lamb that died.

We should not hav thought it worth while to reprint these heathenish hymns if the Independent had not so boldly declared that they were not in use. We hav felt, therefore, obliged to inform our contemporary what is going on in the denomination over which it assumes to preside. To be sure, our contemporary may claim that no one really believes these hymns who sings them. But this, in our estimation, furnishes a strong reason why they should be left out of the hymn-books they disfigure. In England, the London Christian World has lately been obliged to point out the hymns of a similar character which inflame a new edition of the "Congregational Hymnal." We wish that the Independent might also speak out with something of the old-time boldness of its Johnson-Beecher days against similar caricatures of Christianity on this side of the water.

Traducing God.

From the Marlboro, Mass., Times.

The arrogant, conceited, and egotistical little self-styled servant of God, who is most fully impressed with the idea that the sanctity of the Sabbath has been placed in his especial care and keeping, got off a diatribe on Sunday newspapers, a week ago last Sunday, in which he laid down this dictum:

By the purchase of the Sunday newspaper the buyer becomes a party to the controversy on the side against God. If any of us hav been on the wrong side of this controversy, we cannot get on the other side too quickly. But some will say, Why, members of the church buy Sunday newspapers. That does not make it right. Church-members may be on the wrong side of this controversy. Church-members may be a comfort unto sinners. Surely they are on the side against God when they patronize Sunday newspapers.

That is, no church-member who disagrees with him can possibly be right. Now, how much more does this opinionated vaporer know about God than the rest of us? He has never seen him, nor heard from him in any other way than the rest of us, and he is no better qualified to tell which side of any controversy God in on than we are. For all he knows they may hav Sunday newspapers in heaven, and the God he claims is down on Sunday newspapers may hav been reading some celestial Globe or Herald at the very moment his alleged servant was claiming that he disapproved of Sunday publications. You see, it is always Sabbath up there, according to some authorities, and if they hav newspapers at all they would hav to be of the Sunday variety. And really it does seem as though they would be obliged to hav the papers up there. How else can they ever get through the long, long, weary day, with nothing to do but twang away on a harp and sing the praises of God? Of course, they wouldn't hav such papers as we hav—over in hades they would get burnt up before it was possible to read them—but they might hav some kind of a spiritual sheet suited to their spiritual condition.

But this man says he knows God is opposed to Sunday newspapers, because in the fifteenth chapter of Numbers is the story of a man who gathered sticks on the Sabbath day, and the Lord commanded Moses to hav him taken outside the camp and stoned to death. Sounds queer to hear an evangelical minister in this year of grace quoting the old Mosaic law as a rule of action for the present time. Anybody might suppose he had never heard of the late Lord Jesus Christ, and his new dispensation.

Church Exemptions.

From the Toronto Labor Reformer.

The Rev. Mr. Bates, pastor of the College street Baptist church, according to the Globe, made a statement last Sunday of the position of that important body on the question of the exemption of churches from taxation. The reverend gentleman is reported as saying: "Baptists hold that church and state are, or ought to be, entirely independent of one another. The church can stand alone. We would force religion on no one, believing that in this perfect freedom of action lies one of its greatest attractions. We hold, moreover, that this view accords with scripture. The use of the Bible in schools we would make purely voluntary, and, where so voluntarily adopted, we would urge the use of the book itself, not a compendium of selections culled from it. The very same underlies church exemption. If we deny the state's authority over the church, so must we also be careful to accept no state favor for the church. Exemption is unquestionably one of these, because it increases the secular taxes and unjustly burdens many who hav or take no interest in religious affairs. Thus it is that an increasing number, especially of the poorer classes, hav come to regard the churches as their enemies and oppressors." We are pleased to read such broad and genuinly liberal sentiments. The exemption of churches from taxation by law is almost the last lingering of the connection of church and state in this province at any rate, and the sooner this link is broken the better for both. The union of church and state has ever been inimical to the best interests of both; political freedom was impossible while it existed, and true religion suffered greatly from the ill-omened alliance.

Aside, however, altogether from the danger which must ever be to both civil liberty and religious truth while any connection between church and state exists, the exempting of church property by law from taxation is wholly unjust and inexcusable. It cannot be defended on any principle of justice or good policy. It is simply compelling one man to help support another man's religion, a proposition so manifestly unjust that the wonder is that the public conscience has not long ago revolted against it.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Religious Problems

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

ARGUMENT
BY
Robert G. Ingersoll,
IN THE
TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS
FOR
"BLASPHEMY,"
AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BALAAM MEETETH BALAK.

And when Balak heard that Balaam was come, he went out to meet him unto a city of Moab, which is in the border of Arnon, which is in the utmost coast.—Num. xxii, 36.

Gems of Thought.

A DISTINGUISHED English sanitarian has said that he could build a city which would giv any desired death-rate. Side by side with this I desire to place another proposition, viz., that a city might be so built, and the municipality so administered, as to secure any desired degree of morality, within certain limits. Disease is the equivalent of weakness, and induces not only physical indifference but moral apathy. In England the ratio of insane to sane criminals is thirty-four times as great as of the insane to the whole population, and criminal lunatics are in excess in the high proportion of seventeen to one. Physiological unsoundness is moral decay. Personal morality has, in fact, been defined as the highest degree of mental health.—Frances Emily White, M.D.

THE weaker the body, the more it commands; the stronger it is, the better it obeys.—Rousseau.

THE priests of Secularism will be teachers of hygiene, laboring to secure the foundations of mental energy by the preservation of physical vigor.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

THE Scotch clergy held that no one, on Sunday, should pay attention to his health, or think of his body at all. On that day horse-exercise was sinful; so was walking in the fields, or in the meadows, or in the streets, or enjoying the fine weather by sitting at the door of your own house. To go to sleep on Sunday, before the duties of the day were over, was also sinful, and deserved church censure. Bathing, being pleasant as well as wholesome, was a particularly grievous offense; and no man could be allowed to swim on Sunday. It was, in fact, doubtful whether swimming was lawful for a Christian at any time, even on week-days, and it was certain that God had, on one occasion, shown his disapproval by taking away the life of a boy while he was indulging in that carnal practice. That it was a sin to cleanse one's body, might, indeed, hav been taken for granted; seeing that the Scotch clergy looked on all comforts as sinful in themselvs, merely because they were comforts. The great object of life was, to be in a state of constant affliction. Whatever pleased the senses, was to be suspected. A Christian must beware of enjoying his dinner; for none but the ungodly relished their food. By a parity of reasoning, it was wrong for a man to wish to advance himself in life, or in any way to better his condition.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THE population of England at the Norman conquest was about two million. In five hundred years it had scarcely doubled. What, then, does this stationary condition of the population mean? It means, food obtained with hardship, insufficient clothing, personal uncleanness, cabins that could not keep out the weather, the destructiv effects of cold and heat. miasm, want of sanitary provisions, absence of physicians, uselessness of shrine-cure, the deceptivness of miracles, in which society was putting its trust; or, to sum up a long catalog of sorrows, wants, and sufferings, in one term—it means a high death-rate.—Prof. Draper, in The Conflict Between Religion and Science.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of good living. You cannot make any God happy by fasting. Let us hav good food, and let us hav it well cooked; it is a thousand times better to know how to cook than it is to understand any theology in the world. I believe in the gospel of good clothes. I believe in the gospel of good houses; in the gospel of water and soap.—Ingersoll.

THE progress from deepest ignorance to highest enlightenment is a progress from entire unconsciousness of law to the conviction that law is universal and inevitable.—Spencer.

SOCIAL problems should be treated scientifically. If we knew as much about sociology as we do about geology there would be less discontent in the world. If we knew as much about the social system as we do about the solar system, the regularity in the working of the former would in some degree approach that of the latter. If we were as well versed in the science of rights as we are in other sciences, comparativly speaking, this world would be a paradise. If we knew as much about the laws of social conduct as we do about the laws that govern the action of solar bodies there would be no wrong except that resulting from personal turpitude of individuals; whereas now the greatest wrongs and sufferings arise, not from the desire of particular persons to do wrong, but from a very imperfect conception of human rights.—Natural Rights.

THE intelligent people of the world, many of them, are endeavoring to find out the great facts of nature that control the dispositions of men. So other intelligent people are endeavoring to ascertain the facts and conditions that govern what we call Health, and what we call Disease, and the object of these people is finally to produce a race without disease of flesh and without disease of mind. These people look forward to the time when there need be neither hospitals nor penitentiaries.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

BOUCICAULT teaches pupils how to walk at his new dramatic school. Boucicault may be getting old; but he still knows the needs of the theatrical profession.

"CLARA," he said, desperately, in choking accents, "one word!" "Certainly, Mr. Jones," she replied, coldly; "one word, and only one; and I choose, 'No.'"

MRS HOCKSTEIN: "It vos Abie's birt'day, Aaron. Vat ve gif him?" Mr. Hockstein: "Wash ohf a vindow-pane, unt led him loogk oud unt see der hoss-cars go py!"

POWDERLY believes in "one-man power," and it looks as if he might some day realize his wishes. At the present rate of backward progress, he will soon be the one man left in the K. of L.

OLD man: "What do you like the best in all the world, Bobby?" Bobby: "Mr. Primrose, the minister. Cos vy, every time he calls to see mamma he givs me a quarter and tells me to go and buy candy with it."

APPLICANT (knocking loudly at the gates): "What, ho! within there!" Voice: "What's wanted?" Applicant: "I want to see St. Peter." Voice: "Well, you can't see him now: he's gone to the ball game."

"How do you feel now?" asked the general manager of a tar-and-feather social, as he poked a handful of feathers between his victim's teeth. "I feel down in the mouth," the latter replied. Whereupon six revolvers were instantly emptied into the same cavity.

BANK teller: "Will you take it as presumption, madam, if I offer you these few roses?" Miss Caramella Goldust: "I don't know you, sir!" Bank teller: "I am aware of that; but you are the only woman in the history of this bank who ever indorsed a check on the right end."

"MOTHER, I wish you would request Ralph Waldo to cease singing." "What is he singing, Minerva, that you dislike so much?" "He is singing a low song, in which one Johnny—presumably Jonathan—is requested to procure his fowling-piece, with a reiteration of the last clause."

"NAOMI, there is one reason why everybody should admire you." "And what is that, George?" "You use only pure English. So many young ladies hav that detestable habit of interlarding their sentences with slang. Don't you abhor it?" "Well, yes," she replied; "it does make me rather tired."

EDDIE, a small boy who livs on the West Side, attended prayer service at an Episcopal church last Sunday afternoon. When he returned home his mother asked him to describe the service. "Oh, the minister just came out in his night-gown and prayed around awhile in front of his bureau and then went back to his room."

TEACHER: "Johnny, I should think you would be ashamed of yourself to run away from school for the sake of floating around in that old leaky, flat-bottomed boat. Weren't you afraid of getting drowned?" Johnny: "No'm; not so much as on shore." Teacher: "What nonsense! Did you ever hear of anybody going out in a boat for fear of getting drowned?" Johnny: "Yes'm." Teacher (astonished): "Who?" Johnny: "Noer."

"TALKING about dogs of keen scent, I hav one that will compare favorably with any of them." "Remarkable dog, eh?" "I should say so. The other day he broke his chain, and although I had been away for hours he tracked me and found me merely by scent. What do you think of that?" "I think you ought to take a bath."

CHARLIE was playing on the lawn; his mother had to call him three times before he came reluctantly into the house. "I am glad we don't liv in Utah!" he muttered as he entered the door. "And why, Charlie?" asked his papa, who overheard the remark. "Because there a fellow'd hav a dozen mothers to be calling him all the time."

"WELL, this do beat all!" exclaimed Aunt Harriet, as they took their first ride on the elevated: "who'd 'a' thought o' railroadin' in the air?" "Sho!" replied Uncle Abner; "my newspaper says that a big part o' the railroad companies o' New York are run largely on water, and that's the kind o' road I want to see afore we go home."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "What did the children say to the Prophet Elisha?" Boy: "They made fun of his wig." Teacher: "You mean that they mocked at his bald head. What did the prophet do?" Boy: "He set forty-two bears on 'em." Teacher: "That will do. Where did this occur?" Boy: "On the Chicago board of trade, but there's more than forty-two bears there now."

"OH, Mrs. Watts, you should join our literary society!" "Should I?" "Yes, indeed! We study and learn so much. Last meeting we took up Carlyle's quarrels with his wife." "It must hav been interesting." "Very. Next meeting we shall investigate the private life of Goethe and his love affairs." "How instructiv!" "Yes, and we hav found out everything about Poe's dissipation and disreputable conduct, and purpose soon to thoroughly investigate the immoral actions of Voltaire." "Indeed!" "Oh, there's nothing like a literary society to increase one's culture. You ought to join!"

"GINEVRA," faltered the young man, "I despair of being able to express my feelings toward you as I would like, and I am afraid you will not hav the patience to listen to me. I—I always was kind of slow and bunglesome, you know." "Shadrach," said the maiden softly, but with a perceptible business-like ring in her voice, "if you think you can express yourself in fifteen minutes I will listen to you. I expect Mr. Spoonamore at 9 o'clock sharp." And the young man was just fifteen seconds by the watch in expressing himself. Poor, unfortunate Mr. Spoonamore got left! When he came he was entertained by Miss Ginevra's good old mother.

WHEN ROME RULES.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is no stinting of the praise that Surveyor Beattie bestows upon the female inspectors in his service. The collector of the port is in favor of the employment of a larger number of women in several departments of the custom house. There is no difficulty in finding such as are competent for the required work.

THERE are a good many of the workingmen's organizations of this city that hav reading rooms or libraries connected with them. In others there are debating or social societies. The advantages thus offered are in some cases well appreciated by the members. The German workingmen are especially devoted to the social features of their organizations.

A MEMORIAL to the late Gardner Earl, Jr., the well-known collar manufacturer of Troy, N. Y., is being erected in Oakwood cemetery, in that city, in the shape of the largest crematory in the world. It will contain two retorts, one of which will be always ready for use. The crematory will be most artistic in design and will be decorated with granit floorings, stained-glass windows, etc.

POTTSTOWN, Pa., is stirred to its depths, owing to the ravages which the fascinating but demoralizing game of poker has made among its most staid and influential men. Poker chips hav mysteriously found their way to the contribution-boxes of the Pottstown churches, and the bobtail flush and the elusiv jack-pot tempt fathers and husbands to neglect the domestic hearth for the heated precincts where the ante lures its victims and the royal flush ruins its opponents.

THE following obscene state of nature described by the Peoria Transcript, is respectfully referred to Messrs. Colgate and Comstock:

The naked hills lie wanton to the breeze,
The fields are nude, the groves unfrocked,
Bare are the shivering limbs of shameless trees—
What wonder is it that the corn is shocked?

THERE is a German newspaper published at Jerusalem, and it says that the city is growing in size and population at a remarkable rate, which is surprising, because neither its situation nor its trade is favorable to a rapid increase. The Jews take the lead in building, followed by the Russians and Germans. The Greeks and Armenians are also busy building cafés, bazars, and shops.

THE resolution denouncing Sunday newspapers and advising their congregations neither to read nor advertise in them, which was adopted by the Congregational and Methodist ministers of Chicago, has aroused the labor organizations of that city. They say that such action is a criminal conspiracy under the Cole act, which was framed especially against boycotts, and they threaten to arrest and prosecute a number of reverend gentlemen. The labor men are acting under the belief that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

THE fanatical vengeance of some Polish Jews upon a Jewish peasant named Franz Platkowski, who had abandoned Judaism for the Greek church, is reported by the Warsaw Dvevnik as having been carried to a pitch of barbarism hardly ever recorded. The victim was decoyed into a wood, where he was attacked by his two brothers and his uncle. After being beaten he was thrown on his back and a bottle of vitriol poured into his mouth and over his face and head. Then his body was left for dead. He was found alive and able to make his deposition, but beyond recovery.

"No man of prudence would make jests on sacred things," asserts the Christian Advocate. "It degrades religion in the minds of the ungodly. It destroys conviction in the minds of those who are not far from the kingdom of God. It wounds the feelings of those who love the cause and the word of God. It deadens the religious sensibilities of those who indulge in it." All of which we consider pretty fair reasons for continuing the practice. If religion were out of the world, there would be more room for good works.

"CLERGYMEN in New York are beginning to lose their grip," said the correspondent of a famous English newspaper to a Sun reporter. "I hav been cabling across the water now for fourteen years, and I hav had to watch the drift of public opinion very closely. For a long while New York could be depended on to fly into a flurry at almost any time when ministers began to talk. Last week, however, half the clergymen in town utter d the most fierce and bitter diatribes against dancing, and yet not the slightest bit of public attention was attracted by it."

SOME time ago the British Museum bought a magnificent marble bust of the Emperor Hadrian at a very reasonable price. Recently, when the authorities exhibited it with pride to a party of distinguished foreigners, one of them, a member of the Greek diplomatic service, said that he had seen the same bust in the Royal Museum at Athens. He notified his government and the investigation that followed revealed the fact that a large number of very valuable articles in the museum had been stolen. It is said that evidently systematic thefts had been carried on for some time, and some high Greek officials are under suspicion.

A REAL humorist, says the Sun, has been found in Turkey. He is the new press censor of Constantinople, and these are some of the orders which he has sent out. They will make the average American local editor feel the value of liberty: "Art. 3. Do not publish scientific or literary articles too long for completion in a single issue. Avoid notice to be continued, which causes uncomfortable tension of mind. Art. 4. Avoid b ack spaces and suggestiv dots in the body of an article. They tend to raise suppositions and disturb the tranquillity of the reader's mind, as was lately seen in the case of the Levant Herald. Art. 5. Avoid personalities. If anybody comes and tells you that a governor or deputy governor has been guilty of embezzlement, maladministration, or any other blameworthy conduct, treat the charge as not proved and say nothing about it. Art. 6. You are forbidden to publish petitions in which individuals or associations complain of acts of misgovernment and call the sultan's attention to them. Art. 7. You are absolutely forbidden to publish a word about attempts on the lives of foreign sovereigns or acts of sedition in foreign countries, for it is not good that such things should be made known to our loyal and peaceable population. Art. 8. You must not mention these regulations in the columns of your journal, because they might provoke criticisms or draw unpleasant observations from ill-conditioned minds."

Temperature.

Notwithstanding our daily experience amid the ever-varying conditions about us, this familiar subject of temperature has not received its due share of attention.

To observe the mercury rising and falling in our thermometers almost continually, seems to satisfy the general demand for knowledge on this profound subject. Without wishing to know why the days and nights are called either hot or cold, everybody says so, and everybody is perfectly satisfied. Our thermal wisdom seems to end with these sensations. But knowledge does not so much consist in feeling any particular change in the surrounding conditions, as it does in learning something of the causes as well as of the effects. Because everybody knows when it is hot or cold, can everybody tell us why these terms are so used? If we belonged to that large fraction of the animal kingdom known as cold-blooded, these familiar expressions might not find a place in our language. Because the blood-temperature of such animals rises and falls with that of the medium in which they liv, the sensations known to us as heat and cold may not be experienced by them. We are constituted differently. By a process known as slow combustion, our lungs consume oxygen, and evolve a very uniform amount of heat, or, more properly speaking, maintain a very uniform temperature of a little less than one hundred degrees. Below this temperature our sentient nerves must be impressed with the idea of coldness, and above it with that of heat. Then these merely conventional terms, called into use by our warm blood and sentient nerves before temperatures were measured in degrees, hav lost their value in scientific discourse. But they never had more than a relativ meaning, and were always useless without taking into consideration the present temperature of the speaker or writer.

The word fire is another vague and very unsatisfactory term in universal use. It is indiscriminately applied to all temperatures above a red heat, where combustion generally takes place. To be informed that there is a fire in the furnace, is far from warning us against the chances of a boiler explosion. There may be a fire, and there may be a hot fire, because all fires are hot, and still we gain no reliable information by being told so. There is such a vast difference between the coruscations of a bunch of loose cotton, or straw, when on fire, and the melting heat of a compound blowpipe, that the same word can giv no rational idea of both.

But the word temperature, along with a properly graduated scale, defines material conditions from which we are learning the most important scientific truths. That all matter is at all times at some certain temperature, which is constantly changing, is too well known to admit of a doubt. While our daily experience with these fluctuations is limited within a few hundred degrees, empiricism has been bringing to our knowledge a much broader field. Arctic explorations hav encountered more than eighty degrees below zero. The melting heat of iron is about twenty-four hundred degrees above zero. From the fact that the oxyhydrogen blowpipe etherealizes all known substances we are assured that its temperature ranges very much higher.

The empirical science has been able, by the rapid rarefaction of certain volatil substances, to lower the temperature from normal conditions to more than 70° below zero. Sir Isaac Newton determined that evaporation, rarefaction, and etherealization, because they hurry the atoms asunder, lower the temperature in the exact ratio of their activity. He also determined that whatever forces the atoms more closely together, compression, condensation, and consolidation, elevates the temperature in the ratio of gravity and velocity, until the atoms are made repulsiv to each other, when the cooling act of rarefaction supervenes and restores the equilibrium. Temperature is thus seen to be an activ and inseparable property of all matter, which constitutes all we know of the infinit universe. The natural law known as the attraction of gravitation, which should be familiar to us in the cohesion of all solids, the static force of all known substances, the vibrations of the pendulum, and the descent of falling bodies, being another activ and inseparable property of the same matter, it certainly should not overtax any clear mind to discover why the largest planets and the still larger suns are the hottest. And also why the highly rarefied ethereal medium in which our globe is revolving is known to be more than 200° below zero. Since Watts discovered that the force of steam, heated air, etc., instead of being equal in every direction, is all exerted vertically, it must be admitted that the equilibrium necessary to natural harmony is preserved by the resistance of developing heat to the attraction of gravitation, which might otherwise conglomerate the whole into one useless mass.

Whatever condenses matter causes friction, which is known to be the immediate cause of all increasing temperature. By crossing the material rays of the sun, the most delicate form of matter within the grasp of our senses, the sun-glass immediately develops a burning temperature at its focus some two inches behind the lens. Like the Drummond light, which so rapidly condenses two imponderable gases as to raise an etherealizing temperature, the far lighter solar rays make up in velocity what they lack in gravity, and cause a red heat where nothing is visible to our eyes even when aided by a powerful microscope. All metals are known to become very hot under condensation, if only by the slower process of malleation. Ice melts under very high pressure, and there can be no doubt that steel would do the same thing if the ratio of pressure, to degrees of heat required, could be applied. Any force which causes the atoms to rub against each other elevates their temperature in the exact ratio of friction, whether it be slow and heavy or rapid and light.

Because condensation is promoted by the lower temperatures, and this same condensation, which must cause friction, the immediate cause of heat, reverses the operation, the colder and hotter conditions throughout all space are limited. Thus, when any part of space has fallen by rarefaction to that degree of coldness which superinduces a corresponding degree of condensation, frigidity will hav reached its limit, and the activ agglomeration of matter must turn the scale the other way. So, when any part of space, which must long hav been a self-luminous center, of course, has risen by condensation to that degree of hotness which superinduces a corresponding degree of rarefaction, caloric will hav reached its limit, and the activ, ethereal dispersion of matter must turn the scale the other way. Within these limits all nature is constantly building, warming, heating, dispersing, and cooling her parts, whether suns, worlds, or smaller bodies, as quietly and regularly as are the trees in a forest reproduced precisely as fast as decomposition does its work. While the attraction of gravitation in the colder parts of space is crystallizing and agglomerating matter into inhabitable worlds, their crushing centers, constantly condensing under the increasing pressure of radiating columns hundreds or thousands of miles high, are evolving that solar heat which is necessary to surround them with both fluid and gaseous oceans, and warm into existence the races of plants and animals to be found upon them.

In order to fully appreciate and realize the force of these great truths, it is only necessary to know the present conditions within our own solar system. When nature is left to tell her own simple tale, she reveals within earth's accessible crust the unmistakable evidences of growth, amounting to many miles of superimposed strata abounding in the fossil expressions of ages and ages not nearly so highly developed as ours. Nothing but increasing heat within this planet could hav inflected, fractured, shattered, and upheaved every part of this vast rocky wall, and left the evidences of continuous volcanic action throughout these tens of millions of years. Without these countless outbursts of the accumulating heat within, we could not now discover the encroachments of a red heat not many miles from our present surface, and the disappearance of the older fossils among the melting rocks, where the temperature must hav been one or two thousand degrees lower during the ages of their living existence upon earth. We are thus seen to be living many miles further from the center of the globe than were those ancient inhabitants whose fossil remains are disappearing in the molten interior, about as fast as the superficial deposits hav been keeping up the growth of the sphere, and preserving the necessary thickness of the inhabitable shell.

Our moon is known to be the arena of very powerful volcanic action, because its surface expressions point to many earthquake upheavals. It has undoubtedly a molten interior and a very thick, rocky crust. Some of the lower orders of animals may inhabit its shallow lagoons, but its atmosphere can not be deep enough to float rain-clouds over its arid plains. Its general temperature cannot be more than one-fourth that of our globe.

Jupiter and Saturn, our two largest planets, are about ten times as hot as earth. Their crusts are red-hot, their oceans of water and air are commingling in iridescent vapors, and their swarms of busy inhabitants hav been hushed for ages. Surrounded by their young families, called their satellites, we behold these planetary remains moving slowly toward the common mausoleum of our system.

Our central luminary has only reached another step in the normal process of planetary development. His outer wall has melted away and his volcanic action is constantly projecting vast streams of lava and gas from ten to a hundred thousand miles above his general surface. He is now both dispersing and collecting the matter of our system, but will, in the eons of time, develop the fatal temperature described above, when his incalculable material accumulations will atomically become repulsiv to each other and scatter throughout the space from which they are now being gathered. Since planets develop into suns and many systems hav one or more such secondary luminaries, darkness seldom if ever can succeed the expiring central luminaries.

MILLESON.

Chicago, Ill., July 7, 1888.

"Crowning Glory."

A willingness to be humbugged has been a distinguishing trait in humanity through all the centuries; the besetting weakness, indeed, of mankind, making us feel that, as far as "creation" is concerned, man is the "crowning glory of God's works."

Once I saw a crowning glory, dressed in the uniform of a policeman, roughly dragging another crowning glory to prison for having drowned his angelic nature with the "critter" to such a degree as to make himself a public nuisance. A couple of ruder crowning glories one could hardly desire to see.

The official glory struck the other glory a tunk on the head to steady him, at which the drunken glory took offense and with many imprecations gave his brother glory to understand that two could play at that game, inviting conviction with a bite that made his captor yelp with pain, whereat the onlooking crowning glories laughed uproariously, and so much to the resentful disgust of the official glory that he plied his baton with redoubled vigor, rendering the drunken glory helpless and wallowing in the gutter.

A truly disconsolate lot has fallen to the endurance of the large majority of the crowning glories; only a few of them, indeed, having been met with the conditions at all suitable to the majesty and sublimity of perching on the topmost round of so magnificent a "creation" as our great globe and all that it inherits would naturally demand.

Now, don't, I beseech you, attempt accounting for the degrading condition of the crowning glories by pointing to Adam's fall. Confound the flimsy trifle! It won't go down. I can see the curse. But not that one. A drearier argument was never offered to prove a great fact than this pious outcry about the doings in Eden. In private the world laughs at the simple yarn, knowing it assuredly to be not only a weak fabrication, but an impertinence, an insolent, trifling fraud; all well enough for the suckling ages of our civilization, but infinitly ridiculous for the puberty of progress. Pretenses to first-class respectability by money-loving traders—fellows who bend the supple hinges of the knee for thrift—alone hav kept the fable so long looking like a really acknowledged fact; managing rogues with abundant supplies of the good things of life, displaying to less successful crowning glories the manifold blessings of God's approval by presenting themselvs as models of virtuous acquiescence to the "divine plan."

It is easy enough for staid selfishness to be unquestioning in such matters, but when it gets down to gnawing, hell-upon-earth loss of caste, and the dreary blackness of a crust of baker's bread—to be homeless, shirtless, with the abandonment of bitterness that precludes efforts—what then? Yielding to the mental strain of, How long, O Lord, how long? and the ever-recurring question, Why? myth givs way, and the plausible rigmarole of the altar, questioned, becomes torn into shreds and whistled down the winds.

"I cannot steal, and to beg I am ashamed," in the mouth of a man, is a disgrace to the civilization of our century. It may not be creditable in the mouth of any man. But all men, be it remembered, cannot be self-supporting in competitiv life; and for the reason, some minds, by their peculiar construction, are not so prolific of appliances for success as are others; a fact which implies with all the force of a "Thus saith the Lord" that the man with the larger mental scope and ready aptitudes is the supplement of his less gifted brother, besides being an argument no amount of reasoning can push aside in favor of coöperation in society.

The earth is man's and the fullness thereof, is the true text; a corrected version worthy of all acceptance, and which is fast sliding into recognition everywhere; even the Crofters, of the highlands of Scotland, the erewhile crawling, cringing loyalists of the most exacting legalized robbers of Britain, adopting it as the basis of their demands. The universal demand is, Why should I be denied the right to life's enjoyments, as well as the right to dig and to work? Go to, let us hav them. And in this demand and resolution we find the attitude of the age. Civilization is crouching, not in servil submission, but, like the lion, to leap from the restricted jungle, and so reach the light and freedom of unhampered plenty. The day of rights has dawned and men are banding themselvs in holy alliance for self-protection against the Past, its devils and its gods, seeking to share the good things of life through just distribution, knowing that man covets not his neighbor's wealth when having an equal chance to accumulate with others. When not denied the means of living, by working, just as my neighbor livs and works over there, there is clearly no chance for meanness on my part. Our methods of life are false. We liv in a wilderness of lies; stultifying each other by indirection, with the superadded misery of the felt ignominy of wrongdoing. Dishonesty is the master horror of life; and yet it is the last straw sought to be packed on the willing camel of existence; breaking the back of society every hour. At the same time, why it should be so is, above all others, the vexed question of the citizen. Outside of our conventional methods, man is as understood by the word "angelic." Save in the wildest misery of hunger leaping through the veins, man has passed the filled barn and the teeming orchard of his lordly neighbor for ages; aye doing his oppressor homage when he met him in the way. Mankind will ere long pass the well-packed barn and bursting fruit-bins of the workers, each lovingly saying, I lent my muscle and my skill to garner these edibles along with Tom, Dick, and Harry. This will be done when lordly owners will be unknown through all the land and mankind will hav better claims to being called the crowning glories of creation.

When a man is asked to sit down to so rich a banquet as Christianity offers, with its "Ho ye that thirst, approach the spring," "Come unto me all ye that are heavy laden," "Knock and it shall be opened unto you," "If ye being fathers giv good gifts unto your children, how much more will your heavenly father," etc.; and above all, to the ceaseless treasures of the Beatitudes, the adoption of which as rules of action would shut humanity up in measureless content, and then looks around at the sad facts of our civilization, its wastes, its oceans of loathsome wretchedness, its devil's snuff of empty rottenness, what is the conclusion? Why, this: Religion is an open armful of hoax material, a lie, a cheat, a snare, an idiot's dream. What wonder is it that we turn to science with its well-attested truths; seeing in the assurances of evolution, as opposed to revelation, sore labor's bath, balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course, chief nourisher in life's feast? When we look at imperial palaces, cathedrals, and the like, we say with withering impatience, Down with the mockeries! We become iconoclasts by the divine right of knowledge, rebels by the test of knowing a hawk from a hen, a diamond from a dab of paste.

If I were asked to giv a reason why marble, in honor of humanity, should shoot up to the skies to hights above the world's monumental names, I should say, Behold the gentleness of the millions of the bygone, bowing patiently under burdens imposed by taskmaster kings, and mind-obscuring priests; the virtues which hav flourished on the barrenness of poverty; the hopeful trust of betterment still shown in lifelong trials; the devotion to principles that has made Christs of whole armies, dying that others might be saved.

Redeemers! The world teems with them. Here, in our generation, millions of them rushed grandly upon the crucifixions of the battlefields; heroes who, when dying, uttered no cry of upbraiding at the sacrifice; no Eloi, Eloi, lama sabacthani! And if temples were not rent in twain in the throes of their last moments, and no darkness fell upon the world, that which was more immortalizing followed in the wake of their death; a colossal evil crumbled to pieces in attestation of their heroism, giving a moral brightness to our period that made their sacrifice more glorious than the martyology of Christendom.

The Christ can never die but as the fabled bird dies—living anew in its ashes. Like to Bacchus of the ancient Greeks, he is ever fair and ever young.

Woe to the race if but one Christ were all it had to look to for redemption from the deep damnation of ignorance and its concomitants of sinful superstition.

I see Christs wherever I turn the eye to gaze upon them; hear them wherever I turn the ear to listen. Down the long line of the centuries their death-shouts peal like trumpet notes, urging the world to daring for the right. Wherever man has sought resistance to wrong, there has the good Jesus of life been glorified. The Eden of the race is in the better future—the heaven of earth. And to that better future the race will come. Not with the pomp of armies, the roll of drums, and the blare of battle trumps, the neighing of war-steeds, and the thunders that "great Jove's clamors counterfeit," but to the sweet rhythm of heart-throbs of peaceful men and women led by the still increasing witcheries of wisdom. 74.

The Church That Is Wanted.

I lately listened to an uncommonly sensible sermon preached by Rev. G. W. Bicknell, of the Hurd street Universalist church, Lowell, Mass., the subject being, "The Church That Is Wanted—A Creedless but not a Purposeless Church." The text, what the blind man said to Jesus: "Lord, open thou mine eyes."

That, said the preacher, is a common cry to-day. In this time of science and education the soul calls for enlightenment. When, above all things, there ought to be the clearest and brightest spiritual discernment, we find the most spiritual darkness. There are many who, amid the general gloom, get a glimpse occasionally of something better than usually meets their view, yet after a short season of hazy sight all is clouded in. What is the reason of this dismal condition? Why is the cry so often raised, "Lord, open thou mine eyes?"

I offered, said he, as my conviction, that the reason of so much spiritual darkness now prevailing is the influence of creed. Every church has a creed, a creed formulated by the dignitaries of the church in days when only the few were informed, and handed down to the people as authority—given as something that the masses must believe. The older these creeds are the more binding they hav seemed. A creed is venerated for its antiquity. They are credited as the living truth because they come from the dead past—the very reason why they may be doubted. They say to the people in the language of law: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," and beyond them the people dare not go. I acknowledge that a man's assent to any proposition on any subject is in some sense a creed. We all hav our creeds of some sort; we hav our religious, our political, our scientific, our social, and our business creeds—points which we believe. And that is well enough when rightly used.

What I object to is the idea that any man or set of men is authority for an opinion. Against the assertion that any man has a right to say that he is an authority for another I earnestly object and unqualifiedly protest. It is this arbitrary, dictatorial, tyrannical method of teaching, so general in most of the churches, slightly abated of late, that, in my opinion, has caused the vast degree of church failures we are obliged to note. I say, in my opinion. I do not say you must think so because I say so. I do not know; but it is my conviction, and I offer it to your judgment to determin for yourselvs that the bondage of creed is responsible for the want of progress in the church. There has been a little modification in the minor matters of church customs. There hav been Protestants and Nonconformists; but there are the same fundamental principles in the Calvinistic churches now that existed in the Catholic church at its earliest dominion. Had they the power which they want and are striving for they would persecute with as much arbitrary tyranny as ever did the Catholics.

Under Liberal influences from outside, Calvinistic churches hav modified themselvs in the manner of presenting their doctrins, but their dogmas remain, and without important amendment. Their ministers do not dare preach the horrors of their creed, as they used to delight to; they make more of the milder features of their faith, but the intolerant spirit of the system is reflected in their most merciful provisions. The same old claim always comes uppermost: "Thou shalt believe because we say so." And the people lie still, content to hav it so, because they hav not learned that they ought to care to take the trouble to think. For the most part, men do not reason up from fundamental principles. They hold what they are told, satisfied to take their opinions at second-hand. They are Catholics or Calvinists, Methodists or Unitarians, just as they are Democrats or Republicans, because their parents were. They believe as they were born. This is especially true of women; and that is one reason why Catholic priests care more to get the girls than the boys into their schools.

No man has a right to tell another what he shall believe. And yet it is upon this idea of the value of a compulsory creed that the church was founded. It mattered little who you were or what you were, if you only believed. Belief was the all and in all, the be all and end all of religion. And in this the Catholic was as good as the Protestant. The Catholics had a few insignificant ceremonies which you were supposed to observe. They had their few points of doctrin which you had to believe, or say you believed, which would do just as well, and you need not know or do any more. The Protestants hav followed suit, differing only in slight particulars, and those as often worse as better. The Baptists hav stood out independently, they claim, but only in their mode of baptism are they much changed, making their style of administering it the prerequisit to church-membership, if not to salvation.

There is to be another church founded. The church of the future. This soon. The creed will be human character. A church not of dogma, but of righteousness. I know that too many pious men sneer at morals as a means of salvation. They say, "You can't work your way into heaven on your morals." I do not know about that. I do not dogmatize. But I do know this; I know that I know just as much about it as they do. I won't take them for authority. The great sentiment of the New Testament is this: Men ought to believe the truth and work aright. It was this sentiment that Jesus labored to teach and exemplify, and it is this sentiment that I attempt to illustrate. I am against the dark creeds because of what grows out of them. Men get over them generally by leaving their unbelieving friends in the hands of a just God. Their charity is better than their faith, just as their hearts are freer than their heads. (Relating a pitiful burial scene in which a pious sister lamented a wicked brother whom she mourned as in hell:) I could almost anathematize a creed that would fill a soul at the grave with anguish. I pity the drunkard more than I blame him. He goes down in manhood, down in society, down to the grave, the victim of circumstances. We are all us, largely, what we are by virtue of our surroundings. While we commiserate others, as we excuse ourselvs, on account of outward influences which control us, shall a just God who knows it all do less? The Universalist faith has this one thing, at least, to commend it—a feature distinguishing it from the others—it makes the most of the fatherhood of God; it commends all mankind to sweet rest in his loving arms.

The Universalist's is about the shortest creed I know of. But it is a creed all the same. There are those who say: "You must believe the three points of our faith, or we do not want your fellowship." Well, there are some men in the Universalist church whose fellowship I do not want. And in the Unitarian church, which has no formal creed, you may be coolly told, "I do not want you if you believe anything that is unreasonable; if you do you don't know anything." That is just the trouble with us. Very many of us do not know anything. I do not know much myself, but I won't let anybody dictate to me. It is just so with the Spiritualists, who, with all their emancipation from the old churches, hav their own shibboleths and think fools all of those who do not see angels hovering round and hear the voices of departed friends still speaking to them.

And those who are so fond of styling themselvs advanced thinkers—the Materialists—pride themselvs upon their geological, astronomical, and biological opinions, and speak contemptuously of those, as ignoramuses, who do not coincide with them and reiterate the doctrins of Darwin regarding man's descent and destiny. The same self-conceitedness applies to and inheres in them all, and not until we come to respect each other's differences as we were made different, shall we hav a church or a class that is really Liberal. Then we shall fulfil the law of Christ, which is the principle of love. It was that sentiment, and that only—unless we grant him the unfolding of the doctrin of immortality—that he made it his mission to bring to earth.

About immortality I do not now care to speak. I preach a present salvation. We want to be saved in the present. Any belief about the future will not help us much. It can only help us by moral influence, and that is as likely to be perverted as otherwise. A matter that can be put off to some future time is very liable not to be duly attended to immediately. The farther away you put rewards and punishments the less interest you feel in your actions or their consequences. A religion that inspires us to do our duty in the present, that makes us think nobly and act nobly, is what we need. A principle that is suitable to liv by is good enough to die by. The vital question is not, as it is often put, how we shall die, but how we liv. I do not warn you, "Prepare to meet thy God," but be sure to liv godly lives.

The great creed is the creed of righteousness—what we shall do and how we shall do it; in what manner can we most largely develop the best that is in us; how can we most ably assist each other in trouble, and build ourselvs up into what we are capable of becoming. It is not so much our duty to aspire to be angels, as it is to desire to be manly. It should not so strongly engage our ambition to go to heaven, as it ought to demand our energies to do well on earth.

The above report has the merit of serving all alike, and some of it our own Liberals will do well to take home. Unless he can do more good where he is, Mr. Bicknell ought to be on the Secular platform.

Tyngsboro, Mass. JOHN P. GUILD.

Divergent Purposes.

Prof. John Bascom, in the Homiletic Review.

The Catholic purpose in training its youth does not run parallel with our own as a free people. Its schools would make a wide inroad in our school system, and that, too, in a class of our population which peculiarly needs to come under the government of American ideas and American methods. The power of assimilation in an American community has hitherto shown itself marvelous. This power rests very much on our school system, and would rapidly disappear if this system were broken. The integrity of our entire life is necessary for the preservation of every part of it; and we could set no limits to the growing evils of a plausible concession to an alien religious temper. The one thing we are least fitted to do as a people is to patiently hold fast to the terms of a contract, to watch against the slow approaches of mischief, and to reclaim the advantages once lost by hasty liberality.

Pittsburgh's Mistake.

From the Congregationalist.

Other cities besides Boston are wrestling with the public school question. Pittsburgh, notably, is aroused over the presence of a parochial school in a public school building, with only a narrow hall to separate the pupils educated by the state from those whom the Roman church cannot trust the state to instruct. As the Catholics preponderate in that ward, the result has been that each of the four rooms presided over by nuns has fifty pupils, while the public school staff, consisting of four teachers, has only about fifty pupils left to instruct. It is fair to state that the nuns are not paid out of the public treasury, and that the Roman Catholics pay rent for the rooms. But despite these mitigating features, we believe that the Protestants are right in their demand that the buildings erected and designed for public school purposes shall not be appropriated for any private educational ventures, be they Catholic or Protestant. It would be far better to hav the rooms in the public school buildings lie vacant than that they should ever be monopolized by one class or one sect. They would be a powerful, though mute, testimony to the desire and design of the state, that all its children should receive a free, equal, and worthy education.

From Leonard Geiger promptly comes a check for $70—the second for a like amount he has handed us within two months, saying nothing of his additional pledge of $100 to make up the $1,000 asked for the Girard College case—proving conclusivly the stalwart enthusiasm those noble compatriots Geiger and Smith feel for the cause in which they hav enlisted for the war. Though orthodoxy may still hold sour and solemn sway in Hudson, it has, through the efforts of these two friends and their generous allies, Burrows, Peck, Wolf, and Harrowitz, become the most promising point in the whole Empire state, outside that gallant force of the Manhattan Liberal Club. Our battle there is no longer a forlorn hope, we are pushing forward to final victory, and Smith and Geiger are also determined that the American Secular Union shall hav a chance to accomplish something.

As the conquering hosts of imperial Rome received their most disastrous check from the sturdy sons of Germania, so in the present the pretentious cant of Presbyterianism, which seeks to enslave by ecclesiastical law, and the insidious but not the less to be dreaded encroach of modern Romanism, are meeting their most spirited opposition from those of Teutonic extraction, who are everywhere the leaven of liberty. It was a great pleasure again to meet Brother Geiger and his amiable helpmeet, Mrs. Geiger, who redeems her pledge of $10 at the Congress. Her thorough sympathy with Secularism reflects credit on her intellect as well as her heart. She adds hope, kindliness, sunshine, and noble aspirations to the manly heroism of her gallant partner.

To Brother Burrows we send our kindest greeting and fervent thanks for his welcome contribution. Another thoroughgoing Liberal added to our ranks.

Dr. De Lespinasse's interest and generosity deserve especial mention. He is fully alive to the necessity of organization to counteract organization, and the wisdom of furnishing means for Secular agitation. He is an acute reasoner, a scholarly man, having deep penetration into men and their motivs; is a thorough Rationalist, a student of social economics—and a nativ of Holland, where, after a most terrible struggle, they hav triumphed over ecclesiasticism, and at last hav five of our Nine Demands in their laws. Friend De Lespinasse traveled some fourteen hundred miles to attend the congress. Notwithstanding his open and avowed Radicalism, he is highly respected in the community in which he livs, and has acquired a nice competence.

Brother Whittick, of Dushore, we regret to learn, is liable to leave for Europe with his wife, where she is to try to regain her drooping health. This noble pair are both life-members, and those acquainted with their splendid enthusiasm for the cause will deeply regret that we shall be denied the privilege of his superintendence of the Secular interests in the state of Pennsylvania, where, on account of his selection, we hav had great hopes of the Keystone state. A speedy recovery and safe return is the sincere wish of the secretary.

A. J. Kraft is full of splendid impulse and has given a glow of intensity and determination to our labors in Madison county, sending out leaflets and literature in his neighborhood, and elevating our standard with sturdy bravery. He writes:

Dear Friend Stevens: Sorry I could not attend congress, but my mind was with that noble band. . . . You hav done all that was possible, and more than ever was expected, so accept my congratulations. Read Ironclad Age, but know you too well for it to jar my judgment of you. . . . Hope we shall make up enough to redeem Girard College from the sky-pilots who are making it a sectarian institution. . . . Willing to stand levy any time you call on me.

Yours truly, A. J. KRAFT.

Brother Downes is a clerical-looking gentleman who attended the congress, having for years taken an activ interest in the Freethought cause and the work of the Secular Union. Being a "knight of the road"—not a highwayman, but a "drummer"—he must hav splendid opportunities for interesting contretemps with the preachers, who certainly would mistake him for one of their cloth. When "on the road" the writer used to enjoy them hugely.

Mrs. Josephine Duane is one of the "old guard" in the work for reform—ever looking forward with confidence. For years her contributions hav been a benison to help bridge the ugly chasm of indifference to the cause of mental liberty.

A noble pair are Francis and Ruth Brettell, who are a unit against orthodoxy and loyal to the cause. Rochester was a field of brighest promis, ruined by parasites on the movement. However, there is still hope for the Union, and ere long we hope to see a stirring band of interested, self-sacrificing workers. Among those will be found the Brettells.

Of the same warm-hearted stamp are our Paxton friends, Reuben and Sophie Newkirk, whom we greeted with pleasure at the Chicago congress, marking their oneness of conviction and sympathy for the American Secular Union. They must enjoy life indeed who know no fear and learn to look on the bright side of things. The "consolations" of orthodoxy are a nightmare to the sensitiv mind. Their letter closes:

May it help spread the gospel of humanity. You hav done a noble work the past year, and hope you may be spared many, many years to help the good cause. Think the Union has a splendid corps of officers, and no doubt much good will be done. Yours for the truth,

REUBEN AND SOPHIE NEWKIRK.

Brother Kryder, of Alliance, is made of the sturdy mold—is thoroughly activ and earnest and will see that justice is done. Where there are no axes to grind all are satisfied.

Brother Hayden has had a hard pull physically, and on account of his health wishes to settle in southern California. He is an ex-minister, and a dentist by profession, and desires to locate among Liberals where he could make his living by his profession and tender his services on the platform. He certainly ought to hav plenty of calls for such an offer.

From the "City of Angels" we receive a contribution, the contributor being the well-known, bright, crisp correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, C. Severance. We are half convinced there are "angels hovering round."

Mrs. Parker, the efficient secretary of Anaheim, forwards her good wishes for the future and a donation. Mrs. Parker is a host in herself when Liberal work is to be done.

Brothers White, Evans, and Nelson are among our steadfast friends, and with such the American Secular Union need not fear or falter. We send them (metaphorically) a hearty "shake."

Mr. Perot was enrolled by President Westbrook, and is much interested. He is likely to become a life-member.

The new executiv committee for the Golden state, W. F. Freeman, realizing that the first thing necessary was funds, in his usual practical way went at it. We would whisper to others, "Do likewise." Our Stockton friends, individually and collectivly, deserve our sincere thanks.

IMPORTANT.

Would it not be well for the Liberals of the Northwest to meet in Chicago to devise plans for more perfect organization for legislativ work? How many would attend about the time of the Paine anniversary? We could hav a splendid corps of speakers, and if one hundred will pledge to attend from outside our neighborhood, we will secure reduced fares. How many will come to the Freethought feast? We do not want such a meeting unless it is well attended. We might include some states not strictly Northwestern. Let us hear from friends in Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Sit down and write, if you desire such a meeting, while it is in your mind. No time for delay.

In this matter I am prompted by the activity of the clans in California. Under the leadership of Freethought they appear to be determined to hav a glorious gathering in the Golden state, where they hav sent out petitions containing the Nine Demands and the following practical address:

The undersigned citizens of California, realizing that the safety of republican institutions is imperiled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed by the least interference of the state in matters of religion, and believing, with the founders of the republic, that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," hereby invite the Freethinkers and Liberals of California to meet in convention at Irving Hall, San Francisco, Sunday, Jan. 27, 1889, at 10 o'clock A.M., for the purpose of forming an auxiliary association of the American Secular Union, to help secure throughout the country practical compliance with the above Demands of Liberalism.

A SECULAR CRUSADE AGAINST GIRARD COLLEGE.

Our friends will remember that at the recent Congress of the American Secular Union it was resolved to call upon the Liberals and Secularists of the United States to subscribe sufficient to defray the running expenses, literary propaganda, and also for an aggressiv crusade to restore Girard College to the secular standard indicated by the will of its founder.

All true Secularists, all lovers of justice, feel that the time has arrived to act, and to act determinedly and resolutely. An enterprise such as the restoration of Girard College to the course of instruction contemplated by the noble-minded Freethinker to whom it owes its existence is one which must commend itself at once to the approval of all who are in sympathy with the Nine Demands.

It is scarcely necessary, therefore, to emphasize the importance of this matter, or to point out the many reasons which imperativly urge the task upon the American Secular Union, the only guardian of mental liberty in the land. For the benefit of those, however, who may not hav given the subject serious attention, I will merely refer to a few of them.

In the first place, there can be no question of more vital importance than that of securing Secular education. Every effort to thwart this is momentous, an obstacle to our movement, a menace that should be met. That an institution conceived and founded in the very spirit of modern Secularism has been diverted from its original purpose and converted into a medium for ecclesiastical propaganda is surely sufficient to arouse from their lethargy the Liberals of every shade, and a justification for decisiv action on our part.

Again, as Dr. Westbrook has ably pointed out in his work on "Girard's Will," the fact that sectarianism has been able to so successfully evade the conditions imposed cannot fail to produce a discouraging effect upon other public-spirited and generous-hearted Freethinkers who might otherwise feel disposed to endow similar institutions. What security, what guarantee, is there that any testator's wishes shall be respected, when the positiv and unequivocal expressions of Stephen Girard hav been thus wantonly and grossly disregarded?

On the other hand, if Secularism can demonstrate its ability to successfully combat sectarian subtlety and ecclesiastical encroachments, it will inspire with confidence any who should be inclined to follow in Girard's footsteps. Thus a twofold purpose might be achieved. Girard College once rescued from the hands of the Philistines, or rather the Pharisees, similar institutions would certainly follow in the wake.

But the strongest argument in favor of action upon this matter by the American Secular Union is the immense impulse, the prestige, and numerical accessions to the cause of mental liberty which can not fail to follow it.

While the American Secular Union is to-day stronger than it has been for some years, we regretfully admit our insignificance compared with opulent orthodoxy; but if we challenge the trustees of Girard College to "giv an account of their stewardship," and evince a determination to fight—even to the United States court—for the vindication of the chivalrous spirit and noble generosity of Stephen Girard, we shall demand such recognition as an organization as will strike dismay and terror to the desecrators of the dead. Doubtless there are thousands throughout the land whose thoughts and sentiments on this question are identical with ours, whom every Liberal should endeavor to reach, who will gladly flock to our standard and bring to us their encouragement and financial coöperation. For, in order to commence this Secular crusade, we must hav money—the sinews of war must be furnished.

Modern crusades are conducted upon a strictly cash basis. It is often said that the pen is mightier than the sword—it may be, but in this age dollars are mightier than either. It takes only a comparativly small amount to carry through a just cause, while an unjust one has to pay in proportion to its dishonesty. In that is our only consolation, for we must admit that money largely controls the intellectual forces of our time. Men speak for money, write for money, and fight for money. Therefore the American Secular Union has no alternativ—the choice of weapons is not accorded us—we must meet the enemy on his own terms. May this appeal meet with a prompt, cheerful, overwhelming response. Let all contribute according to their ability. Those who can afford should giv $1,000, and scores can easily spare $100, but if they can't do either, let them send $25 or even $5. Don't fail to do something. We had anticipated that $1,000 would start the proceedings, but President Westbrook assures me that he must hav $2,000 as soon as possible. Our president has spent two years of arduous study and labor on this question, has written and lectured extensivly, and expended over $500 in cash and is willing to do more, so we should go into this crusade with a stern determination to Secularize Girard College, and purge it of its orthodox incubus.

Recalling the spirit—not the purpose—which actuated the Crusaders of old, their enthusiasm, their sacrifices, their loyalty to the cause they espoused, shall we be less inspired for a more exalted purpose? Shall not their devotion be ours? And even as all their aspirations were centered on rescuing the holy sepulcher, so shall those of the Liberals of the United States be centered upon the restoration of the noblest charity known to man—Girard College—to pure Secularism and pure morality.

From the generous-hearted, gallant John E. Remsberg comes a magnanimous proposition to start the crusade and pay all his own expenses in the warfare. Hark to the bugle blast:

OAK MILLS, KAN., Dec. 3, 1888.

MY DEAR STEVENS: The American Secular Union announces its intention to attempt to rescue Girard College from ecclesiastical domination. The undertaking is a laudable one and at the same time a most difficult one. A robber seldom surrenders his plunder until overpowered and compelled to relinquish it. The Christian city of Philadelphia, the custodian of Girard's bequest, backed by the Christian commonwealth of Pennsylvania, authorizes and upholds this outrage, and will, doubtless, do all in its power to perpetuate it. But even if the Union does not succeed in wresting this institution from the clutches of priestcraft, it can show the world that a great theft has been committed, and it can expose the thief. I wish to contribute something toward this work, and in lieu of more substantial aid I desire through you to make the following proposition: I will deliver four lectures—one in Chicago, one in St. Louis, one in New York, and one in Philadelphia—if the Liberals of these cities will raise $100, $25 for each lecture, this money to be paid into the treasury of the Secular Union and used for the purpose named.

Yours very truly, J. E. REMSBURG.

Brother John can count on Chicago, sure. Who's next? E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Gathering Experience.

HIAWATHA, KAN., Dec. 5.—If the inspiration of Mr. Putnam's prophecy was not from experience, I should think there must be something of the supernatural about it.

The good people of the American Secular Union whom I met at Pittsburgh will not be surprised to know that my work in the West is not only to conquer foes, but "friends" as well. The adage, "All is not gold that glitters," has a most fitting application to a numerous class of pretenders who are known as "Infidels."

There are a class of progressiv Liberals who may properly be termed Secularists, and whom the church fears or respects too much to brand with the old epithet of "Infidel."

I tell you, friends, it does one's soul good to find a real, live Liberal after wandering among the ruins of orthodoxy.

Jonathan Scott, of Morrill, is one of these. We find on his table all the fresh Secular documents, and in his library a collection of choice books, old and new, showing the reader to be content to stop his researches only when time and age shall close his time of life. Mr. Scott is known and feared far and near for his uncompromising attacks upon the old faith.

Robinson is noted for its few and fearless citizens. Mr. Jas. T. Pomroy, the postmaster, and a dealer in hardware, is the life of the town. He is a Unitarian by faith, hence a good Secularist. He, with Dr. Semaster, made the arrangements for my lecture at that place.

"Secularism: Its Aims and Advantages," was my subject for the evening. The Opera Hall recently completed is a credit to the place. At 8 o'clock there were but few people present, but a few minutes more showed that the people generally were willing to listen to both sides, and a comfortable number of ladies and gentlemen greeted me. The best of order and good attention prevailed. I called for a reply. No one responded. Now, I cannot say if this was because there was nothing to answer or because my discourse was unanswerable; but I really felt disappointed that no reply or criticism was offered after my talk of one and a half hours. However, I am quite satisfied with results at Robinson.

The invalid but genial hotel-keeper, Mr. J. S. Draper, is a man of wide views, and has recently emerged from the mysticisms of the gospel into the light of reason. All he lacks is to hav his name transferred from the Methodist Episcopal church book to the list of subscribers of some Liberal paper that he may know the way of real salvation.

Thomas Payne, not a relativ of the immortal hero and author, but a brother-in-law to J. E. Remsburg, resides at this place; and, for some reason, he and his family appeared not among that intelligent audience.

Henry Williams, Dr. Jas. Gafford, and M. C. Parley, the United Brethren minister, were introduced as the leading men of the town.

I found this preacher a very amiable gentleman; and the strangest incident is in the fact that he forgot to attend the lecture until it was too late.

Robinson is a good point, and I hav hopes of forming a Union there before the winter closes.

I go now to Sabetha, a stronghold of the faithful, thence to Seneca, where the United Independents are holding up the colors.

May peace and prosperity bless the labors of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, is the wish of him who subscribes, D. G. CROW.

In the Field Again.

GRANTFORK, ILL.—I left home November 22d, feeling glum, sour, and discouraged, as I had only two definit lecture engagements—Beaver Dam, Wis., and Pocahontas, Ill.—and there was some reason for feeling blue when I realized that six hundred miles intervened between these places. On the route to Beaver Dam I stopped at Mauston, Wis., and met with "Uncle Billy" Holgate, an old veteran of Freethought. He is eighty-one years old, but most a jolly old fellow. He has been reading the Investigator more years than I am old, and has read THE TRUTH SEEKER for about ten years.

I reached Beaver Dam, where I made an effort to speak Saturday night and Sunday, November 24th and 25th. Beaver Dam is a very beautiful and very wealthy city for its size, and there are some very earnest Liberals there—Andrew Willard (who says his Infidelity has never injured his business), Dr. Swan, B. Thorpe, and Mr. McMullen—but I left Beaver Dam if anything more discouraged than when I reached there; in fact, I did not know whether I was going to be troubled with dyspepsia or Presbyterianism.

I went from Beaver Dam to Mazo Manie, Wis., and found John Leitch and O. B. Hazeltine about the only Liberals in that place. I was the guest of Mr. Hazeltine for a few days, and Mr. Leitch worked up a lecture for me on Friday night, November 30th, and did very well for me, far better than I expected.

Mazo Manie is decidedly orthodox—so much so that the "good people" thought they were doing God good service by destroying the bills I had tacked up. But to counteract that kind of work, Mr. Leitch made us some paste, and we stuck the bills on the boards—and if some pious Christian has not destroyed them, they are sticking there still.

I reached Chicago Saturday morning, December 1st, and an earlier hour than good breeding would allow found me standing at the door of 16 Union Park place, the home of the secretary of the American Secular Union. I think Mr. Stevens neglected much of his work to show me around the town, which, for some unaccountable reason, all Chicago people are so proud of—as though I had never before seen an overgrown village. Mr. Stevens just walked, walked, walked, until I thought, as good a walker as I fancied myself to be, that my legs were about walked into nothingness. However, I hav the satisfaction of having a good bill against him for sole-leather—the legs are young and green and will grow again.

Sunday morning we went to hear Professor Swing preach. From Mr. Swing's great reputation, I expected to hear a very fine orator, but was very much disappointed. His discourse was scholarly, but his utterance was not good—in fact, his delivery is very dull and prosy.

But something different from dull sermons and stale prayers was given at the Forum Sunday night. With great pleasure and satisfaction did I listen to that inimitable little woman, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, deliver her superb lecture, "Cross and Crown." The Forum was completely filled with eager listeners, and Mrs. Freeman received round after round of applause. Mrs. Freeman can draw a larger house in Chicago than any other lecturer except Ingersoll.

In introducing her Brother Stevens said, pointing to a unique floral design representing "cross and crown:" "Mrs. Freeman has nobly devoted her splendid talents to popularize Freethought in Chicago, and has often lectured for us when her health could scarcely endure it, and in that way she bore the cross of our cause, but I am glad to say that the cross has not been without its compensation, for her talents hav made her a national reputation, and we are now ready to crown Mattie A. Freeman queen of the Freethought platform." And had he said queen of the American platform, he would not hav said amiss.

The local Union of Chicago may well be considered the vertebra of the American Secular Union. The Forum is making its influence felt, and there is no reason why it should not, for the mental food one gets there is the best that can be procured. I noticed by the program that Oscar De Wolf, M.D., health commissioner of the city of Chicago, and a man who has both a national and an international reputation as an authority on sanitation, lectured for the Union the Sunday previous on the subject, "Woman as the Sanitary Guardian of the Home." Next Sunday Brother Stevens lectures on "Romish Rubbish."

From Chicago I came to Grantfork, Ill., where I am making my home with that prince of jolly good fellows, Anton J. Kraft, until after my engagement at Pocahontas the 13th, 14th, and 15th of December. As soon as I get rested Mr. Kraft thinks we can go to some of the neighboring towns and crucify some of the Christians.

Mail addressed to me at Grantfork, Ill., will be promptly forwarded. GEO. H. DAWES.

W. S. Bell in Texas.

On the 16th of November I left Chicago for Texas. The ride of about twelve hours between Chicago and St. Louis was delightful, as the weather was charming, and the Chicago and Alton railroad is, I think, the smoothest of all the roads leading out of the Garden City. I cannot say as much for the next twelve hours' ride over the Iron Mountain road to Texarcana. It is quite a rough and uncomfortable road, and the conductors are not any too polite. Our train being late, I was compelled to remain over night at Texarcana, a most forlorn-looking place. I think I never ate worse-cooked meals than I did there.

After a ride of about six hours, Sunday, November 18th, I reached Sherman, and was met at the station by Mr. Louis C. Gilmore, who conducted me forthwith to the court-house, where an audience was awaiting me.

L. E. Gilmore, Dr. Rucker, and Mrs. Scott are the workers in the Liberal cause here.

From Sherman I went to Roanoke, to find when I got there that no arrangements had been made for lectures. "Too much rain and mud." And so I had to postpone my Bell-ringing until a later date.

My next place was Norse, nearly a hundred miles away—and worse still, it was nine miles away from the railroad. When I reached Clifton, ahead of time, I found our good friends, Mr. W. J. Ball and wife, good Liberals, who made me welcome to the good cheer of their happy home. Mr. Ball is a station-agent, a genuin Southerner, and his wife a splendid type of the Southern lady.

I was entertained by them two days and two nights—just two-thirds of the length of time the whale entertained Jonah. However, we hav no reason to believe that the whale invited him to drop in on his way back, or that Jonah had any joyful recollections that made him hanker after another such entertainment. But I, on the contrary, was cordially invited to make my abode with them the next time I came to Texas. It is hardly necessary to say that I shall be glad to do so, although the chickens and the orthodox will scorn the sight of me.

Mr. T. Theo. Colwick came from Norse to convey me there over rough roads. The nine miles seemed long, even though Mr. Colwick is good company. And what was still more irksome was to ride three miles after supper, in the dark, over rough roads, and the buggy every now and then threatening to tip over; and after the lecture to take the same three miles again. "Oh, how I would like to be a Liberal lecturer!" I think I hear some one say. Well, you can hav my place. Lecturing is like going to war, filled with patriotism; there is lots of glory in it, but not many shekels. My audience was good at Norse. I had about fifty persons, mostly young men, who nearly all were eating nuts when I entered the schoolhouse, but everyone was attentiv during the lecture.

From Clifton I had an all-night's ride over the Santa Fé railroad to Columbus. The gentlemen who arranged for my lecture at this place are Mr. James A. Toliver and Mr. Ike Towell. I was entertained by the former gentleman and his good lady with attention. My three lectures were well attended, and created considerable discussion among the townspeople.

I had a long ride from Columbus to Jacksonville. Last night I gave my first lecture in Jacksonville, which was well received.

From here I go to the following places in the order named. I cannot giv dates:

Texas: Bowie, Vernon, Roanoke, Gainsville, Sherman, Trenton. Then to Springfield, Mo. Kansas: Leon, Windom, Lebo, Bond. Missouri: Rockport, Graham. Iowa: Guthrie Center and Bristow. I shall not return to Chicago before New Year's.

W. S. BELL.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON will deliver lectures during December and January in Nebraska—Lowell, Newark, and Newbolds nine nights, commencing December 13th. Address at Lowell, Neb.

PRESIDENT WESTBROOK is hard at work on the Girard will perversion case, and will soon furnish the information asked for in the resolution adopted by our recent congress. He recently lectured in a Quaker meeting-house in Philadelphia on the principles of our Secular Union, before one of the oldest and largest literary societies in that city, and his lecture was received with great favor. He has also lectured before this society on the Girard will perversion. He has promised to lecture on the church-and-state question before Friendship Liberal League early in December.

Sheba.

Just where the kingdom, or queendom, of Sheba was located I am unable to tell, as the Holy Queer does not state, and no map that I know of shows the "lay of the land." But that there was such a queendom somewhere to the sou'-sou'-west by nó'th, or nor'-nor'-east by sou' of Jerusalem, or over against the thumb hand border thereof, is proved by the fact that Her Royal Nibs, the queen of said queendom, once on a time paid King Solomon a visit, which became in time, and so remains to-day, the most famous of the visits of royalty, not excepting that in which figured the famous "field of the cloth of gold."

Concerning the name, age, and personal appearance of the queen of Sheba nothing is said in the H. Q., everything being left to the imagination, and my own able-bodied apprehension of unseen materialities, real or ideal, enables me to picture a roly-poly queen of forty, an oliv-tinted, well-developed specimen of femininity, with a wealth of hair in luxuriant tresses shaming the raven's wing in ravenness of hue; great ox-like orbs, than darkest night far darker they, soft, dreamy, languid, lazy orbs when in repose, but harboring within their depths fierce fires of passion, rivaling the play of lightnings, when roused the dander of Her Royal Nibs; nez retrousse, with nostrils sensitiv as aspen leaves—perchance a gorgeous hoop of gold suspended from the cartilage; mouth exquisit, with lips whose hue our very "Jacks" might envy, two rows of brightest pearls within contrasting with the ruby portals of that mouth, to kiss, or to be kissed, by which must hav been bliss of an all-wool variety! A dimpled chin—but why continue only to arouse a hopeless love? Suffice to say that, with her beauty dark, her embon point, not lacking regal chic, albeit she was no chicken, her No. 3 boots, her jewels rich and rare, and pearl-trimmed robes of royal purple, she was a Daisy from Daisyville, and don't you forget it!

It appears that H. R. N.—Her Royal Nibs—had heard much of Solomon's exceeding wisdom. Not taking stock in hearsay, she packed her trunks and, with a large basket of the hardest kind of nuts to crack, set out by fast camel express for Jerusalem, resolved to see for herself if Sol was the man he was cracked up to be. Of course she traveled in state, on her own private camels, having a train of these animals that was wonderful to behold, so great was it, and so gorgeous were the trappings of the wonderfully enduring, but ungainly beasts; then there were the pack-mules bearing spices, gold, and precious gems to be presented to Sol—"greasing a fat sow's back" was the custom then as it is now, it would seem.

Well, after Sol had shown H. R. N. the elephant, so to speak, cracked all the nuts she had brought to vex him, without half trying, she owned up like a little man that he was a bigger mortal than he had been painted, twice over, and that she was completely flabbergasted by his splendor and knowledge. Then she gracefully performed the "greasing" act, thereby paying for her board and the trouble she had caused, by unloading bales upon bales of spices on Sol, and such as he had never dreamed of for fragrance, barrels on barrels of gems, and one hundred and twenty talents of gold! As it would take about fifteen hundred of our present-day silver dollars to represent a talent of silver in those days, you can put it down that one hundred and twenty talents of gold was no slouch of a sum to lay on one who was round-shouldered and heavily bunioned from excesiv wealth, and feel glad that you weren't Solomon.

H. R. N. gave Solomon a good deal of taffy on account of his swell surroundings, not omitting to mention his stables, containing "forty thousand stalls of horses" (Kings i, 26)—according to Chron. xi, 25, "four thousand"—as both accounts are correct, what are we going to do about it?—but I notice a conspicuous absence of taffy in regard to Sol's muchly multifarious better half. Why was this thus, I wonder? Not a word, not a whisper, not a lisp concerning Sol's muchly agglomerated wife and sub-wife. I wonder if Sol showed her up to his august visitor? 'Tis strange, 'tis passing strange if H. R. N. did not express a wish to see his majesty's wife! If he didn't show her up voluntarily, H. R. N. most assuredly asked to be presented, her curiosity compelling her to do so. Then why the utter absence of taffy in this direction? Alas! we shall never know.

What effect this ostentatious visit to the truly gorgeous court of Solomon the First had on the religious nature or "cult" of Sheba's dazzling queen, the H. Q. does not state; but the inference is that, albeit the immediate effect was somewhat pronounced, there being "no more spirit in her," after she had seen Sol's glory, it was not for keeps, for the "conversion" of the queen of Sheba would hav so punctuated "sacred" history that the event would never hav been omitted from the pages of the H. Q., you bet!

Exactly what the story of this extraordinary visit was told for, unless Jahveh chanced to be in a romantic mood at the time, I fail to see. It may adorn the tale of Solomon's glory, but it points no moral that I can discover, unless it is in the matter of present giving—giv that ye may be given in return. The trouble is, this does not always work satisfactorily. I knew a woman who gave her "lord and master" a pair of beautifully embroidered suspenders, he giving her in return a sealskin sack. She made a palpable hit, you see. Another woman I know gave her "dear hubby," a few days after the wedding, several hundred dollars she had saved, and he gave her in return—what? The slip—he vamoosed. She made a bad break, you see. Such is life!

I hope—we all do, I suppose—that H. R. N. conducted herself in a becoming manner, while at the court of Solomon. It doesn't seem to be just the cheese for a lone queen to gallivant about the country and visit kings of such Mormonic proclivities as was Solomon, although in those days it may not hav been thought amiss. I hope she was careful and discreet, and always had a duenna with her, when in Sol's private apartments, and that no breath of scandal ever wafted itself across the bright sheen of her unsullied honor, or warped itself into the weft of her existence—I do, 'pon honor, now!

"So she turned, and went away to her own land, she and her servants." This is all that is vouchsafed to us concerning H. R. N's departure from the court of Solomon. This is meagerness boiled down. No account of any big send-off, with imposing escort, such as Sol's four or forty thousand stalls of horses could hav afforded; nothing but this beggarly meagerness, as given. Let us hope that Jahveh omitted mention of the send-off, rather than think that Solomon in all his glory permitted H. R. N. to leave his dominions without a fitting escort. For one, I can't believe this. I am satisfied that Sol did the handsome thing, and sent her off with flying colors, as it were, Jahveh not thinking it worth mentioning, though dwelling at length on lesser matters.

We hear no more of H. R. N. She goes out like a candle remorselessly snuffed, as it were. Hoping she arrived home safely, I close, having an engagement to take in a horse-race. Selah! SI SLOKUM.

Elmina to McArthur.

Experience, joined with common sense,
To mortals is a providence.

Wherefore am I accused of being "cold," simply because I wish to stand on firm ground and make no assertions that I do not really believe?

If it be to "repulse" when I deny having certain experiences, why, I must fain bear it; for I must be true or nothing. I think McArthur is mistaken in saying I hav openly stated I knew how the things were done, but was bound in honor not to giv the processes to the public, for I explained in the Concordia Blade at the time how every trick I had the clue to was performed.

Nor am I a "violent opponent of the Spiritual philosophy." I always try to keep the mild, even temper of a Quaker as one of my heirlooms from that peace-loving sect, but I try to persistently and patiently oppose all that I deem false, untrue, and mischievous.

I do not think any friend will be able to furnish the statement that I "admitted the genuinness of my experiences," so far as their being spiritual was concerned, or miraculous, either, and as to "fencing," I plead not guilty of doing so purposely.

If Materialists hav "small brain-capacity," I hope our friend will make due allowance therefor, as none of us can know any too much, be we brainy or not. I am requested to relate the portion of the phenomena I believe was real.

My first sitting with a medium was at the private house of a friend in Brooklyn, whose daughter was mediumistic. We got a few sentences through table-tipping and the calling of the alphabet, but not a single text.

I found that by a slight and imperceptible (to others) pressure on the table I could tip it to any letter I pleased, so you see that was unsatisfactory.

Sept. 20, 286, I had my first séance with a regularly accredited public medium, recommended to me by one of the editors of a Spiritual paper, Mrs. M. E. Williams, 232 West 46th street, New York, a materializing medium. Mr. Masquerier, Mrs. Kimball, and myself had a two hours' séance. About a dozen were there. The room was dimly lighted by one lamp, shrouded in red paper and turned low down, so at first we could see nothing but shadows. The cabinet w s curtained with cloth. We sat in chairs a few feet from it.

Mrs. Williams made a short appeal to the audience to try and put themselvs in a receptiv condition, and in harmony with developments. Then the organist played, "Nearer, My God, to Thee." The curtains slowly parted, and a ghostly form, all in white, appeared, waved its hands, bowed, and blessed the audience. At intervals numerous other forms appeared, sometimes two at once. They called up the audience one by one, and gave them messages, most of the forms being recognized, and cried and laughed over. We were allowed to ask questions, and when Dr. Newton was announced, I received permission to address him a query, and as he had doctored my dead sister, I thought I would inquire about her. I first asked if the spirit knew who I was, but this being a test question, I was sharply informed that it was a very wrong condition in which to approach the spirits, so thenceforth I remained silent. Mr. Masquerier, being well known and noted, received many messages, and was called up and introduced to his dead wife, who touched his head, eyes, and arm. He is nearly blind, so only saw a white mist, and could catch nothing but indistinct mutterings of the message. So he said nothing, and quietly returned to his seat. Many others saw and recognized dead friends, telling us they plainly saw and discerned the features, and got messages none but the dead could hav given. I shall hereafter speak more of this. I withhold my opinion for the present, only narrating things as they appeared. Mr. Masquerier received a message giving him great encouragement for his good work in regard to land reform and farmsteads. Policy there, as he had money.

Now, it all seemed to me like a masquerade farce and play. Though I tried hard to find something real in it, I could not do so. Yet Mrs. Kimball was strongly impressed and felt sure there were real spirits there. Thus do different minds see from different standpoints. I was unknown and got nothing. Mrs. Kimball, being a tall, strong, and resolute-looking woman, was not allowed to even go to the cabinet at all, while believers received plenty of messages, and were called up to talk with and kiss the spirits.

Sept. 22.—Nothing special yesterday; found the clairvoyant we intended to visit—had sick headache, so we went to Caroline Flanders's, and we had a pleasant and profitable call, for she told us much of her personal experience with Spiritual mediums, all of which proved no spirit control. She told us of apparitions which she saw while she was sick—forms as real as living persons. She told of a woman she knew who could read, in the darkest room, from the back of her head—read the finest print in total darkness—and that the least glimmer of light almost crazed her. Caroline is well educated; is a novel-writer and used to write for the Youth's Companion, and got well paid. She came of a line of doctors, and is herself a doctor; so she understands nervous phenomena, in a measure. I cannot deny, or entirely doubt, her testimony; yet, despite numerous cases of this kind, it is still a disputed point among scientists as to whether a person can see from the back of the head or pit of the stomach.

But I am satisfied that if these things are true, they are a part and parcel of what is called Spiritual phenomena, and that it is nerves and not spirits that are the cause of them.

Dr. Hollick, in his "Nerves and the Nervous," givs cases from his own practice, in which each one of the senses plays tricks upon their possessor, so one is never sure of his own perceptions. The sight is most apt to deceive, and show ghosts and apparitions where there is really nothing at all. Now, there are, no doubt, people who see and hear and feel what they think are spirits. But how are they to know but it is their nerves playing them false?

One case Dr. Hollick mentions I will condense and narrate, as it is so apt to our discussion: A lawyer had a client who was accused of murder. The lawyer knew he was innocent, but the question was, Could he clear him? He worked hard on the case for two months, and at the last neither ate nor slept, but lived on green tea. He won his case, but found himself ruined in health, and, at last, as he was one day sitting in his study reading a novel, he heard some one speak, but, looking around, found himself alone. The voice spoke again, and the words were part of what a witness had spoken at the trial, then came part of the judge's charge, then part of his own speech in his own voice. Every day he heard voices, his own and others, always a part of the trial and in the voice of each person, as plain and distinct as at the time, and occasionally when he talked with others these voices overpowered the real one. But in time the man was cured, and the voices came no more.

To merely tell this incident does not giv the slightest idea of the thrilling reality. The book is only $1, and all who are curious to know real phenomena will be well repaid by ordering it of the Truth Seeker Company.

The doctor yet livs, and will vouch for the truth of the narrativs.

There is no courage but in innocence;
No constancy, but in an honest cause.

Slate Writing—A Postscript.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th I said that I got four messages written on one of my slates, three of which were in answer to questions prepared by me before going to see Mr. Keeler, the medium. My mother, my father, and my niece each addressed me appropriately, just as if they were living; they all signed their full names, and the handwriting was apparently theirs. I still hav the slates with the writing on them. But there was a fourth message which none of us could understand; it was this:

Good morning. Tell Sarah. Wallace Mentor.

Mentor does not appear to be a proper name, and we were puzzled to know what it meant. My aunt Sarah was with me, having been allowed to come in after the private séance began; but she did not prepare any questions nor did she expect any communication. The mystery remained unsolved for six months, when, as we were showing the slates to two lady friends and explaining the communications, one of the ladies said, "But you havn't told us about this Mr. Newton?" Then, for the first time, my aunt recognized the name Newton as that of her mother before marriage. But her mother was an only child, and it is now so long since my aunt left England—over thirty-five years—that she is unable to recall a Newton with the Christian name Wallace.

The first letter of the name Newton is so much like an M that no one ever thought of making anything but "Mentor" out of the word until about a month ago. VICTORIA A. BURR.

Colonel Ingersoll Denounces Capitalists Who Enslave the Working-Girls.

From the World.

So much interest has been awakened by the World's exposures of the wretched misery, degradation, and sorry plight of the poor working-girls in their bonds of slavery to capital and monopoly, that a World reporter called on Col. Robert G. Ingersoll to ask his judgment of what remedy, if any there is, he could suggest. Colonel Ingersoll has been an interested reader of what has been published about the poor white slaves, and no one has given the subject more careful thought. The reporter asked:

What is your opinion of the work undertaken by the World in behalf of the city slave girls?

I know of nothing better for a great journal to do. The average girl is so helpless and the greed of the employer is such that unless some newspaper or some person of great influence comes to her assistance she is liable not simply to be imposed upon, but to be made a slave. Girls, as a rule, are so anxious to please, so willing to work, that they bear almost every hardship without complaint. Nothing is more terrible than to see the rich living on the work of the poor. One can hardly imagin the utter heartlessness of a man who stands between the wholesale manufacturer and the wretched women who make their living—or, rather, retard their death—by the needle. How a human being can consent to liv on this profit, stolen from poverty, is bevond my imagination. The exposures made by the World will do good. These men, when known, will be regarded as hyenas and jackals. They are like the wild beasts who follow herds of cattle for the purpose of devouring those who are injured or those who hav fallen by the wayside from weakness.

What effect has unlimited immigration on the wages of women?

If our country were overpopulated the effect of immigration would be to lessen wages, for the reason that the working people of Europe are used to lower wages and hav been in the habit of practicing an economy unknown to us. But this country is not overpopulated. There is plenty of room for several hundred millions more. Wages, however, are too low in the United States. The general tendency is to leave the question of labor to what is called the law of supply and demand. My hope is that in time we will become civilized enough to know that there is a higher law, or, rather, a higher meaning in the law of supply and demand than is now perceived. Year after year what are called the necessaries of life increase. Many things now regarded as necessaries were formerly looked upon as luxuries. So, as man becomes civilized, he increases what may be called the necessities of his life. When perfectly civilized one of the necessities of his life will be that the lives of others shall be of some value to them. A good man is not happy as long as he knows that other good men and women suffer for raiment and for food and hav no roof but the sky—no home but the high way. Consequently what is called the law of supply and demand will then hav a much larger meaning.

In nature everything livs upon something else. Life feeds upon life. Something is lying in wait for something else, and even the victim is weaving a web or crouching for some other victim, and the other victim is in the same business—watching for something else. The same is true in the human world—people are living on each other; the cunning obtain the property of the simple; wealth picks the pockets of poverty; success is a highwayman leaping from the hedge. The rich combine, the poor are unorganized, without the means to act in concert, and for that reason become the prey of combinations and trusts. The great questions are: Will man ever be sufficiently civilized to be honest? Will the time ever come when it can truthfully be said that right is might? The lives of millions of people are not worth living because of their ignorance and poverty, and the lives of millions of others are not worth living on account of their wealth and selfishness. The palace without justice, without charity, is as terrible as the hovel without food.

What effect has the woman suffrage movement had on the bread-winners of this country?

I think the women who hav been engaged in the struggle for equal rights hav done some good for women in the direction of obtaining equal wages for equal work. There has also been for many years a tendency among women in our country to become independent—a desire to make their own living—to win their own bread. So many husbands are utterly useless, or worse, that many women hardly feel justified in depending entirely on a husband for the future. They feel somewhat safer to know how to do something, and earn a little money themselvs. If men were what they ought to be, few women would be allowed to labor—that is to say, to toil. It should be the ambition of every healthy and intelligent man to take care of, to support, to make happy, some woman. As long as women bear the burdens of the world, the human race can never attain anything like a splendid civilization. There will be no great generation of men until there has been a great generation of women. For my part, I am glad to hear this question discussed—glad to know that thousands of women take some interest in the fortunes and in the misfortunes of their sisters.

The question of wages for women is a thousand times more important than sending missionaries to China or India. There is plenty for missionaries to do here. And by missionaries I do not mean gentlemen and ladies who distribute tracts or quote scripture to people out of work. If we are to better the condition of men and women we must change their surroundings. The tenement-house breeds a moral pestilence. There can be in these houses no home, no fireside, no family, for the reason that there is no privacy, no walls between them and the rest of the world. There is no sacredness, no feeling "this is ours."

It would be hard to overestimate the good that might be done by the millionaires of New York if they would turn their attention to sending thousands and thousands into the country or to building them homes miles from the city, where they could hav something like privacy, where the family relations could be kept with some sacredness. Think of the "homes" in which thousands and thousands of young girls are reared in this city of New York. Think of what they see and what they hear, of what they come in contact with. How is it possible for the virtuous to grow in the damp and darkened basements? Can we expect that love and chastity and all that is sweet and gentle will be produced in these surroundings, in cellars and garrets, in poverty and dirt? The surroundings must be changed.

Are the fathers and brothers blameless, who allow young girls to make coats and cloaks and vests in an atmosphere poisoned by the ignorant and low-bred?

The same causes now brutalizing girls brutalize their fathers and their brothers, and the same causes brutalize the ignorant and low-lived that poison the air in which these girls are made to work. It is hard to pick out one man and say that he is to blame, or one woman and say the fault is hers. We must go back of all this. In my opinion, society raises its own failures, its own criminals, its own wretches of every sort and kind. Great pains are taken to raise these crops. The seeds, it may be, were sown thousands of years ago, but they were sown, and the present is the necessary child of all the past. If the future is to differ from the present, the seeds must now be sown. It is not simply a question of charity, nor a question of good nature, nor a question of what we call justice—it is a question of intelligence. In the first place, I suppose that it is the duty of every human being to support himself—first, that he may not become a burden upon others, and second, that he may help others. I think all people should be taught never, under any circumstances, if by any possibility they can avoid it, to become a burden. Everyone should be taught the nobility of labor, the heroism and splendor of honest effort. As long as it is considered disgraceful to labor, or aristocratic not to labor, the world will be filled with idleness and crime, and with every possible moral deformity.

Has the public school system anything to do with the army of pupils who after six years of study willingly accept the injustice and hardship imposed by capital?

The great trouble with the public school is that many things are taught that are of no immediate use. I believe in manual training schools. I believe in the kindergarten system. Every person ought to be taught how to do something—ought to be taught the use of their hands. They should endeavor to put in palpable form the ideas that they gain. Such an education givs them a confidence in themselvs, a confidence in the future—givs them a spirit and feeling of independence that they do not now hav. Men go through college studying for many years and when graduated hav not the slightest conception of how to make a living in any department of human effort. Thousands of them are to-day doing manual labor, and doing it very poorly, whereas, if they had been taught the use of tools, the use of their hands, they would derive a certain pleasure from their work. It is splendid to do anything well. One can be just as poetic working with iron and wood as working with words and colors.

What ought to be done, or what is to be the end?

The fact that the World is turning the attention of people in this direction is full of hope for the future. The great thing is for the people to know the facts. There are thousands and millions of splendid and sympathetic people who would willingly help, if they only knew; but they go through the world in such a way that they know but little of it. They go to their place of business on the elevated cars; they stay in their offices for a few hours; they go home; they spend the evening there or at a club; they come in contact with the well-to-do, with the successful, with the satisfied, and they know nothing of the thousands and millions on every side. They hav not the least idea how the world livs, how it works, how it suffers. They read, of course, now and then, some paragraph in which the misfortune of some wretch is set forth, but the wretch is a kind of steel engraving, an unreal shadow, a something utterly unlike themselvs. The real facts should be brought home, the sympathies of men awakened, and awakened to such a degree that they will go and see how these people liv, see how they work, see how they suffer.

Does exposure do any good?

I hope that the World will keep on. I hope that it will expose every horror that it can, connected with the robbery of poor and helpless girls, and I hope that it will publish the names of all the robbers it can find and the wretches who oppress the poor and who liv upon the misfortunes of women. The crosses of this world are mostly borne by wives, by mothers, and by daughters. Their brows are pierced by thorns. They shed the bitterest tears. They liv and suffer and die for others. It is almost enough to make one insane to think of what woman, in the years of savagery and civilization, has suffered. Think of the anxiety and agony of motherhood. Maternity is the most pathetic fact in the universe. Think how helpless girls are. Think of the thorns in the paths they walk—of the trials, the temptations, the want, the misfortunes, the dangers, and the anxieties that fill their days and nights. Every true man will sympathize with woman, and will do all in his power to lighten her burdens and to increase the sunshine of her life.

Is there any remedy?

I hav always wondered that the great corporations hav made no provisions for their old and worn-out employees. It seems to me that the Pennsylvania road, the New York Central, and many others—not only these railway companies, but great manufacturing corporations—ought to provide for their workmen. Many of them are worn out, unable longer to work, and they are thrown aside like old clothes. They find their way to the poorhouses or they die in tenements by the roadside. This seems almost infinitly heartless. Men of great wealth engaged in manufacturing, instead of giving $500,000 for a library or $1,000,000 for a college, ought to put this money aside, invest it in bonds of the government, and the interest ought to be used in taking care of the old, of the helpless, of those who meet with accidents in their work. Under our laws, if an employee is caught in a wheel or in a band and his arm or leg is torn off he is left to the charity of the community, whereas the profits of the business ought to support him in his old age. If employees had this feeling—that they were not simply working for that day, not simply working while they hav health and strength, but laying aside a little sunshine for the winter of age—if they only felt that they by their labor were creating a fireside in front of which their age and helplessness could sit, the feeling between employed and employers would be a thousand times better. On the great railways very few people know the number of the injured, of those who lose their hands or feet, of those who contract diseases riding on the tops of freight trains in snow and sleet and storm; and yet, when these men become old and helpless through accident, they are left to shift for themselvs. The company is immortal, but the employees become helpless. Now, it seems to me that a certain per cent should be laid aside, so that every brakeman and conductor could feel that he was providing for himself, as well as for his fellow-workmen, so that when the dark days came there would be a little light.

The men of wealth, the men who control these great corporations—these great mills—giv millions away in ostentatious charity. They send missionaries to foreign lands. They endow schools and universities and allow the men who earned the surplus to die in want. I believe in no charity that is founded on robbery. I hav no admiration for generous highwaymen or extravagant pirates. At the foundation of charity should be justice. Let these men whom others hav made wealthy giv something to the workmen—something to those who created their fortunes. This would be one step in the right direction. Do not let it be regarded as charity—let it be regarded as justice.

For Nickels and Dimes, but Not for Principle.

In the report of the last annual Congress of the American Secular Union, held at Pittsburgh, Pa., reference was made in these columns to the puritanical observance of Sunday in that city, enforced through the efforts of a private society of churchmen who arrogantly imagin that they hav the right to control the actions of the people one-seventh of the time. Under a law dating back to 1794 the Law and Order Society has been enabled to make Pittsburgh a veritable graveyard on Sundays. When the Union met there, newspapers were the only articles allowed to be sold. Since then, a dispatch says, newspapers also were interdicted. This appears to hav awakened the journalists. There is nothing like touching a Christian's own pocket to make him see that a wrong is being perpetrated. Touching other people's pockets will not do it. Now the papers are condemning the Law and Order Society, and the Post and Leader are crying "blue laws!" "Scotch Puritanism!" "crude bigotry," and the detectivs of the society are termed an army of ruffians whose rule human endurance can no longer stand. The representativs to the Pennsylvania legislature from Allegheny county hav been influenced, and it is announced that two-thirds of them will work in opposition to the act of 1794, "so far, at least, as concerns the more obnoxious features of that measure."

Later news comes that the druggists also are offended at the Law and Order Society. Having been walked on for a year by the churchmen they are at last getting restless. They hav, each of them, lost the sale of a great many glasses of soda-water with a wink therein, and there is a vacancy in their trousers pockets of cavernous dimensions. Therefore sixty pill-compounders met on the 6th instant to take steps to repeal enough of the law to admit the legal sale of soda-water and winks, in the latter of which there is indeed much money. Some druggists desired to hav tobacco included in the amended laws, and others drew the line at beverages. A committee was appointed to prepare a bill to be presented to the legislature for the repeal or amendment of the blue laws. The street railroad company and the newspaper proprietors were invited to coöperate in the work, as, it was urged, they are on the same level with druggists under the blue laws. The secretary was instructed to correspond with druggists throughout the state and enlist their sympathy and financial aid.

Self-interest, it appears, was the only string touched. The druggists want to sell beverages of which soda-water is the one alias; the street railroad companies want to gather nickels from the public; the newspapers want to collect the pennies from the sale of their papers and the dollars from their Sunday advertisers. But not a word that shows the petitioners hav an idea above a dollar; no indignant protest against religious tyranny, no strong assertion of mankind's rights, no repudiation of the right of ecclesiastics to manage their business fifty-two days in the year. Only a begging for just a little liberty, just enough to sell a little soda-water, and a cigar perhaps, or to ride in the street-cars, or to read a paper, if they will be good in everything else. They are willing to be taken to see grandfather's grave in the afternoon if they can play a few minutes in the morning.

Where are the manhood, the independence, the integrity of purpose, of the Pittsburghers? Are they forever going to crawl and cringe at the feet of religion? If it is not right to sell soda-water and ride in the street-cars on Sunday they ought not to do it; if it is right, then it is right to sell or do anything else, and the demand made of the legislature should include all else; and put it, too, on some broader basis than a nickel or a ten-cent piece. If they admit the right of the Christians to govern them at all they should bear the whole weight of the cross.

Everybody admires a man who stands up straight and fights for his natural rights. Very few will hav much sympathy with one who only wants the chance to make a few pennies by selling soda-water on Sunday.

Responsibility and Theology.

The Christian Advocate contributes to the world of logic this precious bit:

"Lord Byron is credited with the authorship of the assertion that 'man is not responsible for his belief.' Other skeptical minds hav indorsed this plausible half-truth until it has become a current phrase in Infidel circles. And many who, though not pronounced skeptics, are yet moved by the vanity which seeks silly gratification in saying things which startle their Christian acquaintances, are in the habit of repeating it. One also often sees it quoted in the writings of 'Freethinkers.' It may not be amiss, therefore, to press the inquiry, 'Are men really responsible for their beliefs?'

"Byron's assertion wears an aspect of plausibility because it is partly true. Man is not absolutely responsible for his belief, because he is so constituted that his understanding can not assent to any given fact or proposition which is not supported by evidence that appears to be conclusiv. But when such evidence is presented it cannot withhold its assent. Hence, there is a sense in which belief is not voluntary, because the assent of the understanding is determined not by the choice of the mind, but by the evidence on which a doctrin or fact reposes. And so far as belief is involuntary it is true, as Byron affirms, that 'man is not responsible for his belief.'

"But when viewed in all its bearings, this proposition is obviously false, because the evidence of a doctrin cannot command the assent of the understanding unless one chooses to giv it due consideration. Every man possesses the power to examin and to weigh the evidence of Christian doctrin. This power is fully within his control. He can giv or refuse to giv attention to it. And his freedom to do this is the basis of his responsibility for his belief. If he choose to steadfastly hold the evidence of Christian truth before his mind, his understanding will recognize its sufficiency to command its assent. Since, as Pascal pertinently observes, 'There is light enough for those whose sincere wish it is to see, and darkness enough to confound those of an opposit disposition.' But, then, says Dr. Chalmers, in one of his suggestiv letters, 'It is a very possible thing that a doctrin may possess the most abundant evidence, and yet not be believed just because we choose to shut our eyes against it; and our unbelief in this case is owing not to the want of evidence, but to the evidence not being attended to.' It is, therefore, apparent that because of his full liberty to giv or withhold his attention, a man is responsible both for the belief and disbelief which results from his refusal to fix his earnest thoughts upon evidence which, if conscientiously studied, would guide his understanding into a belief of the truth. Byron is wrong. Man is responsible for his belief, and a Christian believer is justified in addressing the skeptic in the words of Milton:

> "'Accuse not Nature. She hath done her part;
> Do thou but thine!'"

That is to say, man is free either to examin Christianity or not to examin it; but if he does examin it he must be convinced; ergo, he is responsible to God (and therefore deserving of hell-fire) for not believing; and if he does not examin it he is likewise responsible, because he had the power to so examin and become convinced, but willfully turned away from heaven. This reasoning lands everybody in heaven or hell, and must therefore be satisfactory to the church.

But who ever heard of such stupid reasoning? In the first place, a man is not free to examin or not to examin the Christian doctrin. His will to do or not to do is determined by his environments, his education, his geographical location, his general make-up, and the traits of his ancestors. The Advocate's first assertion is therefore false, and as upon it is alleged to be based his responsibility for his belief, the falling to the ground of the subsequent assertions is a matter of course.

But supposing the influences upon a man's mind are such that he undertakes to examin Christian doctrin. Are the evidences such as at once compel belief, as is the evidence of an arithmetical proposition? No, only "light enough for those whose sincere wish it is to see." But what sort of reliance can be placed on the evidence which converts only those who wish to be converted? Can it be called conclusiv? What kind of an opinion can we hold of the judgment—its fairness, its honesty—of a man who is convinced because he wants to be, and asserts that it would be right for another man to do something to please him though wrong to do precisely the same thing to please another? A juror who should decide a case on such a pretext would be kicked out of court. Yet that is the Advocate's assertion: the evidence will convince those who want to be convinced, therefore if others are not convinced the fault is theirs, and they must be damned for not having a mind so constituted as to desire a thing before seeking evidence of its truth!

Again, suppose the evidence will not convince even a man desirous of being convinced? Suppose a man's mind has been influenced to desire conversion. Suppose that man is honest, and has strong reasoning power. The Christian doctrin asserts to him as a fact a thing he knows never has taken place—as that a dead man has been brought to life—and his mind rejects it. Is he to blame for his non-conversion? Shall he be burnt eternally for refusing to believe the incredible? Who is responsible—the one who gave him the mind, or the doctrin that mind rejects, or the mind itself? If the first, then all his environments, his parents, even nature herself, must be condemned. If the second, then the minds of those who constructed the doctrin are to blame. If the third, then surely the man is not to be responsible for the fault of a mental organization given him by beings and circumstances over which he had no control.

If we could believe Pascal and Dr. Chalmers, then we could all be Christians just as easily as not. But we cannot believe them, for the simple reason that the evidence is not there to back them up. They wanted it to be so, hence asserted it is so. But supposing they had wanted the moon to play football with; would it hav been on the ground before them by simply asserting that it was there? Yet it would be no more foolish to claim this than to claim that a man can believe just because he desires to. A man may assert over and over again that he believes, but he does not. He only believes he believes, and deceives himself. Unless his reason is convinced he cannot believe, no matter how earnestly he desires to. Therefore, if the Christian evidence of doctrin is not sufficient to convince everybody, as an arithmetical solution will, then only those who hav minds so constructed that they can deceive themselvs, or are deficient in power to cognize facts and draw accurate conclusions therefrom, can become converts. Unfortunately, a great part of the world is of this latter class, though they are no more responsible for their belief, than the opposit class is for its unbelief in the same thing.

It is this same Chalmers from whom the Advocate quotes as implying that Christian doctrin possesses abundant evidence, who thought he had answered Hume's argument against miracles—"That it is more probable that human testimony should be false than that miraculous stories should be true, because all our experience verifies the non-existence of miracles, and at the same time the frequency of false testimony"—by saying, "True, we hav evidence of false testimony, and not of miracles, but we hav no experience of such testimony being false as the testimony we hav for the gospel miracles. No instance can be quoted of twelve men, whose writings prove them to hav been both moral and intelligent, spending their lives in testifying that they saw and heard what they did not see and hear." The same charge lies against Dr. Chalmers's implication that the Advocate quotes as against this ingenious attempt to turn Hume's argument, viz., there are no facts to back it up. The twelve apostles did not write the gospels, nor did the writers of the gospels see or hear a single thing or word they record. In fact, we don't know who the writers were, and are sure of nothing except that the gospels were not written for scores of years after Jesus is said to hav lived. So with this attempt to bolster up illogic with the opinion of Dr. Chalmers—we may turn him round against himself and say that it is a very possible thing that a doctrin may possess no evidence and yet be believed just because we choose to shut our eyes against the evidence against its probability or possibility—that is, if we could believe or disbelieve of our own will.

Men are not really responsible for their beliefs, for the same reason that he who leads a horse to water is not responsible because the animal sometimes refuses to drink. A man says, "I feel I can will and act as I choose, and follow my own strongest desire." So he can, until some stronger desire overrides the first. A man's strongest desire may be to accept the Christian doctrin. He looks for the evidence. Some of it appears to him unreasonable. Then his strongest desire may be to sift that evidence, in doing which he finds it impossible to believe it. Therefore he cannot believe. Is he responsible?

"Facts of mind," says Wilson, "are bound by the law of invariable order. The desire which may hav been the antecedent of the will on a certain occasion was itself the effect of other antecedents, and those antecedents being absent or modified, that desire would be absent or modified. In other words, that state of consciousness called a desire is a link in a chain of invariable cause and effect." Had not the man desired to accept the Christian doctrin, he would not hav desired to sift the evidence. Had he not sifted the evidence, he would not hav rejected the doctrin. Had he not rejected the doctrin, he would not hav been a candidate for hell. This result is evidently what the priests hav in mind when they tell their people who think they believe, not to investigate or question the mysterious ways of God: that it will lead them into trouble and doubt. And it is a solid fact that many men hav been drawn into open Infidelity simply because they tried to be Christians and began "to examin and to weigh the evidence of Christian doctrin." Therefore, it certainly is not true that if a man "chooses to steadfastly hold the evidence of 'Christian truth' before his mind, his understanding will recognize its sufficiency to command its assent." Thinking of one thing, following a strongest desire, leads to thinking of another, and so on in the chain of cause and effect; and a would-be Christian who seriously sets to thinking is on dangerous ground. He will almost surely lose what little faith he has. The only way to be a good Christian, and to hold fast to the faith, is not to think at all.

And theology does not require thought. It requires only acceptance. As Bishop Magee summed up the differences between science and theology, the first discovers facts, the other "accepts revelation and clings to a creed." The chief characteristic of theology, says Wilson, is that it depends upon deduction alone. To verify by an appeal to facts is repulsiv. To lay an accepted revelation on the dissecting table of criticism, to be cut up with a view to examin its nature, is irreverent. Theology treats of things which lie outside of the range of human faculties, such as God, heaven, hell, and she is safe only so long as she confines herself to these. When she introduces human elements, she becomes amenable to science, and must answer the questions science puts. When theology attempts to prove a revelation, she must tell us what a revelation is. When she says revelation comes by inspiration, she must show us how inspiration works, and how she tells the difference between inspired and uninspired thoughts. When she says God interferes with the people of this world, she must prove there is a God. She may talk about God away from the world as much as she likes, and science simply says, I know nothing of such a being, but when she brings him down here she must show him. And if it should appear, adds Wilson, slyly, that a teacher or writer was mistaken as to certain facts verifiable by human means, he must state the reasons for believing he must be correct concerning superhuman facts unverifiable by human means. Thought, applied to theology, only confuses the subject, and leads the thinker into difficulties.

All Sorts of a Fool.

We think that the old gentleman of this town who said that one of his sons-in-law was more kinds of a blank fool than any other fellow he ever saw, was exactly right.

This reminds us that Elliott F. Shepard has come out in his Mail and Express for a war with the South and for the suppression of Sunday newspapers. The war is to be based on the fact that some Republicans were defeated in their climb for office last month, and the newspapers are to be suppressed because Sunday papers and God cannot both hav the same day—one or the other must go. As there is not, and in all human probability will not be, any cause for another sectional war, and as the Sunday newspapers either ignore or laugh at the rant of the puritanical Christians against them, the conclusion is irresistible that the wealthy old commodore was right.

Which Perhaps?

During the past week the American Sabbath Union has been in convention in Washington. Wilbur F. Crafts, of the Presbyterian church, is the leader in the movement, aided by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The Sabbath Union has a petition of six million signatures to present to Congress asking for a national law forbidding all Sunday work and traffic. The Union hopes by closing up all post-offices on Sundays to stop the running of trains on that day, and, as far as Congress can legislate, to stop all manner of labor.

Cardinal Gibbons has just written to Mr. Crafts indorsing the aims of the Union, and the general authorities of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and Reformed churches hav passed resolutions favoring the movement. In this city about all the churches hav indorsed it. The Brotherhood of Locomotiv Engineers, the International Convention of the Knights of Labor, and the Central Labor Union hav also approved the scheme. Elliott F. Shepard is the president of the Union. The convention in Washington is the first public meeting of the Union, and is held to affect the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, before whom the objects of the Union are to be shortly argued. Senators Blair, Edmunds, and Hale are of course helping the churches along, and the prospects of the Union seem good.

If this scheme works all right, and Senator Blair gets his seventy or eighty millions for his education bill, to be spent under the supervision of the Protestant churches, then we shall hav the God-in-the-Constitution amendment up again, with the chances in favor of its passing Congress, whatever the states may do with it. The Protestant churches are much encouraged by their success in confiscating the Mormon church property, and it certainly is a good precedent for future national interference in religious matters. Perhaps by and by we shall hav a state church in every state, and a national church supported by the United States government.

Perhaps, also, by and by, the people will get tired of church domination and pitch the whole lot of rascals overboard.

Resipiscence.

It seems hardly worth while to use the space necessary for the following, but for Mr. Walker's complete satisfaction it must be done:

"Some months ago, in criticising the position of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon the 'obscenity' question, I unintentionally misstated the Editor's views, not having by me the particular number of the paper which contained the article I was noticing so depending entirely upon my memory. This caused Mr. Macdonald to reply in a strain a trifle pungent, closing with these words:

"'The next time Mr. Walker gets up to misrepresent us we trust he will hav the honesty to quote our words. His labored effor's to confute something we never said hav a tendency to make us weary.'"

"I explained how this occurred, saying:

"'It seems that Mr. Macdonald has caught me napping, but when he avers that I knowingly misquoted him he labors under a mistake. At the time I wrote the "Flash" which he quotes above I could not find THE TRUTH SEEKER containing his article, and so I had to depend upon my memory, which appears to hav led me into a serious error. I hav not since then been able to find that copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav no doubt that its Editor quotes himself correctly, above. Certainly no one will more readily than myself admit the vital difference between the position I assigned to Mr. Macdonald and the one he actually took, but I assure him that the misrepresentation was wholly unintentional.'

"Now, had Mr. Macdonald acted as his own physician he would hav let me state my 'apology' in my own words, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but instead of quoting the above, he wrote:

"'This may be, perhaps, a good place to acknowledge Mr. Walker's handsome apology for misrepresenting the sentiment expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We trust that hereafter he will observe strict accuracy in these matters.'

"I exposed the unfairness of this in Fair Play of October 27th, as follows:

"'Does Mr. Macdonald consider that his second paragraph is "handsome" in any way? The word "misrepresenting," when used unqualifiedly, means, as commonly understood, intentional misrepresentation, and Mr. Macdonald well knows that I make no apology for intentionally misrepresenting the position of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I "apologized" only for quoting from memory and thus unintentionally misrepresenting THE TRUTH SEEKER. Why did its Editor not quote this paragraph of mine and let his readers judge for themselvs as to how "handsome" my apology was, and how much ground it covered?'

"Mr. Macdonald has not deigned to notice this, although he had the best of opportunities to do so in his recent reply to the other portions of the article of which it was a part.

"I trust that his action is not a fair sample of Secular fairness."

When we read Mr. Walker's explanation of his misrepresentation, it occurred to us that it was a handsome apology, and we said so. For so thinking we now apologize, plead guilty, and recant. Indeed, we are willing to say it was no apology at all, and could even wish that we were dead before we had provoked our mint and cumin friend to pile his Ossa of stern righteousness upon our molehill of evil doing. But whatever he shall say in condemnation, that will we second and unanimously pass. We ask, with Hamlet:

"Show me what thou'lt do:
Woul't weep? woul't fight? woul't fast? woul't tear thyself?
Woul't drink up Esil? eat a crocodile?
I'll do't."

Anything to satisfy our esteemed friend. He can call his explanation a whale or a weasel or a humpbacked camel, just as he chooses.

We learn from the same editorial of Mr. Walker's from which we hav quoted this—what is it? that he has had trouble with Mr. O'Flanagan, editor of the Kansas Catholic, who refused to print Mr. Walker's articles when replying to them. Notwithstanding that the two troubles are not at all parallel, we giv Mr. Walker's gentlemanly dismissal of the two offending editors:

"Between Mr. O'Flanagan and Mr. Macdonald there does not appear to be much room for choice, so far as fair play in discussion is concerned. Their names and their treatment of opponents alike raise a suspicion of a closer affinity between them than their very dissimilar views upon religion would warrant one in assuming to exist."

Mr. Walker should be more careful. Mr. O'Flanagan may be offended at this.

Some Books to Giv Away.

Those of our readers who intend to keep the Pagan holiday of December 25th by the admirable custom of making presents to their relativs and friends are respectfully urged to consider that books form one of the best possible kinds of remembrance, being both useful and ornamental. And they are further urged to recollect that THE TRUTH SEEKER has a large stock of the best of books interiorally, and exteriorally constructed with an eye single to beauty. Among them we may mention:

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times, by D. M. Bennett, giving a full account of all the heathen and Christian gods, with a description of the religions attached thereto. Two large volumes, in cloth, $3; in leather, with red edges, $7; in morocco, gilt-edged and very handsome, $8.

A complete volume of Colonel Ingersoll's principal works, bound in half calf, for $5. The Prose Poems of the same author are a peculiarly appropriate gift to a Freethinker, and these are only $2 50.

Paine's Great Works are also bound in handsome style, cloth, $3; leather, $4; and morocco with gilt edges for $4 50.

One of the best of presentation works is Mr. Bennett's Trip Around the World. It is useful as a history, entertaining as a novel, and as destructiv to superstition as Paine's writings. The four voluminous volumes are bound in morocco, with gilt edges, and sent free for $10 50.

Another good pagan-holiday work is the World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers, or biographies of the world's benefactors. In cloth, $3; in leather, $4; in morocco and gilt, $4 50.

As a work of fiction, we can unreservedly commend Frederika Macdonald's Nathaniel Vaughan. It is a splendidly written and vigorous presentment of the mischievous nature of modern Christianity. In cloth, with side stamp in gilt, $1.25.

All of our readers know and admire Mr. F. M. Holland (except, perhaps, when he is writing about the glories of free trade), and will be glad to know that his Reign of the Stoics is again in print. This book is a thoroughly accurate, well-classified, and valuable compend of the Stoic teachings in philosophy, ethics, and religion, together with a fine summary of their history as a system. No better book on the subject can be found. It is elegantly printed and bound in cloth for $1 25.

For the children we hav in pretty and substantial bindings Miss Wixon's Story Hour, which is an exceptionally handsome and interesting book, without superstition, for $1; and Apples of Gold, beautifully bound, for $1 25. Miss Wixon's All in a Lifetime, also, is an appropriate work for this season of the year. Price, $1 50.

Liberals will appreciate these books and thank the giver, and by reading them their Christian friends will become enlightened. Therefore, when selecting Christmas and New Year presents, remember to do good as well as confer pleasure, and send for one of these volumes.

Letters from Friends.

BRISTOL, VT., Dec. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st, "Constant Reader" asks for aid in solving the hen-and egg problem. I will submit the following as being the correct answer, or near enough for all practical purposes. The number of eggs will be 27.9996. S. F. HASELTINE.

SANFORD, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to "Constant Reader" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st: If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, three hens will lay three eggs in three days, so six hens will lay twice three or six eggs in three days, which is two eggs each day for the six hens, or fourteen eggs for the seven days. VOLUNTEER.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will try and help out "Constant Reader" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st, on the New York Tribune puzzle:

If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days?

One hen would lay one egg in one day, and six hens would lay six eggs in one day, and in seven days six hens would lay seven times six eggs, equal to forty-two eggs. Is not that correct, Mr. Tribune and Mr. TRUTH SEEKER?

ELLA E. GIBSON.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Nov. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You seldom hear from me, so now for a few words. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a very welcome visitor in our house. The pictures are excellent, as well as the reading matter, and I cannot well do without it. The Christian dislikes it; it comes in contact with his superstitious ideas and leads to Infidelity, and that scares many. Those holding old and popular ideas choose to keep and remain in their ignorance, and they do not seem to like real facts that conflict with their pious ideas, having to invent or misconstrue more or less to reconcile such things.

Now, I want my friends to know where I am, after leaving Utah, so by inserting this letter you will oblige,

LUKE WM. GALLUP.

CIRCLEVILLE, W. VA., Nov. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Through my efforts and the distribution of copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this part of the country, Freethought is becoming quite popular here. I believe that liberty and responsibility should be the basis for all human conduct. Hereafter I will exert greater efforts for the advancement of our cause.

From a humanitarian standpoint, we are under obligations to nature for two of our best conditions in life—usefulness and happiness; therefore, let us honor ourselvs by living in accordance with them by doing good in the world and making people happy. The way to be useful in the world is to do something useful for the world. The way to be happy is to make others so. Nature is the author of my being and the only god that I worship. I read authors, but study nature. I am, as ever, An untiring truth seeker,

MR. EDITOR: I did not imagin that the country contained or allowed such valuable Liberal papers to be published as THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator, both of which journals came to my notice by accident. I think that if you sent back numbers of your paper to trusted Liberals, it would advance the cause by having them circulated among some of our friends of superstition or Christianity. The picture of the "Puzzled Pilgrim" in your issue of November 17th is a good object-lesson for the thoughtful, and speaks as loud as a sermon to those of reflectiv minds. I trust that you will meet with success in your work of freedom, and I think the torch that is held in the hand of Liberty statue in New York harbor ought to be replaced by a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as Liberal literature is the only light that will expose error to the world.

I inclose stamps for a copy of your issue of October 13th, containing Ingersoll's Reply to Manning. Please send catalog of books. CAPT. JOHN TWAMLEY.

CHICAGO, Nov. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: What cowards some of us mortals be! Why are we not courageous in doing such ennobling work, i. e., truth seeking? Why are so many hesitating in stating what they consider truth? It cannot be that they fear to express their thoughts, for ours is a free country, and with great battlefields, viz., superstition, ignorance, and commercial greed. I find in my surroundings men avowing Freethought and yet submitting to the encroachment of pope and priest for fear of losing patronage, social standing, and political influence. Is it a wonder, then, that men of less lights, intellects, keep quietly at home and wait till brave souls assume the offensiv and thereby encourage the timid? I am fully aware of the noble work that is done by the few who, like all those really connected with propagating truth and humanity, giv their time and cash, in addition to the hardship they undergo. What great good could be accomplished were all Liberals to make a united front, not fearing the contemptible ostracism of society so assiduously applied by the hypocrits, the worshipers of power and mammon!

I see by my subscription that another year has passed, and am happy to state that this time I can add three new subscribers to the list of truth seekers. Inclosed you will find check for four subscriptions—which surely does not show much, yet I shall try again, and grow out of my littleness with a brighter mind and braver heart.

Yours, etc., JOHN S. PAULSEN.

OREGON, MO., Nov. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: "When the legitimate conclusion of a proposition is absurd there must be something wrong in the proposition." This is admitted to be true by every clear thinker. In fact, it is axiomatic.

The proposition is that individuals hav absolute property in the land, subject to government taxation. Now, the legitimate conclusion is that the owner may use his property as he pleases so long as he does not jeopardize the property of his neighbors. A few persons may buy up whole islands or countries and eject the inhabitants. They hav the same control over a million acres that they hav over one acre. A few persons may buy up the whole of Ireland and eject all the inhabitants. This is the legitimate conclusion of the proposition, and it is absurd. For it follows that those who are not landholders hav no right to any p'ace whereon they may exist. Even the seas, lakes, and rivers are claimed in the same way as the land.

Any doctrin that runs into such an absurdity must be unsound. HOLT.

WORCESTER, MASS., Nov. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received a copy of Rev. J. D. Fulton's "Break the Fetters," a protest against the Romish church. I also hav before me your issue of July 21st. Fulton desires to substitute the Fulton fetter for the Romish fetter. This is clear on every page. You would break the fetter, because fetters and freedom cannot exist in the same country.

Romanism is a blast, a mildew, wherever its baleful breath is suffered to exist. But politicians court its influence, because it is the most venal class of our citizens. It is the cheapest vote in the market on election day.

Popery exists by its secret organizations, and can only be successfully maintained by a secret organization. I do not advise the revival of Knownothingism, because many of our foreign-born citizens hate popery more bitterly than nativ Americans, for the reason that they hav seen and suffered more from it.

As you are in constant communication with the anti-Catholic element of the country, why can't you organize for secret systematic work against this Roman rottenness? Organizers could be put into the field and organizations effected which would spread the cause of freedom on the wings of the wind, and in like manner purify our priest-polluted atmosphere. F. L. KING.

STEUBENVILLE, Nov. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see the papers, as usual after an election, are beginning to agitate the question of a six years' term for the president. Seeing the great expense, the injury to business, and the demoralization of the people caused by every campaign, no wonder they try to think of some plan to mitigate the evil. But would not the remedy of long terms be worse than the disease? The shorter the term the better when we get a president like the president we hav now. Into what a mess he would hav had the country if he had two years' more power it is hard to tell. My remedy for the evil would be to do without a president other than the president of the Senate, who could perform all the duties of the president with the help of a cabinet selected by the two houses of Congress, who could be chosen from the members of each house and would hav the advantage of being members, and be there ready at all times to answer questions from members, like the members of the English cabinet. Another great advantage would be that the president would always be in accord with the Senate, being chosen by the majority of that body, which would make it impossible to hav such bickerings as we had with Andrew Johnson and the Senate, also with Tyler. The Senate might choose the secretary of the treasury, the secretary of state, and one or more other of the cabinet, and the House the rest. I believe such a plan would be far better than lengthening the presidential term, and would do away with our expensiv and demoralizing presidential elections. Of course it would hav to be done by amending the Constitution, and if it was thoroughly discussed for a year or two by the papers, I think the majority of the people would see its advantages.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., Nov. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: W. T. S. H. in his letter of October 10th makes many misstatements of figures, as, with your permission, I propose to show in the following table. In the left-hand column I will place his prices for the necessaries of life in England, and in the other will giv prices as they are. I know whereof I speak, having been in the provision business in that country for many years:

Retail Prices.			Retail Prices.
Bread,	lb.	....$ 3	Bread,	lb.	..$ .21-4 to 21-2
Beef steak,	"	.... 2 1 to 24	Beef steak,	"	.. 16 to 20
" roasts,	"	.... 17 to 2	" roasts,	"	.. 12 to 14
" common,	"	.... 14 1 2	" common,	"	.. 10 to 11
Chickens, each,		.... 36 to 60	Chickens, each,		.. 36 to 60
Eggs, per doz.,		.... 14 1 2 to 20	Eggs, per dozen,		.. 6 to 14
Cheese,	lb.	.... 24 to 28	Cheese,	lb.	.. 9 to 16
Tea,	"	.... .96 to 1 25	Tea,	"	.. 25 to 72
Sugar,	"	.... 7 to 10	Sugar,	"	.. 4 to 5

W. T. S. H. says that the people work for twenty cents a day. Anyone might as well say that the people in America work for twenty-five cents a day because in some of our industries women do not earn any more than that. He also says that their bread is made out of "yellow meal and butter." Did ever anybody hear of bread made that way? If so, will some one rise and explain the process? No, sir; they make bread out of flour, and giv "yellow meal" to hogs. I do not wish to enter into a controversy about free trade, but I will say this, that the grandest statesmen England has produced during her last forty years hav all been in favor of free trade, and they hav got the people to support them too. The conditions that prevail in the two countries, the United States and England, differ, the former having greater opportunities for men to apply themselvs to the resources of nature, while in England natural opportunities are more monopolized, and it is just this that regulates wages.

He also says that the laborers in this country are better off than anywhere else in the world. How about Australia? Are not wages as good there as they are here?

He also has a dig at the Anarchists. I would like to ask him if Anarchy is a "cause" or "an effect." From the tone of his remarks he looks at Anarchy quite superficially. What do people strike for? He says it is owing to "freedom of the press and speech." I think a remark like that from a "Liberal" is quite out of place. It sounds more like a snort from the papal see. He denounces agitators, and says, "Hang them." And for what? For teaching people what are their rights and urging them to get them if they can. And for this he advocates hanging. Bah! such Liberalism makes me tired. MARCUS GEORGE.

COALTON, KY., Nov. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Now that the election is over, and everyone has time to coolly think of the bitter prejudices exhibited, and the corruption of the money power, I think it a good time to put my favorit theory for the prevention of vote buying and selling before the intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all other fair-minded persons.

As soon as our legislature convenes I am going to try to send them a petition asking them to enact a law compelling each county to build in each precinct a house suitable for the population of each precinct, and, in addition to the house, a hallway fifteen feet long from either side of the main building, and eight feet high and four feet wide, the walls of the hall to be so tightly closed that no one can see through them, and having a door at each end, one for entrance, the other for exit. The intention of such a hallway is that no one should be allowed to enter at the time a voter would be voting under a penalty of $500 unless it should be for the purpose of challenging the right of the person offering his vote. I think we should also ask the enactment of a section prohibiting any person from entering the room where the officers of the election are under a penalty of $500. The judges and clerks should be under a penalty for telling who any voter voted for. The sheriff of the election should stand at the door of entrance to see that no one entered while the voter was voting. He should be on the outside to see that no one eavesdropped. There should also be a penalty of $500 for eavesdropping. The windows of the main building should be so high from the ground that no one could see in from the outside.

I think such a plan as this would giv us a free and peaceable solution of the corruption of elections. I would like to hear the comments of others on the idea.

Yours for U. M. L., SAMUEL P. HERRON.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Nov. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Since you announce in your last issue that you cannot hope to agree with E. C. Walker about the repeal of all laws against "obscene literature," and therefore take leave of the subject, it is with diffidence I seek to introduce it to you again. I presume, however, that you agree with me and Walker in desiring the repeal of the Comstock law. The arguments against the Comstock law are, to be sure, almost innumerable. But I think that you are ignoring or resisting the conclusiv one, to which, properly presented, there can be no reply. My argument is as follows: The talk about obscene literature is all moonshine. There is no such thing as obscene literature. I do not mean to deny that there are books which contain gross language and repulsiv scenes. There are plenty of such books. One of them is called the holy Bible. What I do utterly deny is that there is any reasonable, practical test by which the holy Bible, Rabelais, the Decameron, Gulliver's Travels, many parts of Shakspere's plays, many of Byron's poems, and pretty much all ancient books, can be put in one class, and those other books whose very names are proscribed on account of their indecency in another. Nothing is, or possibly can be, more indecent than a great part of the classical works just named. On what principle, then, are they to be tolerated and the other suppressed? The only distinction I hav ever heard proposed is that the classical works, notwithstanding their frequent profligacy, are in the main meritorious; while the others hav nothing but their nastiness to recommend them. See, now, of how gross an inconsistency this argument convicts those who use it! They obtain a statute to punish a man for selling a smutty book; but what they do punish him for, according to their own story, is selling a stupid book! This is not mere "sarkasm," though if it were, it would be withering; but, on the contrary, is an eminently practical consideration. For punishing the sale of stupid books is not the way to suppress, but to immortalize them. Since the revival of literature in Europe thousands of immoral books hav been written. All are dead except those which possessed real merits and some two or three others. What preserved these two or three from the fate of their equally silly and equally coarse compeers? I am persuaded it was nothing else than this, that some would be suppressor of vice thought it worth his while to prosecute. The natural punishment of publishing a stupid book is not to sell it. The right way to suppress books adapted to "bring a blush to the cheek of a young person," if that be all there is to them, is to let them alone. True, the species is immortal; but if we hav only new and ephemeral publications of this sort, the evil is reduced to a minimum, and it becomes injudicious to disturb what is well enough. "Experience" and "facts observed" show actually just this, that the only way a book with no recommendation but indecency can be pushed to a second edition is that somebody with more zeal than judgment should notice, denounce, and, above all, prosecute it, until general curiosity has been awakened to know what it really is. The Society for the Suppression, etc., does not suppress such books, but advertises them. C. L. JAMES.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In reading your paper I came across an article from C. B. Reynolds in the form of an attack upon Mr. Jamieson. Now, I would like to say a word in Mr. Jamieson's favor. I think the charges made by Mr. Reynolds are very severe and altogether unwarrantable. Mr. Jamieson has always been a fearless exponent of Freethought at all times and in all places. I say the same of Mr. Reynolds. Now, I can see nothing in the article from Mr. Jamieson previous to this attack to warrant it. In my opinion, had Mr. Jamieson refused to debate with Clark Braden on the grounds that Mr. Reynolds refuses to (when he was recognized by the Christian element of that section), I should hav attributed the refusal to cowardliness on his part, knowing as we do in what light Infidels are held by Christians. Any preacher could make the same excuse before his congregation, and sustain himself in it too, although every one of us would attribute it to cowardice. Now, as regards being mercenary, I fail to see how he can provide for himself and family unless he accepts recompense for his work. I think that Mr. Reynolds does the same. It seems to me that I hav often heard groaning in that camp when receipts were not quite up to the standard. I hav never to my knowledge heard Mr. Jamieson complaining about the weather or the receipts. I had the pleasure to meet Mr. Jamieson at the hotel that we both happened to stop at in Anoka, Minn., about three years ago. I had a pleasant little chat with him, but my business being pressing, I did not hav the chance to hear him lecture, but heard a great deal of him through that part of the country, and I think that with people that know him the article will hav little effect. R. S. CHADWICK.

HAMILTON, N. Y., Oct. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your columns that an effort is talked of to restore from theft Girard's College at Philadelphia. Now, I well remember the time Stephen Girard built and put in usefulness this institution of learning, and hav a vague idea of the use it was intended for. I also remember the conditions Mr. Girard imposed upon this college when it was opened, and those conditions were so plain and strong that it did not appear possible for the priests, clergy, or churches of any denomination ever to get control of this institution. But from THE TRUTH SEEKER it seems this school has been captured by the orthodox clergy notwithstanding Mr. Girard's conditions, and is now run in the interests of the orthodox faith.

How is this thing? Has this college fallen into the keeping and control of the Christian faith? If so, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would like to know more about it than they now do, and would be glad to know how this steal was made, and to what extent, and, if it is a possible thing, hav this valuable institution restored to the object for which it was created.

These ministers and churches are experienced hands in stealing colleges, schools, and public money, to build up their order, and they hav great success, and the time has come to look to this thing and put a stop to this kind of thieving, and I am glad to see this affair of Girard College is to be looked after. I would suggest Mr. Ingersoll be employed to examin the case of this college and report what he finds the facts to be, and if he finds it not stolen beyond recovery, that he be employed to restore it to its legitimate place.

I will be one of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that will giv $1 to start the thing, and I presume there are thousands of readers of the paper who will giv $1 apiece, and many will giv much more, if there is a reasonable chance of final success. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will present the facts of Girard College to its readers from time to time.

I hear that it is boasted by some of the leaders of churchdom that Cornell University is to be an object of attack when the right time comes. They want that institution badly, for they say it is the most Infidel school in America; and they will steal it if they can. CARLTON RICE.

BRUNEAU, IDA., Nov. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I here giv a picture of eternal punishment as presented by Elder Knapp in one of his revival sermons, as quoted by the Chicago Times, and if you wish, giv it an insertion in your paper, with the comments below on it.

The soul of the impenitent sinner is plunged by beneficent and omnipotent justice into the awful lake of hell. Weighted with its sins, it sinks down into the molten billows, and down and down for centuries, for thousands and tens of thousands of years. Each instant of this descent is an awful, an unendurable agony, a thousand times worse than the pressing of the quivering human flesh against blazing coals. Millions of years after the plunge the damned soul rises from the molten depths and emerges on the surface of the seething billows. Casting his despairing eyes across to where the father sits, he cries, "God, is it not enough?" to which the righteous father, as his countenance flames with wrath, thunders in a tone which shakes the vaults of heaven and hell, "Down, down to all eternity!"

1. Elder Knapp must hav seen the account of a certain Miss Saint Francis and the angel Gabriel visiting his satanic majesty in his fiery abode, where he saw a beautiful young lady in a room of iron, sides, top, and bottom, all in the hottest flames, she begging to be released, and old Satan telling her, No, no, no! she must remain there to endless eternity. This delectable little story is Catholic in origin, yet found in a Protestant Sunday-school book for the edification of infants. Elder Knapp's ebullition seems to be a paraphrase on it, for grown-up infants.

2. He is either a fanatical fool or a hypocritical scoundrel, and should be sent to a lunatic asylum or to the penitentiary, or treated to a coat of tar and feathers and drummed out of the community where he used such language.

3. He knows no more about that of which he is gabbling than a Mexican donkey would.

4. It is a poor compliment to any community to say that he was allowed to use such language to a public audience.

5. His representation of God sitting on the verge of hell gloating over the miseries of his own creatures shows a more devilish disposition than could be imagined by any but a mountebank whose trade is to howl and yell about hell torments to scare weak-minded men and silly women, so that he can get his bread and butter without laboring for it.

J. H. WHITSON.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Nov. 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I voted the Union Labor ticket. I told Mr. J. Weaver, of the above address, before the election, that if I were back in Illinois I would vote for Fifer for governor, because I believed the Christians there would try and defeat him on the ground that he was an Infidel, which turned out worse than I expected. What are our Republican Liberals going to do about it? I am not sure but the Republican victory was a religious victory after all. I was surprised that there was any other Liberal viewing it in the same light, but such is the fact. A Mr. Boggs told Mrs. Abbott that was the way he looked at it. It is generally known that the national Republican committee snub Ingersoll, and Warner Miller wrote him that he wanted no Infidel to stump the state for him, so the Republican party says virtually that no Infidel need apply. Liberal Republican brethren, are you going to tell them, "We will show you we hav some rights that you are bound to respect?" I am inclined to think it was all cut and dried before Harrison was even nominated. In January Dr. Withrow, Presbyterian, of Chicago, said "he deplored the tendency of the press to make man greater and God smaller. If the people thought the laws man-made, they would hav no respect for them, but if made to understand that God stood behind them, that they were God's laws, they would show more fear;" and "therefore he exhorted the people" to "glorify and honor God by recognizing him more in our form of government and in the criminal laws of the land." This denomination is the God-in-the-Constitution agents, and who knows but it is a Presbyterian victory? Harrison is a strong one, and you need not be a bit surprised, with Harrison, Blair, Edmunds, et al, with "No Infidel need apply," that there will be some national laws passed in this direction. "Is there any hope from any other of the parties?" Yes, I think there is. Republican legislatures pass the Comstock law; the Democrats voted solid against it. The Republican legislature of Ohio passed a law making mediums pay a license of $300 to hold séances in the state; a Democratic legislature repealed it. The Democrats—with the help of the Liberal Republicans, be it said to their honor—elected one of the vice-presidents of the national Liberal League governor as a rebuke to the above Republican law, and it also will be noticed that his being an Infidel did not keep him from polling his full party vote. I wonder if there are not some of the old Liberal warhorses of Abolitionism still within the Republican ranks that will resent the insult. Gentlemen, I for one am willing to follow where you lead the way, and very kindly offer the use of our party for the purpose. Although it has no record upon the subject, I can say this much for it, that about all that did not desert it when it came to voting were Liberal. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

WILKESBARRE, PA., NOV. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav lately received a pamphlet and circular, with application for membership, to be signed and forwarded to what is called "the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists," of Hannibal, Mo., to much of which I cannot object. Much of the constitution is quite Liberal, and made from a sound moral standpoint, but the society is misnamed. There is no use of trying to start an order or society purporting to be founded on reason, judgment, and experience, and professing that reason shall be untrammeled, when in article ii, section 4, "Object of the Organization," that object is stated "to be to eradicate from the mind all belief in spirits," etc. Then, again, in the "Definitions," etc.: "An Agnostic is one who holds that man's experience and observation are the basis of human knowledge, which is consequently limited to the things of this world and this life."

It is quite evident that this mushroom society has for its object mainly to sit down on modern Spiritualism and all investigations of a future life, and is calculated to divide and classify Liberals generally, or in other words, kick out all Spiritualists, by binding its members to not investigate that subject. Of course, no one who has acquired any knowledge and experience on that subject by the use of his reason and judgment could subscribe to its constitution and by-laws. In other words, no one who has any belief in a future life can belong to it, because its object is to root out all such belief. It should therefore be called "the Brotherhood of the Moral, All ends in Mud, Society," or, "the Blank Material," or the "Death ends All, Society," or any such name as would express the idea that a man's reason, experience, and judgment shall be free, provided he confines them to matters of this life, and discards all investigation about another. It is supposed that no person needs to know anything about another life, and if he should accidentally encounter phenomena which would lead him that way, he is in duty "bound" by this bond, which is to tie him to what might be called a mushroom upstart, to shut his eyes to the observations of his senses, and completely ignore the possibility of any such thing.

This concern states that "man's experience and observation are limited to the things of this life only," and "consequently he cannot hav any experience or observations of any other world but this." I deny this as emphatically as I would the assertion that man can acquire no knowledge outside of the limits of his ordinary senses. In fact, if man were limited to his five senses only, and could not know anything but what he could see, hear, feel, smell, and taste, if it were not for his thoughts and memories, he would be no better than the brutes around him.

There is evidently a higher sense than any of the material senses, and which is probably the resultant of their combined operations upon this physical body. When they assert that "consequently man's mind is limited to the things of this life," I think and know, from my experience and observations, that there consequently follows no such thing. The fact that we hav phenomena around us, and that man can reason upon them, and draw conclusions from facts about them, is evidence that these brothers must be mistaken, and blindly prejudiced against a subject they do not understand, and will not investigate. I wonder how they can ask me to sign their "bond," and discard my reason and common sense in the face of such facts as I shall relate. And bear it in mind, that it is by experience and observation of facts that I hav acquired this knowledge of a future world.

Last summer I attended the Spiritual meetings at Onset Bay. Before I left my home I picked up two slates from the shelves of my store, and, after cleaning them, folded them up and placed them in my valise. One day I saw a picture which was made through the mediumship of Mr. Rogers. It was that of an Indian chief, produced as follows: A cardboard was cut by a committee, and placed between two slates. The slates had just been cleaned by sponging off. After the cardboard was shown to the audience of several hundred or more persons, by the committee, it was placed between the slates and secured by being fastened with large gum bands, or screwed together, or both, if my memory serves me. On the bottom of these slates they then placed a box of oil paints, and secured it tightly against the bottom of the under slates. The medium, Mr. Rogers, and his wife, and some of the committee, took hold of the wooden frames of the slates, and held them less than ten minutes, when the slates were opened. Upon the cardboard was found a picture painted of an Indian chief, in oil colors, which it took a day or more to get thoroughly dry. The picture could not hav been painted by any artist in less than a day, as ordinarily done by artists, or perhaps it might hav required a longer time, as it was a very good painting.

This picture must hav been produced by an intelligent force while operating through the material of the slate, and the various colors of paints must hav been by some means conveyed through them also. The intelligence was not from any of the committee, nor from the mediums, as neither knew or had any idea what had been made until the slates were separated. The fact of painting the picture was not all, for the name of the picture was given as "Black Hawk," the Indian chief, and it was recognized to be his from its likeness to Black Hawk's picture as it is framed in various parts of the country, especially as it is painted and on exhibition at the Smithsonian gallery at Washington. So that every feature of this operation was characteristic of a human intelligence, while it was not produced by any human power in the premises. It claimed to be the work of the spirits, and in the absence of any fraud in the case, I contend it is a reasonable belief to say it was.

A short time afterward, I obtained a sitting with Mr. Rogers and his lady, and took my slates to hav something put upon them by the spirits. The slates never left my sight while I was having the sitting. The lady placed a bit of slate-pencil upon one of them and I clasped them snugly together by a rubber band. We then held them between our thumbs and fingers for a short time, when Mr. Rogers was made to write on another slate, "Put on more pencil," whereupon I opened the slates and saw that nothing had been done, not even a mark or attempt of any kind. Mrs. Rogers then put on a much larger piece of pencil, and I placed the bandage around them. We held them only an instant when the vibrations were felt from the efforts made in writing, and we also distinctly heard the scratching. On opening the slates I found this:

DEAR FATHER: I am glad to come to you in this way, as it brings me nearer to you. We are all here, and send much love to mother and all who know us. From your loving son,

TALBOT H. PERRY.

This young man died nearly a year ago. He was buried on last Christmas day. It is very characteristic of my son, just his style, and gave his full name as he used to write it. I had never known Mr. Rogers until that day, and only saw them, he and his wife, once before, but did not recognize him as the medium, and he did not know me, nor that I had such a son who was dead. There could hav been no trick about it, as Rogers could not hav had any clue to myself or the antecedents and relations of my dead son. I hav every reason to believe that the spirit of my son either wrote that message or dictated it, as it could hav come only from his mind. That, at least, is the most reasonable and probable solution. The idea that some material-headed thinkers hav, when they intimate that intelligence is floating about in chunks, or is floating like a cloud on a rainy day, and may be drawn down occasionally, is too absurd for belief, but one of the regular hardheads will adopt any theory, no matter how ridiculous, if it will answer his purpose of denying it to be a spirit. To say that a spirit can do thus and so would be too comprehensible. They are straining after something more scientific, or if not that, then it must be fraud—anything will do but spirit. And the result is that by their egotistic habits and self-conceit, the spirits who might enlighten them on the subject usually let such characters severely alone. And they answer a very good purpose; it is to act as a negativ battery of agitators, while the truths of Spiritualism are impressing themselvs upon all who are free enough and sensible enough to weigh evidence honestly and accept it. Then they answer another purpose—I mean those self-important investigators—they afford good subjects for the spirits to laugh at, as they put on style and play fantastic tricks before high heaven.

I am sorry for that one bad plank in the platform of the Agnostic Brotherhood. It looks like the sign of a crab, and will be liable to leave them lagging behind in the march of human wisdom and progress. J. R. PERRY.

P.S.—I should be pleased to hav Elmina D. Slenker account for those facts in any other half-reasonable way.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Curing by Simples.

BY A LEARNED APOTHECARY.

If you e'er should catch a cold,
These simple remedies, as I've been told,
Will make it quit its deathly hold:

Take water of a scalding heat
And place in it your dainty feet,
Until they peel;
Then eat and eat—
For food's a great reliever.
"Feed a cold and starve a fever;"
And if you feel inclined to cough and sneeze,
Take of teas,
Ginger, slippery elm, sage,
Wormwood—that will make you rage;
No matter, take it or rass over—
Hoarhound, red pepper, clover,
Sassafras, mullein, catnip,
Or any others I havn't named over.

Onions are good to cleanse the blood
From poisonous phlegm,
So eat a dozen of them;
Then take a good sweat,
And then take care
Not to breathe the fresh air,
And avoid a terrible back-set.

If at your lungs it stops,
Put on a poultice of hops;
If it goes to your throat,
Chew freely licorice root;
If to your head,
Take snuff instead.
These are the simples, people say,
Sure to drive the cold away.

The Absence of Little Wesley.

Sence little Wesley went, the place seems all so strange and still—
W'y, I miss his yell o' "Gran'pap!" as I'd miss the whipperwill!
And to think I ust ter scold him fer his everlastin' noise,
When I on'y rickollect him as the best o' little boys!
I wisht a hundred times a day 'at he'd come tromp-in' in,
And all the noise he ever made was twic't as loud ag'in!
It u'd seem like some soft music played on some fine instrument.
'Longside o' this loud lonesomeness, sence little Wesley went!
Of course the clock don't tick no louder than it use to do—
Yit now they's times it 'pears like it 'ud bu'st itself in two!
And let a rooster, suddent like, crow som'ers clos't around—
And seem's ef, mighty nigh it, it 'ud lift me off the ground!
And same with all the cattle when they bawl around the bars,
In the red o' airly mornin', er the dusk and dew and stars,
When the neighbors' boys 'at passes never stop, but jest go on,
A-whistlin' kind o' to theirse'vs—sence little Wesley's gone.
And then, o' nights when mother's sittin' up on-common late,
A-bilin' pears er somepen, and I set and smoke and wait,
Tel the moon out through the winder looks no bigger'n a dime,
And things keep gittin' stiller—stiller—stiller all the time—
I've ketched myse'f a-wishin' like—as I clumb on the cheer
To wind the clock, as I hav done fer mor'n fifty year'—
A-wishin' 'at the time hed come fer us to go to bed,
With our last prayers, and our last tears, sence little Wesley's dead!

Self-Culture.

Self-culture is self-refinement. If we practice self-culture we can accomplish a great many things. This ought not to be slighted, as it admits of great cultivation, and should be cherished by all. We should cultivate ourselvs to be refined. Each small boy and girl, and even much larger ones, should make this a special aim. There is not one of us too old to learn, as the best books hav the most beauty; the greatest truths are wronged if not linked with beauty, and they win their way most surely and deeply into the soul when arrayed in their natural attire. No person can receive the true culture of another in whom the sensibility to the beautiful is not cherished. It should not be excluded from any condition of life. Of all luxuries this is the cheapest and most at hand. It is most important in those conditions where coarse labor tends to giv a grossness to the mind. A young man had qualified himself to pass nautical examination as master by employing his spare hours in study, which ought to suggest to young men generally, and especially the young men of the working class, the possibility of acquiring a great amount of useful knowledge by judicious employment of their leisure hours, and that without depriving themselvs of any healthful recreation. It is a well-known fact that many of the great men who hav distinguished themselvs during the past century, particularly in connection with important discoveries and inventions, hav been workingmen who hav risen by their own efforts, who hav added to their stock of useful knowledge, improved and trained their minds, by employing their leisure hours in reading and studying, often under unfavorable and discouraging circumstances.

It is astonishing how much practical knowledge a person can acquire by judicial and systematic disposal of his leisure hours, and that without encroaching upon time to be devoted to healthful recreation. One hour an evening spent in reading or study on some given practical work will suffice to lay up in the storehouse of memory, in the course of a year, a great variety of important and useful facts that will be found useful in after life. In order to prove this, young men hav simply to make themselvs acquainted with the early history of such men as Stevenson, Hackworth, and others. The lesson their lives hav taught is, first, diligent culture of their leisure hours, minutes, and seconds, devoted to a favorit subject or study; second, having a definit and practical aim; third, adoption of a systematic course of reading or study; fourth, desire and determination to succeed. Such persons, being sustained in health of body and mind, could not fail to succeed.

What was impossible or difficult in their case then is more than possible in the case of young men of the present day, if they go to work with the same thoughtful, careful determination, and avail themselvs of the superior advantages presented by the literary and educational institutions and sources of knowledge which are found almost everywhere to a greater or less extent. The fact is, there is no excuse for workingmen of any class being always hewers of wood and drawers of water, being simply machines in the hands of employers. Making use of the intelligence they hav, availing themselvs of the facilities at their disposal for acquiring knowledge, and putting it into practical use, they can improve their present position, for intelligent employers appreciate intelligent workmen, and they can fit themselvs for occupying positions of honor and usefulness in society. The lesson taught by the lives of men whose lives are connected with the discoveries and inventions of genius ought to stimulate young men of the present to emulate their examples, to follow in their footsteps so far as they did right, and to be animated by a laudable ambition to excel in the sphere of duty and labor which they are called upon to fill. MAMIE JONES.

A Nantucket Tradition.

While the writer was visiting at Nantucket last summer, she was made acquainted with many quaint legends associated with that island, old and gray. Among them was the following tradition, related by the Indians who lived on Nantucket at the time of its settlement by white people, as long ago as 1650. The story is told to little children today precisely as handed down by the Indians.

Many, many moons ago little babies and toddlers of two or three years of age used to be stolen from their homes on Cape Cod, disappearing in an instant, and never seen again. A monstrous bird, with wide, flapping wings and huge talons, would come swooping down on the south shore of Cape Cod, and, when it could not find a lamb or a chicken, it would snatch the first child in its way, and off it would go with the little innocent in its talons. They were Indian children mostly, but none the less dear to their parents and friends.

In this locality on the cape there lived a big chieftain, big enough to be called a giant, whose name was Manshope. He was very angry at the loss of the children in such a manner, and resolved to know what became of them. So at the next visit of the monster bird, which was perhaps an American eagle, old Manshope was on the alert, and, although the prey, which was a sucking pig this time, was in the powerful talons of the bird before he could reach it, he followed the flight of the creature. Wading into the sea, and swimming till he crossed the sound, he arrived upon the land now known as Nantucket. He walked until he came to a wide-spreading tree, beneath the branches of which lay the bleached bones of the dear little children that had been stolen from time to time by the great bird. Manshope was angry, and to soothe his enraged feelings, he thought he would smoke his pipe. But alas! he had no tobacco. He then roamed about until he found some poke-weed and, smoking the same, found it a good substitute for tobacco. He killed the huge bird, and destroyed its nest of young ones, so that no more children were stolen in that way afterward. Then he smoked more poke-weed, and ever since that time fogs hav been frequent at Nantucket, and on the cape. And ever afterward, when the Indians perceived a fog arising, they would say, "It is old Manshope's smoke!"

Another version of the story is that Manshope, after smoking his pipe one day, emptied its ashes, and this made the island of Nantucket.

There were once living upon the island two tribes of Indians, one at either end, and they were unfriendly to each other. When the white people came there to liv, they endeavored to convert the red men and women to a belief in the dogmas of religion, succeeding after a while in imposing upon their credulous and artless natures. One Indian in particular had been converted. His name was John Gill. In the unlettered code of morals among the Indians were many beautiful precepts. One was that no evil should be spoken of the dead. To disregard this was certain death. John Gill, after his conversion to Christianity, forgot this good trait, and said unkind words of one who was a near connection of King Philip of Mount Hope. This fact coming to the ears of Philip, he resolved upon the death of the traducer of his relativ. Coming to Nantucket, he landed at the west end and intended traveling along the shore under the bank until he should reach the home of John Gill and then to dispatch him. An Indian, discovering his approach, and knowing the secret of his journey, ran for life and apprized the unlucky Christian Indian of what was about to happen if he did not make good his escape. John immediately and swiftly proceeded to the village and asked John Macy to conceal him, which he did. The leading white men had an interview with Philip, but it was hard work to induce him to relinquish the killing of the unfaithful Indian, which he did only on receipt of a handsome sum of money and several presents.

Philip's idea, and the prevalent one among the Indians, was that the dead were unable to defend themselvs, and therefore it was wrong to speak reproachfully of them. It was a beautiful thought, scrupulously observed among the red men of the forest.

It was born, not of religion, but of the nativ honor and justice in man. Evil should not be spoken of the living either. If we cannot speak well of individuals, it is better to say nothing, unless it is absolutely necessary to warn others of danger. S. H. W.

Many thanks to the donors. Yours for truth and charity, MISS SATIE THORPE.

[How small a sum is a dime! One hundred of them will make $10, just the sum Satie wants, which, added to that already received, will buy a cow for the Caseys. When you read this, dear friends of the Corner, do not wait, but send along the dimes. We shall all feel an interest in the Casey cow, whose name should be "Liberal," because she will be purchased by Liberals, owned by Liberals, and, undoubtedly, will giv a liberal supply of rich, sweet milk.—ED. C. C.]

OSCEOLA, IA., Nov. 23, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I hav written to the Corner. I saw Lenora Stockinger's essay on "Forests." I thought it very nice. I hav an essay on "Self-Culture" that I thought I would send to hav put in the paper if there is room for it. Hoping to see this in print, I remain,

Your Liberal friend, MAMIE JONES.

BRIDGEVILLE, TENN., Nov. 30, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will now write to you, hoping to see my letter in print. We hav three boarders now. Our town is building up fast. We hav a nice depot up here. We hav four stores in our little village. I hav three pet rats as white as snow. There is no school here now. We hav readings here every Wednesday night.

Your true friend, CLARA LEINART.

In sending communications to the Children's Corner, be careful and hav them written plainly, and also let them be original. To take the thoughts of others and pass them for your own is wrong and wicked. It is taking that which does not belong to you, and anyone knowingly doing that would be called a literary thief.—ED. C. C.

General Spinner and the Birds.

The venerable but vigorous Gen. F. E. Spinner, formerly United States treasurer, writes from his camp at Pablo Beach, Fla., to his friends, the boys, to spare the birds. "I well recollect," he says, "that I once shot a robin. He flew some distance and fell in the tall grass. I went and picked him up and found that I had inflicted a fatal wound in his breast. The poor wounded bird looked up into my face so imploringly that it caused me to shed tears, and now, to-day, at the age of eighty-five years, I am haunted by the pitiful, imploring look of that poor, innocent, dying bird, and feelings of deep remorse come over me whenever I see a robin. I would be willing to make great sacrifices to be made guiltless of the wanton murder of that poor innocent bird." The general makes a special plea for that sweetest of all American songsters, the ill-named catbird. But as for the English sparrow, he says with righteous wrath, "Kill him wherever you find him, in season and out of season. He has never been known to do any good and is of no use. Giv him no quarter, but go for him as you would for any other thief."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Twins had arrived at the house, and Johnnie, aged five, was much interested in them. When he was taken to see them he looked long and earnestly, and, turning to the nurse, he remarked: "Say, nurse, which one of them are they going to drown?" He remembered what had been done when there were too many kittens.

"I am afraid, Bobby," said his mother, "that when your papa comes home all tired out with his day's work, and learns what a naughty boy you hav been, he will punish you." "Perhaps, ma," replied Bobby, with hope strong in his breast, "he will be too tired to feel like punishing me."

Father: "Hello! Where did you get all those toys?" Son: "I bought 'em with the money you gave me." "But I gave you that money to teach you how to save." "Yes, pa, I kept it for three weeks until I learned all about saving, and now I'm learning how to shop."

Lady: "And what does your father do?" Little girl: "Oh, papa is a doctor." Lady: "Indeed! I suppose he practices a great deal, does he not?" Little girl: "Oh, no. He doesn't practice any more now, he knows how."

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Poetry.

A Two-Bit Poem.

From San Francisco Freethought.

[A man who has evidently seen more prosperity than he is enjoying nowadays has twice called upon me at 514 Kearny street with products of his pen, which he desired to dispose of for a price. The first time he came he brought a story of personal experience entitled, "Embraced by a King." He wanted a dollar for it. I shook my head. He added a poem to it and said, "Now giv me a dollar for the two." "No." "Half a dollar?" "No." "Two bits to buy a meal of victuals with." I handed him that sum, and took the manuscript. The poem was of the Sunday-school variety, but "Embraced by a King" proved to be possessed of considerable merit. The next time he came I gave him back his poetry, and recommended him to try some other paper. I didn't care to purchase contributions—had a deep drawer full of good ones—but, somehow, before he went away, he had got another two-bit piece out of me for a "meal of victuals," and left the following verses. The reader must judge whether I got cheated or not.]

SAINT PETER AND THE POPE.

The golden gate's ajar, and there
No gold awaits the wicked prayer
Of those who spent time's sacred air
In gambling with the highest player
That they might win.

St. Peter handed up his key,
Lang syne to stern old Destiny—
With this injunction, that there be
Nor pope nor other scarlet she,
Allowed within.

But somehow Bobbie Burns and Jack,
One Barleycorn, with pint of sack,
Got old St. Peter on his back,
Then crowed as Peter's cock, alack!
Did at his sin.

The pope he heard it far in Rome,
Which made his angry heart to foam;
Then turned him to the awful tome,
That "Index" 'neath St. Peter's dome,
And looked within.

He saw (some spirit vision came)
A saint and sinner ganging hame
Tigither with a lovely dame—
The lassie seemed a wee bit lame—
As might hav been.

The pope with his long, crooked stick,
And flashier eye than lightning quick,
Asked the young gal what kind of trick
Had made her comrades so sin sick,
Then asked her in.

The Vatican, my dear, says he,
Is only the fit place for thee;
Let saint and sinner parted be,
Come enter and abide with me—
The church's bride.

The limping damsel went with him,
To light his household's holy dim,
With dusky face and smile as grim,
Looking the while so awful trim,
She did abide.

Some time had passed—one day says she,
You are not good enough for me,
And worse than Bobbie on the spree;
I do not like your mystery,
No such queer Christianity;
So to St Peter back I'll go,
And wash with kiss his holy toe;
But yours—oh, no!

Tardy Retribution.

A Christian sailor beat a Jew,
And while he pummeled him he cried,
"I'll pound your body black and blue,
For our dear Lord you crucified!"

But when the Jew recovered breath,
Said he: "My friend, do you not know,
That Jesus Christ was put to death
Some eighteen hundred years ago?"

The Christian dealt another blow,
And answered with a wrathful shriek,
"I care not how long 'twas ago,
I only heard of it last week!"

In this fine mirror is displayed
The Christian charity of ages,
For such a picture is displayed
Too oft on history's bloody pages.

Obituary.

May Schulenburg died at her home in Detroit, Mich., on November 15th. H. C. Bechtold, editor of the Michigan Arbeiter-zeitung, officiated at the funeral. He said:

Friends and neighbors: We hav come here to bid farewell to a departed sister, a sister in humanity. Alas! that it is a last farewell to one who has been dear to all who came within the circle of her acquaintance and the touches of her womanly heart, to a friend whose memory will ever liv in our remembrance.

Ladies and gentlemen: You hav brought along the beautiful children of Flora, and decked with choicest gifts the broken form of our sister, in order to hide the stern view of the grim visitor, who is wont to knock at the doors of all the children of man. Your presence brings consolation to a desolated home. You hav shed tears and suppressed tears—let them freely flow and relieve the heavy-laden heart. You could not suppress your sympathy.

Were not the pale lips of our friend closed in silence, she would thank you for your kindness. So let me do it in her place and in the name of the family. Born in a foreign land, our departed sister found a hearty welcome and a home in your midst, a home embellished by the treasures of culture and warmed up by affection. The true house-warming, like the inspiration of the soul, flows from the heart, whose fountain of light and life will never dry up. For whoever has, in the performance of his duties, lived for his loved ones, or to the satisfaction of the best of his time, has lived forever. This is true and undisputed immortality.

In a home and community where everyone strives to perform the duties of life from the motiv of love, all its members enjoy activity and rest. This sweet rest after hard work enables us to anticipate the long rest awaiting us in the grand cycle of uninterrupted going and coming. This thought calls to my memory a few old Saxon verses, illustrating the temporary calm in the storms of life:

The winds are hushed and the waters at rest;
They sleep like the passions in infancy's breast,
Till storms shall unchain them from out their dark cave,
And break the repose of the soul and the wave.

The repose of our silent friend will be broken no more. We are now about to transmit the broken form of our dear friend to her final resting-place, and in doing so you will join me in this invocation:

Sister Mary Schulenburg, you hav been for thirty-three years—too short a term for our wishes—a true companion to your afflicted husband, a true mother to your children and grandchildren, and a good neighbor and warm friend to all. We must part, but you will liv in our memory till our lives, too, will ebb away. Rest in peace! and in the grand process of evolution, farewell!

The Preacher Knows No More Than the Bartender.

From Life.

The Rev. Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage, the great pulpit athlete of Brooklyn, discoursed on Sunday concerning the devil. In the process of printing the moral that adorned his tale, he had occasion to picture the scene in heaven when the sons of God were assembled, as related in that section of the scriptures devoted to the misfortunes of a certain patriarch, who would not hold his present reputation if he had sat long under Dr. Talmage's preaching. The reverend gentleman, taking his text from the first chapter of Job, in which the intrusion of Satan among the angels is mentioned, described the Lord and the seraphim gathered in the business office of paradise, the former receiving the reports of the latter. One of these angels, according to the great athlete, had "seen a meteor run down a planet," and another "had been present and witnessed the birth of a new world;" and it was while they were relating these wonderful experiences to their startled friends, still according to Dr. Talmage, that "a filthy, unkempt, vagabond-looking fellow strode unceremoniously into the august assembly, without taking the trouble to wipe his feet," said fellow being Satan.

Why this vulgar and flippant twaddle should "go" with Dr. Talmage's congregations we are unaware; but it is not creditable either to their piety or intelligence that they should crowd his church for amusement of this nature. If a person out of holy orders ventured to picture God and his angels recording accidents to the solar system, and the devil intruding among them with a top hat pulled down over his eyes, a bad cigar in his mouth, and the end of his tail in his coat pocket, that person would be considered not only irreverent, but blasphemous; and yet such a scene is no more sacrilegious than Dr. Talmage's. And why should grown people go to hear the Brooklyn athlete's weak efforts to picture a material heaven, when every intelligent person among them knows that the man in the pulpit has no more an accurate conception of paradise than the man who is mixing drinks in the next block?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

BALAK TAKETH BALAAM TO A HIGH PLACE.

And it came to pass on the morrow, that Balak took Balaam, and brought him up into the high places of Baal, that thence he might see the utmost parts of the people.—Num. xxii, 41.

Odds and Ends.

"MAMMA, is that the usher?" "Yes, dear." "Does he show people where to sit, mamma?" "No, he shows people where not to sit."

HE: "And you really love me, darling?" She: "Why do you doubt me, dear?" He: "Well, I saw you setting the clock an hour forward when I came in."

MOLLY: "And I'm sure you liked Paree, dear, didn't you, now?" Polly (just back): "It was perfectly lovely, dear; in fact, as the French themselvs say, toot sweet."

"How do Squiggins and his wife get along now?" "Very happily indeed." "Are you sure of that? I hav been told that they don't liv together." "Yes, that was the idea I sought to convey."

SHE: "I must show you my new clock before you go." He (facetiously): "Some of my friends tell me I am homely enough to stop a clock." She: "Oh, that won't matter! It can be started again."

MRS. ALEXANDER TULLINER, of Frankfort, Ky., claims to hav been cured of paralysis by "faith, electricity, and good bourbon whisky." The proportions in which the ingredients were taken is not mentioned.

"SWACKHAMMER, why don't you giv up that abominable haoit of cigaret-smoking?" "Jrobinson, I ll do it if you will quit writing poetry for the newspapers." It w s a severe struggle, but Jrobinson yielded, and the guardian angels of two young men wept tears of joy.

THE Christian nations are more than usually busy just now dividing among themselvs the real estate of the benighted heathen. But they are amply justified in so doing. In preparing the heathen for heaven the Christian nativs naturally conclude that the heathen hav no further use for their earthly possessions.

A SIMPLE street arab had been captured and brought into Sunday-school. He was of frank and open spirit and had all the courage of his ignorance. "What do you know about God?" asked the teacher. "'Bout God? Nawthen." "But you know the savior died to save sinners, don't you?" "Naw. Never knowed he was sick."

BEDROCK (looking over the paper): "Here's something extraordinary, my dear. Husband and wife liv together twenty-four years without a cross word." Mrs. Bedrock: "There's nothing strange in that." Bedrock: "Paper says it's the only instance of the kind on record. But, then, it's easily accounted for." Mrs. Bedrock: "How?" Bedrock: "They are mutes."

THE other day a Brooklyn boy of six years, who had been "pestering" one of his little brothers, was sentenced by his mother to sit for an hour in a high chair in one corner of the sitting-room as a punishment. During the hour a friend of the family came in. The culprit had a Bible in his hands, and pretended to be reading very intently. The friend of the family, having been informed of the "punishment," went up to the lad and asked: "Are you reading about the little boy who troubles his brother?" "No," promptly replied Young America, "I'm reading about God, who knows enough to mind his own business."

MR. HANKINSON and Miss Kajones (enthusiastically joining the rest of the company in the request): "We shall be delighted to hear you sing, Miss Garlinghouse." Miss Garlinghouse (seating herself at the piano): "What shall I sing? Tum-ti-tum-tum. H'm. Thre-e-e fishe-e-rs went sa-a-iling out into-a-o the west. Out into the we-o-e-st, as the su-u-u-n went down," etc. Mr. Hankinson (fervently): "Now that I hav the opportunity to speak to you at last, Miss Kajones—Laura—you will listen to me, will you not, while I tell you of the deep and earnest love I hav so long felt for you," etc.

A SOMEWHAT eccentric parson in southern Virginia was intending to preach from the text, "And the spirit of the Holy Ghost descended like a dove." It occurred to him that it would illustrate the text forcibly to hav a dove let down with a string from the ventilator above the pulpit just as he uttered the words. So an old negro servant was brought to the church on Saturday and sent up into the garret to rehearse letting down the dove. It worked to perfection, and on Sabbath morning the old darkey was again sent to the garret before the opening hymn. The preacher reached the words, "And the spirit of the Holy Ghost descended like a dove," but the dove didn't descend. The text was repeated, and still no dove appeared. A third time the parson repeated the words, and then glanced up at the ventilator to see what was wrong. Slowly the ventilator opened, and in the space appeared a woolly head. "Say, massa!" said the darkey, "I'se 'fraid de Holy Gose can't show up to-day. Ole cat's bin up yar an' chawed his whole damned head off."

"WE acknowledge the defeat of our candidate, Bill Peters, for sheriff," says a Missouri paper, frankly and manfully. "And it simply remains for us to trace out and profit by the causes of his defeat. Up to 1 o'clock everything looked smooth and clear for Bill here at the county seat. Then Hi Pugh, Bill's opponent, came around the polls with a wagon-load of Ben Davis apples, and begun giving them away until the tide turned in his favor. Then Bill's friends flew around and bought a barrel of cider, and let her flow free to everybody, and Bill took the lead again. But it begun to look dark for Bill when Hi drove home and got a keg of peach brandy, and dished it out like it was common well water. Bill caught up again with a keg of apple jack and a jug of cherry bounce. But about an hour before the polls closed Hi scared up fourteen dandy bull-pups and a lot of punkin-pies and Bill couldn't offset that with anything the crowd cared for, so Hi got there. But 'truth crushed to earth shall rise again,' and we'll get Bill there next time. You hear us!"

Gems of Thought.

THERE can be no absurdities in religion, which is the work of the Word, or the Divine Reason, which, as we all know, has nothing in common with human reason. It is only through want of faith that incredulous persons fancy they can perceive absurdities in Christianity, whence it results that a want of faith is the hight of absurdity. The absurdities of the Christian belief disappear when its doctrins hav been inculcated from earliest childhood, and adhered to without doubt or question. —Voltaire.

THERE is in childhood a period measured by six, or at most by ten years, when any well-inculcated dogma, no matter how extravagantly absurd, is sure to retain its hold for life.—Schopenhauer.

FROM the very beginning the sect of the apostle-training Galilean has been a sect of assiduous educators. They were not satisfied with founding schools and opening their doors to all comers, but went forth in quest of new converts, and pursued their aim with a persistence of zeal and a versatility of skill that could not fail to accomplish its purpose. As soon as a sufficient increase of power enabled them to control the institutes of primary instruction they turned their chief attention to the dogmatical education of the young. Though the propagation of an unnatural creed is not favored by natural fertility, the naturally barren doctrin of renunciation was thus successfully propagated by a system of incessant grafting. By the skilful application of that process the most dissimilar plants were made subservient to its purpose. The "worship of sorrow" with its whining renunciation of worldly enjoyments, and its indifference to health and physical education, was grafted on the manful naturalism of the Hebrew lawgiver.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

SEEK to make honest inquirers rather than converts and disciples. Make truth and virtue so lovely that all will desire them, and thou wilt hav become a true educator.—Mrs. Stenker.

WITHOUT candor, discussion, in the highest sense, is impossible. All hav the same interest, whether they know it or not, in the establishment of facts. All hav the same to gain, the same to lose. He loads the dice against himself who scores a point against the right. Absolute honesty is to the intellectual perception what light is to the eyes. Prejudice and passion cloud the mind. In each disputant should be blended the advocate and judge.—Ingersoll THEOLOGY is but ignorance of natural causes reduced to a system.—D'Holbach.

To me it seems easy to account for these ideas concerning gods and devils. They are a perfectly natural production. Man has created them all, and under the same circumstances would create them again. Man, in his ignorance, supposed that all phenomena were produced by some intelligent powers, and with direct reference to him.—Ingersoll.

CONTEMPT for human sciences was one of the first features of Christianity. It had to avenge itself upon philosophy; it feared that spirit of investigation and doubt, that confidence of man in his own reason, the pest alike of all religious creeds. The light of the natural sciences was regarded with a suspicious eye, as being a dangerous enemy to the success of miracles, and there is no religion that does not oblige its sectaries to swallow some physical absurdities. The triumph of Christianity was thus the signal of the entire decline both of the sciences and of philosophy.—Condorcet.

THE warfare of religion against science is to be guarded against in Protestant countries not less than in Catholic; it breaks out in America not less than in Europe. I might exhibit many proofs of this. Do conscientious Roman bishops in France labor to keep all advanced scientific instruction under their own control—in their own universities and colleges? so do very many not less conscientious Protestant clergymen in our own country insist that advanced education in science and literature shall be kept under control of their own sectarian universities and colleges, wretchedly one-sided in their development, and miserably inadequate in their equipment: did a leading Spanish university, until a recent period, exclude professors holding the Newtonian theory; so does a leading American college exclude professors holding the Darwinian theory: hav Catholic colleges in Italy rejected excellent candidates for professorships on account of "unsafe" views regarding the immaculate conception; so are Protestant colleges in America every day rejecting excellent candidates on account of "unsafe" views regarding the apostolic succession, or the incarnation, or baptism, or the perseverence of the saints.—Professor White, President of Cornell University.

FOR the establishment of facts, the word of man is now considered far better than the word of God. In the world of science, Jehovah was superseded by Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler.—Ingersoll.

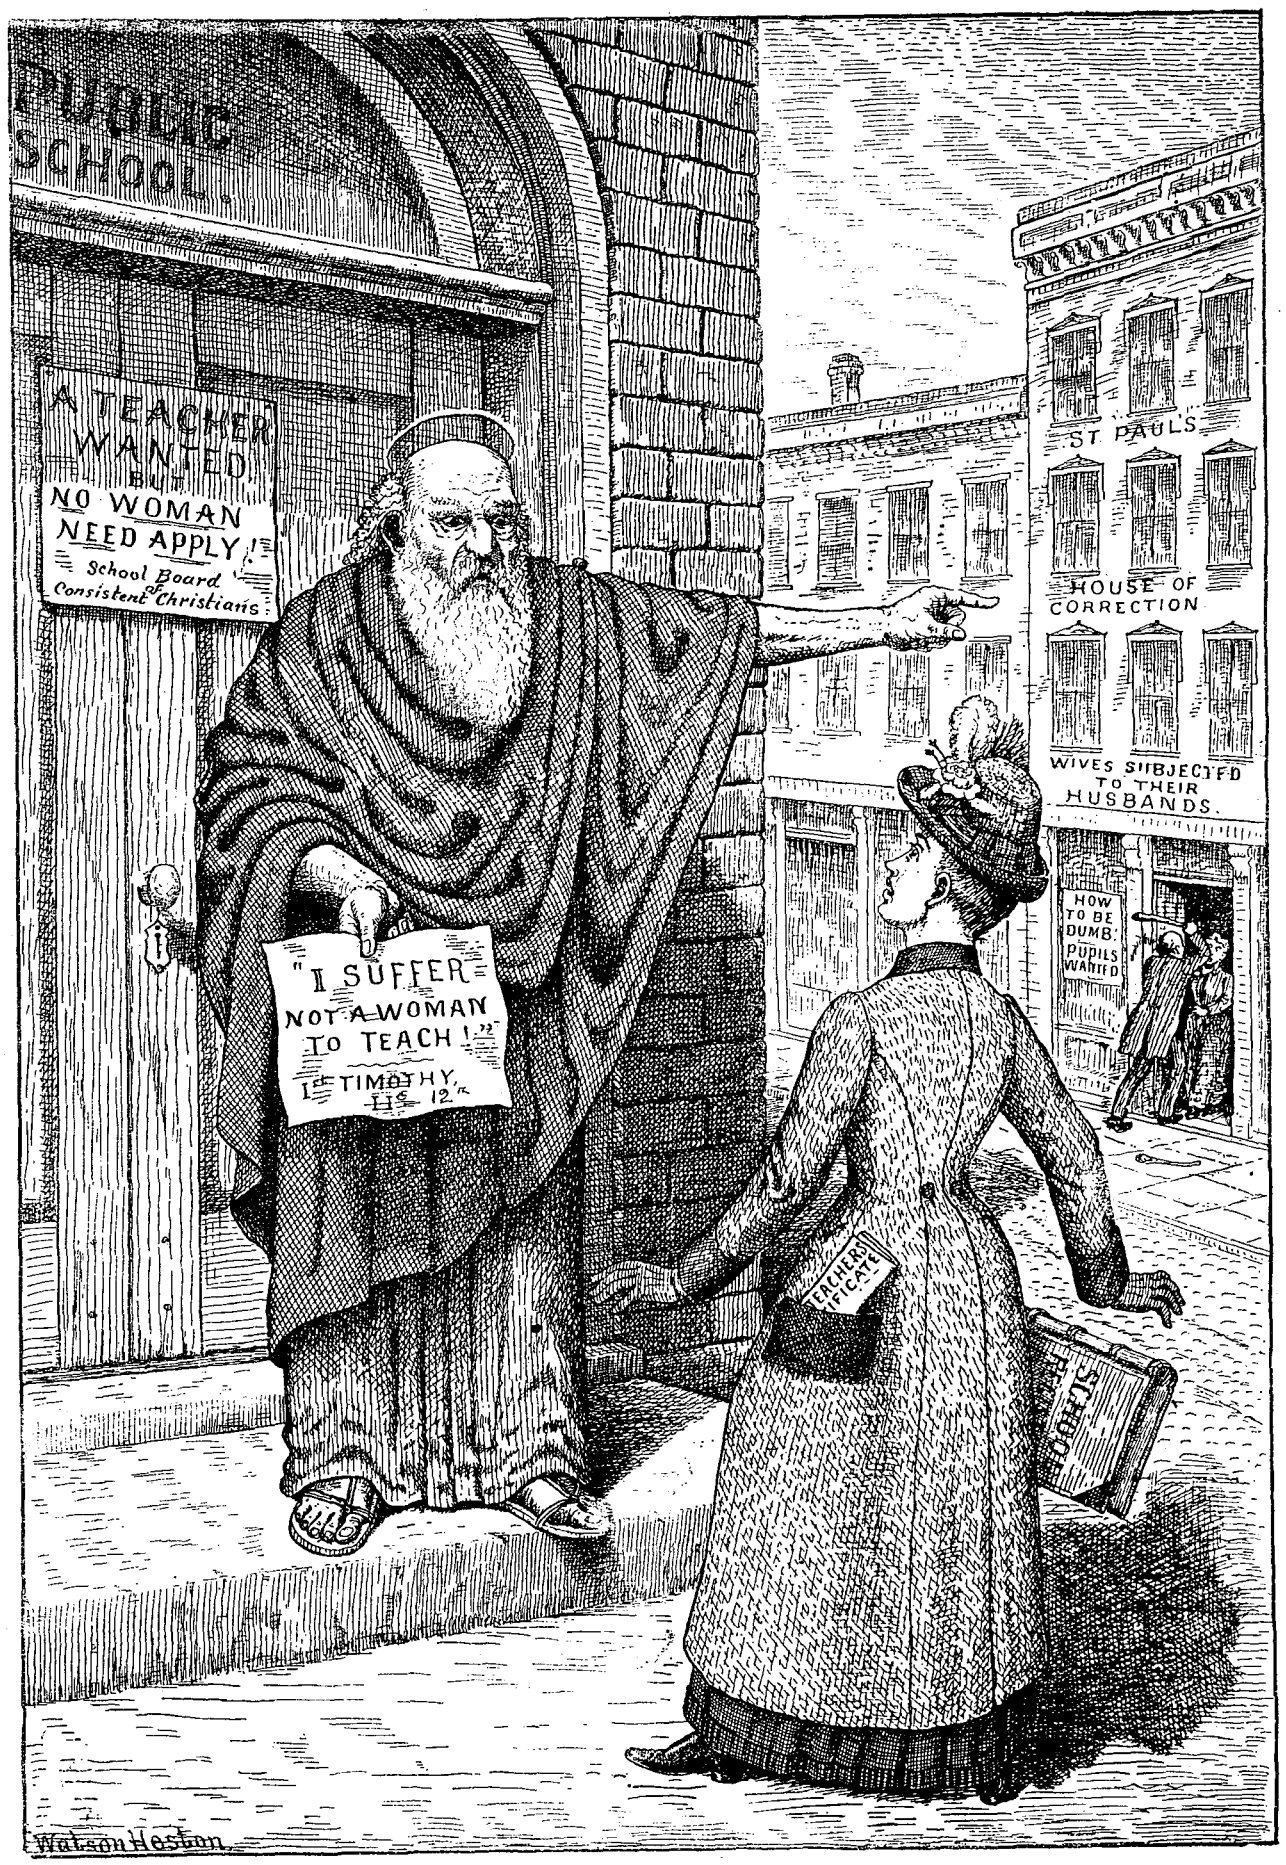
Notes and Clippings.

ENGLISH trade-unionism is rapidly growing Socialistic. On the continent to call a man a "workman" is equivalent to calling him a Socialist.

IT is thought that if Italy is involved in a war the removal of the pope will be a practical necessity.

NOTWITHSTANDING the prodigious open corruption of the late elections, and all the talk of stringent enforcement of laws against offenders, nothing is being done.



ITALY is advanced in the woman's rights movement. Both houses of her parliament hav just missed passing woman suffrage bills this year. Garibaldi, Mazzini, and nearly all Italy's greatest men hav favored such measures.

As the time for the publication of the Japanese constitution approaches, the political activity among the people increases. A manifestation of this spirit is to be seen in the recently effected organization of the "Society for Investigating the Principles of Self-Government."

AT the Baptist congress at Richmond, Va., Norman Fox, D.D., of New York, objected to the declaration that rights of conscience forbid religious exercises in schools. "If legislativ bodies and political conventions can properly be opened with prayer," said he, "religious exercises can properly be held in state schools. As a matter of scientific teaching lectures can be delivered on the history, doctrins, and influence of Christianity the same as on Neo-platonism or the feudal system, or any other doctrin or institution which has been a factor in history." But as in treating any other doctrin or institution representation is given to every side of scholarly judgment upon it, will the pious be satisfied to hav presented to the scholars, alongside of their own views, those of the great body of thinkers and scientists who regard Christianity as a humbug?

THE New York state law providing for executions by electricity has a provision that papers shall publish no details of executions. The editors are indignant, and will report the executions at risk of imprisonment. They appeal to the constitutional declaration: "No law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." They point out dangerous abuses which might occur if executions were surrounded by the privacy contemplated, and declare their readiness to do their duty to the people at the first opportunity.

WRITING on the question whether Roman Catholic countries are less progressiv than Protestant, the Freeman's Journal (R. C.) says: "The Hanseatic League of Free German cities, from Cologne to the borders of Russia, were vastly more flourishing in proportion before the so-called Reformation than they hav ever been since." And then it says: "The truth is, of course, that the Christian religion has but little to do with the productiv capacity of any land, or the commercial instincts of any race."

ST. PAUL AS A MEMBER OF THE SCHOOL BOARD.

IN a lecture on "Voltaire and His Age" at Columbia College, Professor Scribner first showed the influence of Voltaire on his own times; how by his genius and indefatigable energy he managed to abate the prevalent vices and prejudices in a great measure. He continued: "He secured tolerance for all sects in France. His philosophical works, together with those of his great contemporaries, Montesquieu, Raynal, Diderot, and Rousseau, had a great influence upon the welfare of America, by making the colonists alive to their needs, and kindling in them a thirst for freedom. When America had acquired her own independence, a counter current swayed the destinies of France itself. The companions of Lafayette, returning to France, strengthened in the French minds the lessons taught by such men as Franklin and Adams, and brought about the French Revolution, which consecrated and also strengthened the new order of things in this country."

FOR some time there has been a feeling in South Carolina in favor of an educational qualification for suffrage. A few days ago an educated colored man made a strong appeal in the newspapers for such a qualification. On the 8th a bill was introduced in the house of representativs, providing for a change in the constitution that a citizen would hav to be able to read the constitution of this state and the United States and write his own name before he can cast his ballot. This bill will be passed, and the people will vote upon the amendment at the next election.

ANYTHING more amusing than the comments of a Turkish newspaper, the Mizan, upon the recent presidential election would be difficult to imagin. It appears most extraordinary to the Turkish mind that such things as elections are tolerated by the American authorities, or that, if tolerated at all, they are not so managed as always to render authority the more strongly intrenched.

SHE was a tall, slender, middle-aged lady, says the Star, and she climbed up the stairs of the city hall elevated railroad station with considerable dignity. It was about 6 o'clock in the evening, and there was a long line before each of the ticket-seller's windows. The lady, however, pushed ahead of everybody, purchased a ticket, and walked toward the ticket boxes. Just as she reached the box the gateman turned his head; she made a motion as if dropping the ticket in the box, but, instead of doing so, held it tightly in her hand and boarded the train. Then, after seating herself comfortably, she opened a religious weekly and perused its columns until the Grand street station was reached. Here a half dozen messengers entered the car and began making things lively. The good lady, who had defrauded the company out of five cents, rebuked the boys several times for their unseemly conduct, and, finding they took no notice of her, left the train in a huff at the Fourteenth street station. A little meditation on this will discover a complete presentation of the conduct and character of the meddling religious classes.

A NEW regulation for the censorship of newspapers has just been announced to the editors of Constantinople. Hereafter any newspaper that publishes a paragraph which has not been first approved by the censor will be closed up. For the daily papers a censor visits the office. But for the weekly papers all matter must be sent to the bureau of the press two days before the paper appears.

Sun-Gods of Ancient and Modern Religions.

All truth is safe, and nothing else is safe, and he who keeps back the truth, or withholds it from men from motivs of expediency, is either a coward, or a criminal, or both (F. Max Müller in Science of Religion).

For modern man, with his knowledge of the forces of nature, with his astronomy, natural philosophy, and chemistry, it is impossible to feel, yes, even approach in any degree, that state of emotions which pervaded his primitiv ancestors, when they in their childish, uncultured way tried to understand and explain the forces of nature in their various aspects.[1] Only through the assistance of the imagination could primitiv man account for what he heard, saw, and felt, and from the analogy of his own actions he interpreted the phenomena of nature. He knew only the force of will, and consequently he endowed nature with volition. He made her alive, peopled her with mighty agencies, whom he in course of time personified, making them stronger and more powerful than himself, and yet subject to joy and sorrow, happiness and misery, anger and kindly feelings. But no natural object was looked upon with more wonder, awe, and veneration than the Sun. To these feelings the poet of the Veda hymns givs expression: Will the Sun rise again? How can he climb the steep vault of heaven without falling back? he asks. And when the great illuminator stretches out his golden arms to bless the world and rescue it from the terrible darkness, then he exclaims: "Arise, our life, our spirit has come back; the darkness is gone, the light approaches!" [1]

But when the light of the coming morning sun woke man from his slumber, and he, refreshed, rose from his night's rest, as if infused with a new life, he could not fail to observe that he was not the only one that had been blessed with a new spirit—nature had partaken in the blessing. Were not the busy insects more activ, and the movements of the animals stronger and more graceful? Did the song of the birds not sound sweeter? Was the fragrance of the flowers not still more delicious than on the evening previous? And he designated the Sun as "Giver of Daily Life and Light." But is it not the same sun that parted from us yesterday that shone in the early hours of my childhood? asks the old man. If he shone then, he shone at the beginning of time, and the sun becomes "the Creator," the maker of all things. "Truly admirable for grandeur are the works of him who has separated the two worlds and fixed their vast extent, of him who has set in motion the high sublime firmament, who has spread out the heavens above and the earth beneath."

"Between this earth and the sublime heaven above, all things, O Varuna, are of thy creation."

But the sun is not alone the Creator; he is the Protector of everything that moves or stands, of all that exists. He sees and knows everything. He sees the right and wrong among men; he knows their inmost thoughts, and therefore he is implored to forget and forgiv all that is, and he has become the "Judge."

"The king Varuna sees everything, all that which is between the two worlds and beyond them; he reckons the winking of the eye of all creatures."

"That which two men, seated side by side, are plotting, is heard by king Varuna, himself the third."

"He who should leap over the sky and beyond it, would not escape the king Varuna. . . ."

"Free me from the bonds of my crime, do not sever the thread of prayer that I am weaving, do not deliver me over to the deaths that, at thy dictate, O Asura, strike him that has committed a crime, send me not into the gloomy regions far from the light."

"Let me pay the penalty of my faults, but let me not suffer, O king, for the crime of others; there are so many days that hav not dawned yet, let them dawn for us also, O Varuna!" [2]

Such is the god of the Veda, the almighty, the organizing, the omniscient and moral Varuna; and like him is Jupiter in Rome, Tina in Etruria, Zeus in Greece, Ahura Mayda in ancient Persia, Ra in Egypt, Il of the Babylonians, Asshur of the Assyrians, Baal in Phœnicia, Jehovah among the Jews, etc.

We hav now seen how the Sun, like all other natural objects, becomes personified, but as yet the person of the Sun god has not become distinct from that of the Heaven-god. In fact, they are one and the same person. The sun is the eye of Zeus as well as that of Odin.

Still, early man did not stop here; from personification he in turn reached deification, and through the process of disintegration he made every expression that described natural objects a description of individualized and anthropomorphous gods. The person of the Heaven-god became distinct from that of the Sun-god. The former was made a personification of the sky. "Dayaus pitar," "Heavenly Father," "Our Father," "O dear Zeus," prays the Athenian, "rain thou on the fields of the Athenians and on the plains." As it is in Greece so it is also in Rome.

"Behold over thy head this luminous space which all invoke under the name of Jupiter," says Ennius; while Cicero exclaims: "The refulgent heaven above is what all men unanimously call Jove."

Ahura Mayda, the omniscient Lord, is likewise a god of the heavens. The sun is his eye, and the star-spangled solid stone sky is the garment in which he clothes himself, and therefore he is called the "most solid of gods." Says Herodotus: "The Persians offer up sacrifices to Zeus, going upon the highest summit of the mountains, as they call Zeus the entire orb of the sky."

When the roaring thunder struck terror into the minds of the Israelites, they imagined they heard the voice of the "God above gods" of Jehovah, by the breath of whom frost is given, who "laid the corner-stone" of the earth when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy (Job)

While the Sky, as we hav seen, is designated as the "Heavenly Father," "Our Father who is in heaven," so is the earth called "Our Mother."

"The Sky appeared to men," says Plutarch, "to perform the functions of a Father, as the Earth those of a Mother. The Sky was the Father, for it cast seed into the bosom of earth, which, in receiving them, became fruitful, and brought forth, and was the mother." [1]

And from this union of Dayaus Pitar with Prithivi Mâter, of Odin with Fregga, of Nut with Seb, of the heaven-father with the earth-mother, was born, without carnal intercourse, the bright Sun. Still, not alone from the intercourse of the Sky with the Earth was the Sun born. "His birth may be derived from ever so many different mothers. He may be the son of the Sky or of the Dawn, or of the Sea or of the Night." [2]

Aditi, "the mother with powerful, terrible, with royal sons," gave birth to the Sun, and "as the Sun and all other solar deities rise from the east, we can very well understand how Aditi, the Dawn, came to be called the 'Mother of bright gods.'" [3]

Still, this instance is by no means the only one we find. Dahana givs birth to Indra, Devaki to Chrishna, Isis to Horus, Neith to Ra, Iohaste to Œdipus, Io to Hercules, Maya to Gautama Buddha, Maia to Hermes, Mary to Christ Jesus.

Now, Aditi is the same as Dahana, as Devaki, as Neith, Iohaste, Io, Maya, Maia, and as Mary, but all these are but personifications of the Dawn; and the child born of them, whether named Chrishna, Buddha, Indra, or Christ Jesus, is the Sun.[4]

But not always is a Sun-god the child of a "divine" virgin. We are told that Perseus was the son of the mortal virgin Danæ, Apollo of Latona, Christ Jesus of Mary. This statement seems to contradict the one made above. But the contradiction lies on the surface only. There very often are, as in the case of Christ Jesus and Mary, genuin mortal beings invested with the names and attributes respectivly of the Sun and the Dawn, or Night, to such an extent as to all but entirely efface the human, and thereby render it impossible for us to tell where the mythical ends and the historical begins. Therefore, in the service of true history, it is better, so long as we are not certain, to allow ample room for the former. Then it is easier to add to the truth than to deduct from it appendages which through time hav received the stamp of historical truth.

An interesting coincidence between the different mothers of the sun is that, although they hav given birth to a child, they remain "pure virgins," and are worshiped as such by their devotees. The titles by which they were invoked in prayers are in many instances the same as those of Virgin Mary—"Our Lady," "Queen of Heaven," "Mother of God," "Immaculate Virgin," etc.

Not always does the god of heaven himself overshadow the maiden; this function is sometimes given over to the "Holy Spirit." We know that the child born of the ancient Germans' virgin goddess Hertha [5] was conceived by the latter, and the incarnation of Gautama Buddha, as well as that of Christ Jesus, was brought about in a like manner.[6]

Having made the acquaintance of some of the principal sun-gods, seeing how and where they originated, and found that they are but physical objects, which, through man's natural desire of investigation and his anthropomorphistic and anthropopathic tendencies, hav become personal beings, to ascertain how far this desire to attribute human passions and form to the deities has reached, and to determin the principal characters of and analogies between the gods, will be our next object.

In the hymn to the Delian Apollo, we are told how Latona, traveling from land to land, at last reached Delos, where she gave birth to her glorious son, on which occasion the earth beneath smiled and the immortal goddesses shouted for joy. This birth took place under a palm in open air, while, according to some, it occurred in a cave at early dawn.[1]

Joyous demonstrations on the part of earthly and heavenly beings, yea, even of Nature herself, seem to be in common for all the Sun-gods. When the birth of Chrishna drew near "heavenly spirits and nymphs danced and sang," and when at the midnight hour the god was born the clouds emitted low, pleasing sounds, and poured down rain of flowers.[2] But no two accounts bear a closer resemblance to each other than those of Gautama Buddha and Christ Jesus.

When the former was born—which is said to hav taken place in an inn, or in a cave—a rain of flowers fell on the earth, a brilliant light shone, and the attending spirits sang, and Rishis and Devas exclaimed: "This day Buddha is born for the good of men, to dispel the darkness of their ignorance." And the four heavenly kings continued, saying: "Now, because Bodhisativa is born to giv joy and bring peace to the world, therefore is there this brightness." And then all the gods of the heavens and all the Devas joined in the song with their wonderful voices, and said: "To-day Bodhisativa is born on earth to giv joy and peace to men and Devas, to shed light in dark places, and to giv sight to the blind." [3]

In the narrativ of the Luke narrator is likewise mentioned a brilliant light—"the glory of the Lord shone round about them" (the shepherds)—and after the angel had spoken to them a "multitude of the heavenly host" praised God and said: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." [4] But divine honors are not sufficient to create the necessary glory of the new-born child, earthly honors are to be added, and in spite of his "divine" descent his pedigree is traced back to "royal" persons, not alone on his mother's side but also on his father's. Chrishna and Horus are of royal blood, and while Hercules's pedigree is traced through Alkmene to Phoroneus, the first king of Argos, Gautama Buddha is, through his father Sodhodana, related to Maha Sammata, the first monarch of the world,[5] and Joseph the father of Christ Jesus "was of the house and lineage of David." [6]

In joining the honors of heraldry to those of heaven the priests had, no doubt, practical purposes in view. The god's royal descent would make the lower classes look up to him with still more reverence and admiration, because in the Eastern countries, with their despotic form of government, a royal person, and especially the king, was regarded as an impersonation of wisdom, while the upper classes would not hav to humble their pride, which certainly would hav been the case had the divine teacher been of mean origin.

But it was not enough that the heavenly powers had shown their favor at the child's birth; their good graces were to follow him during life, and through their protection enable him to fulfill his mission. Therefore, when Chrishna's life is sought by the tyrant Kansa, who ordered all male children to be slain, a heavenly voice informs his parents of the threatening danger and orders them to make a hasty flight.[7] The life of Gautama Buddha was subject to a similar danger through the intention of Bembasara, whose ministers advised him to kill the first-born male child that had seen the light in the tribe of Sâkyas, since he would be dangerous to the former's power.[8]

In the life of Christ Jesus we hav a similar occurrence. An angel appeared to Joseph, warned him of Herod's murderous design, and told him to flee with the mother and child into Egypt. But when Herod found out he had been mocked, he was "exceedingly wroth, and sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coast thereof, from two years old and under." [9]

We hav here evidently to do with an Aryan myth. We remember that Christ Jesus, Chrishna, and Gautama Buddha are but personifications of the Sun. But to whom is the light of the sun dangerous if it is not to the darkness, to the night? When the Sun is born the government of the Night begins to totter, and for the sake of self-preservation the monarch, whether called Kansa, Bembasara, or Herod, seeks to destroy the child, the Chrishna, Buddha, or Christ Jesus, the sun. But in vain; fate has decided in favor of the latter.[10]

Nothing is able to divert the young god from his mission, although suffering intensely from hunger and from holding his breath, as in the case of Buddha, and when the royal Mara (Prince of Evil) tempts him by offering the dominion over the world, his offer is spurned. "Get thee away from me," says Gautama Buddha.[11] As with Buddha, so with Zoroaster [12] and Christ Jesus and others. When Christ

Jesus had fasted in the forty days and forty nights, "he was afterward a-hungered;" then the devil came and offered him "all the kingdoms of the world" if he would worship him, but the young god was firm, "and saith unto him, Get thee hence, Satan." [1] In the temptation of Christ Jesus, Buddha, and other sun-gods we hav the battle and subsequent victory of the Sun over clouds of darkness and storm. Thus, in Eastern mythology, the Serpent or Devil is an impersonation of darkness and death, evil and winter (Cox: Aryan Myth.; Bunsen: Angel Messiah; Baring-Gould: Curious Myths, etc.).

After the god has shown his strength and power of mind in this way, he enters upon his religious life as a teacher and prophet, teaching, wherever he goes, the people to honor their "father in heaven," and love their fellow-beings, to show humility, to be temperate, not to resist evil, to be generous, etc., but the teachings, however moral, are in many instances carried to such an extremity as to become unpractical and thereby useless for man. Still, the god confines himself not to this; out of compassion for mankind, and to giv emphasis to his doctrins, he calls unto his assistance supernatural powers, he performs miracles. In some instances the god possessed the wonderful gift already during infancy—at least, if we can believe the sacred writings of followers. Both Chrishna and Christ Jesus cured when boys one of their playmates who had been stung of a serpent, and while the former creates new calves and boys in place of some that had been stolen, Christ caused some boys that had been transformed into kids to resume their original shape.[2]

In early times miracles were of every-day occurrence; lepers are cured,[3] the blind are made to see,[4] the lame they walk,[5] the storms are stilled,[6] promenading on the water, without getting the feet wet, is shown,[7] yes, even the dead is brought to life.[8] The necessarily short space that can be allowed to an essay of this kind forbids us to enter further in upon this interesting theme. We could quote many more examples, and procure still more authorities in confirmation of the undeniable truth of the above, but we think enough has been done to prove that the lives of different Sun-gods are remarkably alike.

As formerly said, the intention of the Sun-gods coming on earth, and their mission on this planet, are to teach depraved mankind to liv better lives and to save them from the "righteous wrath" of their "heavenly father." To this end the Sun-god sacrifices himself. "Let all the sins that were committed in this world fall on me, that the world may be delivered," says Gautama Buddha.[9]

This belief in redemption from sin through the suffering and death of another being was very common in ancient time, and is evolved from the idea that the god called for sacrifices that he might show his good will and exempt man from calamity or punishment for some sin. The character of the offerings were different: the fruits of the earth, flowers, or libations; later it was thought the deity called for blood, then animals were sacrificed, and after a while, believing different sins or crimes called for different kinds of offerings, human beings entered the list, first, slaves and children, later, persons of eminence, and the doctrin of expiation of sin through the sacrifice of another human being guiltless of the crime was founded. In Greece and Rome this belief took in most cases the form of self-sacrifice, while among other nations, whether ancient Scandinavians, or the Jews, Hindoos, Phœnicians, or Egyptians, the victim was another person. When in Egypt "the eldest born of the family of Athamas entered the temple of the Laphystan Jupiter at Alas in Achaia, he was sacrificed, crowned with garlands like an animal victim," [10] while the priests offered the following prayer: "If any evil is about to befall either those who now sacrifice, or Egypt in general, may it be averted on this head." [11]

But while the sacrifice of a mortal being was deemed sufficient to expiate the sin of a few, it was believed that to redeem all mankind a perfectly pure and sinless being was wanted. But who could fill this place? No human being surely. None but a god, and the Sun-god was the person selected. It is through the sufferings of his incarnation that mankind is saved.

> Persecutions without end;
> Revilings and many prisons;
> Death and murder,
> These hast thou suffered with love and patience,
> (To secure the happiness of mankind),
> Forgiving thine executioners (Hymn to Buddha).[12]

So suffered he, "the Anointed," "the Christ," "the Savior of the World," [13] and, moved by pity, "gave his life like grass for the sake of others," [14] and, like him, Chrishna [1] and Mithras,[2] Horus and Osiris,[3] Æsculapius [4] and Hermes,[5] Serapis [6] and Apollo,[7] Hercules [8] and Prometheus,[9] Bacchus [10] and Christ Jesus,[11] etc.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to state in what way the different saviors died. In many instances is one account at variance with another. Now he is killed by a boar, now fastened to a burning wheel, again in another place killed with an arrow, or he is crucified.

The Vishnu Purana says Chrishna was shot in the foot with an arrow, and died in consequence of his wound, while, according to M. Guigniaut, he perished on a tree, to which he was fastened by an arrow,[12] and while dying he forgave his executioners.[13] The Phrygian savior, the "Only Begotten Son," [14] "suffered a death made bitter with nails and stakes." [15] Prometheus was nailed by hands and feet to the rocks of Mt. Caucasus, the hands being in an extended position,[16] while, according to another account, he was but chained. Hercules is torn limb from limb, while Adonis's life is brought to an end by the wild boar. Ixion is fastened to a burning wheel and dies there, and Christ Jesus is crucified on Mt. Calvary. All these, and many more saviors' deaths that could be mentioned, giv us examples sufficient to prove the above assertion, and to show that, in spite of seeming contradictions, the death of one is analogous to that of another.

The wild boar is none but the winter, and [17] the spear, the arrow, or the nails, are the dark and terrible-looking rain or snow clouds which hav combated the light of the Sun ever since his birth, and which now, when he has reached his southern limit, overcome him. The cross or wheel, which is but a St. Andrew cross, on which the god dies, is an emblem of his fructifying power.[19] The myth of Prometheus must be considered as an exception from the general rule. Then, his name, which signifies providence, is but one of the numerous titles of the Sun, and his crucifixion or binding implies, like that of Hercules, Samson, Odyssius, the restriction or diminishing of the Sun power or warmth during the winter months.[19]

"And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him.[20]

The god, when dying, is not left alone; his mother, and the maidens he loved, remain with him that his pains may be soothed, and his last minutes brightened through their love and sympathy. Iole is found by the side of Hercules, and a weeping woman embraces Gautama Buddha's feet, and moistens them with her tears.[21] Oceanus leaves Prometheus as Peter Christ Jesus, while the faithful nymphs, the daughters of Oceanus, remain until the last; so did Mary and Magdalene.

These faithful women are the Dawn (the mother of the Sun), "the fair and tender light which shed its soft hue over the eastern heaven as the Sun sinks beneath the western waters;" [22] they are the bright and fleecy clouds that are visible at a beautiful sunset or sunrise.

The darkness grows more and more intense, and at last it covers the face of the earth. The Sun-god is dead. But his death is manifested by great revolutions in nature. The sun is darkened, the earth quakes, rocks are rent, ashes and fire fall from the sky, spirits fill the air, and the graves giv up their dead.[23]

But even after his natural death the Sun-god's mission is not ended—he descends into the infernal regions, into hell or hades, there to redeem the spirits of men of former ages. Osiris and Horus,[24] Chrishna [25] and Adonis,[26] Zoroaster [27] and Hercules,[28] Jonah [29] and Christ Jesus,[30] etc., all descend and remain there for a period of three days and three nights.

We see this myth of the descent into hell is likewise universal, and, like the others relating to the Sun-gods, it is founded on natural phenomena. When the sun at winter solstice for three days and three nights remains in the lowest regions, the ancients taught the god had descended to hell, to hades, in the belly of the fish or sea-monster—the earth being frequently represented by them as a great fish.[31]

"Out of the belly of hell I cried, and thou heardst my voice," says Jonah.[32]

When the three days and three nights hav passed, the Sun-god leaves his tomb, the coverings of his body are unrolled, and the grave is opened by divine powers. The god rises from the dead and ascends bodily into heaven, while a beautiful but strong light illuminates the surroundings. Under such circumstances does the resurrection take place. The "savior," the "Resurrected One," Chrishna [1] or Buddha,[2] Osiris [3] or Horus,[4] Adonis [5] or Mithras,[6] Christ Jesus [7] or Bacchus,[8] etc., has fulfilled his mission on earth and leaves for his celestial abode.

We hav now traced in great characters the evolution of the Sun-god, the savior, idea. We hav seen that in the earliest stage, the Sun-god and the Heaven-god were one and the same person. That later in time they became two distinct beings, and how the former out of mercy came down on earth to save mankind from sin and its subsequent punishment. We hav followed these saviors from their birth and until their ascension to heaven, noting, as we went along, the main incidents of their career, and found that the life of one is very much like that of another. This striking resemblance can, in case of the ancient religions, be accounted for by the similarity of the development of natural religion, the foundation of which, on the part of the Aryan nations, was brought along when they emigrated from their original home in India. To the question where the Christians received their savior idea, we can but say that all evidence points to a Buddhistic origin, and in the few cases where the resemblance ceases, it is due to the intermingling of Greek and Roman, Phœnician, Egyptian, or Hebrew mythology.

The Certainty of the Unexpected.

"To be astonished at nothing which happens is the only means of retaining one's peace and happiness." Horatius Flaccus, thou wert wise, not only in thy own day and generation, but for all days and generations!

Two thousand years, nearly, hav come and gone since thou didst pen thy famous Nil admirari, of which the above is a poor and feeble paraphrase of the barbarous Briton, yet the latter's descendants acknowledge to-day, as does the whole civilized world, that thou didst thus write truly, and didst thus write for all time.

To bear constantly in mind the certainty of the unexpected; to look forward, not fearfully, but calmly and courageously, to the outcome of the hour we liv in—an outcome which may be full of disaster, which, on the other hand, may be replete with happiness—is the true wisdom of mortals here below.

Our climate, our mad struggle for wealth and social advancement, our fierce thirst for pleasure and comfort, all tend to militate against the serenity above recommended.

But the habit may be cultivated. Once train a man to look confidently into the near future, braced for the shock of the unexpected, using all possible means to prevent annoyance, loss of property, of life, of what he holds most dear, yet prepared for the stroke, if in spite of all such caution it shall come, and you hav a character like that of the old Greek athletes, whose forms and faces were sculptured on the frieze of the Parthenon; forms developed in full manly perfection; faces calm, even in the death-struggle with the centaur; faces free from anger and indignation on the one hand, from levity and boastful cheerfulness on the other; faces unmoved, confident, forceful. It was the Hellenic love of sweetness and life, the Hellenic devotion to beauty and formal, physical perfection, that built up a nation of whom the world still talks, and about whom the world still wonders, two thousand years after the race has disappeared from the face of the earth.

But it was something more than this that made the Greek of the Athens of Pericles what he was.

It was the old Hellenic certainty of the unexpected, and his preparation to meet and battle with it.

The Hebrew gloom and lamentation were unknown to him.

Action with him was the first impulse, and after action triumph.

One of the most wonderful among the new psychological developments in America is a renaissance of the same sentiment.

Our young people liv more in the open air, take more to athletics, cultivate formal strength and beauty, to a far greater extent than we of the forties and fifties. It is an encouraging sign. Bodily strength argues mental and moral vigor. All three are needed to face that

> Ominous hour that knocks at our door with tidings of mishap.

All three are requisit to face the future and the unexpected with brave hearts, and a calm, undaunted front.

The Sabbath Union's Bill.

At the instigation of the American Sabbath Union, Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, introduced in the Senate last May the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

A BILL

To secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, as a day of rest, and to promote its observance as a day of religious worship.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person, or corporation, or agent, servant, or employee of any person or corporation shall perform or authorize to be performed any secular work, labor, or business to the disturbance of others, works of necessity, and mercy, and humanity excepted; nor shall any person engage in any play, game, or amusement, or recreation to the disturbance of others on the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, or during any part thereof, in any territory, district. vessel, or place subject to the exclusiv jurisdiction of the United States; nor shall it be lawful for any person or corporation to receive pay for labor or service performed or rendered in violation of this section.

Sec. 2. That no mails or mail matter shall hereafter be transported in time of peace over any land postal-route, nor shall any mail matter be collected, assorted, handled, or delivered during any part of the first day of the week: Provided, That whenever any letter shall relate to a work of necessity or mercy, or shall concern the health, life, or decease of any person, and the fact shall be plainly stated upon the face of the envelope containing the same, the postmaster-general shall provide for the transportation of such letter or letters in packages separate from other mail matter and shall make regulations for the delivery thereof, the same having been received at its place of destination before the said first day of the week, during such limited portion of the day as shall best suit the public convenience and least interfere with the due observance of the day as one of worship and rest: And provided further, That when there shall hav been an interruption in the due and regular transmission of the mails it shall be lawful to so far examin the same when delivered as to ascertain if there be such matter therein for lawful delivery on the first day of the week.

Sec. 3. That the prosecution of commerce between the states and with the Indian tribes, the same not being work of necessity, mercy, or humanity, by the transportation of persons or property by land or water in such way as to interfere with or disturb the people in the enjoyment of the first day of the week, or any portion thereof, as a day of rest from labor, the same not being labor of necessity, mercy, or humanity, or its observance as a day of religious worship, is hereby prohibited, and any person or corporation, or the agent, servant, or employee of any person or corporation who shall willfully violate this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten nor more than one thousand dollars, and no service performed in the prosecution of such prohibited commerce shall be lawful, nor shall any compensation be recoverable or be paid for the same.

Sec. 4. That all military and naval drills, musters, and parades, not in time of activ service or immediate preparation therefor, of soldiers, sailors, marines, or cadets of the United States on the first day of the week, except assemblies for the due and orderly observance of religious worship, are hereby prohibited, nor shall any unnecessary labor be performed or permitted in the military or naval service of the United States on the Lord's day.

Sec. 5. That it shall be unlawful to pay or to receive payment or wages in any manner for service rendered or for labor performed or for the transportation of persons or of property in violation of the provisions of this act, nor shall any action lie for the recovery thereof, and when so paid, whether in advance or otherwise, the same may be recovered back by whoever shall first sue for the same.

Sec. 6. That labor or service performed and rendered on the first day of the week in consequence of accident, disaster, or unavoidable delays in making the regular connections upon postal-routes and routes of travel and transportation, the preservation of perishable and exposed property and the regular and necessary transportation and delivery of articles of food in condition for healthy use, and such transportation for short distances from one state, district, or territory into another state, district, or territory as by local laws shall be declared to be necessary for the public good shall not be deemed violations of this act, but the same shall be construed so far as possible to secure to the whole people rest from toil during the first day of the week, their mental and moral culture, and the religious observance of the Sabbath day.

For the purpose of influencing the Senate the Union held a convention in Washington last week and also obtained a hearing before the committee, at which a petition bearing six million signatures of Sunday-school scholars and church-members—babes and bigots—was presented. The church was represented by many representativs, none of whom could be more zealous than Senator Blair, chairman of the committee. The Executiv Committee of the American Secular Union appointed John B. Wolff to oppose the bill, which he did with such ability as to win praise even from his clerical opponents, and a compliment from Blair himself.

The movement is one of the most formidable, crafty, and far-reaching that has ever occurred in the history of ecclesiasticism. For the first time since the Reformation hav the chief Protestant churches and Catholics come together to make common cause against a common enemy, which they both dread, and in which they read their inevitable doom, namely, the age of science, reason, and liberty. The "representativs" of the movement were divided into three classes—the Catholics, who took the palm for numbers; the Protestants (Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists), who came next, and the Seventh Day people, who are a feeble folk as compared with the others, and deemed scarcely worth considering in the main purpose, no matter how much hurt. The latter were present, however, to protest against the whole movement, and did some effectiv work. Mr. Wolff, for the American Secular Union, had great difficulty in securing a hearing. The committee, ruled by Blair, wanted to hear only one side, and Mr. Wolff was constantly interrupted by Blair with impertinent and irrelevant questions, his evident policy being to fritter away the time, and hear no Secular argument at all. The purpose of the bill is to promote the religious observance of the Sabbath. The real object, as shown in the title and revisions of the bill, is to enforce the religious observance of the Sabbath by law. The great effort of all the orthodox speakers was to keep out of sight the religious aspect of the movement. Their arguments were mainly devoted to the secular aspects of the subject—the right to rest, the necessity of rest, the benefit of rest to the toilers, and their sympathies even extended to rum-sellers and their bartenders. One of the speakers thought that Sunday work was one of the great, if not the greatest obstacle to the reform of that class of sinners. But when driven to the wall they were forced to admit that the animus was purely religious; their reason, that it is God's day, was instituted and ordained by God, and therefore nations and men are bound and should be compelled to observe it. It is a clear case of fraudulent pretenses; another attempt to smuggle through Congress a law directly attacking inalienable rights and the fundamental principles of the civil compact, and thus to subordinate the state to the church.

The ministers squirmed when confronted with the fact of their associating with Catholics, who, while professing republicanism here, practice despotism elsewhere; who, while uniting with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union here in the enforcement of Sabbath laws, in other countries where they hav the power not only do not enforce the Sabbath, but keep it as a day of recreation—perform their religious duties and then attend bull-fights, theaters, etc.—and to aggravate the pious miscegenation thousands of them are engaged in the saloon business without detriment to their religious status.

Another thing bothered them not a little. While insisting upon a particular day for themselvs, they necessarily deny the same privilege to their fellow-Christians, or compel them to lose two-sevenths of their time instead of one-seventh; and they had the audacity to justify this inequality on the plea of the majority and the common good of society from their standpoint.

In regard to their petition, they admitted that in soliciting signatures they avoided all whom they suspected or knew to be against the movement; and they were totally silent as to the business men, who constitute by far the largest class who would be affected by the stoppage of the mails and merchandise.

Dr. Lewis, Seventh Day Baptist, opposed the movement, but was willing to go along if his brethren would make an exception of his sect. He stood broadly upon the inherent and constitutional right of conscience as to all forms of religion and all religious observances, but was still willing to compromise.

Prof. A. S. Jones, of Battle Creek, Michigan College, representing Seventh Day Adventists, went even further than the Seventh Day Baptist, and declared against the entire movement. He wanted no exception in their behalf—would not accept it even with the exception. He declared that the Sabbath was purely a religious institution with which the state could hav nothing to do. He said we pay taxes to the state and worship to God. He came well prepared, with a masterly and unanswerable argument, based upon the principles, the Bible, and the practical effect, but it was greatly marred by the wanton interference of the chairman, ostensibly to elucidate, really to break the force of the blow. The answers of Professor Jones were so clear as to be irritating to the chairman. His review of the history of ecclesiastical innovation and usurpation from the days of Constantine to the establishment of the Roman church, with all that followed, was simply scathing. He pointed out how the church obtained sanction and aid from the state until it finally became the state and exercised an unlimited despotism over the consciences, lives, and property of men. He cited the fact that the Romans prior to the advent of Christianity had a law punishing with death anyone who established a new religion. That it was this discrimination that made Jesus and his followers insist on a complete divorce of the secular from the religious. And therefore that no true Christian can ask for the interposition of the secular arm to enforce his creed. He brought out the fact that they had Sunday laws in Arkansas and Tennessee, where the Seventh Day Christians, after conscientiously keeping their Sabbath, hav been prosecuted, fined, imprisoned, their only means of livelihood confiscated, and required to pay their own board while imprisoned, while in one case the man lost his child and wife as sequences of his prosecution and persecution. These facts went to show the utter impossibility of constructing any law upon the subject of religion which would operate equitably or could be enforced justly. Owing to the frequent interruptions of the chairman he was not permitted to follow out the line of argument clearly defined in his commencement.

The other Christian speakers followed the well-known lines of argument for such measures, and Senator Blair gave them plenty of room. Finally, Mr. Wolff secured the floor, and though constantly interrupted by Mr. Blair, gave the committee some wholesome advice. He said, in substance: "The greatest dangers to all forms of government and the stability of all associations are: 1. Ambiguity in the constitutional compact. 2. Strained constructions of the ambiguities. Doubtful interpretations and doubtful powers are always dangerous, because they open the door to all forms of usurpation.

"The powers of the United States government are generic and purely secular. The Constitution confers powers upon Congress on four subjects of common morality—counterfeiting, piracy, felony upon the high seas, and treason. The right to pass any law respecting the establishment of any form of religion is expressly prohibited, and for reasons not commonly understood, even by the clergy. In the colonies and inchoate states prior to the adoption of the Constitution they had state religions, and persecuted to the death those who set up other forms. To prevent any interference with this assumed right the prohibition was made absolute.

"The present bill is an attempt to further establish a form of religion exclusiv and in contravention of all other forms even of Christian religions, by selecting and enforcing the religious observance of a particular day dictated by the sects acting in concert, and is a clear case of the exercise of powers not conferred by the Constitution. The plea of public good has no value in the argument. A principle should never be violated. If it is, the temporary good will be overbalanced by the permanent evil.

"The rights of conscience are inherent, inalienable, above and beyond all compacts and statutes. They are not and cannot be subjects of legislation. The right of free thought, speech, and action on all subjects, limited only by the same rights in others, is absolute in every intelligent entity. Any abridgment of that right, followed to its logical sequences, will destroy society itself. The great and only legitimate object of government is the enforcement, not the abridgment, of personal rights. Religion has to do with a man's conscience and his god, if he has any. It is entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the state. It does not belong to the state to fix and enforce penal sanctions for the violation of laws and obligations which it did not and cannot create, and for which no authority is conferred."

Here Mr. Blair interrupted to ask, "What of the Mormons?"

"The Mormons," replied Mr. Wolff, "hav the same right to their religion that these Christians hav. Devil-worshipers hav the same right.

"Your attention may properly be called to a fact of great significance in the higher moral education of man: That which is right in itself is always right; that which is wrong in itself is always wrong, and no law or opinion or authority can change this status. The time of performance has nothing to do with the moral or even religious quality of actions. They are governed wholly by capacity, animus, and effect. If, then, you teach a man that an act, right per se, is wrong if done on a particular day, you teach him a falsehood, and lower the standard of morality in the man—that is, you erect a false standard. The same is true of the distinction between a statement in common conversation and an oath on the Bible. The standard of veracity is lowered.

"Specifically, the bill is open to serious objections: 1. There is a statute which provides that the intention of the act shall be expressed in the title. This bill violates that statute in that the real object of the bill is not expressed in the title, but some other thing. The title says, "To promote the observance of the Sabbath as a day of religious worship." The body of the bill provides the machinery for compelling its observance, by annexing penal sanctions for its violation.

"2. It provides for the civil recognition of the Sabbath as the Lord's day, a prerogativ not vested in Congress by the Constitution.

"3. It is ambiguous, does not clearly define and distinguish secular from religious work. In this respect it is like the obscene literature law. Being capable of a double or various interpretations, determined by capacity, interest, prejudice, and bigotry, it is necessarily liable to great abuse. Statutes, as well as organic compacts, especially in criminal laws with penal sanctions, involving life, liberty, and property, should be so constructed that no lawyer or court could twist a double meaning out of them."

The chair interposed: "But we hav the courts for the purpose of construing the Constitution and laws."

"True, we hav them for that purpose, but what good? The courts are just as much the subject of self-interests and fanaticism as lawyers, clients, and other people. With the present looseness of construction and interpretation of the Constitution and statutes, they are not worth so much rotten paper as guarantees of personal rights. In almost every important case before the Supreme Court there is a minority opinion. It is, therefore, not an absolute decision—only a majority decision. That which is true of the higher courts is true of the minor courts.

"Even Congress at every session is violating the Constitution in exercising judicial functions which do not belong to it, while courts are exercising legislativ functions because of the vagueness of the laws.

"4. The matter provided for in Sec. 2, in regard to mails, etc., was settled more than a half century ago forever, by one of the ablest discussions ever had of a public question. This occurred before the present gigantic interests and complications were conceived of by the most prescient minds. This section is also a slip-shod affair, as it provides for opening the mails in certain cases for examination, and givs discretion to a subordinate official as to contraband mail matter.

"5. Sec. 4 is also ambiguous, as it fails to define what is and is not necessary work, again conferring discretion—legislativ functions—upon the military.

"6. Sec. 5 not only invades the sanctity of personal rights and denies the right to contract, perform contracts, and receive compensation therefor, but it offers a reward to rascality, by protecting rascals in the non-payment and recovery of money due for service performed.

"7. Sec. 6 provides for exceptions which open the door to great abuses, by again permitting subordinates to construe the law. It also declares that the purpose is to secure to the whole people the religious observance of the Sabbath, as if the setting apart of the day by law would secure its religious observance, or the failure to do so would prevent anyone from keeping any day holy of choice. Notwithstanding the labored effort by all the speakers on the other side to mislead by covering up the animus under the plea of temporal rest and good, the bill itself and the unsophisticated confessions of some of the less cautious speakers show beyond a doubt that the sole purpose is to hitch the state to their ecclesiastical Juggernaut, and thus crush out what they cannot compass by moral suasion or logic. It is a clear confession that the church is unable to fulfill its own prophecy, and is in turn prophetic of its wane and downfall. Hence this monstrous army and miscegenation of antagonistic forces to compass a common object.

"We hav here not only the major and minor sects of Protestantism, but the common enemy of all of them, the Catholic church, in the person of Cardinal Gibbons, whose letter lies before me in cardinal red, the bloody insignia of Rome, joining hands, Pilate and Herod like, to crucify the truth and right. Nor is this all. These forces are divided among themselvs. See how these Christians disagree. It is only a few years since the Arminians and Calvinists were as much at swords' points as the Catholics and Protestants. Here is one set of Christians in a movement which drives to the wall another set with the same God, the same Bible, the same natural, civil, and religious rights. These people mercilessly discriminated against hav given us an unanswerable argument against this whole movement.

"The Catholics, who exceed in numbers all the Protestants represented here, do not keep or enforce the Sabbath in countries where they hav civil control. In the morning they are very religious, attend church, say prayers, confess their sins; in the afternoon they attend bull-fights, theaters, saloons, gambling shops, etc. Let it not be imagined that the Catholics are so much worse than the Protestants. The Protestants inherited from their natural parent constitutionally the spirit of intolerance and persecution for opinion's sake. From the burning of Servetus until this hour, as exhibited in this conspiracy against civil and religious liberty, they hav been limited in their diabolical aggressions only by opportunity and power. They brought it with them to this country. We see it in the murder of witches by good old Massachusetts; the blue laws of Connecticut; the blasphemy laws of Maryland, my Maryland, my Catholic Maryland, still unrepealed, so that we are liable under a rigid enforcement of these laws to hav our tongues bored for blasphemy.

"You, sir, hav asked one of these gentlemen for a definition of religion; he gave you a generalized definition such as you may find in some of the lexicons, but it was no definition satisfactory to the intelligent, inquiring mind. Ask each one of them, and he will be compelled to giv you a different answer. Now go outside and ask the thousand and one sects which hav drawn from the same God, the same Bible, the same inspiration, and no two answers will be alike. Hence, the impossibility of legislating successfully upon the subject. They differ as to times, days, creeds, and ceremonies. They differ as to this life and the life to come.

"Finally, I object to legislating upon a subject that the petitioners and Congress do not understand, as we hav seen demonstrated here to-day.

"The logic, if any there be, is reasoning with the major proposition omitted. Not a man has attempted to lay his foundation in self-evident proposition, demonstrated or proved fact. It is all assumption, a mere matter of authority and majority.

"As for Congress, if I am any judge, it does not understand and does not liv any form of religion, and has already gone too far toward putting God into the Constitution. There is no authority for chaplains, and yet from the very organization of the government they hav been paid out of the funds of men who protest in vain. If this is not taxation without representation, then what is it? We hav oaths in all courts upon Bibles, Protestant and Catholic. We hav Sunday laws in all the states. We hav God in all state constitutions except South Carolina, I believe. We hav untaxed hundreds of millions of church property, thus augmenting the burdens of non-communicants. All this and more we hav, and it is time to halt. Let Congress confine itself to its material functions and matters of this life; let it take up and solve first of all the problem of equitable distribution of surplus products; of the enforcement of personal rights as against the abuses of the government itself; the cause and prevention of crime, instead of dabbling in subjects entirely beyond its comprehension and jurisdiction. It seems to me that this would be wiser and better."

Jesuitical Plots.

Last week has been an eventful one in the history of Chicago, for again the police hav been busily manufacturing dynamite plots, suppressing various meetings which were as far from being Anarchistic in their character as the imagination can travel, doing their best to reëstablish a reign of terror, and trampling on the rights of the people with perfect impunity. They went so far as to "proscribe" some scientific Sunday-schools which are now being inaugurated by the German Turners in connection with some of their societies. Anything radical or Liberal, of course, must be Anarchy in the imagination of the discriminating blue-coated Bismarck of Chicago. Now we must look in the morning papers to ascertain whether any meeting of a Liberal or radical tendency has permission of John Bonfield, the bullying representativ of Rome, to assemble. This is part of a deep-laid plot of the Irish Catholic element to excite timid and credulous citizens into fears of assassination by Anarchists, so that none but Catholics may be considered loyal enough and brave enough to save society from annihilation, and by this course Rome will be able to retain a stronger hold on the offices and promote the interest of the "true" church which declares it will "overthrow all heretical commonwealths and governments."

At last some of the papers hav got nauseated with this cry of "wolf," and seeing it as merely a political trick, denounce Bonfield as a blusterer, and accuse this "savior of society" as the cause of the Haymarket tragedy. This is a rather tardy vindication of my letters, some of two years ago, but if Bonfield does not manage to plant sufficient dynamite among his enemies and hav them convicted on his cooked-up evidence, for his retention of glory, honor, and power, there is a bare possibility of his putting his neck in the halter and having to stand before a less partial and prejudiced jury than was selected with such scrupulous care to hang several godless men. The Chicago Times of December 10th, under the caption, "Bonfield's Bosh," prints this editorial:

John Bonfield, in fact, though not in name, chief of the police, is to-day doing Chicago more harm than any so-called Anarchist within its limits. In pursuance of a program so plain that he who runs may read this Bonfield is professing to fear each bush—not an officer, as the phrase runs, but an outlaw skilled in the use of dynamite and ready to resort to its use. Does a member of the trades assembly canvass in decent and orderly fashion the opinion of candidates for the assembly touching the Merritt law, Bonfield pronounces him a Red—an Anarchist. Does some citizen complain of police brutality or inefficiency, there is nothing easier than to class him as a Red. Are Socialists endeavoring to propagate doctrins regarding government of which the mass of citizenship knows little and cares less, an undiscriminating police set them down instantly as Anarchists. The right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition is fundamental. The police under the Bonfield doctrin has but to assert that an assembly is for Anarchistic purposes and suppression may follow. It is an easy way of ignoring the limitations upon authority, of encroaching upon the liberty of the individual, of creating a popular scare for ulterior motivs, for, unhappily, many thoughtless people incline to accept a policeman's statement as a proved case.

It is high time this ridiculous nonsense should cease. Continue it and police management will become more potent for social mischief than all the Reds that can be gathered into Greif's beer-hall from the dregs of the foreign-born population centering in Chicago. There was no trouble yesterday. There will be none to-morrow. After the charter election there will be no pretense of any. But while this elaborate tomfoolery of Bonfield's is going forward, and terror-stricken or sensation-mongering newspapers are spreading it abroad as the struggle of law and order against the dynamite demons of unrest, who are plotting day in and day out for the destruction of Chicago, the city loses something more than its good name. It is being avoided as if it were plague-stricken by extra-timorcus people who prefer to hav commercial dealings with places where policemen are not put on parade for the ostensible purpose of crushing Reds.

Chicago people going quietly about their business are well aware that Bonfield's Anarchists are like the Irishman's fleas—when he puts his hand upon them they are not there. But the city suffers none the less from the superserviceable zeal of a police officer who, since the affair in the Haymarket, which he precipitated, has been fighting, like Falstaff, armies of men in buckram and in Kendall green. Bonfield's Anarchistic scares hav slender foundation. The city is capable of sitting down hard on any Reds that may attempt revolution. It is equally able to take care of the bully with the club. In self-protection it may become necessary to set about the latter performance.

In the same issue the Times gave the following synopsis of my lecture last Sunday evening:

E. A. Stevens, president of the Chicago Secular Union, made a savage onslaught upon the relics and traditions and policy of the Roman Catholic church in his lecture at the Forum last evening. He had a large audience which, judging from the frequent bursts of applause, was entirely in sympathy with his most radical views. His theme was "Roman Rubbish," and he commenced with a reference to the "crafty aggressivness of the Romish church in this country, forecasting the struggle which freedom has before her unless Americans arouse themselvs from their apparent indifference." Romanism, he said, had grown out of all proportion to other sects. Cardinal Gibbons was recognized as our political dictator, for he wielded the loaded dice of destiny—one million five hundred thousand of Roman Catholic votes—with unerring precision and tremendous effect. The priesthood were swelling with defiant pride and had opened a dangerous war upon our public schools, while their pestilential influence pervaded society with as deadly vapors as the upas tree. Manhood appeared to be oozing out of our national life, for whoever sounded the tocsin against Rome's insidious intrigues and moral and political turpitude was set down as a foolish alarmist. The day of liberty's doom might not be far distant.

After reviewing some of the bloody wars, massacres, butcheries, and barbarous cruelties of past ages which were perpetrated in the name of the "true church," the speaker said that no Catholic of the present day condemned these atrocities. It was still claimed that the pope could not err; that the church was the "same to-day and forever." Romanism was rapidly preparing the minds of American children to swallow the rubbish about relics and shrines which had so long held the people of Italy, Spain, and other countries in the most debasing servitude. Rome was always against reason and for revenue. In the Old World it had derived enormous incomes from palpable and preposterous frauds, and now desired to impose its European relic rubbish for the enrichment of its American church. Our American schools system was the main pillar of our republic. In them no sectarianism should be taught whatever. Protestants wanted Catholic intruders kept out of the schools, but wanted prayer and Bible-reading to remain. From this Protestant blunder the time was coming when Catholics would hav turned the tables, for if they increased in the future as they had in the past the Catholics would hav a majority in the year 1900, and, as Father Heckler said, take the country and keep it.

The lecturer named many of the relics that are exhibited for money in Catholic countries and the stories that are told about them. He said the divine museum displays which had gulled and debased the credulous Catholics of Europe, furnishing marvelous instances of idolatry and lying, were to be petted and perpetuated in this country, and instead of being prosecuted for obtaining money by false pretenses their property must be exempt from a proper share in the public burden of taxes. He quoted from many sources to prove that the aim of the Catholics was to secure control of America, and that they were rapidly nearing the goal of their ambition. In conclusion he said: "Believing in the integrity and inflexible antagonism to church and state of the American people we consign to them the cause of truth and equity for ultimate triumph, for complete mental freedom is the foundation on which all future progress rests, and Secularists should renew their efforts to rescue the state from religious bigotry and ruin; for no truly republican form of government can consistently aid or recognize a tyrant of the skies or pander to his deputies of earth.

You can readily imagin that there is no meeting in Chicago which would please Bonfield half so well to suppress as the Chicago Secular Union, but high over our platform we stretch the American flag, under it reclines the cross. Our mottoes are all from Americans who are supposed to hav retained the esteem of the people—Washington, Grant, and Garfield—so there is no possible chance to trump up a charge of Anarchy on us; besides, the people who lecture and attend are often too high up in the social scale for Bonfield's minions to tackle. We are not allowed to distribute our advertising cards on the streets—there is an ordinance against it—but all the gospel meetings advertise in that way, and are never interfered with. I hav been to see the captain of our precinct, but can never get an interview.

Now the owner of the building from which we lease the Forum has started a species of petty annoyances which are likely to either involve us in interminable lawsuits or compel us to vacate. The Liberals of the country ought to hav and own a hall in great centers like Chicago and New York. The Episcopal cathedral is on the boulevard just one block below the Forum, which, in spite of its splendid music and wealthy membership, and owing to the numerous counteractions in Chicago, such as a score of theaters, innumerable Spiritual meetings, free sacred concerts, and all sorts of attractions, does not draw as well as the Forum, as we hav more people who are anxious to hear the gospel of common sense, so they hav doubtless "seen" Brother Berry, the owner, who is also an Episcopalian, and the petty annoyances calculated to freeze us out hav commenced. The orthodox would raise a mighty big purse to purge this city of the Secular Union, while we are actually warning these fools of their own folly—acting as a sort of John the Baptist in the wilderness to warn them of the approach of the Catholic serpent which will eventually crush out all their and our liberty.

Our London Letter.

A conference on evangelical preaching was held in London last week by the nonconformist, and furnished a good opportunity for mutual and self-glorification. Judging from the report of the speeches, the conclusion reached was that nonconformity is the only genuin form of Christianity, and though the other sects perhaps mean well, they are still groping along in the darkness of ignorance, and while they won't exactly be damned, they will hav to take a very back seat in the temple of the New Jerusalem. These luminaries of nonconformity may be very pious, but they make some astounding assertions, proving they know very little of any history, save that written by members of their own party. The chairman opened the ball with statements that hav been repeatedly shown to be utterly opposed to truth. He said "there has been no movement for the good of man, in his social, secular, or physical aspect, no movement, in the last fifteen hundred years, which did not originate in the Christian church, which has not been fostered and conserved by the Christian church. Therefore, when we hav a great work for the good of man you always find that the work has sprung from the men of the day who formed the church of the day; and it is the religion of Christianity permeating all our institutions, habits, thoughts, and legislation that has been of any value and good, and it has been to the absence of the Christian spirit and love that we owe so much of those gigantic evils which we are confronting to-day." And again, "I very much doubt whether slavery would hav been swept off the statute-book of this land if it had not been for the pulpit of that day." It seems these very truthful remarks were greatly applauded, which shows what very silly sheep these shepherds lead. No wonder the speaker, when treating of the artisans, said "they are a very different class of people from what those who went before them were. They hav enjoyed the advantages of education, they hav enjoyed to some extent that power of reading to which I hav alluded; but the pulpit is, to a certain extent, at a disadvantage in dealing with a congregation with that peculiarity." No doubt the pulpit is at a disadvantage in dealing with intelligent and well-read men, over whom it can hav no power—this can only be held over the average believer, who is just the reverse.

The great "I am," otherwise Dr. Joseph Parker, built up a straw man and labeled him Agnostic, after which he proceeded to treat him as Samson did the thousand Philistines, and as he used a similar weapon, he did fearful execution. Parker may be very clever, but scarcely sincere, when he is willing to accept the doctrin of evolution and throw over creation—though probably he is quite as honest as his fellows, the sum and substance of the creed being, little to do and good pay for it.

Another brother seemed to take rather a pessimistic view of the state of his branch of the church, as he dolefully complained, "There most be a sort of conspiracy on the part of Agnostics, on the one hand, and Catholics on the other, to treat us as if we had no locus standi at all, and might be ignored in all controversy of the higher kind." This is rather rough on the party, and his fellow-evangelicals must hav felt rather nettled at the cat being let out of the bag; better be abused than totally ignored. Altogether, the report of the proceedings is very amusing, though not particularly instructiv.

Mrs. Besant scored well at the school board elections, heading the poll in the Tower Hamlets division by nearly three thousand above the next successful candidate. She will do good work, but with her other and numerous engagements, she will find her hands full, and if not careful, will overtask her strength.

The Oaths bill passed through the House of Lords without amendment, but in its present state can scarcely be considered a final measure, though it appears to be looked upon as such by some of its supporters. Probably when a real and not sham Radical party is in power, it will be purged of its imperfections.

Mr. Foote's political weekly had rather a short lease of life. It was a pity it came to so quick an end, being smartly written, and containing much information. I suppose he finds himself quite sufficiently occupied with his Freethought papers and lectures.

J. D.

God and the Devil in the Court-Room.

Some two years ago, Sereno E. Todd, of Orange, N. J., employed Joe K. Field, a professional attorney and master in the court of chancery, to foreclose a mortgage for him. By delaying to bring suit on the bond within six months, the case became outlawed, so that Mr. Todd lost his entire claim. His attorney (Field) then sued him for the costs, about $145, which Todd refused to pay. At the trial, Todd (a layman-lawyer) managed the suit himself, and got his lawyer into a ludicrous predicament. From the notes of the reporter the following is copied:

Mr. Todd: If the court please, I would like to ask the witness some qualifying questions. As he appears in the capacity of client, sole witness, prosecutor, attorney, solicitor, and counsel, I wish to ask him if he believes in the sovereignty of the ever-living God?

Mr. Field: I do.

Mr. Todd: Do you believe in the divine authenticity of the Bible?

Ans. I believe in the inspiration of the scriptures according to the teaching of the Protestant Episcopal church.

Mr. Todd: Do you believe that God takes cognizance of our deliberations as a court?

Ans. I do.

Mr. Todd: When you were sworn, you appealed to God to help you tell the truth. Do you believe that God is present to help a witness to tell the truth?

Ans. Yes, I do.

Mr. Field: Well, when a witness perjures himself by testifying to falsehood, did God help him?

Mr. Field: No, he did not.

Mr. Todd: Then, who did help him to lie?

Mr. Field: The devil.

Mr. Todd: Then, it is your belief that Satan appears also at court?

Witness: Yes; certainly.

The court: I do not perceive the object of this?

Mr. Field: He wants to show whether or not I am an Infidel.

The court: I think you had better proceed to business.

Mr. Todd: Will the court allow me to ask one or two more questions? You say that you believe that God helps a witness to tell the truth?

Ans. I do.

Mr. Todd: Then you say, if the witness fails to tell the truth, the devil helped him to lie?

Ans. That is about what I said.

Mr. Todd: Then you believe that God is present to take cognizance of the deliberations of every court, and the devil comes also, and they are both tugging at the elbows of a witness—one trying to induce him to tell the truth, and the other making efforts to get the witness to perjure himself?

The court: Gentlemen, I shall rule that we proceed to business.

A few days ago the same parties had a suit in chancery, when Field called Mr. Todd to the witness-stand as a witness for them. In violation of the rules of jurisprudence, an attempt was made to retaliate for the puzzling questions that had been propounded at a previous suit. It is always expected that attorneys will protect their own witnesses. As soon as the witness had affirmed, Joe K. Field said to Mr. Todd: Do you believe in God?

Ans. Yes, sir.

Mr. Field: Do you believe the Bible?

Ans. I do.

The court: This is not allowable. You hav no right to accost one of your own witnesses in that way. [A sharp rebuke.]

Mr. Todd (to the court): I hope the court will allow the gentleman to ask all the questions he desires. I will answer them.

The court: This is a new departure in jurisprudence for an attorney to attempt to show up any fancied disqualification of his own witness in the court-room. It is not allowable.

What an impressiv cartoon could be drawn of God and the devil in a court-room, tugging at the elbows of every witness, God trying to induce him to tell the truth, and the devil trying to induce the witness to perjure himself!

REPORTER.

Tabooed Themes.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Among the many excellent thoughts of the your correspondents are a few statements that will hardly bear analysis.

"A lecture upon any of the sciences, intelligently delivered, would prove so interesting that Christian and Liberal alike would be most delighted and eager to hear more and read more of all natural phenomena, and thus the Christian be lured away from the supernatural and superstitious to the world of science, humanity, and liberty."

Thus hopefully does a gifted lady write.

Let us calmly examin the matter. I was personally acquainted with one of the finest lecturers upon science and Liberalism that ever stood upon a platform—William Denton. Were Liberals satisfied, after listening to a dozen of his lectures on geology, to allow him to depart without some of his radical lectures upon the Bible, god, devil, hell? Very seldom.

I hav attended Christian Chautauqua conventions where science was the rage. No one was inclined thereby to accept Liberalism; but many were confirmed in the conviction that "Nature is God's general Bible illustrating his special one, and that science is the child of Christianity."

Several years ago I persuaded a number of Liberal societies to engage the services of Prof. Edward Whipple to giv lectures on geology, astronomy, and cognate subjects. Professor Whipple is a well-versed scientist and fluent speaker. His lectures upon science created but little enthusiasm compared with his own lectures upon anti-theological subjects, or my anti-Christian, anti-Bible, anti-devil, anti-religious discourses. In several towns where I hav given illustrated lectures, astronomical, geological, acoustical, and lectures on electricity, Liberals hav said, "That is all well enough, interesting, and instructiv; but we want you to lay aside your apparatus and giv us a course of lectures against Christianity and the Bible."

In company with a Liberal friend I once attended a lecture in Chicago by Prof. Richard A. Proctor upon astronomy. My Liberal friend went sweetly to sleep! An educated Liberal, too. I seldom hav heard so good a lecture.

I hav known some lecturers upon science who are Liberal but who never say a word publicly in favor of Liberalism. Instead of "luring" Christians away from the church, they were "lulled" into the belief that science and Christianity are the best of friends.

An important part of the Freethinking lecturer's work is, in my judgment, to show the relationship between science, superstition, and Liberalism. If this requires the lecturer to "rudely" handle that Christian idol, the Bible—and I think it does—do not spare it, nor its Gods nor devils. Shake them up and do it thoroughly. Let not one little guilty God nor devil escape. Firmly do I believe with Gail Hamilton, "The more you shake the truth the more you shake it into place; but if you shake a falsehood it all shakes to pieces."

This world is broad enough for all of us. No two speakers hav the same gifts; each must do his own work in his or her own way.

This brings me to another point in our Liberalism: the right of each to advocate his or her own highest conceptions of truth, without regard to policy or the effect which such conceptions may hav upon others.

It may be all true, as our sister says, that the "devil is not a pleasant subject to speak on;" but hav we not as Liberals learned that truth is not always pleasant, while error is at this very hour fascinating and fashionable among millions of Christians? Garrison and Phillips rasped the church with their truth, their harsh, unwelcome truth.

Mrs. Ritchey also says, quoting: "The generous heart should scorn a pleasure that givs others pain." Henry C. Wright and other Abolitionists were generous-hearted, yet took great pleasure in striking down the "pet institution" of the South, and every blow they struck against slavery was like a trip-hammer of death upon the hearts of thousands of slaveholders.

If "the time is at hand for our lecturers to lay aside the destructiv part of Liberalism and take up the constructiv," thus showing what it is; if we should never again mention "Auld Nick," Jehovah, Bible, hell, heaven, and other unpleasant subjects, out of which our Christian opponents hav woven considerable poetry, I merely inquire, How will both sides be presented? The church is a great constructionist—a builder—but I really think I prefer a thousand times over, because a thousand times truer, destructiv Liberalism to constructiv Christianity. But, really, nature does not teach me that there are any such distinctiv processes going on. There is not a destructiv blow struck by Liberalism that is not death to error and helpful to truth. There was not a weed I killed in my garden this summer which was not an advantage to the plant I desired to preserve. I go to nature to learn my lesson, not to the church. The Christian church would be only too glad to hav Freethinkers stop their destructiv work, say no more about the devil, nor one word more about the Bible, nor the Sabbath, nor church dogma of any sort, in which case THE TRUTH SEEKER would "shut up shop," and commence the publication of a "popular science" weekly!

W. F. JAMIESON.

Wilber, Neb.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Provo, Utah, is the county seat of Utah county. It was settled in 1849, and the then "land of sand and sagebrush" has become a luxuriant garden city, with a population of about five thousand. The city is situated just below the mouth of Provo cañon, on the east bank of Utah lake. It has many fine buildings and some very pretty lawns and gardens. The streets are wide and hav an abundance of shade-trees.

The picturesque residence and beautiful gardens of that cultured Liberal and genial philanthropist, Dr. E. Hannberg, are a notable feature of Provo. The doctor and his amiable and accomplished wife entertained me in their beautiful home, which is replete with gems of art and has an extensiv library of choice literature. It was a delightful resting-place for the worn and weary Infidel pilgrim.

The principal manufactories of Provo are the woolen mills and three flour and two saw mills. The woolen mills comprise four large stone buildings, the cost of which, furnished and ready for work, was $200,000. There are 3,240 spindles, and machinery for carding, dyeing, and preparing 2,000 pounds of wool per day, and 215 looms capable of turning out fabrics of over $175,000 value each year.

The Mormons hav a capacious temple, and the Methodists a large church building. The Brigham Young Academy is located here, which he very liberally endowed some years before his death.

The lectures were delivered at the court house and created very much interest and discussion. The attendance was quite good, considering the great attractions at the Opera House. Provo is a most promising field of labor for Liberal lecturers. Here I met that earnest, practical Liberal worker, H. L. Brooks, one of friend Wm. Reynolds's chief aids-de-camp, a most indefatigable rustler. He conveyed me to his hospitable home at Lake Shore, near Utah lake.

About a dozen miles southwest of Provo, only a few miles from Spanish Forks, I had a view of the "baby factory," a large, long, three-story barracks owned by a devout Mormon, who until recently resided there with his thirteen wives. Soon after being sealed to No. 13 the activity of the United States marshals, in compliance with the Edmunds law, made it risky to "liv out his religion," and so he went on a mission. But he recently returned, to be welcomed and embraced, not by pretty young No. 13, but by a grim old United States marshal. He is now condoling with his dear brother saint, Geo. Q. Cannon, in the Salt Lake penitentiary, over the tribulations of Christ's Latter Day Saints.

Lake Shore is not a village, but simply a farming settlement, a beautiful land of fruit and flowers. The people are mostly engaged in agricultural pursuits. Butter and cheese are quite a specialty in this vicinity. Vineyards and orchards flourish, and a very large quantity of wine of the very finest quality is made. Potatoes yield from six hundred to eight hundred bushels to the acre, excellent in quality, very large and solid; one with a hollow center is a very rare exception.

My lectures were delivered at the school-house. Although the nights were dark and nearly all had to work very hard all day, the first night the house was filled, the second crowded to its utmost capacity, with intelligent men and women, intently eager listeners.

Brother Brooks is a miniature giant; he was a most powerful proselyter when an elder of the Mormon church, and has lost none of his zeal, energy, or magnetism now that he is a genuin Liberal. He has inspired the best people of his neighborhood with his own untiring spirit of energy and self-sacrifice. A committee was appointed to raise funds and decide on site and plan for a Liberal hall. The Liberals of Lake Shore are bound to succeed in this endeavor, and the hall, once erected, will not rot for lack of occupancy—lectures, discussions, science school, concerts, amateur dramatic entertainments, socials, balls, etc., will follow in constant succession—for a more genial, generous, jolly community cannot be found in all Utah.

At Murray, Utah, I delivered two more lectures, "The Bible in the Public Schools," and "The Trial of Satan." The way is opening up for a first-class practical Liberal organization in this place.

I found a pleasant home at Ogden, Utah, with the noble old brother John A. Jost, one of the veteran Liberals of Utah—a kindly, gentle nature, one who loves justice, delights in mercy, and revels in relieving distress or in any way contributing to others' happiness.

Ogden, the seat of Weber county, is a very handsome, thriving city, with a population of well-nigh ten thousand. The lack of depot accommodations has long been a drawback to Ogden, but after nineteen years' discussion the people hav yielded to the rapacious demands of the railroads, and the foundations of a Grand Union depot are laid.

The attendance on Sunday afternoon at the lecture was very small, but we had a fair gathering at night. There is much need of persistent, judicious distribution of Liberal literature in Ogden, and more especially of a thorough canvass of the city for subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other leading Liberal papers. Mormons are devoted to securing "the kingdom," and non-Mormons to securing the almighty dollar. The few Liberal friends find it hard, up-hill work, but the cause is onward, steadily gaining. There is no cause of discouragement; the difficulties should be a great incentiv to more determined, self-sacrificing effort.

I paid a second visit to Echo, Utah, a pretty little retreat, and delivered one lecture. I greatly enjoyed my visit, but was much grieved to find Brother Fred Hirst, the leading Liberal and most cultured scholar and scientist of this section, suffering from some disease of the tongue. Not alone every person in Echo and vicinity, but every employee on his division of the Union Pacific railroad, are intensely desirous of his speedy cure. Few men are more deservedly beloved or so highly esteemed as Fred Hirst, the Infidel station-agent at Echo.

There is a splendid opening for Liberal work in every part of Utah. Mormons once having received the light of truth, once convinced of the absurd fallacies of their faith and the corruption and tyranny of the theocracy, can only become Liberals. It is impossible for any man or woman to turn from Mormonism to any other Christian denomination. If ever this is done it is simply for hire. A lecturer thoroughly posted in Mormonism could do a great work in Utah, and effect more in less time than in any other field that I hav visited. A good, really able woman would be most efficient; one without "isms" or "ites," but devoted to the true principles of Liberalism, ready and willing to rough it; one who would love her work, visit the people, be one of them, and thus at every visit increase her influence and extend her acquaintance.

The best plan would be for all the workers in the territory to solicit subscriptions and raise a fund sufficient to engage a suitable lecturer for five or six months, and pay a lump sum for the entire term, in consideration of which all the time and efforts of such lecturer should be devoted exclusivly to Utah. The central committee should hav charge, and arrange the route so that there would be a lecture every night—no long jumps—so that the daytime could be devoted to visiting and becoming acquainted with the people. When a route or circuit is formed, let the lecturer go over it again and again, organizing local Liberal societies, science schools, and dramatic clubs, extempore speaking classes, etc., as opportunity offers.

Let the self-sacrificing workers meet once each month, extending an earnest invitation to the Liberals of means and influence to meet with them and consult as to the best plans and methods for carrying on the good work.

If this can be done, Utah will within two years become the banner stronghold of Liberalism in the United States.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Secular Union in Wisconsin.

From the Daily Review, Milwaukee.

At the coming session of the legislature an effort will be made to pass a bill removing church property from the list of property exempt from taxation. If such a bill is passed it will hav the effect of adding $3,000,000 to the taxable property of Milwaukee alone, and will add $42,500 to the annual revenue derived from taxation. In former years there hav been efforts to make church property taxable, but they hav always resulted in failures.

This winter there is to be something of a national movement, and the legislatures of several other states will hav bills before them similar to the one which will be introduced at Madison. In Illinois such will be the case, and it is said that Governor-elect Fifer favors such a bill and will use his influence to hav Illinois church property taxed. There will be a great deal of opposition to the scheme, of course, and the chances of such bills passing are not very bright, although a very determined effort will be made to get one through in this state.

From the Evening Wisconsin.

The perennial question of church taxation will bob up serenely in the incoming Wisconsin legislature as a matter of course. With about every fifth man in state legislatures it is a hobby either to attack or defend the proposition; and any measure relating to church taxation that can be introduced for legislativ discussion is welcomed—if for no other reason—because it givs a considerable number of members for and against an opportunity to air their eloquence in "threshing over old straw." Almost every veteran assemblyman and senator has his church-taxation speech sacredly preserved, though yellowed with years; and quite independent of any results that may follow, it is a rare delight to him to "get it off" just as frequently as opportunity permits.

As any church-taxation scheme thus has an inside track in gaining for itself a status and consideration in the legislature, so also there is no lack of willing minds and hands to do the necessary preliminary work of drafting bills. Just now, here in Wisconsin, it is the Secular Union—whatever that may be—that is moving in this preliminary work.

And right here the Wisconsin begs to say that the fundamental weakness in most plans of church taxation submitted to the legislature lies in the fact that they are the plans of avowed enemies of the church and of religion. The motiv back of such effort—antagonism against an established order that has done much for the world, and which most of the world reveres or at least respects as a good order—is unworthy and wrong. Its tendency is to arouse the activ personal hostility of every friend of religious institutions quite irrespectiv of the question whether he approves or disapproves the rule of taxing church property. The sort of opposition to church taxation that is in its real intent warfare against religion, is never going to succeed in this country in putting church property on the books of the tax-collector.

Yet, on grounds of equity and governmental consistency, and even on religious grounds, there is no reason whatever why churches should not be taxed. The Wisconsin believes they should be, for at least three reasons here briefly given:

Because the state under our republican government has no right to be the patron of the church in any sense; it is no part of the function of the state to aid directly or indirectly in the religious teaching or training of the people.

Because, also, by church exemption the precedent is established and the door is opened for an indefinit extension of the rule of tax exemptions, unjust to every citizen who pays tax; and there are no end of enterprises—benevolent, charitable, educational, fraternal, recreativ, etc.—able to find some real justification in claiming right to be exempt from public tax, so long as the churches are free.

Finally (and this third reason is properly from the religious rather than the Secular standpoint), freedom from taxation amounts to a direct premium offered to religious societies to accumulate property, rear costly edifices, adopt imposing rituals, become exclusiv and aristocratic, and thus to separate from and lift themselvs above the great mass of men to minister to whom, primarily, the church was instituted. The influence of the church in saving men and women from wretchedness and sin has been in inverse ratio to the wealth of the church ever since church history began to be written. And thus it comes that the state does a religious, not less than a Secular, wrong in encouraging by the method of non-taxation any needless accumulation of ecclesiastical property.

Whenever church taxation shall be intelligently and earnestly and honestly urged solely on the ground that it is just and right, it will very likely be enacted into law in all the states as it has been already in California—because in the long run right wins anyhow. But so long as the apparent motiv on the part of those who most urge taxation is mere animosity against the church as an institution, so long the effort to tax churches will fail and ought to fail.

The Bible Should Go.

From the Denver News.

The decision of a Wisconsin court that the Bible may be read in the public schools of that state, without comment, will suit some people, but will not be commended by the truest friends of our system of popular education. The schools belong to the people and should be conducted so as to be acceptable to all, or at least so as to be free from reasonable objections. The most effectiv enemy of American public schools is he who insists upon the introduction of whatever will offend the most sensitiv conscience, for he thus places a valid weapon in the hands of opposition. The code of morality that governs the world is peculiar to no creed, and may be inculcated without reasonable offense to anyone. Our schools are intended to make good citizens and safe members of society. They are not intended to influence or direct religious tendencies. That is a matter for home and church influence. It must be avoided in a system that is sustained in part by general taxation. The public school must be maintained and therefore must be free from valid objections based upon religious scruples. This nation cannot exist without popular intelligence, a fact that makes our free schools indispensable.

Consolation for the Clergy.

From the Evening Sun.

Some very gloomy pictures of the religious state of our town were drawn by the Protestant clergymen who held a conference on the subject this week. They alleged that a vast multitude of our people never go to church, and totally neglect all religious duties. Some of them are Infidels and others profligates, but the greater part are merely heedless of those matters in which the clergy are interested. There is no doubt of the truth of this charge. New York is not a center of piety, and the mass of its denizens do not liv according to the teachings of the church. But let not our clerical friends overlook the fact that our town does not stand alone in this respect. Is there in all Christendom to-day any great city that can be said to be devoted to the faith and practice of religion? Surely nobody who knows London, the mightiest city on the globe, will say that it is. Verily, nobody will say that Paris, which comes next in order, is. Nobody will say that Vienna is, or that Berlin is, or that Liverpool is, or that Rome is. In all of these cities, and in hundreds of others, the clergy make the same complaints that are made by their brethren in this city. They giv way to lamentations over the neglect of religion. We hear the same complaint about many large American cities—New Orleans, San Francisco, Chicago, and even Boston. Let us, therefore, hav fair play for our town in this respect. The outlook for religion is not more gloomy here than it is elsewhere.

How the Clergy Like to Hav Things.

From the Standard.

The Rev. Samuel Maude, vicar of Needham Market, in the kingdom of Great Britain, is a clergyman who believes that children—that is, children of the lower classes, of course—should submit themselvs to all their governors, teachers, spiritual pastors, and masters, and order themselvs lowly and reverently to all their betters, as per the catechism instructed. One morning lately Mr. Maude met a common little boy of his parish, near school-time, and ordered him to go to school. The little boy insolently replied, "I don't go to your school now;" whereupon the reverend gentleman "seized hold of him, shook him, and wrung his ears. The boy caught hold of the palings, but Mr. Maude pulled him away by putting his knee in his back, and dragged him into the school-room."

A generation ago this might hav been thought rather a delicate attention on Maude's part than otherwise; but things are different now, and the boy's mother impudently summoned Mr. Maude before the petty sessions, where another clergyman presided. They had to find Maude guilty—there was no help for it. So they fined him sixpence. And then the reverend magistrate addressed the boy's mother in this fashion: "I think it is monstrous hard that clergymen are to be dictated and dominated over in this way. It is simply abominable that for holding up our little finger we are to be brought before the magistrate for assault.'

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL FOR 1889.

What do you think of the prospects of Liberalism in the country?

What has been your experience as a lecturer throughout the country?

Where are the most Liberals, and in what section of the country is the best work for Liberalism being done?

In your opinion, what relation do Liberalism and Prohibition bear to each other?

Do you think that Liberals should undertake a reform in the marriage and divorce laws and relations?

Should Liberals organize?

Should Liberals vote on Liberal issues?

Do you think Liberals would leave their present political parties to found one whose platform would be the Nine Demands of Liberalism?

Can, or ought the Liberals and Spiritualists to unite?

Which do you consider the more dangerous to American institutions, the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party) or the Roman Catholic church?

What ought the Liberals to do to make this a free country legally, and to spread their doctrins?

What is your opinion of the Christian religion and the Christian church?

Why did you leave the church, if you ever belonged, and what influence was most effectiv in inducing you to do so?

What do you advise as a remedy for economic troubles?

That is a pretty formidable series of questions, and they cover ground enough for several volumes; in fact, they cover about all the grounds of difference between Liberals. But the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER valorously asked them of more than forty of the prominent writers and speakers of our cause, and twenty-four answered them in season to appear in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for next year, which periodical is now ready for the buyer. The contributors to this symposium are:

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.	J. H. BURNHAM.
JAMES PARTON.	L. K. WASHBURN.
HELEN H. GARDENER.	ELLA GIBSON.
S. P. PUTNAM.	SUSAN H. WIXON.
CHARLES WATTS.	JOHN PECK.
E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.	W. S. BELL.
PARKER PILLSBURY.	E. C. WALKER.
ROBERT C. ADAMS.	MRS M. A. FREEMAN.
J. D. SHAW.	DR JULIET H. SEVERANCE.
F. M. HOLLAND.	MRS. E. D. SLENKER.
E. B FOOTE, JR., M.D.	COL. J. R. KELSO.
LUCY N. COLMAN.	G. H. DAWES.

The symposium fills nearly seventy of the ANNUAL's large pages, and we do not think that such a brilliant and able company of writers has ever before been gathered into one volume. These men and women, whose names are household words not only in Liberalism, but in law and literature, hav freely contributed to answering the questions which oftenest vex and confuse the Liberals of the country, and hav given them their honest thought condensed into epigrams. Certainly nothing like this symposium has ever been known in the literature of heresy.

But this is not all. Under the head of "Ingersoll and Shakspere," there are more than thirty pages of the most interesting comparisons of prose and poetry ever contributed to the pages of any periodical. The words of the world's greatest orator are set alongside the verses of the world's greatest poets. Shakspere, Chaucer, Spenser, Drayton, Drummond, Milton, Butler, Congreve, Schiller, Goethe, Shelley, Byron, Wordsworth, Percival, Pierpont, Dana, Hugo, Massey, Swinburne, and even Oscar Wilde, are matched against the orator to show that the nineteenth century is as fortunate in poetry and oratory as any that hav preceded it. So far as possible the subjects chosen are the same. It is a great collection, and will instruct, and be useful in dozens of ways.

The Calendar for the ANNUAL has been revised, and brought down to date, and the History of Freethought for the year is full and truthful.

The frontispiece of the ANNUAL is a magnificent picture of the statue of Giordano Bruno. The best picture of the Lick Observatory ever given to the public has been transferred to the ANNUAL, as also the representation of the greatest telescope in the world; both the gift to science of a Freethinker. The other illustrations are pretty and pleasing, and become the work, which is printed in the same elegant manner as heretofore.

Every subscriber when renewing his subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER should drop an extra twenty-five cents into the letter for an ANNUAL. No such amount of reading can be had anywhere else for twice the money, and the names of the contributors assure the Liberal public of the quality of the contributions.

That Sunday Bill.

The various forces at work for and against a national puritan Sunday—which the pietists erroneously term the Sabbath—had a hearing in Washington last week before Senator Blair's committee on Education and Labor. The bill to which they spoke was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Blair last May, and is given in full in the report, elsewhere, of the proceedings.

The parties represented were the promoters of the bill, the American Sabbath Union, then in convention in Washington, and the Seventh Day Adventists, whose advocate spoke for the Jews as well as for his own sect. The American Secular Union was represented by J. B. Wolff, who resides in Washington. Mr. Wolff was the only secular speaker, while the Christians had several advocates. The superintendent of the "Sabbath Observance of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union" was there and read a paper which asked Congress to stop the running of trains on Sunday, because the states could not do it; a Washington reverend spoke for the workingman (poor workingman, how he is loved!); Mr. Cleveland's pastor tried to convince the committee that our Sunday is really the primeval Sabbath; a Chicago preacher also tapped his heart and let it bleed for the laborer who is so cruelly oppressed that he has to work on Sunday for pay; and the Seventh Day Adventist advocate wanted the bill amended so that his fellow-religionists and the Jews could carry on business on Sunday. The most unique specimen of argument was by an ex-officer of a railroad company. He said that Sunday trains can be abolished without injury either to the railroad companies or to the people at large. As to the transcontinental trains, he would get over the difficulty by having several lie-over stations, where passengers could spend Sunday, the railroad companies furnishing them with free hotel accommodation. As to live stock trains, he held that they should never be run for more than forty-eight hours continuously. As to milk trains, he said that the Saturday milk is not delivered to New York consumers before Monday; and, as their extreme limit is one hundred miles, that milk can be forwarded on Sunday nights. As to Sunday mail trains, they were unnecessary, as telegraphs were resorted to in cases of emergency. It is amazing how ingenious these bigots are in devising methods of getting around difficulties in the way of their domineering over their neighbors.

Mr. Wolff, in his vigorous and sledge-hammer manner, rightly characterized the movement for the bill as one full of danger to this government, or any other. "It is," he said, "an attempt to do by indirection what the letter of the law forbids. There are only four matters of morals upon which the government may legislate, and this is not one of them. The demand that we shall hav a civil Sabbath which is made here I do not object to; but there is also the demand for an ecclesiastical or religious Sabbath, which I do object to, the two factions making common cause to secure the adoption of the law under consideration." Mr. Wolf called attention to the fact that the Catholic branch of the delegation, or of the influence back of the delegation, does not enforce observance of the Sabbath day as asked for here, but permits all sorts of entertainments and sports in connection with the religious services of the day. In demanding that he should surrender his rights for the non-observance of a religious day because he was in a minority, they made it right for him, when in a majority, to invade the rights of the delegation to observe the day as they felt it should be observed. It was this that made it a dangerous precedent to establish. His speech, the substance of which we giv in the report, evoked compliments from his opponents for its ability.

The committee will now deliberate upon the matter, and very probably, if Senator Blair can compass it, will report favorably upon the bill. Senator Blair is as great a religious bigot as New Hampshire ever produced, and in all these fanatical movements uses his senatorial position to help along his religion. But several senators hav already assured the Secular Union that they will vote against the bill, and that there is but little likelihood of its passing the Senate. However, the bill must be watched and fought at every stage of its progress. Let the arguments against it be spread before the country as extensivly as those for it, and the fact of its introduction will by no means be a total evil.

A Protestant Victory of Votes.

The Protestants hav won in their fight with the Catholics over the schools of Boston. The election occurred on the 11th instant, and though the candidates were the regularly nominated Republican and Democratic office-seekers, the former stood for anti-Catholic and the latter for pro-Catholic sympathies. The women decided the election. The motiv moving them was the attempt of the Romanists to control the schools in the interest of the Catholic church, banishing a school history because it referred to the sale of indulgences in terms displeasing to them, and displacing a teacher who explained the meaning of indulgences contrary to the definition of the church. For four months the campaign has gone on, the Protestant women listening night after night to "no popery" speeches, caucusing for their candidates, and arousing the enthusiasm and prejudices of the people in all possible ways. "Elect no more Roman Catholics to the school board!" has been their cry, and of the candidates whom they presented, while two are Hebrews, not one is a Catholic. Of the sixteen school committeemen who hold over eight are Catholics, and this the Protestant party claims is a sufficient number in a body whose total membership is twenty-four. The Catholic women, under orders of the priests, took the other side, and worked as hard for their candidates as did the Protestants for theirs.

The Herald describes the scenes at the polling-places as unique. More earnest workers than the women, it says, were never seen. The way in which they buttonholed new arrivals and forced their attention upon them would hav done credit to a veteran "heeler." Their presence at the polls, too, was conduciv to good order, and at one place a row was stopped by the policeman exclaiming that there were ladies present and talk of the kind being indulged in was out of place. The colored women voted the Republican or Protestant ticket, and though when one of the dusky sisters and an Irish lady met the conversation was apt to be excited, no casualties among the female voters are reported. The women voted with as much intelligence as the men, and only in one instance, quickly suppressed, did the roughs attempt to annoy them.

It remains to be seen what the Protestants will do with their victory. If they drive all Catholic teaching out of the schools, they will do well. If they replace it with Protestant dogmas, the change is not of much account. Fanatical puritanism is as vicious as fanatical Catholicism, and the cause of true liberty is not subserved by supplanting either by the other.

In Wisconsin.

That is a queer editorial which we copy in another place from the evening Wisconsin, regarding the effort to be made this winter in the legislature of Wisconsin to repeal the law exempting church property from taxation. The Wisconsin favors such a bill because it is only right that the churches should bear their share of the public burden, and it opposes it because the Freethinkers are also in favor of it. A more spiteful, hypocritical, malicious, and mean spirit than that which moves the editor of the Wisconsin it would be difficult to find.

It is true that bills of the same kind hav time and again been brought up in the Wisconsin legislature by Freethinking members, and it is true that such bills hav failed of passage. But that does not prove that the bills will always be defeated. The world is moving, and justice is being slowly accomplished. Wisconsin moves along with the procession, and many men in that state who once regarded church taxation as a sacrilege, now believe it to be but simple justice. And the fact that in one city alone the treasury would benefit in so large a sum as $42,500, is a powerful incentiv to do this justice. The piling up of ecclesiastical property, held because untaxed, is becoming a source of danger in Wisconsin, as in other states, and the predominance in certain counties of the Catholics, who hav ruined several public schools and built up parochial schools, make it extremely desirable to patriotic citizens that ecclesiastical domination should be overthrown. In no way can this be done so effectually and so justly as by refusing to longer grant immunity from taxation.

We would recommend that every Freethinker who reads this should write, and induce all his friends to write, to the member of the legislature from his district urging that official to vote for the bill. Or let every Freethinker prepare such a letter, and get as many voters to sign it as he can. Such documents will stimulate the legislator, and, perhaps, help him to make up his mind.

Why Don't They Prosecute?

The officers of Anthony Comstock's Society hav been attacked again and again, charged with blackmail, and defied to come into court and clear their character. Lum Smith, of Philadelphia, against whom Comstock and Britton both brought suit for the purpose of bluffing Smith, has time and time again tried to hav his cases brought to trial, but each time unsuccessfully, both of the plaintiffs running away when served with summonses to attend. They cannot be brought to face the music.

The latest attack upon them was published in the World of December 9th. It charges Britton with systematic levying of blackmail upon gamblers, and implicates Comstock. It is made by Michael J. Sullivan, who was employed by the Society as clerk and agent for two years. The affidavit which he has furnished the papers states that upon entering the service of the Society he was at once set to work securing evidence against gamblers, the force consisting of himself, Joseph A. Britton, George E. Oram, and Anthony Comstock. Britton, says Sullivan in in his affidavit, lived in "almost oriental luxuriousness," and pretended that he was in the diamond business, opening what he called a "private office" in room 42, Temple Court, as "Andrews & Co., dealers in diamonds and precious stones," many of which were believed to hav come as spoils, or from thieves. The affidavit goes on to say:

"A great many things occurred during the years that elapsed between 1885 and the present autumn which put me in possession of facts to prove that Britton was receiving thousands of dollars each month from the different gambling-houses in the city. I will giv here the amount which each of the different gamblers has to pay, or at least do pay, to Britton: Faro houses, $100 per month; pool-rooms, $50; 'policy' dens, $10; Chinese 'fan tan' dens, $10. As nearly as can be calculated from my experience in that Society, Britton receives in the neighborhood of $120,000 annually as 'hush money' in this manner."

Comstock is also deeply involved, the affidavit charging him with constantly visiting Britton's office, which Sullivan says was a rendezvous of gamblers, policy dealers, and bookmakers, and on one occasion after the refusal of a bookmaker to pay tribute to Britton, raiding the bookmaker's place of business. "Seeing all the pool-rooms that paid for 'protection' flourishing and running with open doors," continued Mr. Sullivan, "I resolved that I would obtain the evidence against the places Britton was 'protecting,' and did obtain such evidence in twenty-one cases, comprising 'eight faro banks, twelve pool-rooms, and one policy shop." The affidavit enumerates each place and its location, and the number of tables and gamblers. This evidence, Mr. Sullivan alleges, was handed to Anthony Comstock as chief officer of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, by him, as an agent of the society. "Mr. Comstock informed me," says the affidavit, "that he knew both Oram and Britton were receiving blackmail, and that he would soon hav them both out of office. But the gamblers 'protected' by the officers of the society were not interfered with, nor were Britton and Oram dismissed."

Sullivan was dismissed from the service of the society last October, being called into the presence of H. E. Simmons, chairman of the executiv committee, and Anthony Comstock. "Mr. Simmons," continues the affidavit, "was armed with a large number of reports of detectivs who had shadowed me night and day for months. Anthony Comstock charged me in the presence of Mr. Simmons with having made an 'affidavit' or article derogatory to himself. I denied having executed such a document. On the day I was suspended," continues the affidavit, "all the gambling houses suddenly ceased, but the next day, when I was no longer an employee of the society, they were running in the same open manner." Mr. Sullivan's affidavit concludes: "Should the district attorney, or the state attorney, or the legislature, require incontrovertible proof of all I hav herein set forth I am ready to appear with the witnesses and truthfully answer any and all questions that may be put to me touching the subject."

These are very substantial, pointed, and serious charges made against the agents of the society, and agree with the statements of Brooklyn's district attorney made some months ago, that the agents of the society were nothing but blackmailers. But Comstock, nor the society, nor Britton, will prosecute. William C. Beecher, counsel for the society, says: "The society is not libeled. If the people he has libeled choose to take it up they can do so." Comstock says: "Sullivan has been very careful not to publish a libel against me. I hav no cause of action. It is for Mr. Britton to proceed against him." Britton says: "I shall do nothing to Sullivan." In the World of December 10th, 11th, and 12th, Sullivan reiterates his charges, giving additional details. Touching Comstock's assertion that he has no ground to cause Sullivan's arrest, the latter holds that if Mr. Comstock's statement that Sullivan opened letters be true he (Sullivan) has committed an offense against the postal service of the United States, of which Mr. Comstock is an agent, and for which he can arrest him. "He can also arrest Britton," says Sullivan, but "Will he dare to do so?" he asks. Sullivan claims, also, in answer to another charge against him by Comstock, that he had a perfect right to use the letter-heads of the society, and that if Mr. Comstock will over his own signature charge him with using these letter-heads for an illegal or criminal purpose he (Sullivan) will hav him (Comstock) arrested, and he adds:

"Mr. Comstock either willfully, or otherwise, misunderstands a great many of my statements. He has all the documents which I furnished him, and should know, knowing me as he does, what I intend to charge, and whom I intend to accuse. I hav never stated that the Society for the Suppression of Vice received $120,000, or any other sum, annually, from gamblers. I stated that I calculated that that was the amount that Mr. Britton received. I did state that he was enabled to procure this blackmail through his power to wield the society's displeasure. I know as a matter of fact, and can prove it, that 'unprotected' violators of the law were prosecuted by the society, and 'protected' violators were allowed to pursue their nefarious practices unmolested. In some special instances it might be found necessary to cover up their tracks by making pretended raids on some one or two of the 'protected.' If, as Mr. Comstock says, he did not think my testimony was deserving of credit, why did he take me with him as a witness, long after I had left the office, as he did in the case of the Jersey City 'sawdust' swindlers? Why did he not employ other help to secure corroborativ evidence against the places I informed him of? Besides this, Mr. Comstock knows very well that my testimony was not alone and uncorroborated. This evidence was secured after Comstock knew all that was alleged against me to my discredit, and yet I was not at the time removed from the society. I shall at a future day hav something further to say in these matters, but I prefer telling them for the first time in a court of justice."

If Sullivan is lying, as Comstock and Beecher and Britton charge, why do they not prove it? If they are all honest men it can be shown. Their indisposition to make the attempt looks bad. Soapboiler Colgate and his pious confreres should look after the character of their trusted agents. The public never had a very high opinion of them, and if they do not clear themselvs from these accusations, the charter of the society may be in danger. It ought to hav been repealed years ago, or rather it ought never to hav been granted. Let Comstock look to himself.

The Evangelization of New York.

The assortment of Protestant sects which met in this city week before last to consider ways and means of converting the inhabitants of the town to the Protestant version of Christianity has a large undertaking on hand. It seems that in 1840 there was one Protestant church to every 2,000 of population; in 1880 one to 3,000, and in 1887 one to 4,000. Yet the present church edifices are more than sufficient, as their seating capacity is 300,000, while only about 100,000 attend the services. Manifestly, therefore, the problem is not how to build more churches, but how to fill the ones already erected.

The increase in the population of New York is largely from immigration. The most of this is Roman Catholic—Irish, German, and Italian. Of course the Protestants can never hope to get these folks into their churches, for the reason that the Roman church satisfies them better, giving them more freedom of action, and assuring them of heaven by the performance of certain church duties, the chief of which is the payment on demand of small sums of money. When they leave their mother religion they usually become indifferent Infidels.

Taking the population of the city at 1,600,000, and the membership of the two chief branches of Christianity at 600,000—a large estimate—there are about a million people in this town who do not go to church. How they shall be gathered in, is the problem of Protestantism. We hav a few ideas on the subject.

First. The ministers must cease preaching hell. The millions do not believe in the existence of such a place and they laugh at the fossils who are forever dangling the lurid scarecrow before their eyes.

Second. The ministers must stop talking about the love of God for all his children. The million sneer at such talk when other millions are starving, other millions are dying of pestilence, and other millions are wretched with disease.

Third. The ministers must drop theology—the fall, the atonement, the salvation by ecclesiastical machinery. Theology, to the millions, is what the preachers liv by, the same as lawyers liv by expounding the law. And as no one goes near a lawyer till he needs his services, so no one helps support a minister till he is obliged to. And the point is, that the million cannot recognize the obligation.

Fourth. The ministers should preach on subjects of contemporaneous human interest. All subjects making for moral and intellectual progress should be used as texts. They should let politics alone. They should quit trying to enforce their ideas on the people by legislation. They should set an example of honesty by paying their taxes. They should come down from their high and mighty pedestals. Their pretensions are seen through and laughed at. They hav lost their grip. They are behind the times. Few care more for their opinions than for the epitaphs in old moss-grown graveyards. They are always shrieking Don't, and crying to the people to Come back. Thou shalt not! is their supreme commandment. The people hav grown tired of these cries, and will no longer listen. If they desire to hav their words heeded, let them reform. Let them tell us something they know; something they hav found out themselvs. Let them instruct instead of frightening. In short, let them cease being Christians and become men—resign as preachers and educate themselvs as teachers.

The people of large cities hav grown by Christianity; they are ahead of it. They do not believe in it; they do not feel the need of it. It is a past issue with them. They speak of it with tolerant pity—something their fathers had along with stage-coaches and hand-reapers—or that they themselvs had with the mumps and measles. These are the reasons that the churches are not full. To convert the city to Protestantism, Protestantism will hav to cease being Christian.

Mr. Washburn, as all of our readers know, is one of the brightest, sharpest, wittiest, and most eloquently earnest of the Freethought speakers and writers, and this lecture is one of his best.

Letters from Friends.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Dec. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: To-day is the sixth anniversary of the death of the great and good D. M. Bennett, founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I remember as well as if it were but yesterday when the news came announcing Mr. Bennett's death, and many a time since hav I recalled the noble and honest deeds he performed in behalf of Freethought and humanity, and gazed with admiration upon his manly features, which occupy a conspicuous place in our album of the world's intellectual heroes. Several days ago I came across a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER dated Dec. 16, 1882, several days after the death of Mr. Bennett, and as I read over the beautiful and touching tributes from those who held him in high esteem, tears would frequently come to my eyes. Mr. Bennett did a great work and did it well, and I feel that though he is dead, he has left to the great cause for which he so faithfully labored a legacy in the remembrance of his virtues, his services, his honor, and his truth.

Yours for humanity, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Nov. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with much interest Colonel Ingersoll on "Robert Ellsmere," though I regret to say I hav not read "Robert Ellsmere." Being an enemy of all tyranny, social, spiritual, or political, and hating one kind just as much as another, I am sorry to observe that in one place our great orator does not lay the blame on the right shoulders, though I begin to hope he soon will. "Nothing," he says, truly enough, "is more cruel than orthodox theology," and then follows a very unfortunate instance: "Think for a moment of the manner in which charities are distributed, the way in which the crust is flung at Lazarus." That is not the fault of orthodox theology, but of political economy, with which theology was never on very good terms. When the church distributed charity, and so far as she does it now, her fault is not unkindness; but encouraging dependent poverty by indiscriminate giving of alms. She deserves the blame of making beggary chronic instead of occasional, but not that of quarreling with her own work. Most justly does Colonel Ingersoll say immediately afterward that the country—any country—is "divided between certain successful robbers, flatterers, cringers, and crawlers, and that in consequence of such division a large majority are tenants, renters, occupying the surface of the earth only at the pleasure of others." Colonel Ingersoll is making commendable progress toward Anarchism, but, to be perfect, he wants to perceive that all this is the fault of the state primarily and only secondarily of the church. The church is a very successful "flatterer, cringer, and crawler," but in America, at least, she is hardly powerful enough to be a robber. The state is; and to the state therefore belongs the blame, if, as Colonel Ingersoll also remarks, "the same is true in this country" as in England.

What, art mad? A man may see how this world goes with no eyes. Look with thine ears!

MR. EDITOR: Hav just finished reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER, November 24th, Mr. J. H. Wood's letter, in which he reviews Mr. Hacker's land and other theories at some length.

According to Mr. Wood, "taxation," instead of land ownership, usury, etc., is the great, overshadowing evil of our time, and he tires not in repeating it. Will Mr. Wood, in another letter, pray tell us how he would hav this government overhauled so as to obviate the necessity of taxation? Would he hav it pay its expenses with money—say, greenbacks—of its own furnishing? Or would he do away with civil government altogether, substituting Anarchy instead? On either horn of such a dilemma it would not seem an easy place to hang long.

O my fellow-statesman, Brother Wood! With that big no-taxation beam in thine own eye, how canst thou see to pluck those fantastic land-distribution and non-usury motes out of Father Hacker's?

Mr. Wood thinks the Prohibitionists will take control of the Republican party, "just as the Whig and Free Soil party were married to the Abolition party." As a matter of common history, some five or six years before the war, the Whig and Free Soil parties were reorganized into the Republican party. Until and during a greater part of the war that party abjured the name and purpose of an Abolition party through its leaders, and notably by their chief in his first inaugural in 1861. Slavery was finally killed through a military necessity; the only alternativ being the destruction of that institution or the Union.

Yes, slavery was absolutely abolished, as we had supposed. But not so, thinks Mr. Wood. Hear him: "The colored people were never slaves more than they are now;" then, as if the statement would acquire additional force by amplifying, "The colored people South are to-day in precisely the same condition that they were before the war!" Is not that putting it a little wild?

What if Mr. Wood's theories are as much afloat as his facts?

C. H. GREENE.

BARRE, MASS., Nov. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent "Pericles" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th, page 747, says: "I know the ignorant and vulgar cannot understand this," that is, his theory of God. Now, I think I understand it perfectly, but do not agree with him when he says "science has given us a new, a greater god;" then defines "that new, or rather that oldest of all the gods," as "the great cosmic unity," and after thus defining this new or old god as the great cosmic unity, he calls it, or refers to it, eight times in the next thirteen succeeding lines as a being of gender, by applying to it the personal pronouns "he," "him," and "his."

Would it not hav been better for "Pericles" to hav stuck to the neuter pronoun "it," in his remarks on cosmic unity, instead of flying back to Christianity and pagan mythology to personify it as a man or god? It would be just as sensible to call it she and her, and make of it a goddess, as did the Greeks and some other nations, for "Pericles" well knows that the great cosmic unity embraces all genders, if it embraces any.

The trouble with "Pericles" is, as with many others, in calling this cosmic unity "god." He cannot divest himself (when he calls it god) of the old sex idea of man or masculinity, so he invests it with the nomenclature of the churches, thereby thinking he is describing a new god, that they, and we—"the vulgar and ignorant"—cannot understand, when he is only using their appellativs under a new definition of the word "god."

Is it not a great mistake for people who do not believe in an anthropomorphic God to use the same word, "god," as those do who do believe in him, and then attempt to argue away their own change in the meaning of, or new use to which they put, the word God? Why will they endow the material universe—their "it"—with the attributes of the gods of the Christian and pagan worshipers, even calling it—the universe—God? The only way for Liberals, or those who disbelieve in gods, is to discard the word entirely; then they will rid themselvs of their contradictions, and escape the ridicule they so justly merit for their seeming inconsistencies.

U. S. MILITARY HOME, WIS., Nov. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the article, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 17th, by my friend Nelson Hunt, it is implied that the recent "exposure" of Spiritualism by the "Fox girls" was brought about by a liberal expenditure of the root of all evil by the orthodox churches. If such is a fact, I can assure them they hav put their money to a silly use, for I know that the tippings and rappings are not the result of trickery.

Some thirty-odd years ago, when Spiritualism was raging in Cincinnati, I used to take a hand in the game, and became fully convinced there was a power in the will that was not understood at that time, and I am as much in the dark to-day as I was then.

Somebody has told us there is a natural (physical) body and a spiritual (mental) body. The Spiritualists say, I believe, that when the natural body dies the spiritual is born. I entertain a somewhat similar idea, but the result is widely different from that which they and all the orthodox churches teach:

I believe, with all due deference to the learned in theological lore, that at death the spirit—the mind—is wafted off to the ethereal regions, and from thence is absorbed by those living on the earth; some organizations and temperaments imbibing much more of this mind-matter than others, which accounts for the great diversity of intelligence manifest, also for the gradual advancement of the human family and the well-known fact that history is ever repeating itself. Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and Napoleon Bonaparte were but the reappearances of the mind-matter thrown off by Joshua of old and many others. "Whatever is, has been, and will be again; there is nothing new under the sun."

JORDAN, MINN., Dec. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: During the early part of the year 1886 a writer over the signature "McArthur" wrote a series of letters entitled, "Examination of Church History," being letters to a Catholic friend, which were published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I then thought that the author was a man of more than ordinary ability, as his letters could not hav been other than the result of much reading and research.

Now I feel an intense curiosity to know whether it can be possible that this is the same McArthur who wrote the letters referred to above, and the McArthur who of late has been writing such unmitigated, nonsensical trash on the subject of Spiritualism, as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Spiritualists claim that the spirits of the dead can and do communicate with the living. But if spirits do not possess a material or physical body, it is absolutely certain that they cannot possess the organs of speech. How, then, in the name of common sense can they communicate with the living?

So far as I can learn, and judging from all I hav seen written on the subject, it has yet to be proved that spirits are not merely the creatures or creations of the human imagination, or of diseased and perverted minds.

If the human body possesses a soul or spirit that can liv after the body dies—and the spirit desires to communicate with its friends who are still living—why cannot the spirit communicate with its friends directly instead of through a medium? To my mind the answer is perfectly plain; in the first place, because there are no spirits to communicate with anybody, and in the next place, because such a course on the part of the spirits would knock mediumistic séances higher than Guilderoy's kite—it would deprive the mediums and their confederates of their nice little dark-closet games of trickery and fraud, and of their opportunities for cheating their demented dupes out of their money. But it seems as if some people like to be humbugged, and are willing to pay for the privilege. And upon what other theory can we account for people, otherwise intelligent, who patronize and support the churches and the preachers? By the way, what has become of the prayerful and tearful George Chainey—has he evacuated this vale of tears and ascended to some ethereal sphere, and in making the ascent did he cast his mantle upon the shoulders of McArthur? or did the Burr family hav a first mortgage on it?

THOMAS KNOTT.

SABETHA, KAN., Nov. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After waiting a reasonable length of time to hear something of the American party, I was most delighted to find a friend to American sentiments speaking from San Francisco over the nom de plume of "Formerly a Republican."

This is exactly my present condition politically. I see nothing promised from either of the old parties which will carry out the principles to which we are so much devoted. I find many from both the old parties, and a few from both the labor and Prohibition branches, who are ready to join in a faithful and determined movement for honesty, liberty, and justice.

General Harrison, his cabinet and allies, will never encourage one of our principles, which are opposed to his individual religious sentiments and opposed to the prejudices of the very factions which placed him in power—I mean the church and other influential corporate powers.

The church will never allow a bill to pass favoring our Nine Demands, and the banks will never allow the postal savings banks bill to even go to a third reading. They will send delegations to Washington in twenty-four hours after such bills hav passed a second reading, and kill them while in the hands of the committee. Our only hope is to organize, and organize now in every state and territory, getting our forces in readiness for the great struggle of 1892.

We may elect a few of our advocates to positions of trust and influence, and, if nothing more, can force a hearing for our American ideas before the public. These are purely political measures, and must be settled through the medium of politics.

For any party to succeed hereafter, it only wants a principle for its platform, and that principle to be from the hearts of the people. The childish quibble over the tariff during the last campaign, designed to draw the minds of the masses away from more important issues, presented a disgusting sight to all earnest and loyal citizens. Principle was laid aside and policy ruled the hour. That policy was adopted which was most likely to win. The Republican party is not worthy the success it achieved. No party will ever ride into power again upon a platform so barren of the fruits of experience.

Henceforth I am for the American party, (1) educational qualification for the voter, (2) woman's emancipation, (3) against church rule, (4) foreign ownership of land, (5) indiscriminate and unlimited immigration, (6) and for the Nine Demands. Who will second this motion?

AMERICUS.

SUSANVILLE, CAL., Nov. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber for your valuable paper for the past three years. I hav gained more knowledge from it than all the rest of the papers that I hav taken, and I take and read eight papers weekly. The fine essays from Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Peck are worth ten times what the paper costs.

I liv in a free country, and a very Liberal county, as California has the most Liberals, the most generous and free-hearted people, of any place in America. But, like all other places, we hav some very narrow-minded and selfish ones here. I sometimes write for our county paper, and once in a while I touch on that sacred book, the Bible. Not long since one of our narrow-minded Christians went as a committee of one and informed our editor that he must not insert any more of my productions, as such were not safe literature for the young to read, and said it was blasphemy. As I did not sign my name to my productions, the editor, being a Liberal, gave my name and said to the poor idiot: "Now, sir, my paper is just as free to you as to him, and if he has made any assertions that you can prove not to be true get in and make him take it back." "Why, he says the Bible is not true." "Well, my dear sir, you get in and prove it is, and then Mr. Jones will come and acknowledge that he has lied, for he told me he would, and I know he is a man that will stay with it. Now, sir, you can get in and answer Mr. Jones, and I will publish it for you." "I do not propose to make any reply to him unless he will acknowledge the truth of the Bible; then I will reply to him." Now, what a fine show I would hav in that court—take the evidence of his witnesses as facts and not be allowed any evidence in rebuttal! I find all Christians just that small and mean. I do not blame them for it. I pity them. They hav got the wrong side of the case and they dare not come to a fair trial.

I was amused at a young man a few evenings since. He was baptized two weeks since in the Seventh Day Advent doctrin. He came to me and said, "I used to think you were a very wicked man." "Well, my dear young friend, do you not think it more strongly now?" "No, sir, I do not. I think you are a better man than half of those Christians." "What has caused you to change your opinion?" "I hav read the Bible for the last two weeks more than I ever read it in my life. I hav come to the conclusion that you are right, and I hav drawn out of the church. I do not want to be a hypocrit, and if I stay in the church I will be one." "Did you not read the Bible before you joined the church?" "No. I listened to the preacher and acted on what I heard from him, not from any knowledge of my own, and if I had not read and thought for myself I could hav made a good church-member."

There is one church here. They sent out a young man to preach last year. He came here without any experience and preached just as he was taught. It did not go in the golden West as it would in the church-ridden East, consequently he was a failure, and now the little church is kept up by a few old women, and some few tottering old men who hav lived out all their vitality and are merely waiting there. They are living as they were taught—in infancy their good old mother died a Methodist, and they know she is in heaven, for she told them she was going there, and she never told a lie. One of our little church did not appear to understand all of the holy book to his satisfaction, and so asked the young preacher his views on the subject. The young divine very politely informed him that it was not necessary for him to understand the Bible to be a Christian—all that was required of him was to go on and attend to his own business and the church would do all the thinking and searching the scriptures for him. The deacon, being a man of some education and a lawyer by profession, took this under advisement and came to the conclusion that if some one else had to do his thinking and pleading it was a waste of brains to giv him so much, and he informed the young divine that he might just draw a large black mark across his name on the church board, and he would do his own thinking and pleading and take his own chances, and now this said deacon reads my TRUTH SEEKER every week, and says it is the best paper he ever saw, and wonders at the ignorance of this enlightened age. There are a great many Liberals here, and I will send you the names of some of them soon. My papers are read by many, and I circulate them as long as they can be read.

I was once a Methodist. Like the young man, I studied the Bible until I came to the conclusion that if I remained in the church I would be condemned as a hypocrit, and on that ground be cast out with the thousands who are professing religion only as a cloak for busiuess purposes or for the purpose of taking advantage of their fellow-men. JONES.

BERLIN, N. J., Dec. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this nation are generally poor. Most them are, in spirit, humane and generous, and would rejoice with joy unspeakable to see the whole world united in the spirit of universal brother and sisterhood, but hav not the means to do much in that direction. Very few Liberals are so wealthy as the so-called Christians who occupy the "most eligible pens" or pews in the churches, but there are a few Liberals who are rich, and I hav long wondered why they hav never established a home for aged and infirm Liberals, where they could enjoy the necessaries and comforts of life when bowed down by age and infirmities. I do believe that if some of them could for one hour feel the miseries that some aged Liberals suffer such a home would be provided at once, and the noble benefactors would find more pleasure in spending a portion of their surplus means in that way than in any other.

Look at our case, for example. I am now more than half through my eighty-eighth year; Mittie, my faithful companion, who has stood by me in my Infidelity nearly half a century as firm as the rock of Gibraltar, is a few years younger, but for many years has been very feeble, and for some months past has been so weak that she often staggers and often has to catch hold of things to save herself from falling while at work or crossing the floor. It is now about sixty-five years since I arose in a large protracted meeting where there were nearly a dozen ministers, and delivered my first public testimony against the churches. One minister had been made so insane in that meeting that it required two men to watch him day and night to keep him from murdering his family. He was sent to the insane hospital, where he recovered so far as to be safe, but his reason was never fully restored. Hundreds of others in that large meeting, which had been held day and evening for three weeks, had been brought to the verge of insanity by hearing so much about an angry God, death, hell, and the devil. The ministers saw that they were carrying things too far, and let up on common sinners long enough for one of them to preach a sermon against the Roman church, which he called the mother of harlots and other appropriate names. I watched my opportunity, and before he was in his seat I was up. Said I, "All we hav heard about the church of Rome is true. She is really the mother of harlots." "Amen!" "Glory!" "That's true!" came in a shower from all parts of that large congregation, and as I was a stranger there, every neck was stretched up and every eye and ear opened to see and hear what would come next. "But," said I, "your speaker forgot or neglected to mention one very important fact." "Amen! glory!" came in another shower. "He neglected to say that your own Protestant churches are the harlots that the church of Rome is the mother of, no more like organizations of humanity, peace, and love, than harlots are like chaste and virtuous women." Every countenance fell flat and not another amen was heard, while I went on to tell them that the Puritans, so called, had a flare-up in the old country with their old Roman mother and came here to set up housekeeping for themselvs, and as soon as they got the power persecuted all who did not believe with them the same as their old mother had persecuted them. They banished Roger Williams and forced him to seek a home among the Indians, cut off the ears of Baptists, imprisoned Quakers, bored their tongues with hot irons and hung several of them on Boston Common, and were even found at this late day divided up among themselvs into sects and parties, all hating and persecuting each other as far as they had the power to do it. Having thus proved the Protestant churches to be the real daughters of the old harlot, I closed. The ministers whispered along the line where they sat, and then one of them arose and told the congregation that they had held the meeting three weeks and had intended to hold it two more, but if they must be exposed to such testimonies as they had just heard it would be better to close it now. So he made a prayer an inch or two long or short and dismissed the people, and the parsons went off to commence operations on new ground. Well, friends, from that day to the present I hav been regarded by all the churches wherever I hav been as a castaway—a brand for the fire—and though I hav had more or less to do in all the real reforms that hav been started for more than sixty years, the last minister except one that has spoken to me for years, an old fraud whom the Methodist bishop sent here to preach, told me I hav no more sense than a dog and ought to be treated as a dog. And as the majority of the people here believe that everything spoken by their ministers is directly from God, you can easily imagin how little company we hav with no Liberal within miles of us.

O for a home for aged Liberals! As we are not personally acquainted with many Liberals, if we had means to hire a woman to care for us it would probably be some sectarian who would lie about us as they did about Paine, and we had rather die alone than be abused as he was. If we should sell our little home and propose to spend the money for board while it lasted, we should not know where to find a congenial family of Liberals to board with, but if there was a home established by Liberals for the aged and infirm, we could turn in what we hav and be sure of care and comfort for a while. But as there is not such a home we are in a sad fix. In writing this article I feel that I am writing it as much for the future and for others as for the present and ourselvs, and hope wealthy Liberals will giv it the attention that the subject demands. J. HACKER.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wonder if some smart theologian can explain why Pentecost was not mentioned by any of the writers of the gospels. It will not do to say that the gospels were written too soon. Those who are said to hav written the gospels had not been baptized with the Holy Ghost until that time, and yet they are perfectly silent on that subject.

I shall be obliged to anyone who will explain how those "strangers" who stood there knew that these men were all Galileans who spoke; how they knew that they spoke the wonderful works of God; and how they each knew that the others heard, each of them, in their own tongue, wherein they were born, even going so far as to name the different nationalities to which the others belonged. How could a Parthian know that his next neighbor was a Mede, and the next an Elamite, another from Mesopotamia, from Judea, from Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, etc.? How could they know that some of them were Jews and some of them proselytes? And then the worst part of it is, they were all supposed to be speaking of it, for it says: "We do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God."

Peter, who seems to be the principal speaker on that occasion, though speaking by the Holy Ghost, quoted from the Septuagint, which is a mistranslation of the passage in question. The Greek word Peter is said to hav used means "corruption," whereas the Hebrew word meant the grave. Peter was proving that the Psalmist spoke of Jesus, because Jesus "saw no corruption," but was raised from the dead. The Psalm'st said of the parties (for it is plural) that they should not be suffered to go to the "grave" or "pit."

Now, Peter acknowledged that Jesus went down into death, a grave, pit, etc., which proves emphatically that he was not the party of whom the Psalmist wrote.

May I inflict upon you a few more lines of my rhyme?

TUNE: THE POACHERS.

The devil's dead, some one has said,
  And hell's to rent, quoth he;
Joy on the head of the lost dead,
  Their souls can now go free.

Ye great ones, who through being true
  To reason came to grief,
This news, if true, will be to you
  An infinit relief.

But while you're glad the priests are sad;
  Their drawing card is gone.
While hell they had their every fad
  Was based and built thereon.

But who would go way down below
  To hell to get cheap rent?
Where hell is, though, the priests don't know,
  Though many there they've sent.

Could priestly scout the spot find out
  And clearly point the way,
There is no doubt that on that route
  A railway line would pay.

The priest would go and pay full fare
  O'er Satan's grave to weep,
For their lost hopes lie buried there
  In Satan's grave quite deep.

JOHN HUDSON.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 1, 1888.

TO HON. R. G. INGERSOLL: It may be presumptuous in me to question or criticise you, but as a pioneer long ago, at my great cost, for truth and you; as a humanitarian wanting right views and motivs, and appreciating you for your great power to spread the light and do good, I trust you will read this with the same spirit and purpose with which I write it.

Near the close of your letter to Cardinal Manning under the head of "Rome or Reason," to prove that interest-taking is not a crime, as it was made in the canon law, you make the following statement: "Without the right to take interest, the business of the world would, to a great extent, cease, and the prosperity of mankind end. Every mile of railroad was built with borrowed capital on which interest was paid or promised. In no other way could a capital great enough hav been formed to construct works of such vast and continental importance." These statements hav been the burden of my mind for several days. If they are true, then they conflict with my sense of justice and humanity, and all my past views and expressions as to the character and ultimate results of interest-taking are wrong; and it seems to me that they also are incompatible with the general purport, spirit, and expressions of your public lectures, such as "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," your "Lay Sermon," and, indeed, all of your humanitarian utterances.

Whether or not railroads could be built in no other way is, to me, an open question, but they might not hav been built so soon. Every human structure in all the past has been built by human labor; and capital is only accumulated labor, excepting raw material, while millions of laborers are all the time at work for just enough to keep from starving to pay the interest on bonds and mortgages with which this nation is more and more burdened and enslaved. Right here in this county of so many railroads nearly four thousand farms are mortgaged, and labor must pay $170,000 interest thereon annually to increase the capital of somebody or some company—whether, in the end, for "continental importance" or national downfall, is to be seen. It is my moral sense, my impression, that the canon law against interest was a good and just one, however at variance with present policies and practices. In this I may be greatly mistaken, and too much influenced by my sense of the just and humane.

Interest is getting something for nothing out of labor, and all our towns and cities are full—and fairly increasing—of real estate and money loaners, on the plan and under the impulse of interest-taking, to enlarge the possessions of the few and multiply poverty and want, vice and crime. No one has a greater love of internal improvements—internally of man and internally of the nation—than I; and if it can be proved by logic and facts and ultimate results that interest-taking is a just and righteous way, and the best and only way, to promote "continental importance" and national good, then, if it is beneficial in the end to take interest to build railroads, it is also just and right to take interest for any and all purposes, or else my logic is lame. So the more we enslave and rob to pay interest, and the more interest we thus obtain, the greater the "continental" benefit.

That railroads are of "vast importance" is true, and so, also, are many other structures, but if to build them the people hav, unjustly and unconstitutionally, been robbed of two hundred million acres of land, nature's gift to all the children of Mother Earth; if human labor is enslaved and robbed of its own products to pay interest to raise the capital to build them; if for every million grabbed by the few in the way of interest-taking one thousand paupers and tramps are made, and vice and crime and taxes—also to be paid by labor—are correspondingly increased; if arson, burglary, robbery, and murder—three times as many murders in the United States as in any European nation—are fearfully on the increase, greatly promoted by legalized interest-taking or robbing; and if millionaires and railroad and other rich and haughty and defiant corporations and individuals can buy and sway and control legislatures and courts state and national, and say, by word or action: "The people be damned," and with "the sword and the purse" in their hands usurp the natural and constitutional power of the people, and thus become their masters and not their servants, what will the ultimate result be?

Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

You write against the orthodox ways and means of raising money to build cathedrals and churches, when popes, cardinals, bishops, and priests work upon the ignorance, fear, and credulity of the laboring classes, while you seem to me, if I understand you, to advocate a legalized right to take interest and make the laboring people pay it.

How much difference can there be
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee?

Human avarice and ambition for man-made place and power are the two gigantic and perverted factors that tend, threaten to undermine the basis of our boasted "land of the free," and disintegrate its superstructure. In this insane rush after "the root of all evil" and for office, the nation is so demoralized that truth, justice, humanity, and manhood are ignored and set aside, while church and state court each other and play into each other's hands more and more; politicians and demagogs fawning to pope and priest to obtain votes to get into or retain office, and the pope and lesser magnates, Protestants and Catholics, seeking and scheming to get pecuniary aid through these *mis*representativs of the people. The natural and constitutional rights of the great mass of the laboring people are ignored and violated; the spirit and purpose and meaning of the national Constitution are more and more perverted and misconstrued; crimes are constructed falsely, and real crime goes unpunished if the criminal be rich, high in place, or orthodox. A very large portion of all these deplorable evils are, to me, the outgrowth and consequence of the interest plan of growing rich and powerful.

In view of present and ultimate results to the people and nation, how you can advocate the taking of interest as a principle and moral right, and make it harmonize with your general expressions with tongue and pen to the public, I cannot see.

When in your most pathetic and eloquent address to the soldiers in New York, you said "our flag waves over a country absolutely free," I wondered how, in the face of facts to the contrary, you could say it. When in your "Lay Sermon" you said, if I remember, every man should earn his living, and that if "no one had too much, all would hav enough," I gloried in the statement, for you said it, and what you say has great weight for good or evil. Yet it seems to me you advocate a practice, or policy, which inevitably multiplies the number who hav "too much," and the number who hav not enough, and widens the gap between them. The people must take these powers from their unlawful possessors, or be base slaves. "Would you rather that Cæsar were living and die all slaves, or that Cæsar—the money power perverted—were dead, and liv all free men?"

I know you are naturally noble, good, humane, and manly, and I want to be with you on every question that pertains to human good; but I cannot bring my sense of right, justice, and humanity to agree with the results of interest-taking, i.e., the bad results "of vast and continental importance."

"What constitutes a state? Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned, thick walls and moated gates; not broad-armed bays and ports, where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride; not starred and spangled courts where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride. No; men—high-minded men; men who their duties know and know their rights; and knowing dare defend them."

Appreciativly yours, J. H. COOK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Song of Christmas Time.

Bring holly berries bright and red
From nature's altar near;
And let the green from forest shades
Crown all the Christmas cheer.

The Druid priests in other days,
With golden sickle keen,
Brought garlands for their festal morn
Cut from the evergreen.

From their dead hands we so receive
The custom old and gray;
Thus blessings fall from ancient time
Upon this later day.

For sweet it is to feel the breath
'Mid winter's chill and snow,
Of that which whispers low and soft,
Of summer's warmth and glow.

St. Nicholas, with flood of gifts,
Reaches from German lands:
From him we learn the wealth and worth
Of open, bounteous hands.

Above all canting creeds or books
There comes the rose-crowned thought—
With opal hues it twines about
Each high or lowly lot—

That all of human kind are blent
In one great brotherhood:
That, side by side, we are the same,
Known or misunderstood.

That all we do in kindness here
Reflects in glory bright;
As beaming stars in cloudless sky
Make fair the gloomy night.

Then make all days so sweet, so white,
With love to one another,
That each shall see as on he goes
In every man a brother.

Hence shall the Christmas-tide be bright
With all that love can giv:
For in such treasure manifold
The graces all do liv.

Humanity Abroad,

OR,

HOW SANTA CLAUS FOUND THE FLEISCHERS.

There were the father and mother and eight children, the youngest only one week old. And they were dreadfully poor, were the Fleischers, living high up in the air in an attic chamber, and strangers to everybody. They had come from Germany away across the deep, deep sea, and when Gustav, the father, looked into the faces of his little helpless children and heard their plaintiv cries for bread which he could not supply, he thought he should go wild. When he m t the sad gaze of his handsome wife, handsome in spite of want, poverty, and sickness, he wished in his heart they had all gone to the bottom of the sea while crossing the broad Atlantic. If he could only get some work—but he could not. He had tried and tried, and every time was repulsed. There was no work for him, and he brooded over his misfortunes until he became frantic, and said he would rather die than liv to see his children starve to death before his eyes.

And what did he do, but start right off for the Brooklyn bridge to drown himself? But just as he was going over the bridge a big policeman snatched hold of his legs and pulled him back from the watery grave he sought, and marched him off to the "Tombs," in other words, to prison. When he told his sad story in the cell, all who heard it had watery eyes, and the next morning the papers told the tale to everybody.

It was Christmas—icy and snowy. The Fleischers were hungry and cold, with not a morsel of food nor a coal of fire in the scantily furnished attic, and the father gone they knew not where. Presently an awful thump came on the rickety old door, which opened at the same time to admit the queerest little old man that ever you saw. On the top of his head was a huge California squash, a big ham on each shoulder, a string of sausages were linked around his big body, and for a sword there depended from his waist the half of a sheep. For his pocket-handkerchief, he had a great square of raw beefsteak. He had badges stuck on his breast of chickens and ducks, and one immense turkey swung from his back. His pockets were filled with oranges, nuts, candies, and raisins. Following him was his page with a big box full of potatoes, cranberries, cabbages, onions, turnips, and celery. He had no sooner unloaded than up came a barrel of flour, with a bounce on the floor, and another barrel, full of apples, went bump against the wall. A tub full of butter was rolled in, and a sack of coffee, then a chest of tea and a whole cheese were dumped upon the floor.

The Fleischers stood stark amazed, and never spoke one word.

"Ish dish all for we?" they at length inquired, and when told it was they laughed and jumped and kicked and screamed and rolled over and over on the floor, like little crazy children, while their mother sat and cried like a baby.

"It never rains but it pours," and all that day long there came groceries and provisions until the apartment could hold no more. And money came, too, more money than the Fleischers had ever seen in all their born days. The little old man, divested of his peculiar but substantial adornments, looked on and smiled serenely.

By and by Gustav came home looking very sheepish and ashamed of himself. He soon comprehended the state of affairs, and said to himself: "Dot vas von goot chump I makes py dot pridge! I ish so glat I vash not det dish arfternoon!"

Of course they had a splendid dinner that Christmas, and the little chubby children ate so much they almost burst. Their eyes shone and their cheeks got very red indeed, and their tangled curls were used to wipe their little greasy noses.

The father and mother felt like new people, and the week-old baby stretched and doubled up its little fists as if quite ready to fight the whole world.

"I halluf got von chob, und dot vash the pest of all," said Gustav, crying for joy.

Mr. Steinbauer, the kind-hearted man who had engaged him, told about it in this way: "I ret it in de babers," said the fine old German gentleman, "apout de boor poy, how he go chump from der pridge pecause he vash so boor. I vash not halluf through reating, put I hash to shtop to wibe de dears avay. I then crab a peesh of baber, and I gommence to write von ledder. Bud I sait, dot ledder vill not reesh dot chudge in dime. So I puds on my tob coad und I go like mat to de pridge. I ruds tidl de bersbiration bour town my packs like vater-vorks. I go to dot chudge ad de courd, und I go dot boor poy's pail for von honered tollars, und I gif him von goot chob."

Well, the Fleischers lived like heroes all winter, and the children grew like weeds. They insisted that the little old man was actually Santa Claus himself, but it was no such thing. His right name is Humanity Abroad, but the children will insist on calling him Santa Claus, and Gustav says he never would hav found them if he had not undertaken "dot chump from der Prooklyn pridge."

How the Indians Punished Children and Servants in the Olden Time.

When a child or a servant had been disobedient, the offender was laid flat on his back, and the castigator put a knee on either arm, thus pinioning the culprit to the earth. Then, holding back his head by the hair, the one inflicting the punishment ejected a decoction made of bayberry-root bark, very strong and bitter, from his mouth into the nose of the quivering boy until he would be almost strangled. It took some time to recover, but the punishment was generally salutary. The Indian name for this was medom-humar, or, in other words, great punishment. S. H. W.

Christmas.

The observance of "Christmas" did not originate with Christians. Before Christianity was thought of the pagans celebrated by festivals and good cheer the winter solstice. The custom of decorating with evergreens at this season of the year came from the Druids, who worshiped in leafy groves, under the shade of trees. When Christians came into power and popularity they borrowed the custom of celebrating the winter solstice from the pagans, invested it with religious rites, and observed this time as the birthday of their savior, Jesus. It is not his birthday, however. So little is known about his birthday, or about his early life, that it is impossible to say when was the time of year that he came into existence, if he ever did really exist.

The significance of Christmas as a religious holiday is observed by Catholics and Episcopalians more than any other sect. The association of gifts with this time comes more particularly from the Germans, who hold St. Nicholas, or "Santa Claus," as the patron saint of this period. Among Protestants it is thought more of as a gift-making and gift-receiving season than in any other way. But we should not giv presents by the calendar. We should giv them whenever the spirit moves, without reference to times or seasons.

It would be much more creditable to Americans to celebrate the Fourth of July, the birth of American Independence, by giving good gifts, as heretofore intimated in the Corner by Mr. Jason Waters, than by holding to a custom that has no real significance except that given it by the pagans centuries ago.

Correspondence.

MOUND CITY, Dec. 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl seven years old. I go to school, and I like my teacher; his name is Mr. Tyler. I am in the Second Reader and the geography and the arithmetic. I hav a little twin brother who goes to school with me. My uncle Henry takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and my papa reads it, and I like to read the Children's Corner. My name is OLLIE MAY STRONG.

ROCHESTER, N. H., Dec. 9, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I see other children are writing for the Corner, I thought I would write a few lines. I was twelve years old last June. I go to school every day. I am in the fifth grade of grammar. My grandmother has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for five years, and she kindly loans it to me. I feel deeply interested in the subject of Freethought, and I love to read the Children's Corner. I enjoy reading all Liberal papers and books. If some little Freethinker would write to me I would gladly answer such letters.

If you think this will do, I would like to see it in print. Your little Freethinker friend,

ESTELLA LEIGHTON.

Knew Him.

Capt. Billie Crim is a very efficient officer and a very clever gentleman, but he is thin, very thin. The following good joke is told on popular Captain Billie:

A few days ago he was sitting in a rear room in a doctor's office. In a front room the office-boy was reading a dime novel, when an urchin made his appearance with a basket of fruit, and insisted upon the office-boy making a purchase. To get rid of the young fruit-vender, the office-boy went to a case, opened the door, and exposed to view a skeleton. The fruit-boy fled in terror, leaving his basket behind him.

Capt. Billie Crim, hearing the commotion, went into the front office, and, upon learning what had occurred, walked to the door and said to the urchin, who stood across the street, crying bitterly:

"Little boy, come over and get your basket. Nobody shall hurt you."

"No, I won't," sobbed the little fellow. "You can't fool me. I know you, if you hav got your clothes on."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Bennie was asked if he was afraid of the dark. "Oh, no," he said, "I go in great piles of dark!"

A little girl about four years old and a little boy about six had been cautioned not to take away the nest-egg, but one morning when they went for the eggs the little girl took it and started for the house. Her disappointed brother followed, crying: "Mother, mother, Susie's got the egg the old hen measures by!"

Castles in the Air.

It is related that Prince Bismarck was once asked for an autograph by a young English girl, who professed extraordinary admiration for him, and wrote that she would consider a few lines from him an omen of happiness for her future life. He sent her the following: "Beware, my child, of building castles in the air. They are, of all structures, the easiest to erect and most difficult to demolish."

A new baby came to a home on Charlotte avenue and the little three-year-old, Harry, brought in a little playmate to rejoice with him over the new sister. After looking at it a moment the little visitor says: "Why doesn't it laugh? Our baby does." Little three-year-old looked at baby, and then at his playmate with marked disapproval, and replied: "Our baby knows better than to laugh at nussin'."

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Poetry.

I Dinna Ken.

I dinna ken hoo tears maun fa'
On this puir leaf o' hawthorn green,
But, oh! it cam' frae far awa',
Whaur mountain linns mak' siller sheen.
Sae mony, mony leaves blaw doun,
Yet nane are aye the same tae me;
And this hae seen Dun-Edin toun,
An' brings the fragrance o' the sea.

I dinna ken what gars me greet!
But chirpin' linties in the bowers,
An' thissels gay, an' gowans sweet,
Wi' hawthorn, fairest o' the flowers;
Whaur blithe the lav'rock sang to me,
'Mang heather-bells an' hielan' braes,
An' streams sae bricht rin to the sea
Wi' licht o' gowd frae simmer days.

I dinna ken what mak's me pine
Wi' hairt sae often sair an' sad,
Whan mither pit her han' in mine,
An' ca'd me aye her bonnie lad;
An' baith wad cross the saut, saut sea,
Though luve at hame bides sweet an' fair,
Whaur ilka singing bird is free,
An' yellow broom is brichter there.

I dinna ken hoo tears should dim
My ain an' my puir mither's e'en,
When barnies sing the sweet auld hymn
She sang hersel' to ilka wean.
Gie me the glen, the muir an' lake,
The simple cot whaur I was born,
The birken wood, the burn an' brake,
An' mavis in the dewy thorn.

I dinna ken gif grief o' mine,
Sude weet my cheeks like simmer rain
In this braid lan' o' corn an' wine,
Whaur hairst brings hame a gowden train;
Her flowers are a' sae sweet an' fair,
Though strange her snaw-white thistles* be,
Gin I could see my ain ance mair,
I glad wad lay me doun an' dee.

I dinna ken hoo ithers weep
Through waefu' nichts an' weary days,
But I sic lang, lane vigils keep
Ower three moun's far frae hawthorn braes.
Sweet mother, wi' my treasures twa,
Upon your laigh beds droopin' doun
I'll plant this flower frae far awa',
That cam' frae oor ain Embro' toun.

Jehovah's Soliloquy.

Here I am all alone. I am Jehovah. Here hav I existed from all eternity (Ps. x, 2). Besides me there is none other in all the realms of infinit space. I am lonesome—a king without subjects—a god without worshipers. I will create myriads of angels who shall worship and adore me, their creator and their god. I will create them holy and happy; it shall be their highest enjoyment and pleasure to do my bidding and serve me. Day and night I shall hear my praises sung by countless millions of angels whom I hav made (Ps. cxlviii, 2). It will be better than to remain as I hav, for all eternity, all alone. I will create two mighty archangels, who shall help me to rule all the angelic hosts which I hav made. Their names shall be Lucifer, son of the morning (see Isa. xiv, 12) and Michael. But lest I grow weary of continual praises and flattery, I will so arrange the constitution of one of the archangels that he shall get tired of my service and seek to gain his independence of me; he shall draw one-third of all the angelic host to his side. It shall be Lucifer, son of the morning, that shall do this, and I will hate him, and will curse him with an everlasting curse, and he shall be called Satan, dragon, and the devil. And Michael shall make war on the dragon (see Rev. xii, 7), and shall prevail against him, and shall drive him out of heaven and all his host with him, and he shall enter heaven no more forever—except on business with me. (See Job ii, 1.) And I will make a hell of fire and brimstone for the devil and his angels, where I will torment them day and night for ever and ever. (See Rev. xx, 10.) But first I will use Satan for my own glory, as I see fit. For lo, I will make a world and I will make man in my own image (see Gen. i, 26), who shall be the father of all living. I will make him holy and innocent; and I will set good and evil before him; and I will command him to do the good and shun the evil. But he shall hav no experience or knowledge, and I will drive Satan from heaven to earth (see Rev. xii, 9), and he shall deceive the pair and they shall fall. Then will I curse the man whom I hav made. And I will curse the earth also for his sake, and I will bring death into the world and man shall die. But their souls I will torment in fire and brimstone forever (see Rev. xx, 15) with the devil and his angels. This will I do to the man whom I hav made, and to his children, through all their generations.

But I will save a few that I delight in, and they shall liv with me in heaven. (See Luke xii, 32.) For, lo! I will send my only son (begotten thousands of years before his mother was born) to die for them, the just for the unjust. He shall suffer in their stead, and all who do not believe that he is my son and accept him for their savior, them will I torment in hell-fire for ever and ever.

And I will make a covenant with my children, and I will write my commandments on tables of stone with my own fingers. (See Ex. xxxi, 18.) And I will cause some of my children to be prophets, and they shall write my wishes and laws in a book, so that all my children shall know my will. It shall be the Bible, and I will command that it be sent to the uttermost parts of the earth, so that none shall hav any excuse (see Rom. i, 20) for not believing on my son. Yet I will so arrange it that only a small portion of my children shall ever hear that I ever had a son at all, yet if they believe not on my son, and are not baptized, they shall be damned (Mark xvi, 16). But I will for my own glory damn some of my children to hell, let them believe on my son never so much. For some I will hate before they are born. (See Rom. xi, 23.) And some I will so harden their hearts that they cannot do right even when they would. To some also I will send strong delusion that they might be damned (2 Thess. i, 11, 12).

My book, also, which I will giv to my children for their guide, shall be so obscure and contradictory that but few shall understand it alike, which will cause my children to divide into many sects, and they shall torture and kill each other to please me. It shall he so obscene (read Gen. xxxviii) and filthy that it cannot all be read aloud for very shame. And it shall be that some will deny that it is my word by reason of its being so contradictory and filthy, but such will I damn to the lowest hell for their unbelief. I will also put a lying spirit in the mouth of some of the prophets, and they shall be deceived (Jer. xx, 7; also, 1 Kings xxii, 23) and shall deceive others. And they that serve me shall be the most miserable of all them that dwell on the face of the earth (1 Cor. xv, 19).

And, lo! I will at last burn the world which I hav made (2 Pet. iii, 10). And I will call the dead out of their graves, and all, both small and great, shall stand before me in judgment and be judged out of the books which are kept. And many shall be astonished on that day when they find they are doomed to dwell in everlasting fire after serving me all their days (Rom. ix, 16), but if any complain, I will say, Hath not the potter the right to make a pitcher and a spit-box (Rom. ix, 21, 22) out of the same lump?

All this I will do for my own glory and pleasure, and to make my power known and felt by my children. For I am God almighty. I can kill and I can make alive (1 Sam. ii, 6); I can create and I can destroy; and all that I undertake that will I perform, except to beat an army that hath chariots of iron (Judg. i, 19). And who shall accuse me of wrong? for, behold! I make man for my own pleasure and glory, and will do with him even as I see fit. I am God! A. B.

Another Freethinker Gone.

From the Seneca Falls, N. Y., Reveille.

At an early hour on Tuesday evening it was rumored that Dr. Hiram J. Purdy had died quite suddenly at Panama, but no one seemed to hav any authentic knowledge of the fact. On Wednesday morning the editor of the Reveille received a letter from Mrs. Purdy, who is now in New York, confirming the sad intelligence, and giving the particulars of his death as she had received them from relativs on the isthmus. He died at Panama on November 17th, of yellow fever, after a brief and painful illness. The intelligence of his condition was not received by Mrs. Purdy until about a week after his death, as it requires some eight or ten days for a steamer to reach New York after leaving the isthmus. His cousin, who livs but a few miles distant, was not notified of his illness until three days previous to his death, when he was too weak and unconscious to make known his wants. He was taken to a hospital, the best medical aid summoned, and every attention was given him, but the dreadful disease could not be baffled, and death was the inevitable result. He was buried on the day of his death in the American cemetery, the authorities refusing to permit the body to be sent home.

Dr. Purdy left Seneca Falls early in September, expecting to spend the winter in Panama, where he had passed a good part of last winter in the practice of his profession. He must hav reached the isthmus about the first of October, and soon thereafter entered upon his professional duties. He had relativs at Panama and it was at their solicitation that he went there last year, though he thought it would be beneficial to his health, which had been failing for several years past. When he left home he expressed grave doubts of his return, seeming to anticipate that he would be stricken with the disease of which he died.

The deceased was a nativ of Wayne county, having been born in West Butler in January, 1847. He studied medicin in the office of Dr. W. F. Peck at Davenport, Ia., and was graduated from the Bellevue Medical College in the spring of 1869. He came to Seneca Falls in 1871, since which time he has been in activ practice here, although absent more or less during the last two or three years. Dr. Purdy was an excellent physician, and wholly devoted to his profession. He was a man of decided opinions, and expressed them without fear or favor. He disliked pretenders, and would not tolerate them. In his practice he was eminently successful, and his patients were among our best citizens. They believed in him implicitly, and admired him for his skill, independence, and courage. Socially and professionally he was a genial man, kind-hearted, generous, manly, and all deeply regret his sad and sudden death. His wife and one daughter survive him.

"The 'Bible Inquirer' is better than a Concordance as a reference, to speedily find the teaching of the Bible, on any subject. It is a sledge-hammer in demolishing error, yet the most devout Bible-worshiper can find no cause of offense. Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.
For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Reminiscences of a Preacher,
A RADICAL ROMANCE.
By WILLIAM McDONNELL,
Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.
The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.
Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. Gems of Thought.

THE doctrin of the Galilean Buddhist is essentially a doctrin of pessimism, of other-worldliness and nature-hating renunciation of human reason and earthly prosperity, and therefore wholly irreconcilable with the promotion of progressiv science and secular happiness.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

WHY should we desire the destruction of human passions? Take passions from human beings and what is left? The great object should be not to destroy passions, but to make them obedient to the intellect. To indulge passion to the utmost is one form of intemperance, to destroy passion is another. The reasonable gratification of passion under the domination of the intellect is true wisdom and perfect virtue.—Ingersoll.

No person can hav lost his liberty but by his not knowing how to defend it. There are two methods of losing it. The one is when the weak hav been subdued by the strong; and the other is when fools hav been deceived by designing men. People tell of certain conquerors who, having overcome another nation, caused everyone to put out an eye; there are people whose eyes are both put out like the old horses that turn in a mill. I wish to keep my eyes.—Voltaire.

WHENEVER tyranny aims at reducing the mass of a people to the will of one of its portions, the prejudices and ignorance of the victims are counted among the means of effecting it.—Condorcet.

EVERY school-house is a fort.—Ingersoll.

OPPRESSED by the double yoke of spiritual and temporal power, it has been impossible for the people to know and pursue their happiness. As religion, so politics and morality became sacred things, which the profane were not permitted to handle.—D'Holbach.

EVIL is due to natural causes. Man can gradually remove the evils that afflict him by becoming acquainted with his nature, relations, and surroundings.—B. F. Underwood.

We hav the morning star,
O foolish people, O kings!
With us the daysprings are,
Even all the fresh daysprings;
For us, and with us, all the multitudes of things.

O sorrowing hearts of slaves,
We heard you beat from far!
We bring the light that saves,
We bring the morning star;
Freedom's good things we bring you, whence all good things are.

These hav we, these are ours,
That no priests giv, nor kings;
The honey of all these flowers,
The heart of all these springs;
Ours, for where freedom livs not, there liv no good things.

Rise, ere the dawn be risen;
Come, and be all souls fed;
From field, and street, and prison,
Come, for the feast is spread;
Liv, for the truth is living; wake, for the night is dead. —A. C. Swinburne.

BUT an outline of this kind would be too meager without some sketch of the warfare of religion on instruction in science. Not without profit would it be to note more at length how instruction in the Copernican theory was kept out of the church universities in every great Catholic country of Europe; how they concealed the discovery of the spots on the sun; how many of them excluded the Newtonian demonstrations; how, down to the present time, the two great universities of Protestant England and nearly all her intermediate colleges, under clerical supervision, hav excluded the natural and physical sciences as far as possible; and how, from probably nine-tenths of the universities and colleges of the United States, the students are graduated with either no knowledge or with clerically emasculated knowledge of the most careful modern thought on the most important problems in the various sciences, in history and in criticism.—President White of Cornell University.

WITH the single exception of Cornell, there is not a college in the United States where truth has ever been a welcome guest. The moment one of the teachers denies the inspiration of the Bible, he is discharged. If he discovers a fact inconsistent with that book, so much the worse for the fact, and especially for the discoverer of the fact. He must not corrupt the minds of his pupils with demonstrations. He must beware of every truth that cannot, in some way, be made to harmonize with the superstitions of the Jews.—Ingersoll.

To make our word or act sublime, we must make it real. . . . Use what language you will, you can never say anything but what you are. What I am, and what I think, is conveyed to you, in spite of my efforts to hold it back.—Emerson.

IF you want to know the opinion of your neighbor, you want his honest opinion. You do not want to be deceived. You do not want to talk with a hypocrit.—Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 15. No. 52. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. {New York, Saturday, December 29, 1888.} 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

MORE FACT THAN FABLE.

A countryman, who had more generosity than judgment, found a snake which had been left out in the cold until it was ready to perish. Moved by pity he took it into his house and warmed it by his fireside. No sooner had the warmth restored it than it began to attack the members of his household. At this the man, whose compassion had saved its life, saw that the only way to deal with a reptil was to destroy it, which he at once proceeded to do. MORAL: Don't trust a Roman Catholic (Related a long time after Æsop).

Notes and Clippings.

A CHINAMAN who, after several years' residence in this country, returned to China, has been telling his countrymen that the Americans worship a mysterious being called All Mi-T Dol Lar.

VIOTORIA WOODHULL has purchased a house in Paris for 2,000,000 francs in which she hopes to found an institution for the free education of women. She is still devoting herself to the interesting science of stirpiculture.

THE schoolmaster is needed in Alabama, if the Montgomery Advertiser is correct when it says that there are in the state 370,279 persons over ten years old who do not know how to read, and that of these 60,174 are white adults.

THE Grangers are still flourishing in Pennsylvania. During the present year the membership has increased 8,000, twenty-six new granges hav been organized, and there is a surplus of $7,000 in the treasury of the state grange.

IT is said that the trustees of a heavily mortgaged church in Lincoln, Neb., in order to raise money to clear the debt, sold advertising space on the walls of the auditorium and that "handsome advertising cards appear in conspicuous places, the charge being $5, and the agreement including an indorsement from the pulpit."

THE bishops having the Washington Catholic University in charge hav written to the pope thanking him for his support of the university scheme and announcing that the work was making most satisfactory progress, $800,000 having been collected, while the ground on which the buildings will be erected has already been paid for. The bishops draw attention to the great importance of the university, which, they say, will act as a bulwark against the rise of Rationalism and Freethought in America. Perhaps!

THE Manchester chamber of commerce, by an overwhelming majority, has passed a resolution holding that all foreign goods similar to those produced in England should pay the same proportion of the imperial and local taxation which they would hav paid had they been manufactured in Great Britain.

AMONG the 128 members of the next assembly of this state there are 15 farmers, 1 cigarmaker, 1 tanner, 1 hat manufacturer, 1 streetcar conductor, 2 shoe dealers, 2 carpenters, 1 steam-fitter, 1 iron founder, 3 clerks, 3 editors, and 3 undertakers. The others are mostly lawyers, merchants, and doctors.

IF the following story is true, the United States Senate is composed of pretty small men: Father Larkin, who has just been made a chaplain in the army, obtained his confirmation from the Senate through pure grit. He had been bluffed off by the Senate military committee until his patience was exhausted. Last Thursday he entered the committee room and calling the clerk aside said, in a tone of voice which could be heard in all parts of the room: "Look here, young man, I want my nomination confirmed. I want my case settled so that I can draw my money. I hav no money, and the hotel people say that if I don't pay my bill I'll hav to go. Tell the committee my predicament." An hour later the Senate had approved of his appointment. His name was the only one acted on in a large batch of nominations before the committee.

"I HOPE the time is not far distant when this Museum shall be open to the people on Sunday." So spoke President Robb, of the park commission, at the opening of the new wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art yesterday. Mayor Hewitt took the same stand. He said: "I trust the time will come when on no day shall the people be excluded." These are timely utterances and embody a sentiment that will be reëchoed by the community. Let the Museum be opened on Sunday, and let it be done at once.—Herald.

THE friends of female suffrage in this city are boasting that their cause has received an unparalleled impulse from the Boston election of last week, when 17,000 women cast their votes for a school committee and decided the results at the polls. The weather-worn upholders of the cause, who hav advocated it for a generation, are especially gleeful, and they giv evidence that thousands of members of the fair sex here who hav always in past times stood aloof are now taking an interest in it. Dispatches from Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Susan B. Anthony, and Miss Lucy Stone hav been received by the Woman's Suffrage Society. The society says that all objections to the cause were answered by the Boston election. It showed that women can form a practical political organization; that there can be perfect decorum at an election in which women vote alongside of men; that women are ready to vote, though they may hav to wade through the mire in a deluge of rain; that women can canvass for votes or peddle ballots without unsexing themselvs; that women will vote for a candidate of their own sex; that both rich women and poor can vote together; and that women hav very decided views upon some public questions. The women suffragists here say that the strength they hav recently attained will be seen at the approaching session of the legislature of this state, when a mass of petitions in behalf of their cause will be sent up to both houses. The late Boston election has been a great thing for them, and George William Curtis has given the assurance that women will secure the suffrage as soon as they demand it.

"IF General Boulanger's ascendency," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "meant only a veto on the persecuting mania of the French Atheist, it would probably be worth the risk that would attend it in other directions." Well, we will not discuss that, says the London Freethinker, for facts must be established before argument begins. We simply ask Mr. Stead to explain "the persecuting mania of the French Atheist." We deny that any such thing exists. French Atheists—with a small a à la Stead—hav not, in our opinion, persecuted their Christian fellow-citizens in any single circumstance. They hav legislated for the church, it is true; but the church is a state institution, supported entirely by state funds. As for the attempt to make divinity students pass through the army like other citizens, we fail to see that it involves persecution. Suppose the conscription existed in England, does Mr. Stead think we should allow the young gentlemen who aspire to fill pulpits to shirk the common burden of national defense?

Who Was Christ?

To my mind the latter end of this, the nineteenth century, appears to be the fulcrum, or center point, upon which are pending the destinies of the human race. Will the ponderous load of past ignorance and superstition outweigh the grand discoveries of science, and all the human powers of reasoning; or are the latter, as they appear at the present time, to prevail largely, and promis to do so in the future, to giv a brighter, higher, and nobler path to man? At the present time principles and minds are engaged in great and lasting struggles for predominance, and where the present age is drifting it is indeed difficult to prognosticate. But as the scales of superstition fall off the eyes of the people, they begin to see and to think that all is not what they hav been led to suppose it to be, and little by little they drift onward in the stream of progress until they find it too late to retrace their steps, and finally they find themselvs outside the pale of the church altogether.

There is a continuous and endless debating carried on upon the question, Is there a God? But the proposition with Liberals should be, Are not all the gods which hav been presented to man through books, claiming a supernatural revelation, either imaginary or fictitious? Also, Is it not idolatry, or superstition, to revere or worship any of them? Is it not also degrading to man to adore and worship a deity which has no existence of itself, and exists nowhere in infinit space, nor indeed out of it, if there can be bounds to the material universe and vacant space beyond it?

The question I ask is, "Who was Christ?" Was there ever such a being as Jesus Christ, either as a man or a God? It is admitted by its own advocates that Christianity is an offshoot of Judaism; and the Jews neither ancient nor modern hav had any expectation of an incarnate deity.

The idea as a canon of religious faith is purely of pagan origin, as is also the very structure of Christianity itself. Now, the Jews only expected, according to the promis of their sacred books, a messiah, a temporary deliverer and a conqueror. But in this the Jews were not alone, for the Hindoos had the same expectations, also numerous avatars and incarnations of their gods. The Egyptians likewise had exactly the same principles and tenets underlying their national religion from time the most ancient, even before the Jews had a nationality, laws, writings, or a name. The Greeks, also, are said to hav had thirty thousand gods, most of whom were believed to hav appeared in the flesh in some form or another. But the Christians, accepting the remnants of an old Jewish fable, profess to believe only in one "Jehovah;" however, they teach also of the power of the Holy Ghost, again of Jesus Christ; then they hav, according to current theology, the manifestations of three Gods.

Let us take whatever opinion we will of the nature and person of Jesus Christ, his origin is very obscure, perhaps lost beyond recovery. If we believe the current theology of the day, he is not permitted to hav a human father. According to Matthew, Herod sought to take the life of the young child, when Joseph and Mary fled with the baby God into Egypt and remained there until the king's death. Now, if our present system of chronology is accurate, great discrepancies are presented upon this story, for if Christ was born in the year 1 of our present era, King Herod had been dead four years, and therefore could not hav committed the murder of the Bethlehemitish children, and of which there is not a particle of contemporary record whatever. Therefore, if Christ was really contemporary with Herod, even for a short time, he must hav been born four years before A.D. 1.

From the death of Herod to his thirteenth year, and some say his fiftieth year, with one solitary and doubtful exception, he is not heard of again. Therefore, the whole of his activ life is compressed into the small space of two years and nine months. During this brief period he wrought many extraordinary miracles. Earthquakes and eclipses marked the footsteps of this God, and yet not a single historian of that day, out of all the sacred or mythic books, has so much as alluded to this wonderful incarnation. Throughout the whole range of Roman history there is not a single instance of a man seized in the night, tried before the judge, and put to death at 9 o'clock in the morning. It is, therefore, impossible that we can accept the narrativ as other than an imperfect and fictitious record of the events of those times. These inconsistencies and impossibilities are adduced only to prove the doubts and uncertainties mixed up with the history of this personage.

To doubt his existence both as man and God may seem strange when eighteen centuries hav passed away since he is reported to hav figured among mankind. Yet what can we do in the face of such conflicting testimony? If Christ had really lived, worked, and performed such miraculous feats as are attributed to him in the gospels, is it not possible that such would hav been recorded by the historians of the day? Is it not possible that all the facts in connection with the life of Christ would hav left some mark or ripple on the current of contemporary history? During the reign of the Roman emperor Tiberius we are told that a darkness involved the empire for three hours. Surely this should hav excited the notice of the astronomers, but, on the contrary, it passed entirely unnoticed in an age of science and history.

There is at the present day much ignorance, or, at least, indifference, even among intelligent Christians, to the fact that the very name of Jesus is not of Hebrew, but of Greek origin, as indeed is the whole history of his life as related in the four gospels, and no one but those who hav a previous theory to uphold can believe that the people of Jerusalem during the time of Christ spoke any other language than that spoken by their forefathers. From this we will pass to other instances where the name of Jesus is applied to others not named in the gospels, and it will be a matter of surprise to many to know that no less than fifteen, most of them living at the time of the Christian era, are named by the Jewish historian, Josephus, as bearing the name of Jesus:

1. Jesus, son of Josedek (Ant., xi, iii, 10, iv, 1).
2. Jesus, surnamed Jason, son of Simon (Ant., xi, iii, 10, iv, 1).
3. Jesus, son of Phabet (Ant., xv, ix, 3).
4. Jesus, son of Sie (Ant., xvii, xiii, 1).
5. Jesus, son of Damneus (Ant., xx, ix, 1).
6. Jesus, son of Gamaliel (Ant., xx, ix, 4).
7. Jesus, son of Sapphias (Wars, ii, xx, 4).
8. Jesus, son of Shaphat (Wars, iii, ix, 7).
9. Jesus, son of Ananus (Wars, iv, iv, 3).
10. Jesus, son of Ananus, a plebeian (Wars, vi, v, 3).
11. Jesus, son of Gamala (Life, 38, 41).
12. Jesus, a high priest (Wars, vi, ii, 2).
13. Jesus, son of Thebuthi (Wars, vi, viii, 3).
14. Jesus, father of Elymas.
15. Jesus, surnamed Barabbas.

It was this last one named Jesus that was imprisoned at the same time as Christ, being a noted prisoner who had attempted to lead an insurrection, and as it was an ancient custom of releasing a prisoner upon a certain occasion, and one which the governor did not wish to depart from, he accordingly asked the people, saying, "Which shall I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus that is called Christ?" And we are told that the people answered, saying, "Barabbas."

And it is not only the name Jesus that is of pagan origin but the whole fabric of our national religious system, for we hav even imitated the Hindoos in the incarnation of Jesus Christ and the virginity of his mother. Here is the Hindoo legend on the subject: "One evening as the virgin Devanaguy was praying, her ears were suddenly charmed with celestial music, and the god Vishnu appeared unto her, and she was 'overshadowed,' and conceived. She was conducted by a messenger to a stable. The new-born child was called Chrishna (in Sanscrit, 'sacred'). The shepherds ran and prostrated themselvs before the infant, and adored him. The reigning tyrant of Madura, having heard of the birth of the child, sought to destroy him, and accordingly ordered the massacre of all infants of the male sex born during the night of the birth of Chrishna. And at the age of sixteen Chrishna traveled throughout India to preach the new doctrin."

Now, this legend is dated back thirty-five hundred years before the Christian era, and I venture to think that no sane person can, after reading the above and bearing in mind at the same time the difference in date, deny conscientiously that the supposed birth of Christ, of a virgin mother, is but an imitation of ancient mythology, for in the foregoing we hav almost used word for word over again as found in the New Testament.

If we turn to China and Japan we shall find that the incarnation of Buddha is just the same, for Buddha was conceived in the womb of the queen Mayadevi, who, after having born him, was still considered a virgin, therefore we could not hav better deified Jesus, the son of a Jewish carpenter, than by imitating the Chinese, Japanese, and Hindoos in bestowing upon his mother the patent of virginity in spite of the eight children attributed to her by St. Matthew in his gospel, fifteenth chapter.

I could giv many more instances upon this question, but as space will not permit, I must, perforce, draw my remarks to a close. But sufficient has been said to show that great doubts exist at the present day concerning the existence of Jesus Christ, as narrated in the gospels, for outside of these there is not a particle of evidence, which is at all reliable, which can be adduced in favor of such a theory, and as the gospel narrativs themselvs are so contradictory to each other respecting his genealogy, birth, life, and death, they too must be rejected as unworthy of credit. Then the only conclusion we can arrive at is that the existence of Christ, as narrated in the gospels, is not only doubtful but impossible. Also, that the very foundations of Christianity are of purely pagan origin, and, therefore, Christianity was in existence long ages before the supposed time of Christ. In fact, there is nothing original in the creed but the appeal it makes to the ignorant and the weak—an appeal made to superstition and faith instead of knowledge and reason. Is it not possible, then, that such similarities of doctrins as we hav just been considering should raise the most serious questions as to the relation of such beliefs? Nay, more, for even the gravest doubts are entertained by many eminent scholars as to the whole doctrinal system of modern Christianity being but a transformation of the ancient mythologies of India, Greece, and Egypt.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Frigid Atheism.

It is the fool only, and not the philosopher, or even the prudent man, that would liv as if there were no God.—Thomas Paine.

Atheism denies the existence of God, and its loving relation, Materialism, furnishes the information of "no life beyond the grave." "From nothing nothing comes," is the prime favorit apothegm of Atheists. This apparently true assertion often proves a mighty cold douche on the warm and tender aspirations of reasonable Christians not only, but on the hopes of other rational persons. The longing for eternal joy is implanted in the mind of every intelligent human being. "From nothing nothing comes," seems perfectly true, and as truth ought to be the parent of satisfaction, no attempt should be made to refute this axiom, for no sensible idea can be formed of a God who created matter out of nothing. A clear idea of God is associated only with the word intelligence, and in my humble opinion God is incomprehensible intelligence. Atheism asserts that intelligence is simply "highly organized matter," and that matter not intellectually organized existed before mind. This declaration appears like obtaining a problem from an answer, and if carefully analyzed we may be allured to believe from nothing something came. Allow us to examin this in the light of Atheism. Science positivly claims, and undoubtedly truly, the earth we inhabit was, ages ago, as warm externally as it is supposed to be at present internally. At that time where was life, and where was the life principle, or nature's chemist? Are Materialists prepared to say the life principle is a product of fire, or will they claim the same was previously—and where? Or will they admit something can come from nothing? The life principle is as much a fact as the attraction of gravitation, and if it were suspended during the hot period, why cannot the attraction of gravitation be also suspended? Our Atheist friends will recollect suspension in such cases is nothing from something, or can they state a natural law whereby the attraction of gravitation can be imprisoned and released? Materialism claims the universe—less life—existed anterior to life, and the credulous believers insist mind was the antecedent of the universe. Is it not more reasonable to think life and matter hav eternally existed—that neither is a precedent of the other—than to suppose dead matter has forever been, having never been created, and that mind was created or evolved? Evolution carries us back to a handful of "primal germs," and insists these were the creation or beginning of life (intelligence), but absurdly fails to reveal how they were evolved from lifeless material. Are we to understand these first germs were formed through the magic of chance—that is to say, a little albumen, a little phosphorus, and a little et cetera, accidentally met, were charmed by each other's company, resolved to stick together, were warmed into life by the genial rays of the sun? Prove the universe minus mind, the original incubator, or Atheism must ever remain as it is—an incubus. The experiments of Pasteur and Tyndall conclusivly show the fallacy of spontaneous life—that is to say, life nowadays cannot be produced except in accordance with natural laws. Now, if those famous "primal germs" came into existence through natural laws, what are the laws? To say the "proper circumstances" do not now occur is to acknowledge the inconstancy of nature—is to admit "something can become nothing." Is it not easy to believe in the beginning mind dwelt in the midst of quiet disorder, and gave form to chaos? Is it not more probable than that mind is the child of dead material? No sane individual thinks God was his own creator. It is possible he always existed, and the creation may hav been merely a change from inanimate to animate, and vice versa.

Notwithstanding the powerful efforts of honest scientists, the secret of this change still rests with God. I fail to see how the doctrin of evolution tends to undermine or injure the belief in God. When Atheists hav answered the following questions they can perhaps convert the civilized world to their horrid Materialism. What is electricity? What is the attraction of gravitation? What is life? No answer based on mere theory will be accepted. No one can, without being ridiculous, deny the existence of God, until at least one of these questions can be answered. To admit these phenomena are inexplicable exploits of nature is to say man is not the lord of creation—that nature is superior to man. According to Atheism, "highly organized matter" (mind) deserves no more attention than inorganic (dead) matter. Matter is matter, and if nature is God, let us worship her.

It seems to me more consonant with sanity to believe the sun, moon, and stars were started in motion, are guided by intelligence, than to think they and dead matter were the original creators of mind. The Atheist must allow life or the life principle as well as dead matter has eternally been; that they never had a beginning and consequently will never hav an end. If he fails to admit this he must concede the life principle had a commencement and will hav an end. If the life principle was never created and will never cease to exist, what would be the effect if old earth was again made as hot as it once was? On the other hand, if this principle had a beginning, how could it without a creator? Can the life principle or chemistry of nature be annihilated by a general conflagration? Can it be suspended? In other words, can it become nothing? Materialists say we hav no immortal soul, because the body after death weighs exactly the same as during life, and as a natural sequence, if anything (soul) leaves the body it is nothing. This is a very plausible remark, but allow us to sift it in the sieve of Atheism—science. If we inspire to the full capacity of our lungs while on a weighing apparatus will our weight be noticeably increased? Can it not be the spiritual body is of the same gravity as the atmosphere or even less? We are accustomed to speak of the "boundless space." Is it not possible the whole system of things of which we hav knowledge is surrounded by a globe having interminable thickness? Man knows little, but perhaps all that is and is to be known is sufficient for his welfare. It may be well to understand nothing. Limitless space, eternity, and God are complete incomprehensibilities. No one can safely deny the existence of God, and no one can prove there is one, therefore let us act as if there was.

A few words concerning the alleged ethics or moral beliefs of Atheism. I cannot understand how one who says there is no God can consistently make pretensions of goodness. There are countless sinful acts to be committed which no human laws can ever reach, and as conscience depends entirely upon heredity and early training—more largely on the latter—what then will be the conduct of one who, from infancy, has been taught there is no God? Philosophers may cackle all they please about the foolishness of scaring right from wrong, but please inform us how else it can be accomplished. How does the intelligent father instruct his child concerning vicious habits which may be formed in childhood? Does he not inform his child of the consequence, and does not the child desist or refrain from fear of the result? Does the child comply with his father's request only because it is right to obey? We pay attention to sanitary regulations simply because we fear disease. If an Atheist has the opportunity of stealing an amount of money and never will be discovered, why not steal? Suppose an Atheist has the chance to steal from a neighbor who will never be aware of his loss, why not steal? Suppose an Atheist steals $5 from his Christian brother—the Atheist is benefited and the Christian not injured—never knows he has been robbed—what is the harm? Atheism appears to be a very unprofitable doctrin to be disseminated. If there is no God—no immortal soul—why further propagate the human race? If I believed in either Atheism or orthodox Christianity, I would never encourage the perpetuity of the human family. Why raise children for hell or annihilation? Why do our honest Atheists endeavor to spread their belief, or rather unbelief? Can they not perceive a godless race—unless at the summit of intelligence—must inevitably be sinful? It may be, if a man is naturally honest and has a perfectly good conscience, he will be none the worse for being an Atheist; but if he is dishonest naturally, and has a bad conscience, if he is an Atheist will his belief improve him? I am aware of the fact that some Atheists are very wise and benevolent, but I also know some Atheists are ignorant and degraded. The Bible says, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God," but it appears the fool and the wise man hav said in their hearts there is no God. When the human family has so evolved that the "king of terrors" is uncrowned, and compelled to abdicate in favor of the queen of pleasures—life—the tenets of Atheism will be unobjectionable. EDWIN N. BEECHER.

Colonel Ingersoll on Heber Newton.

From the New York Herald, December 12th.

The Rev. R. Heber Newton, rector of All Souls' Protestant Episcopal church, started people to thinking by his sermon delivered on Sunday last, in which he laid down the dictum that the need of the present age is a new religion. His bold and uncompromising way of handling so ticklish a subject, and the earnest manner in which he avowed his belief that Christianity in its present form does not satisfy the spiritual aspirations of modern progressiv humanity hav caused a sensation in the religious world, and there are those who believe that the fearless, independent clergyman has got himself into hot water with his ecclesiastical superiors by his utterances on that occasion. The future will show whether there is any basis for such a belief; but, meanwhile, the sermon last preached by the pastoral head of the fashionable All Souls congregation is affording plenty of food for thought and comment among those who hav followed the course of Mr. Newton during the last few years.

And they are not confined to the Episcopalian fold by any means. Leaders in every religious denomination hav read his words of recent date with interest, and not the least concerned in the outcome of his departure from the old ruts of theological opinion has been the large and constantly increasing body of Freethinkers, of whom Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll is a conspicuous representativ.

It was with a view of getting their opinion of so important a matter as the possible "backsliding" of a clergyman of the repute and influence of Mr. Newton, and the probable effect of such a proceeding upon the Christian community, that I talked with Colonel Ingersoll yesterday. The noted Infidel conversed freely with me upon the subject, and the discussion took a wide range, covering many important matters relating to the religious situation and outlook, before he had concluded.

"Colonel," I began, "I wish to get your opinion of the sermon preached by the Rev. R. Heber Newton on last Sunday. I suppose you hav read the report of it that appeared in the Herald of yesterday?" The colonel replied:

I hav read the report, and I am satisfied, first, that Mr. Newton simply said what he thoroughly believes to be true, and second, that some of the conclusions at which he arrives are perfectly correct. I do not regard Mr. Newton as a heretic or a skeptic. Every man who reads the Bible must, to a greater or less extent, think for himself. He need not tell his thoughts; he has the right to keep them to himself. But if he undertakes to tell them, then he should be absolutely honest.

The Episcopal creed is a few ages behind the thought of the world. For many years the foremost members and clergymen in that church hav been giving some new meanings to the old words and phrases. Words are no more exempt from change than other things in nature. A word at one time rough, jagged, harsh, and cruel, is finally worn smooth. A word known as slang, picked out of the gutter, is cleaned, educated, becomes respectable, and finally is found in the mouths of the best and purest.

We must remember that in the world of art the picture depends not alone on the painter, but on the one who sees it. So words must find some part of their meaning in the man who hears or the man who reads. In the old times the word "hell" gave to the hearer or reader the picture of a vast pit filled with an ocean of molten brimstone, in which innumerable souls were suffering the torments of fire, and where millions of devils were engaged in the cheerful occupation of increasing the torments of the damned. This was the real old orthodox view.

As man became civilized, however, the picture grew less and less vivid. Finally, some expressed their doubts about the brimstone and others began to think that if the devil was and is really an enemy of God, he would not spend his time punishing sinners to please God. Why should the devil be in partnership with his enemy, and why should he inflict torments on poor souls who were his own friends and who shared with him the feeling of hatred toward the almighty?

As men became more and more civilized, the idea began to dawn in their minds that an infinitly good and wise being would not hav created persons knowing that they would be eternal failures, or that they were to suffer eternal punishment, because there could be no possible object in eternal punishment—no reformation, no good to the punished—and certainly the sight of all this torment would not add to the joy of heaven, neither would it tend to the happiness of God.

So the more the civilized adopted the idea that punishment is a consequence and not an infliction. Then they took another step and concluded that every soul, in every world, in every age, should hav at least the chance of doing right. And yet persons so believing still used the word "hell," but the old meaning had dropped out.

So with regard to the atonement. At one time it was regarded as a kind of bargain in which so much blood was shed for so many souls. This was a barbaric view. Afterward, the mind developing a little, the idea got in the brain that the life of Christ was worth its moral effect. And yet these people use the word "atonement," but the bargain idea has been lost.

Take for instance the word "justice." The meaning that is given to that word depends upon the man who uses it—depends for the most part on the age in which he lived, the country in which he was born. The same is true of the word "freedom." Millions and millions of people boasted that they were the friends of freedom, while at the same time they enslaved their fellow-men. So, in the name of justice, every possible crime has been perpetrated, and in the name of mercy every instrument of torture has been used.

Mr. Newton realizes the fact that everything in the world changes; that creeds are influenced by civilization, by the acquisition of knowledge, by the progress of the sciences and arts—in other words, that there is a tendency in man to harmonize his knowledge and to bring about a reconciliation between what he knows and what he believes. This will be fatal to superstition, provided the man knows anything.

Mr. Newton, moreover, clearly sees that people are losing confidence in the morality of the gospel; that its foundation lacks common sense; that the doctrin of forgivness is unscientific, and that it is impossible to feel that the innocent can rightfully suffer for the guilty, or that the suffering of innocence can in any way justify the crimes of the wicked. I think he is mistaken, however, when he says that the early church softened or weakened the barbaric passions. I think the early church was as barbarous as any institution that ever gained a footing in the world. I do not believe that the creed of the early church, as understood, could soften anything. A church that preaches the eternity of punishment has within it the seed of all barbarism, and the soil to make it grow.

So Mr. Newton is undoubtedly right when he says that the organized Christianity of to-day is not the leader in social progress. No one now goes to a synod to find a fact in science, or on any subject. A man in doubt does not ask the average minister; he regards him as behind the times. He goes to the scientist, to the library. He depends upon the untrammeled thought of fearless men.

The church, for the most part, is in the control of the rich, of the respectable, of the well to do, of the unsympathetic, of the men who, having succeeded themselvs, think that everybody ought to succeed. The spirit of caste is as well developed in the church as it is in the average club. There is the same exclusiv feeling, and this feeling in the next world is to be hightened and deepened to such an extent that a large majority of our fellow-men are to be eternally excluded.

The peasants of Europe—the workingmen—do not go to the church for sympathy. If they do they come home empty, or rather empty-hearted. So in our own country the laboring classes, the mechanics, are not depending on the churches to right their wrongs. They do not expect the pulpits to increase their wages. The preachers get their money from the well to do—from the employer class—and their sympathies are with those from whom they receive their wages.

The ministers attack the pleasures of the world. They are not so much scandalized by murder and forgery as by dancing and eating meat on Friday. They regard unbelief as the greatest of all sins. They are not touching the real vital issues of the day, and their hearts do not throb in unison with the hearts of the struggling, the aspiring, the enthusiastic, and the real believers in the progress of the human race.

It is all well enough to say that we should depend on providence, but experience has taught us that while it may do no harm to say it, it will do no good to do it. We hav found that man must be the providence of man, and that one plow will do more, properly pulled and properly held, toward feeding the world than all the prayers that ever agitated the air.

So, Mr. Newton is correct in saying, as I understand him to say, that the hope of immortality has nothing to do with orthodox religion. Neither, in my judgment, has the belief in the existence of a God anything in fact to do with real religion. The old doctrin that God wanted man to do something for him, and that he kept a watchful eye upon all the children of men; that he rewarded the virtuous and punished the wicked, is gradually fading from the mind. We know that some of the worst men hav what the world calls success. We know that some of the best men lie upon the straw of failure. We know that honesty goes hungry while larceny sits at the banquet. We know that the vicious hav every physical comfort, while the virtuous are often clad in rags.

Man is beginning to find that he must take care of himself; that special providence is a mistake. This being so, the old religions must go down, and in their place man must depend upon intelligence, industry, honesty; upon the facts that he can ascertain, upon his own experience, upon his own efforts. Then religion becomes a thing of this world—a religion to put a roof above our heads, a religion that givs to every man a home, a religion that rewards virtue here.

If Mr. Newton's sermon is in accordance with the Episcopal creed, I congratulate the creed. In any event, I think Mr. Newton deserves great credit for speaking his thought. Do not understand that I imagin that he agrees with me. The most I will say is that in some things I agree with him, and probably there is a little too much truth and a little too much humanity in his remarks to please the bishop.

There is this wonderful fact—no man has ever yet been persecuted for thinking God bad. When anyone has said that he believed God to be so good that he would, in his own time and way, redeem the entire human race, and that the time would come when every soul would be brought home and sit on an equality with the others around the great fireside of the universe, that man has been denounced as a poor, miserable, wicked wretch.

EUREKA, CAL., Dec. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER that a number of persons are willing to contribute their mite toward defraying the expense of bringing suit against the trustees of Girard College for mismanagement. Their imposition ought to be stopped, and I am willing to contribute $10, and more if necessary, to bring those religious rascals to justice.

Important.

Organization being of primary importance to the cause of Secularization, we write YOU to know whether Liberals of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana, and Michigan desire to meet in Chicago, about the time of the Paine anniversary (Jan. 29, 1889), for conference, consideration of plans for more perfect union, for legislativ work and formation of a Northwestern auxiliary to the American Secular Union.

If the responses are sufficiently numerous, we will arrange for a brilliant array of speakers. If you can not attend personally, will you help financially? The expenses will not be heavy. Let us hear from you immediately. Please answer this notice, or we shall be anxiously waiting, and there is no time for delay.

Please giv us your views on the subject. Do you think the time and place propitious?

Let our scattered forces combine, and out of this Western auxiliary we hope the several states will soon be well organized.

Now for a rally in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty. E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

The New Year.

The American Secular Union is about entering upon another year, having certainly made a good record during the one just past, and laid out a vast amount of important work for the future, but it remains to be seen whether YOU, who read this, are willing to assist in making the coming year one of splendid progress—an epoch of achievement. You should need no reminding of your duty, but ever be on the alert to anticipate the machinations of the enemy. The foes of mental liberty hav stormed the citadel of freedom—are sapping and mining our boasted battlements—and the destroying train is dangerously near the deadly fuse. Feeling that the people hav lost faith in an outrageous orthodoxy, and are either against it or indifferent, its priests are making a desperate struggle to fasten the fangs of ecclesiasticism on the body politic, as a means to perpetuate their power in the state, knowing that they are fast being repudiated by the people. They are demanding a national Lord's day law to be enacted by Congress, and an amendment to the Constitution providing public schools shall teach "the principles of the Christian religion." These cunning, deceitful attempts are the outward forms of a mammoth conspiracy which is secretly and successfully working to suppress our boasted freedom in religious matters. These agents of orthodoxy claim to hav a petition signed by six millions demanding the adoption of the above measures, as was fully detailed in last week's TRUTH SEEKER. The American Secular Union, by its agent and attorney, the venerable Liberal of Washington, J. B. Wolff, entered a most vigorous protest and performed noble service. Mr. Wolff said, "I think I ought not to stand alone. And I think it a lasting disgrace that the Liberals of this country do not provide means which shall enable this organization to present a more powerful protest in point of numbers against this entering wedge of absolute church and state proposed by ministerial traitors who aim to poison the source of the will of the people." Again let me call your attention to the resolutions of the last congress:

The American Secular Union, in congress assembled, reaffirms its inflexible determination to practicalize that priceless boon, mental freedom, which the framers of our Constitution established as the radical principle of our republic, and hereby declares itself the unalterable foe of all theological schemes to subvert our liberties, which are now not only insidiously sapping away our freedom, but defiantly plundering the taxpayers.

The American Secular Union stands as the solitary representativ of the plain, bold, simple declaration of Abraham Lincoln, "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people," as against a government ruled by a relentless God—in short, it stands as the representativ of the American idea.

WHEREAS, We view with alarm the persistent reactionary and revolutionary attitude of the various ecclesiastical bodies to gain greater control of the state and to sweep away the very corner-stone of American independence by advocating the recognition of God in our form of government, which would practically put an end to religious freedom; and

WHEREAS, Lands and money are annually granted to sectarian institutions; public offices in many states are open only to those who will, by oath, acknowledge the reigning superstition; Sunday laws are being "religiously" enforced in nearly every state; Bible-reading, prayer, and other religious exercises are carried on in the public schools; Congress and legislatures are consecrated to plunder by hypocritical prayers which cost the country at least $50,000 a year; fast days and thanksgivings are ordained by governments, state and federal; Indians are parceled out to religious sects for instruction; prisoners in jails and children in houses of refuge are delivered to the various denominations to be paid for from state funds and guarded by state and municipal police; postal laws are enacted at the suggestion of church coteries, limiting the liberty of the people and the press, and enforced by agents who are in no way responsible to the public at large; therefore,

Resolved, That as Freethinkers we hav reason to feel ourselvs direct heirs of the heroic fathers who fought to overthrow the iniquities of a "God's anointed" ruler, and veritable heritors of those who founded a state without a church; that as our Constitution aimed at complete secularization, the American Secular Union should be careful to preserve and eager to extend that principle, so that the foundations of our national welfare may be fully assured.

Resolved, That we call upon every man and woman who believes in intellectual freedom to aid in breaking mental chains; everyone who aspires to establish happiness here should assist in overthrowing the power of bigotry and superstition in the state, which the adoption of our Nine Demands only can accomplish.

Resolved, That we pledge ourselvs during the coming year to endeavor to gather into harmonious relations the Liberals of every shade; to disregard past differences, and determin that one grand, inspiring purpose shall animate us—the advancement of our second Declaration of Independence, nor will we falter in carrying out the desire of President Grant to "keep the church and state forever separate" till our efforts are crowned with complete success.

I can write nothing more pointed and concise. If you believe in them, cut them out, show them to your friends and neighbors, and away with your moral cowardice. Read them every day till you know and feel the importance of the work in which we are engaged. Then labor with might and main for the fulfilment of the last resolution, and we shall hav the proud satisfaction of looking upon the year 1889 with a thrill of patriotic joy that it marked a most important epoch in the grand struggle for mental freedom, otherwise it is not likely to be a Happy New Year. It remains for us to make it so. Will we?

THE BOARD OF GRIEVANCES.

It is a deplorable fact that the malcontents who hav crawled into the Liberal movement hav, in the past, been a source of positiv injury, and recognizing that it is the duty of an organization to defend and uphold its officers from such baseless slanderers, the recent congress wisely adopted unanimously the following resolution:

Resolved, That a board on grievances be appointed by the directors to whom any and all questions of misconduct or charges against any officer of the Union shall be preferred; that if they deem them of sufficient importance, the charges shall be brought before the board and their action thereon shall be maintained until the succeeding congress, when the charges shall be considered by a special committee of life members. That any person who shall publicly or privately make charges against the officers of this Union, without giving them an opportunity to refute them before the board of grievances. shall be denounced as a slanderer of the American Secular Union.

In accordance with the above, these gentlemen hav accepted appointment as the board of grievances: Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, Saginaw City, Mich.; G. F. A. de Lespinasse, M.D., Orange City, Ia.; Leonard Geiger, Esq., Hudson, N. Y.; Wm. Redfield, Esq., Stanley, Ia.; Hon. M. M. Secor, Racine, Wis.

If any person has or shall hav positiv proof of misconduct on the part of any officer of this Union, it is his right and duty to lay his charges and proofs before this board of grievances—a board selected from the best material in the Union, the most activ, well-known, and generous workers in our ranks—gentlemen who giv of their means to sustain the work, honor, and reputation of the American Secular Union, and who certainly hav every reason to jealously guard it. This board are appointed to deal with facts, not mere assertions; with proofs more than charges, and that they will do so unflinchingly the Liberal public at large will be thoroughly satisfied, knowing as they do that no officer of this Union will ask any favor at their hands only this: that if anyone is known to make detrimental assertions relativ to their official conduct, the board shall demand proof for such statements, and if none are forthcoming, the Liberal public shall be warned against him.

Every Liberal should aid this properly authenticated committee by notifying its chairman, Brother Burnham, or its secretary, Dr. Lespinasse, of reports brought to their knowledge. Furthermore, if detrimental assertions are made in your presence, just demand if the party making them has substantiated them before this board, or treat them with the contempt they deserve. Such are the assassins of Liberalism.

Brother Burnham is too favorably known as a man and a lecturer who has made great sacrifices for the cause—stepping out from a position of affluence and influence to one of hardship and struggle in an unpopular cause—to be suspected of bias against the best interests of the American Secular Union, and is certainly a proper man to be at the head of such a board.

If the other gentlemen are friendly to the administration it is only because they hav faith in its integrity, but they are men who hav faith only in facts, and if the facts are shown to be against the administration they will act in accordance with their honest judgment. In fact, we hav been unable to find any person whose support of the Union for the last few years has amounted to anything who is not heartily in favor of the administration.

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE FORUM.

The concert and literary exercises arranged by the quartet was a splendid artistic, if not a financial success, and to Mr. Frank Stillman, the organist, and Mr. Card, the leader, are due the thanks of the organization for this most creditable program:

PROGRAM.

1. Piano Solo. Miss Edith Deal. Selected.
2. Recital. Mrs. George A. Vinton. Robert of Lincoln.
3. Soprano Solo. Mrs. Emma Ma Dan. Pierrot.
4. Piano Duet. Radieuse, by Gottschalk. Miss Hattie Allen and Frank Stillman.
5. Whistling. { a. Sing, Smile, Slumber, b. Last Rose of Summer, } by Gounod. Miss Grace Bigelow.
6. Tenor Solo. R. Burus Haverson. Forebodings.
7. Recital. Carrie Predmore. Sockery Krause's Cat.
8. Piano Solo. Grand Polka de Concert, by Bartlett. Miss Hattie Allen.
9. Recital. George A. Vinton. Monolog.
10. Baritone Song. If the Waters Could Speak as They Flow. M. J. Hays.
11. Whistling. { a. Il Bacio, by Arditi. b. Serenade, by Schubert.
12. Recital. Florence Segner. An Old Story (Illustrated).

Miss Deal, our former organist, also a very accomplished pianist, who adds delicacy of interpretation to her selections, kindly assisted, and received a merited recall. In fact, to abbreviate this notice, it might just as well be stated at the outset that all the numbers were so exceptionally well rendered as to receive an encore. Prof. Geo. A. Vinton, director of the Chicago Musical and Dramatic College, and one of our activ members, whose inimitable character impersonations are a whole entertainment of themselvs, added much to the strength of the program. Mrs. Ma Dan's solo was rendered with that evenness of quality, easy phrasing, and melodic grace of a voice naturally true to pitch, and possessing sweetness and power. Miss Hattie Allen and Mr. Stillman's difficult duo was performed with the dash and technique of a pair of virtuosos, and the young lady charmingly sustained her reputation in the solo which followed.

The songs of Messrs. Hays and Haverson were admirably sung and enthusiastically applauded. The professional lady whistler was very fine, but it was scarcely necessary to add so expensiv a luxury to so excellent a program. The recital of little Florence Segner was a novelty. When her father mounted the platform with an immense easel, we were full of expectancy to know what this little six-year-old was going to do. It turned out to be an original poetic version of "Mary's Little Lamb," with thirteen large crayon sketches depicting the thrilling situations of this domestic drama. The sketches and recital were a pleasant conclusion to an excellent performance.

A LIGHT-BEARER.

Moses Harmon, the much-persecuted editor of Lucifer, occupied the rostrum at the Forum last Sunday, and though it was the first time he essayed to address a public gathering, delivered a very able lecture from the individualistic point of view on the Eighth Demand of Liberalism, entitled "Christian vs. Natural Morality." An interesting and animated discussion followed, participated in by Judge F. C. Russell, C. S. Darrow, Moses Hull, the celebrated Spiritualistic lecturer, who was present, Mr. Wm. Holmes, H. E. Bartholomew, and the writer.

The Catholic Church vs. Our Public Schools.

The hatred exhibited by the Catholic hierarchy toward our public schools and free institutions of the United States of America is deep and deadly—more rankling and venomous than that of any monarchy in any country toward us.

The Catholic church is controled by the Jesuits, who are worse than common pirates ever were. The pirates only infested a small portion of the sea, but the Catholic church makes war upon all mankind. It is the common enemy of man. Russia is accursed today by having more religion than any other country on earth, and is unfit for any decent man to liv in.

But if the Catholics under the leadership of the chief of pirates in Rome succeed in breaking up and destroying the common schools of this country, this will be only one step toward enslaving the people. Next will go the freedom of the press, and tnen free speech; then ignorance, slavery, and the holy Inquisition and Auto-dâ-fé for the few brave, freedom-loving men and women who remain true to themselvs and humanity. When that day comes our country will be infinitly worse off than Russia now is, and the people there in the grip of the Greek Catholic church are worse off than an honest, moral man in the orthodox hell, if there is any such blot on the fair face of nature.

The skirmishing commenced in San Francisco in 1886, when the "woman in scarlet" was repulsed. The campaign has really opened in Boston, and though the Jesuit pirates held the skirmish line, they hav been defeated in the first regular pitched battle. This was only a battle of ballots, but it was as hotly contested as any battle that was ever fought with powder and ball, and for the present as momentous. They are not killed, "only scotched." They are as the oligarchs were in the South before 1861—they must rule or ruin.

The fight in San Francisco arose, as in Boston, over the subject of "indulgences." They make history, and then deny the record. The pupils in the high school read of the "granting of indulgences." They asked the teacher the meaning of the term, and who had the power to grant "an indulgence." He gave the definition: "A right, privilege, or permission to do certain things or acts in consideration of a certain sum of money, or its equivalent, generally held as criminal acts or offenses by the civil, common, or statute law." And "that the pope of Rome could alone grant an indulgence, or authorize his inferior officers to do so." On the return home of the pupils they mentioned the incident to their parents, and some of them being Catholics they mentioned it to their masters, the priests, who in turn conveyed it to the mogul, the bishop, who demanded of the superintendent of public schools that the teacher be suspended. He obeyed the order from Rome, and promptly suspended the teacher. However, the teacher did not propose to be trampled upon in such a manner, and demanded a committee of investigation. By this time the press had got hold of the affair, and great public excitement followed. The knavish superintendent appointed a committee consisting of two Catholics and one Protestant. They promptly reported to sustain the superintendent. This made the people wild, and a new committee was demanded by them, aided by the press.

The new committee consisted of one well-known Protestant, one Jew, one Infidel, and one Catholic. This committee took the statements of the young ladies and young men, and they submitted a majority report overruling the superintendent and reinstating the teacher. This made the Catholic bishop, Alemeny, very angry, though the Bible says that "anger resides in the breast of fools," and he directed the priests, his slaves, to preach against what he termed "an insult to the Catholic church." This enemy of our dearest institution did not stop at this, but went to work and raised money enough from his dupes to buy the lot opposit the high school building and erected a parochial school upon the ground. He then, with all the biting malignity of a saint, exclaimed, "We will show you what we can, and will, do."

And this occurred in the "far West" in this land of freedom. But free only in name. Seven-tenths of the Secular press is subsidized by this corrupting church of Rome; and nine-tenths of our politicians are under pay from this common enemy of the American people. "Uncle Billy" Sherman has declared "that the next war we hav will be between the Catholics on one side, and the people on the other. It will be a thousand times more bitter than the late war of the Rebellion. It will be all over the land."

This is true, and every day brings us nearer to this impending conflict. Let the people be organized and ready. The Catholics hav the strategic hights in every city from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. Did you ever think of this fact? CITIZEN.

St. Joseph, Mo.

W. S. Bell in Texas.

I hav had to make some long jumps from one place to another in filling my engagements in this great state. From Jacksonville to Bowie was a long ride over rough roads. It was predicted that I should not hav more than a dozen people out to hear me, but to the surprise and great gratification of the few Liberals here, we had a houseful on both evenings that I spoke. There was more general interest manifested than anyone had apprehended. The stalwart Freethinkers of this little town are Dr. H. A. Baker, S. K. Ingram, A. S. Harris, and Clark Arnold.

My next stopping-place, not far away, was Vernon, a live town, one on the boom. The court being in session, many people were in attendance from the country, and they gave my lectures a boom by turning out in great numbers to hear me. It was quite gratifying to the Liberals, and, I need not add, to myself too, to see the court-house crowded, night after night, with attentiv and eager listeners. It sometimes happens that I hav a large audience on the first night, but on subsequent nights they are smaller, but not so in Vernon. They wanted to hear all they could about mental liberty and Secularism. The true Liberals here are M. N. Sevier, J. B. Ralston, C. P. Lockwood, R. Fitzgerald, and Geo. Warner.

If I left Vernon with a light and cheerful heart, I was doomed to come to grief at my next lecture-point. Roanoke is a very small town, with but two or three Liberals in it. I had a small audience and less pay. Mr. Spencer Graham and J. M. Wines did all they could to make the lecture a success; but in vain. The dear people of Roanoke are two or three centuries behind the times.

At Gainsville I spoke twice in the Christian church to quite attentiv and large audiences. There are a great many professed Liberals in Gainsville, but their Liberalism is, with many of them, all mouth. Dr. N. T. Bomar is an old-time Freethinker, who has kept the flag nailed to the masthead for many years. The following are my engagements for the rest of this month: December 14th, 15th, Springfield, Mo.; 18th, Humboldt, Kan.; 19th. Lebo, Kan.; 23d, 24th, 25th, Rockport, Mo.; 26th, 27th, Graham, Mo.; 29th, Guthrie Center, Ia.; 31st, Danville, Ia.

The Morality of Pittsburghers.

When I read at the breakfast-table, at one of the hotels, one morning, how the piety of this old city had been shocked by the presence of the Secular congress then in session in one of its halls, and when I fully realized the nature of the threat contained in the article which I held in my hands, one of the first thoughts that came into my mind was that I left home without bringing any weapons of defense with me. I had negligently forgotten that I might need them. Not long before I had had some experience with a gang of Pittsburghers who had come up to Ravenna, O., where the people of Portage county were trying to convict some burglars, thieves, and murderers. Not only Portage county, but other counties, and even states, were deeply interested in the convicting of all the persons arrested. Heavy rewards had been offered, much time had been spent, and great care had been used in hunting up and bringing to trial one of the most daring and desperate bands of outlaws that ever lay in wait for the commission of heinous crimes in northern Ohio.

We had spared no expense, and the best detectiv and legal talent of the city of Cleveland and of the country had been secured.

Ultimately we convicted only "Blinky" Morgan, who was quite as innocent, in all probability, as either of the others arrested with him. And for this general clearance we feel indebted to the piety and morality of the city of Pittsburgh.

This little scrap of history was out of my mind when I left home to spend two or three days in that city; but it came back vividly when I reviewed the editorial a newsboy handed me on the morning above referred to.

It is not my custom to carry weapons when traveling—I hav preferred generally to be without them—but if there is any city where they are needed, I believe it is Pittsburgh. Its gambling-dens and Sunday laws, its criminals and clergy, ought to make it an exception among considerate men who find it necessary to either pass through or abide in its gloomy surroundings. And yet I shall vote to hold the next Secular congress in the same hall, in this same city. It is just the place not to run from, and where the greatest good may be accomplished.

SECULARIST.

Colonel Ingersoll's Writings in the Public Schools.

It was reported that some of Colonel Ingersoll's writings had been read in the public schools of this city (Buffalo), and the Rev. Rufus S. Green, a prominent Methodist preacher of the city, was terribly excited over the matter, and rushed into print with the assertion that the report should be refuted at once, as such a report going abroad would disgrace the city. In answer to Rev. Mr. Green's letter the following was written and published:

To the Editor of the Courier: The Rev. Rufus S. Green in his "explanation" in the Courier this morning inculcates the idea that it would be a disgrace to the city to hav Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's writings read in our public schools. So far as the theological opinions of Colonel Ingersoll are concerned I will agree with Mr. Green that it would be very improper to hav them taught in our schools, but no more so than it would to hav the theological tenets of the Protestant or Catholic churches, or to hav their sacred writings read in our schools. Our public schools, which are supported by the whole people, should be kept entirely free from sectarianism. It is not the place to teach religion or antireligion; but that is not saying that there are not chapters and pages of Colonel Ingersoll's writings that would not be most appropriate to be read in our schools, the same as might be said of the writings of many learned doctors of divinity and other theological writers. Colonel Ingersoll has produced some of the grandest and most sublime literary productions ever written or spoken in this country. His speeches and writings are prose poems. Henry Ward Beecher introduced him to a great political gathering held in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn some years since in these words, as reported in the New York Herald: "I hav the pleasure to introduce to you the greatest orator that speaks the English language on the face of the globe." And the New York Mail and Express said of his great speech delivered at the reunion of the soldiers at Indianapolis in 1876: "Perhaps, without exception, the tribute paid by Ingersoll to the soldiers on that occasion is the most brilliant piece of word-painting in the English language. Some hav claimed that the words of Webster in reply to Hayne, of South Carolina, hav never been surpassed in terseness and eloquence, but actually there is hardly a comparison."

But it was not my intention here to eulogize Colonel Ingersoll. His great power of oratory is known to everybody in this country, and those who hav read the late numbers of the North American Review know something of his power as a controversialist. And whatever may be said against his theological views, I challenge anyone to find anything in his ethical teachings that is morally objectionable.

And as the Rev. Mr. Green insinuates at least that it would be a disgrace to hav his writings read in the hearing of our school-children, I will ask the gentleman to giv the readers one sentence in the writings of the great Agnostic that is immoral in its teachings. Just one sentence. No clergyman or priest in this country ever taught a higher morality than does Colonel Ingersoll, and, what is still better, never lived a higher one. H. L. GREEN.

A Merry Christmas.

From the Marlboro, Mass., Times.

We don't know whether Jesus Christ was born eighteen hundred and eighty-eight years ago, next Tuesday, nor whether he was crucified dead thirty odd years later, nor do we particularly care. We hav no definit knowledge, and never expect to hav, as to whether he was the son of God, and had been living up-stairs with his father several thousand million years before either of them thought to send the other down here to offer himself as a vicarious sacrifice for the sins of mortals, or whether he was just a plain, everyday sort of an illegitimate son of a virgin mother, but what we do know is that next Tuesday is the day set apart in all Christian lands for celebrating the birth of Christ, for the giving of gifts, the wishing of joy and happiness to friends and acquaintances, and for the unpacking of the children's stockings that hav been stuffed over night by that beneficent friend of the little ones known as Santa Claus, or St. Nicholas, and so, following the beautiful custom, we wish our readers, every one, a very merry Christmas.

Just Like Older Christians.

Dispatch from Syracuse, N. Y., to the Sun.

The class rivalry between the sophomores and freshmen in Syracuse University has become very fierce this term, and has manifested itself in uncommonly annoying ways. Among the students there are about thirty young men who are licensed as local preachers, and who go out and earn an honest penny on Sundays by preaching the gospel in rural districts. A short time ago the freshmen organized a local preachers' association, and excluded the sophomores from membership. This boycott irritated the clerical sophomores, and they determined to teach their brethren a lesson. One evening last week the association met in Brother Sykes's room in East Genesee street for their week's prayer-meeting. The special theme was "Christian Fellowship." Brother Wood was the leader for the evening. After a hymn and a chapter of scripture the brethren knelt down, and Brother Wood started in on a long and fervent prayer. He had just got past the point of invoking the divine blessing on the meeting, the college, the students, and others, when an unearthly blast that loosened the stovepipe and made each brother take a firmer grip on his chair resounded through the room. Brother Wood's tongue clave to the roof of his mouth for a moment, but he rallied and resumed. Then the shrill notes of a kazoo joined the trumpet-like sound. This was more than freshman grace could stand and the petitioners jumped to their feet, without waiting for Brother Wood's amen, and seizing ball-bats, and various missils, pursued the boycotted sophomores, who scattered in all directions. Then, reassembling, the brethren resumed their devotions, only to be saluted by the dismal wail of a horse-fiddle.

"I move we adjourn," shouted Brother Hoyt.

They did adjourn without waiting for the motion, and the entire association joined in pursuit of the sophomores, all of whom escaped, however, without recognition.

The sophomores say that they will break up every meeting of the association unless they are allowed to join it.

Is Mr. Shepard a Hypocrit?

From the Atlanta Constitution.

Col. Elliott Shepard, the hypocritical ass who edits the New York Mail and Express, and who places at head of his editorial columns every day a verse from the Bible, is making another exposure of himself.

In a recent editorial article he turns his bloodshot eyes in the direction of this section and furiously inquires of the South, "Do You Want War?" The blooming idiot then goes on to remark: "We are speaking soberly, with self-restraint, but in terrible earnest, when we sound this note of warning."

When a bald-headed snipe of the valley like Pecksniff Shepard begins to tamper with the dogs of war it is time for the whole country to stand from under.

WE shall hav to caution Friend J. K. P. Baker, County Surveyor of Shelby county, Ia., against the too free use of epithets. We had to cut some out of his communication in the present issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Gentle sarcasm and good-natured raillery may be admissible, but personal denunciation is out of place among friends. Spiritualism is a subject which our readers seem to never tire of discussing, and it is not for us to say they shall not discuss it. We must, however, draw the line at harsh personalities.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON is now lecturing in Nebraska. Those wishing Liberal lectures can address him at Wilber, Neb.

THE Philosophical Association of Brooklyn meets at the Fraternity Rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street (Williamsburgh), every Sunday afternoon. The lecture for December 23d is by John R. Charlesworth, subject, "Do We Liv After Death?" Mr. Charlesworth is a Materialist. December 30th, Lucien Saniel will describe "One Century of Revolution." In January, Mr. T. B. Wakeman will address the association. Debates follow the lectures. New Yorkers who like to take walks on Sunday could do worse than drop into these meetings.

International Courts of Arbitration and Friends of Universal Peace.

There is in our time a steadily growing tendency among educated people, and principally among those of Liberal and humanitarian views, in favor of erection of international courts of arbitration to decide in such cases of disagreement between nations as otherwise might result in disastrous wars. It is admitted by almost every individual—even by such as are not members of "peace-promoting" societies—that war, this relic of a barbarous past, is a disgrace to the nineteenth century; that it results in more harm than good for mankind in general, since its influence is not confined to the countries engaged, but is felt thousands of miles away. For instance, our late war compelled manufacturers in England to shut down their mills, since the export of cotton from here and to England had ceased, and thousands of workmen were thereby forced to a life of idleness and consequent misery. But the effects of a war do not even cease when the war is over. There is the national debt incurred, the blighted homes, the broken-up families, and on the theater of war the destroyed buildings, the killed or stolen (by requisition) live stock, etc. For these and several other reasons people who loved their fellow-beings decided upon the erection of said courts of arbitration, and since this way of settling disputes has proved successful in a few cases, they sing glory to these courts, and in the innocence of their hearts think war has received its deathblow, and that at least one or two generations hence it will be a thing of the past. But will it? I dare say no. The friends of arbitration hav looked at the subject through the purple glasses of emotion, and when their investigation was finished they prepared learned treatises full of beautiful aphorisms, black-colored metaphysics, and logic as green as that the average Methodist minister serves to his congregation—treatises that clearly prove alike the ethical and religious soundness and the impossibility of the realization of their ideas.

The number of mistakes which the "friends of peace" hav made can be condensed to two: 1. Their definition of right and wrong; 2. Their regarding a nation as an individual.

We will now examin these charges, and to that end ask, What is "right?"

For the writer of this article it would be preposterous to attempt to giv a philosophical solution of this question in its ethical sense, a task which I respectfully leave to men better qualified by an intellect superior to that I can boast of. And besides, since ethics are of no use in our present inquiry, I will confine myself to the purely practical, and in place of demanding the attention of the reader's philosophical and ethical powers, I simply call on his every-day common sense to follow me through my investigation.

In political, social, and military aspects it is "might" that is "right." Then might creates right. Only what might creates and sustains is right, and as soon as might is overturned right changes. Every change of power (revolution) in the history of mankind proves this to be true.

Before our late war the master of a slave had a right to punish even unto death the latter if he was disobedient, and any gentleman could apply his cane or horsewhip to the back of a colored person that had shown a disrespectful attitude toward him. The war being over, all this was changed, and it is now considered a crime to keep slaves, to kill or even strike, except in self-defense, a colored person. We see here that so long as the might, the power, of the slaveholding states was superior to that of the Abolitionist, slavery and its consequences were in accordance with right; but when might changed and came in possession of the opposit party, right too changed.

Most political economists, statesmen, etc., hav the idea that by dividing the political power in a legislativ, a judicial, and an executiv one, we hav cleared the dangerous rock of tyranny. Let us see. A certain measure is passed by the legislativ body, but it is of no practical consequence as long as the judicial part of the administration has not rendered the verdict that said measure is not illegal, is not in opposition to the fundamental law of the state. But even in case of a favorable decision the measure has not become a law—it remains invalid and insignificant so long as the executiv power has not signed it and provided for its enforcement. And consequently there is but one power in the state—the executiv. What is might decides, and nothing else is right. The division of power is, therefore, but an illusion, the belief in which makes the nation relax its watchfulness over its sacred treasure, liberty.

In military aspects we find, likewise, might is right. Then it is evident that only the stronger power is right, since it is the only one that can sustain and enforce its claims. The weaker has to submit to the bidding of the stronger, who, by force of arms, has subdued, or can subdue, the former. Consequently the word of the stronger is law for the weaker, a law signed and sealed by cannon and gun.

We hav now seen what practically constitutes right in social, political, and military aspects, and we will now examin, in the light of above-gained information, the practicability of courts of arbitration as used in international disputes.

Among the different settlements of international disputes no one is better known than the "Geneva arbitration," which was for the settlement of claims made by the United States against Great Britain for damage done to the former by the Confederate man-of-war Alabama, which was fitted out at Birkenhead, England.

Let us now view the political and economical conditions of these countries. Both were caused by an enormous national debt, brought on chiefly by wars; the strategetical position of each of them was so that a war could be carried on only by enormous expenses, and a decisiv battle demanded that one or both of them had to transport soldiers across the Atlantic ocean. The United States army might hav invaded and taken possession of that part of British territory lying north of us, but the acquisition of such a vast territory, its invasion and subsequent management, would call for money and considerable administration, both of which we had plenty of use for at home in settling our own affairs. Furthermore, war meant a continued depression of manufactures and commerce, under which both countries had already suffered enough to satisfy every one of the inhabitants engaged in occupations of a peaceful character. We see thus that the expenses of a war, even if successful, would hav for both nations amounted to a sum considerably larger than that of the claims, and that furthermore the hope of the United States to get the sum in question by resorting to arms was not and could not be very great. Therefore both parties agreed to submit their dispute for settlement to a court of arbitration, which on Sept. 15, 1872, decreed that Great Britain should pay the United States the sum of £3,229,166 13s. 4d.

But, in a case where each of the parties involved think themselvs strong enough to resent, and subdue their opponent, the result will be different. Let us suppose France and Germany become involved in a new war. France of to-day, which is considerably stronger than the France of Napoleon le Petit, wishes to take back Alsace and Lorraine, and to wash off in German blood the stain put upon her martial honor in 1871. Germany, on the other side, remembers how she walloped the small Frenchman in the last war, and is by no means disposed to giv up what she bought so dearly. She says: "Since you want the bone, come and take it if you can." Now Europe interferes and offers to settle their quarrel by arbitration, but quite naturally, neither France nor Germany will submit to an arbitrary decision, since they are sure one of them will be disappointed; therefore, arbitration is rejected with thanks, and on logical grounds, and war begins.

Let us take a third case. Suppose Denmark and Germany are the parties. Denmark, whose army on war footing is but one-seventh of the German army in time of peace, has consequently no hope for success, while exactly the opposit is the case with Germany. To preserve its independence Denmark calls on the great powers for interference; it wants arbitration. Let us furthermore suppose Denmark has the moral right on her side, since Germany, wanting but enlargement of its own territory, began the war for this reason only. There can now be two instances: Germany either givs her assent to the establishment of a court of arbitration, or she withholds it. But the result is the same in either case. Then if the decision given is in favor of Denmark, she can but ignore it, and what are the latter and the other powers going to do about it? Denmark cannot enforce the decision, and the other powers will not, if they are in any way sensible, since it would be the greatest injustice to their own citizens to waste the latter's money and blood to secure the happiness of a people they do not care for; in nine cases out of ten the other powers will confine themselvs to remonstrances, that is, indignant press notices and diplomatic blowing, a la Lord Palmerston; but even if they are so foolish as to interfere with arms, they will but move the inevitable a little further back in time, since, being frustrated in his design, Germany will soon find another casus belli.

We see thus that the submission to the decision of a court of arbitration in international disputes will be realized only when, as the saying goes, the game is not worth the candle.

But, say some "friends of peace," let us decrease the armies a certain number of per cent, equal for all nations, since such a means will decrease the burden of taxation. Very true. But how are we going to do it, since such a proceeding will disturb the political equilibrium of the world and only a very few governments will agree to do so? An illustration will show the fallacy of this proposal. Two nations, A and B, are engaged in a war against each other. A stands on the outer line, B on the inner line. A has 300,000 men in the field, B 200,000, of which 100,000 are necessary to guard the line of defense. Let us now, with the advocates of "reduction," reduce both armies say twenty-five per cent; this leaves for A 225,000, for B 150,000. We see thus that while the strength of B, after reduction, leaves him yet 50,000 men as reserves, and while the proportion on which they stand to each other has remained the same mathematically, it has changed considerably practically. Then, while B preserves his line unimpaired, A has, in consequence of reduction, been obliged to weaken one point or another, either in his line or base, and while the hope of success has decreased for him, it has increased an equal number of per cent for B. A's reduction can therefore not be accomplished, since few, if any, powers who hav a dangerous friend, or friends, for neighbors, will run the risk.

Well, let all potentates of earth meet; let the nations send delegates, and let us agree on dismissing our armies; let us use the men-of-war as merchant ships, or for scientific explorations; let us throw gunpowder, dynamite, and the like into the water, and sell guns and cannons as old iron. I will not examin the proposal which some of our "friends of peace" hav astonished the world by making. I will for argument's sake suppose that the jealousy, the fear, and all other ignoble emotions found in every nation hav been overcome by the "divine" eloquence of the "peacemakers," and that not a single instrument of war exists any longer. What then? The different nations exist yet, and, consequently, also diversity of interest. Let us now suppose a quarrel comes up on one or another boundary line. Countrymen take sides with countrymen, and the whole disagreement, which might hav started from two individuals favoring each other with a treatment of massage which they applied with doubled-up fists, brings people on both sides the line out of temper. The one party gains the victory, and, armed with clubs, axes, knives, etc., it starts in pursuit of their retreating opponents. During the excitement of pursuit passion conquers reason; and that "love of fight" subdued by artificial means, the recollection of wars of former times, perhaps a great victory or an ignominious defeat, these and many other influences carry them along, buildings are burnt, domestic animals are killed or taken along, blood of innocent human beings is shed, until at last, as by a miracle, the police come in force strong enough to establish peace. This is done. Who shall pay the damage? The aggressiv party or the state to which it belongs, of course. But if it will not, what then? Then the case is carried to the international court of arbitration, which givs its decision. Now, the nations who are represented in the court hav no means to enforce their decision if such a thing should be as that the guilty party will not submit to the judgment given. Then, as we know, all war material has been destroyed. Nothing is therefore left but to resort to arms. Arms are made, and as soon as one nation begins, the rest in self-defense are compelled to follow suit, and soon the world will again stand armed, but with a loss of billions of dollars. Consequently disarmament is possible only if we likewise destroy every product of nature from which arms can be made. This being impossible, it follows, as a logical consequence, that the scheme of disarmament cannot be realized—is nonsense.

No; if universal peace shall be brought about, if the wish of disarmament shall be realized, the way to it goes in the exactly opposit direction, namely, through increase of the number of soldiers, through an increase of the sums yearly demanded by the governments on military and naval budgets. And in this strife of destruction of national prosperity not the richest nation, but the most abstaining, most simple, the one who can renounce most of life's luxuries, will win. And then, after the whole world has been subdued, has been made one great state, and after the spirit of independence, the love for one's own country, of one's own language, of the great martial monuments of the past, has been rooted out—an end which it will take generations and generations to accomplish—then, and not before, is there use of talking of disarmament, of eternal peace, of the brotherhood of mankind. GUSTAVE NELSON.

A Survival of the Campaign.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of November 17th, under the head of "The Christian Victory," you say, "The results of the national and state elections do not, we imagin, affect the progress of Freethought, or retard or advance the time when the Nine Demands shall become established law."

I take issue with you, and I will tell you why. The election of General Harrison means the perpetuation of, for at least four years, the villainous and pauper-breeding tariff superstition. If it were not for this stupendous robbery, our people would hav more money and more leisure, consequently more intelligence and less Christianity. Go into the "protected" industries of Pennsylvania where miners used to earn from $130 to $200 per month, but now get from sixty to ninety cents per day, and how many Freethinkers do you find? Come out West among an equal number of men engaged in the free-trade industry of agriculture, and you will find Freethinkers by the hundreds.

One fraud is the ally of every other fraud. Kill one and you weaken all the rest.

Here in California the dear workingman has, for the past few months, been the recipient of a vast amount of tender solicitude. Gen. W. H. L. Barnes, the great corporation lawyer, frescoer of wind, and eater of $50 champagne dinners, together with General Diamond, president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and largest importer of Chinese slaves on this coast, hav been so lachrymose in their prophecies of evil to the American laborer in case of a reduction of the tariff that Bible students, like myself, hav been reminded of good old Jeremiah, whose head, you remember, became a fountain of water and whose eyes became waste-ways of tears while foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem and the downfall of Israel.

According to these kid-gloved statesmen—and they are a fair sample of the average tariff advocate—the presence of Aaron's golden calf in the camp of Israel was a small calamity compared with the disaster that would follow a reduction of the war tariff.

Now, the truth is, that next to the Christian humbug the tariff is the biggest superstition that ever robbed a credulous people. That our prosperity is the result of the tariff is as nonsensical as the claim that civilization is the result of the Christian superstition. Whatever prosperity and civilization we hav is in spite of these diabolisms.

Ours is an ocean-bound continent, and, whatever may hav been the necessities of our early years, we now need no advantage that nature has not given us. If there is any "beneficence" in protection, why were the years between 1873 and 1879 a time of mourning in every community of this high tariff land? Everywhere were strewn the wrecks of honest toil and enterprise. Honest debts to the amount of more than $1,000,000,000 were canceled by enforced bankruptcy. Thousands of brave hearts and strong hands gave up in despair and are to-day broken in body and in mind because of those fearful times.

High tariff advocates hav much to say about England, but they do not tell us that the worshipers of money and of caste in that country, as in this, are protectionists to a man. England sends to us for bread and meat to feed her toilers, and gathers raw material from every quarter of the globe, and then must ride three thousand miles of restless wave to pay duties and sell to us who produce our own food and raw material with labor largely purchased in the pauper markets of the world. We even pay for much of this pauper labor in villainous whisky, at ten cents a drink—a clear profit of eight cents. Such are the glorious results of eighteen hundred years of Christ.

Both William M. Evarts and James G. Blaine, while at the head of the treasury department, were compelled to leave on record the fact that English workers, everything considered, are as well paid as ours. Mr. Blaine, as much as any tariff reformer, has exposed the fraud of "protection."

While our manufacturers, with hypocritical pretenses and under forms of law, are receiving enormous bounties for protection against European pauper labor, they are sending their goods to European markets and competing successfully there, as a perusal of English trade journals shows. According to Mr. Blaine, our cotton goods are driving English cotton goods out of Canada.

Any man with sense and honesty enough to be an Infidel can, by proper investigation, learn that for every dollar the tariff puts into the treasury it takes five out of the pockets of the people, and givs it to such men as Andrew Carnegie, whose income last year, according to his own statement, was $1,500,000. Mr. Carnegie is an advocate of evangelical Christianity and an importer of paupers. Is it any wonder that he is a "protectionist?" The robber barons of the world are "protectionists," and this alone ought to convince us that "protection" is a fraud.

GEO. T. BRUCE.

Mr. Baker Replies to McArthur.

If McArthur chooses to parade his wooing of Aunt Elmina, he must expect, as he seems to invite, some notice of his singular performances. Let us indulge the faint hope that, notwithstanding the silly remarks of the juvenils with exceedingly small brain capacity, the wooing may proceed without delay, and that the gentleman in the case may exhibit some degree of affability at least toward the lady.

If she really has thrown cold water on his efforts, it is, no doubt, because she anticipated, not without some reason, that he was about to go into a "feint."

The gentleman wishes, Oh, how much he wishes, to "commence" his argumentativ flirtation! Several years ago, when the subject of "the resumption of specie payments" was the absorbing theme of public discussion, and the method of resumption was generally conceded to be a problem of great difficulty, Horace Greeley gave it as his opinion that "the way to resume is—to resume." So it seems to your Iowa philosopher that the proper way to commence a discussion is—to commence it at once, instead of bantering and blustering for a preliminary detailed statement of certain admissions alleged to hav been made by the other party to the controversy.

"I state again that you admitted the genuinness of some of your experiences." Having said this, McArthur asks, "If anyone who is interested in this will kindly send me the needed quotation," which is to prove that his lady lies. "Genuinness of experiences" is a McArthurism, and a literary curiosity. Does it mean—does he mean—that she admitted that spirits actually produced some of the phenomena? For tireless persistence in begging the question let McArthur take the proverbial bun. She says: "I hav seen nearly all phases of the phenomena," and, "I really can't think of a single thing that I believe was done by or through spirits," "but I believe all I ever saw or experienced was done by the mediums or their confederates." "Too many tell of unaccountable things to allow me to doubt all the phenomena," so "I granted that probably a portion of [them] was real; for I am loath to believe that all are deceivers or deceived." McArthur quotes her as saying, "A portion were real." He should learn to quote correctly even if he himself does not understand the rules of syntax. To notice all his blunders, and those that he carelessly, ignorantly, or willfully imputes to others, not even sparing the nameless dead astronomer, would take too much space; besides, as the saying goes, "the game would not be worth the candle." Acrimonious epithets and derogatory adjectivs can not with any success take the place of impartial statements and candid argument.

When he accused Elmina of being "one of the most, if not the most, violent opponents of the Spiritual philosophy," he appears to be a dwarf in a furious rage, trying with one hand to tear from its pedestal a placid statue quite above his utmost reach, while with the other hand tugging at his boot-straps he is making frantic efforts to raise himself to the object of his animosity.

Now he piles Pelion upon Ossa regardless of who is beneath, when he says "I state again," and "I state again," and "I state again;" for if "the evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen," then its repetition thrice ought to giv a weight to exceed that of thirty thousand. If all your other readers can't see Elmina's alleged admission and McArthur can see them, that settles it.

In his contribution to the issue of December 1st his oft-repeated apothegm appears in a regenesis, and this time it is twins. In one of its geminic aspects it holds "one fact" in one hand and in the other "countless thousands of theories." In its other phase it is the same old rag doll that he dandled with so much gush and slush before, only now it has an additional patch for a sort of apron. This remodeled piece of wisdom in its new apron now declares that, "all else being equal, the evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen."

Why should not equal causes produce equal results? They always do, and the diversity in our experiences is sure proof that "all else" is not equal. "Exceedingly small brain capacity," or something of some kind, causes this difference in the evidence of our senses as to the phenomena. Everything else is not equal when one sees and another does not see. One may be blind or look through colored glasses, or in a morbid humor close the eyes and stubbornly refuse to look. "Our phenomena are facts! To be sure! All phenomena are "facts;" but when "we hav simply an array of facts supported by a philosophy," our facts are in a sickly condition. This is the gist of all I hav said. I rely on facts, not theories. True, or real phenomena, as forming evidence, do not need any "support" from theory, speculation, or philosophy. They are to be tested and judged by our experience alone. "An array of facts supported by a philosophy!" If your "Iowa sage" ever wrote anything, or in his most careless humor ever said anything as repugnant to scientific thought or method as this phrase, please try the experiment of "braying a fool in a mortar," and see if you cannot eliminate the folly. The luminosity of the definition that a fact is a fact might pass without criticism, but for the incongruity in the use of the overtaxed little word, as McArthur skips from one meaning of it to another meaning seemingly unconscious of his mental departure. He seems to think by words rather than by the harmonious relativity of ideas. It would be greatly to the advantage of such followers in the wake of words, if language were so constructed that each word could hav but one appropriate clear meaning and use. Such vocabulary would militate against the business of word-shuffling and punning, but greatly encourage the habit of clear thinking. Imagination and credulous timidity might still people dark closets with ghosts and bears, but the bare fact would not bear the ambiguity imparted to it by a word of various meanings. A "fact" can be neither combated nor supported by a theory. Facts are self-supporting. A fact is not a statement to be "emphasized" or "believed." It is to be received into our conscious experiences, as a feeling, seeing, or hearing. The astronomer looked as if he actually believed each "fact." If he ever made the experiment, he knew, realized them; if he never realized the facts, he believed, not the facts, but the statements of them, and his confidence in these statements was based on an assurance that the same experiences would be his, "all else being equal."

There was something remarkable, though, about this astronomer of great celebrity. Among his other accomplishments was a claim to a knowledge of painting. In charity to the illustrious dead let us imagin that his accomplishment was not only a claim, nor even a knowledge of painting alone, but also the attainment of artistic skill. When my enemies die let McArthur write their epitaphs and I shall be revenged. "A small oil painting," "almost a work of art," done, as we are left to infer, by the spirits! They made it. Did they make the oil and paint? Heston will only need to picture that "fact" in all its details in order to hav a companion-piece to his picture of Balaam and his beast. If some one only had the angel's sword to place beside the brush that painted that small oil painting, miracles or no miracles, the eternal fitness of things would be apparent, even to a brain of exceedingly small capacity. Another remarkable thing about this deceased astronomer, "he believed that Zoellner and Flammarion were able to measure four hundred millions of millions of miles a second and demonstrate it." That is as clear as mud and as solid as a soap-bubble. This shows the capacity of the astronomer to believe things. No wonder he "declined" and died. And he believed they could demonstrate it. I hav driven two school-marms into the asylum with the question, What does it refer to for its antecedent?

McArthur is an adept at constructing ambiguities. Even his apostrophes hav a sort of mocking-bird farness and nearness, producing a ventriloquistic effect on the reader that is not agreeable. If his egotism is colossal it is at least definit; but his tu-isms are not very easy to determin. However, his most serious fault, which is really a crime, is his lack of candor. He seeks to place his antagonist in a false light. Just think of him coupling Cronin and Baker together as having analogous views. A demonologist and a Spiritualist hav much in common. Think of him relegating superstition to the churches, and a portion of the Materialistic community. What is the ground for all that clap-trap anyhow? Is it that we think ourselvs qualified to judge of all things in the range of our experience, untrammeled by authority and undeterred by the smallness of our brain capacity; or is it that we are slaves to authority? "If you don't believe it, write to Pat Cronin and J. K. P. Baker." The insolence of this is only exceeded by its unfairness.

J. K. P. BAKER.

Slate-Writing.—A Postscript.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19, 1888, I described some slate-writing obtained by me at Mr. Keeler's room. I wrote out my questions before I went there and Mr. Keeler never saw them, nor did I disclose to him a single name. I got three answers on the slate, and the signatures of my mother, father, and niece were apparently genuin. But there was another communication which was not in answer to any inquiry or thought of mine, and this is what I said about it in my former letter:

> The fourth message was this in large letters: "Good morning. Tell Sarah. Wallace Mentor." No such person is known to any of us. If by "Sarah" was meant my aunt, she herself was present.

Three days ago, as I was showing the slates with the writing on them to two lady friends, after I had told about the messages from my mother, father, and niece, one of the ladies remarked, "But you havn't told us about this Mr. Newton. Who was he?"

Then my aunt Sarah and I looked at the signature again, and for the first time we read it Newton. The first letter looks more like an M than an N, but reading it N the name is plainly Newton. And then my aunt remarked, "Why, my mother was a Newton before she was married." That of course solves the mystery. Such a person as Wallace Mentor probably never existed, but it is quite possible that my aunt had a relativ by the name of Wallace Newton, though as yet she is unable to recall such a name. She came over from England in 1851, and is the youngest of a large family, few of whom now survive.

They Pay Taxes in California.

From San Francisco Freethought.

It seems to be a fact that the religious institutions of this state are assessed and that the tax is collected. A pair of black-dressed and black-hooded "sisters" exhibited a total lack of judgment one day last week by walking into the Freethought office and soliciting a contribution to pay the taxes on some Catholic-factory to which they were attached. We did not giv them a nickel, and if they had known how little money we donate annually to religious purposes, it is probable that they would not hav asked us for anything. Let them hustle as the rest of us do.

"W. A. C." in a Letter to the same journal.

Church property in this (Los Angeles) county is assessed as other property, and I think the taxes are paid. Of course this must extend over the state. I got my information from the assessment roll of this county, and if it is correct the first Demand of Liberalism is satisfied, so far as this state is concerned.

Various Opinions.

There are twenty-four contributors to the Symposium in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889, and fourteen questions were asked of each one. There are, therefore, more opinions in that ANNUAL than in any other book of the century. And every opinion is worth studious consideration.

A Welcome War.

On top of the Protestant victory in Boston comes the announcement that the Protestants of New York are about to begin a war against Romanism in politics and schools, and of the holding of a meeting to begin the fray.

The secretary of the Boston Committee of One Hundred, which managed the religious campaigning in Boston, is the Rev. James B. Dunn. That gentleman tells a World reporter that he had received a visit from two New Yorkers, "men of prominence in business and religious circles, representing a large number of prominent Protestants," who desired to borrow the religious methods of Boston's reformers in order to redeem New York's government, now almost exclusivly controled by Romanists, and likely in the future, through the ascendency of Tammany Hall, to be wholly directed by Roman Catholics. Mr. Dunn told them, so he says, how to go to work. He explained the organization of women, mapped out a campaign, showed them how great results had followed a house to house visitation by the ladies, and assured them that the coöperation of the women won thousands and thousands of votes.

The Protestants involved are the German Lutherans of this city and Brooklyn, with allies from neighboring towns. Dr. George C. Seibert, a professor in the Presbyterian seminary of Bloomfield, N. J., first suggested the desirability of an organization to resist papal power, and after one or two informal conferences the pastors and officers of thirty-three churches got together and elected a governing board. The organization is to be called the German Evangelical Alliance, and its object is "to maintain and defend the civil and religious liberty of this country wherever it seems to be in danger." The program, however, does not contemplate resistance to such schemes as that of the Sabbath Union, but only to break the power of the Catholic church, whose influence, said one speaker, is beyond description. An appeal to Protestants has been written, one section of which is as follows:

"The pope has a greater power to-day than any other sovereign. He menaces the United States. In Boston the Catholics hav gained control over the public schools, and right here in New York Archbishop Corrigan is an absolute ruler. While millions are expended for the Catholic church, nothing is done for the Evangelists. It is the duty of all the people who hav other than the Roman Catholic belief to make one front against this phalanx of arch enemies."

The Alliance will apply for a charter for the central organization, and local alliances will be formed throughout the country. An appeal has been written, and is now being discussed by the members. It calls upon all German evangelical associations of America to stand firmly together for defense against the powerful foe of their religion and of the political liberties of the nation; to ignore all factional differences and join hands in this, their time of peril, as the foe is at their door. The question the Alliance confronts is pictured as of great importance, and it is urged that mature judgment be brought to the fulfilment of their Christian duties as against the "liberty-murdering power of Rome."

All this is exceedingly interesting. A check to the growing power of Rome in this city is badly needed. And in a fight between the two great sects of Christianity, it is more than probable that Liberalism would be the beneficiary. So jealous are the two religious wings of each other, that rather than that its opponent should profit, one would giv up religion in the schools and donations from the county treasury. We shall welcome the war.

The Metropolitan Museum.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art dedicated the new wing to their building on Tuesday the 18th. A steel-engraved invitation, 7 inches wide and 5¾ long, with the seal of the Museum attached thereto, besought the honor of THE TRUTH SEEKER Editor's presence, probably because that individual has interested himself a good deal in the Museum, to the end that the treasures now concealed therein might be known to the public.

The dedication was a great affair. All the big bugs and McAllister's four hundred were there. So also were the fashionable ministers and a glee club. Dr. John Hall opened the ceremonies with prayer, and then the president of the park board, Ex-Senator Robb, presented the new building to the trustees of the Museum. Mr. Robb is an advocate of Sunday opening, and he concluded his speech by saying:

"I hope that this is only the beginning of many an improvement in the Museum. I hav another hope, in the expression of which I voice the sentiment of a large portion of the people of this city, and that is that the time is not far distant when this Museum shall be open to the people on Sunday."

This sentiment was heartily applauded, more heartily, in fact, than any other advanced. Mayor Hewitt, who concluded the ceremonies by declaring the Museum open, also spoke briefly for Sunday opening, and he, as well as Mr. Robb, but expressed the opinion of almost the whole city. Between the two speeches, the treasurer of the Museum and the glee club were heard, as well as W. C. Prime, son of Irenæus Prime. Messrs. Marquand and Prime had not a word to say in palliation of their obstinacy in keeping the doors of the Museum closed on Sunday.

The new wing was built by the city, which now has invested in this one Museum about eleven hundred thousand dollars, costing in interest sixty-six thousand dollars annually, in addition to the fifteen thousand dollars yearly presented to pay running expenses. It is a pretty heavy investment, and one from which the people receive but small return, owing to their inability to view the treasures. Mr. Prime, who is one of the officers, said in his speech that the medieval ages were *mis*called the Dark Ages, and he is evidently honest in his pious thought, if we may judge by his constant opposition to the greatest improvement that can be made in the management of the institution. A minority of the directors of both Museums are in favor of a liberal policy, but Prime and Jessup are as yet sufficiently powerful to prevent its adoption. The Museum is well worth a visit if one can spare the time on week-days.

The Debate at Silverton.

The Liberals of Silverton, Oregon, hav touched pitch and been defiled. They thought to shut Clark Braden up by getting an Infidel debater to meet him, and they find that they hav only opened wider the sewer-gates of his eloquence. After months of negotiation, B. F. Underwood and Braden stood on the same platform for eight evenings, and debated the differences between Liberalism and Christianity. Mr. Underwood conducted himself as a gentleman. Braden from the first played the part of fool and clown and mountebank. He began his antics with his opening speech, and up to date has not ceased. The only result of the debate that we can see is, that the Silverton Liberals are now convinced that Braden is an ass and a blackguard, and undoubtedly the Liberals of Eugene City—where the performance was repeated, through the misrepresentations of Braden's church friends—will agree with them.

The wrangle at Silverton did not end with the close of the "discussion." After he had howled himself hoarse on the platform, Braden went into print. He prepared a eulogy of himself and had it signed (or forged their signatures) by most of the preachers in Silverton. This eulogy was published in the Silverton Appeal. In it he attacks the Liberals of the place, praises himself, and more than insinuates that he has destroyed Infidelity forever. Then he had the eulogy printed on a wide sheet of paper, and is now, with the aid of the Ironclad Age, circulating it throughout the country. Of course the Silverton Secular Union had to reply, which they did in the same paper, and also by circular. The controversy is a sort of "You lie!" affair, and both sides roundly denounce each other. Clark Braden never had any honor or dignity to lose, but the Liberals of Silverton, it seems to us, cannot not help regretting that they ever engaged in skunk-hunting.

However, if the lesson is not lost upon other communities of Liberals, the time and money of the Silverton and Eugene City Liberals may hav been well spent. They hav found out that Braden's character is such that no matter how a debate turns out he has nothing to lose. Abuse of himself only feeds his foul vanity, and notoriety, no matter how obtained, is just what he wants. He would rather be kicked than be ignored. In his normal condition he livs in moral backyards and feeds on intellectual swill, and to be occasionally taken into the parlor, although it be by the scruff of the neck to be used as a door-mat, is an honor which he greatly appreciates. To get recognition he does not hesitate to lie, to bully, or to forge indorsements of himself; and his ingenuity in inventing foul libels has never been exceeded by any churchman. A controversy with him cannot be other than a match at bandying billingsgate, and whoever engages in it lowers his own dignity and injures the cause he represents. And whoever selects him as a champion will surely regret it, if he has the least regard for decency and honesty.

Powderly's Bargain With Rome.

It is a pretty good recommendation of the movement against monopoly of land that the Holy Apostolic Roman Catholic church has condemned it through the "Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition." Whatever that church denounces is a good deal more than likely to be of value to the human race. The words of the condemnation are these:

"In regard to those things which were again proposed the society of the Knights of Labor may be tolerated for the present, provided that those points in its statutes which are incorrect or can be taken in a bad sense are amended; especially if those words of the preamble of the constitution for local assemblies which seem to savor of Socialism or Communism are so corrected that they may signify that the earth (soil) was so given by God to man, or rather to the human race, that everyone may enjoy the right to acquire some part of it, by the use, however, of lawful means, and the right of property being prescrved."

This is in accord with the pope's encyclical of December, 1878, in which he said that "Catholic wisdom, relying upon the precepts of the natural and the divine law, has provided for the security of the state and the family by its tenets concerning the right of domain and the division of property. The Socialists denounce the right of property as a human invention, repugnant to the natural equality of men. But the church ordains that the right of property and dominion, which springs from nature itself, be kept sacred and inviolate to everyone."

Acting upon the orders of the "Sacred Propaganda" at Rome, Mr. Powderly has promised to change the constitution of the Knights of Labor to suit the wishes of the church, as per this letter:

"CARDINAL'S RESIDENOE, 408 NORTH CHARLES STREET,
"BALTIMORE, Sept. 25, 1888.

"YOUR GRAOE: On receipt of the letter, of which the inclosed is a copy, I wrote to Mr. Powderly requesting him to come and see me. He came on the 24th inst., in compliance with my invitation, and cheerfully promised to make the emendations required by the holy office, and expressed his readiness to comply at all times with the wishes of the ecclesiastical authorities. Very faithfully,

"Your friend in Xto, J. CARD. GIBBONS.

"MOST REV. DR. ELDER, Abp., Cincinnati."

Without reference to the inherent rightfulness or error of the Knights of Labor constitution, it is pretty evident that the church of Rome completely controls the order, or what there is left of it, since Powderly captured it at the last convention. Mr.

Powderly denies that he has sold out to Rome, but in the face of Cardinal Gibbons's letter his denial will not go far.

Stories About Him and His.

The past ten days has developed two new stories about Colonel Ingersoll and his family. Yarns like these are bound to come up about so often, if not oftener, and presumably will continue to do so as long as the church does not count as sinners those through whose lies the glory of God doth more abound. The first is this, published in the World, December 20th, as a special dispatch from Chicago:

"Chicago Roman Catholics took a great deal of interest in the honors paid to Bishop Spalding, of Peoria, yesterday, and in the general talk an interesting story about the bishop and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll came to light. It is told by a pastor of one of the churches here, and goes like this:

"Several weeks ago the editor of the Forum magazine wrote to the bishop to ask if he would, as a champion of religion, meet Colonel Ingersoll in an open discussion in the pages of the magazine. Bishop Spalding was much surprised, but, being a doughty warrior for his faith, answered that he was more than willing to engage in such a contest with any Infidel. Messages passed between the two sides, and the terms of the polemical joust were all arranged—whose paper should appear first and when, who was to hav the last word, and all the rest of it. Both sides were fully committed to the debate.

"All of a sudden the negotiations on behalf of Colonel Ingersoll were broken off. The only information of this that the bishop received was a curt telegram saying that Colonel Ingersoll's wife was opposed to her husband's engaging in such a discussion at this time and in the manner proposed. For this reason he had withdrawn. The bishop made no reply and the matter dropped. Now the friends of Bishop Spalding and the religious enemies of Colonel Ingersoll are saying that the great Infidel was afraid of the ecclesiastic and used his wife's objection as an excuse to get out of the proposed contest."

A World reporter took the story around to Colonel Ingersoll's office, and found him in, "and very indignant when he read the Chicago special." The reporter adds: "It was with unusual sharpness in his voice that the colonel said: 'There is no truth in the statement. The editor of the Forum will know whether any discussion was about to take place in that magazine. The story probably grew out of an effort on the part of Courtlandt Palmer to hav a discussion in the Nineteenth Century Club between Bishop Spalding and myself. Nothing ever came of it, however.' 'Are you willing to enter into a discussion with the bishop?' 'If Bishop Spalding really wishes to giv his views I think that the editor of the North American Review will giv him the space he desires, and I could reply if necessary.'" Mr. Lorettus S. Metcalf, editor of the Forum, also called at the World offiee and denied the story.

The second traveler's tale is that Miss Eva Ingersoll recently visited St. Patrick's cathedral, and was so impressed by its magnificence that shortly thereafter she became an enthusiastic Christian. "This merely illustrates," comments one journal, "that the colonel's children are much like other people's children. They do not always follow in the footsteps of the 'old gent.' The little rebel in other fathers' boys and girls has a lodging-place in one of his girls at least." No doubt this story will afford considerable amusement to the Ingersoll family. The colonel will probably murmur something about "another damn fool," Mrs. Ingersoll will perhaps ask, "Robert, why do folks lie so?" bewitching Eva Ingersoll will undoubtedly laugh good-naturedly, magnificent Maud Ingersoll will allow her upper lip to turn slightly upward, and Mrs. Farrell will at once paste the item into her huge scrap-book of stories about the colonel and his family. And then all of them will forget the Christian sinner for God's sake.

But "the mendacity of superstition is almost enough to make a man believe in the supernatural."

Trouble Ahead for Italy.

Up to the present month the Vatican authorities hav steadfastly refused to allow Catholics to take part in the election of deputies to the Italian parliament. This was done because the church did not recognize the Italian government, though in municipal elections the pope did not forbid the participation of Catholics.

The injunction against voting for deputies has now been withdrawn, and "full liberty of action" is accorded Roman Catholics. This means the return at the next election of a large number of Catholics, who will form in the chamber of deputies a clerical wing, with the sole aim of wrenching from the state concessions to Rome. The pope's purpose is the restoration to the temporal government of the church of the papal states, taken from her by Cavour and Garibaldi, and now forming with the other peninsula states the kingdom of United Italy. To accomplish this he is using all his immense political power.

The probabilities are that the pope will be disappointed. Certainly as long as Crispi, the Freethinking premier, is in power, the schemes of Leo XIII. will be abortiv. But a strong clerical party in the chamber of deputies will make an infinit amount of trouble for the government, and be a constant and dangerous menace to the peace and stability of the Italian kingdom. Roman Catholicism is a religion for which reformation appears impossible. Complete annihilation of its temporal power will be Italy's only remedy, and that cannot occur so long as other nations treat with the pope as a ruler of any sort.

The Church in Politics.

J. D. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, has been aroused by the Sunday bill of the Sabbath Union and the proposed public school amendment to the United States Constitution, to form a resolution which ought to be held by every Freethinker in the country. This resolution is to hereafter make his politics secondary to his principles, and to vote and work for the Nine Demands first, and for other things next. He says:

"The editor of this Pulpit is not a politician, though, as stated elsewhere, he has always exercised the right of suffrage by voting as he thought best for the general good. He has always acted within the ranks of the Democratic party, never having once scratched a party ticket. He may continue thus to act in the future, but he has made up his mind to oppose, from now on, the discriminations favoring any form of superstition, and the party or parties favoring such discriminations, and he holds himself ready to act with any reasonable party that will embody these demands, or similar ones, in its platform of principles. Of course there are other, and it may be said equally important, principles to be incorporated into a party platform. This is readily granted, but as a Liberal, and in behalf of Liberalism, as we understand what Liberalism is, we declare these demands absolutely essential to a party platform able to cope with the fanaticism that seeks to turn this government over to God, which means that it is to be conducted in obedience to the dictates of the clergy who claim to be God's representativs on earth."

The Christians in his neighborhood hav already made religion the main issue in their political campaigns, and Mr. Shaw instances the fight in the ninth congressional district of Texas, represented by Roger Q. Mills, the sponsor of the Mills tariff bill. Colonel Mills was the regular nominee of the Democratic party, and although, says Mr. Shaw, "that party went far beyond the line of true independence to palliate the hatred of the preachers for its favorit man, who had offended them by opposing Prohibition, and by using the plain words and practices of their savior against them; though it employed one of them to go and pray for it on the occasion of his nomination, thereby running the risk of his turning the Lord against them, they then went solidly against Mills and for Jones, who made the race without a single issue, except that he was a 'Christian gentleman,' as was so often uttered by the Revs. Carroll, Burleson, Bishop, and others. These gentlemen, who claim to be the subjects and followers of him who said, 'My kingdom is not of this world,' went square into the political arena, and with tongue and pen, by prayer and persuasion, did all they could to beat one of the best and bravest men that ever held a public trust, and put in his stead an obscure adventurer, whose only plea was that he was a 'Christian gentleman.'"

The Sabbath bill and the conduct of the clergy in his state lead Mr. Shaw to conclude that the church is reaching for political power, and he desires to precipitate the conflict which must come. "Let them cry out," he says, "for God in the Constitution, the Bible in the public schools, as loud as they will. Let them shake their clenched fists at parties and candidates from now on. The sooner we can get them at it on all hands, and the more frantic they become, the sooner will the strife be over. We say let them petition for Sunday legislation, and tamper with elections to their hearts' content. The people are not going to submit to their clamor. The more they abound the less use will good men hav for them."

For more than a decade we had thought and said just these things, and we wish that more Freethinkers could be induced to take an activ interest in politics and to vote on Liberal issues exclusivly. But as a general thing the Freethought party is politically split up and scattered among all the others. Here in New York some vote the Labor ticket, some the Socialist ticket, and the rest the Republican and Democratic tickets. Their political party affiliations seem much stronger than their Freethought principles. We believe, however, that a secular government is of importance paramount to all other political issues, and until that is attained Liberals, it seems to us, should investigate the principles of their candidates and vote accordingly. The church and state ought to be so widely, thoroughly, and fundamentally separated that it would be unnecessary to ask what a candidate will do for his church if elected. State and municipal officers ought to be deprived of all power to do anything for their church. Then religion would indeed be out of politics. But so long as the politicians "work the religious racket;" so long as the church votes for certain men because these men will grant public money to the church by means of laws obtained by previous bargains between politicians and pietists; so long as the clergy are in the political arena as clergy; so long as the church and state are practically united—just so long will it be necessary for Freethinkers to stand up in the opposition and use their voting strength to defeat ecclesiasticism and secure a secular government. We are glad that the gentle and unaggressiv nature of Mr. Shaw has at last been aroused. The provocation must hav been mighty ere he came out in this flatfooted way, and we can only hope that every other heretic in the country will follow his splendid example.

THE sympathy of Mr. Bradlaugh's friends in this country will go to him in the loss of his daughter, Alice Bradlaugh, who died December 2d of typhoid fever, at the age of thirty-two. The funeral was private and silent, and the remains rest in Woking Cemetery. Miss Bradlaugh was one of her distinguished father's best and readiest helpers, and the signature "A. and H. Bradlaugh" to the news columns of the National Reformer made the names of Alice and Hypatia Bradlaugh familiar to all English Freethinkers. Miss Bradlaugh established classes in science which she and her sister personally conducted, and her death will be a personal bereavement to many besides her relativs. She was also the home-keeper for her father, to whom she was devoted.

ANNIE BESANT, whose successful candidature for membership to the London school board is already known to our readers, returns, in the National Reformer, her grateful thanks to her supporters. She says: "From all parts of the country letters, resolutions of clubs, and telegrams of congratulation hav reached me, each one adding to the weight of responsibility, in the hopes expressed and the trust given. I can only say in answer that I will try to do my duty. Ten years ago, under a cruel law now partially changed, Christian bigotry robbed me of my little child; now, the care of the 763,680 children of London is placed partly in my hands, 98,890 of these being in my own constituency, and the trust thus given I will try faithfully to discharge. More I cannot say." Mrs. Besant received 15,926 votes in her district, Tower Hamlets, some three thousand more than the next successful candidate. She was supported by Freethinkers, Socialists, and Liberals, and though efforts were made to induce her to drop the Freethought principles she refused to do so, and is now the Freethinkers' representativ in the board. The Rev. S. D. Headlam, a Liberal Christian and Socialist, is also elected, and will aid Mrs. Besant in her efforts to procure secular education for the school-children.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH'S Oaths bill is now the law of Great Britain, having passed the House of Lords after considerable opposition, and a declaration from one lord that Atheists should not be permitted to blazon their unbelief. The business part of the bill is as follows: "Every person, upon objecting to being sworn, and stating, as the ground of such objection, either that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief, shall be permitted to make his solemn affirmation instead of taking an oath in all places and for all purposes where an oath is or shall be required by law." The bill also provides a written affirmation in lieu of affidavits. The advantages of the bill are that it permits persons without religion to affirm their allegiance as members of Parliament, solicitors, barristers, etc., and for the first time enables those whose religion makes them unwilling to take an oath, to make affirmation of allegiance. It removes the incompetency of non-religious witnesses in Scotland, and enables jurors to affirm in all parts of the United Kingdom. By repealing all or parts of various acts it protects non-religious persons in courts. Its disadvantages are that it may sometimes, in the minds of Christian jurors, prejudice a witness or party to a suit by compelling him to avow his lack of religious belief, and it puts Secularists in the category of sects. It is, however, an immense step ahead of the present unjust laws on the subject and as the best that could be wrung from Parliament Mr. Bradlaugh is deserving of congratulations and thanks for his efforts in obtaining it. Lord Coleridge had the bill in charge in the House of Lords.

Letters from Friends.

SAN BERNARDINO, Nov. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription to your valuable paper. My wife says she cannot keep house without it. Since you illustrated your paper it is the best educator for the young children I ever saw. May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv till it has demolished all bigotry and superstition. GEO. R. KNIGHT.

WARRENSBURGH, Nov. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I cannot do without it. It is my meeting and my church and my God. It is the only guide that directs me on the right road to glory. I also send $1 for membership to the American Secular Union. Please forward it to E. A. Stevens, secretary. When proceedings are commenced on the Girard College I will chip in again. WM. WILCOX.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 17, 1888.

DEAR FRIENDS: I see the Truth Seeker Company has out a new edition of "The World's Sages and Reformers," and in the notice of it we are told it is composed of biographical sketches of the prominent men who hav championed reform. Now, our good and wise Mr. Bennett was not one who forgot the race is composed of men and women. He gave us sketches of many notable women, and would hav given more still, only that comparativly few of the women hav had enough written of them to refer to. But the fact that Mr. Bennett givs so many narrativs of so many good women makes his book doubly valuable to us all. I prize it above all other books the Grand Old Man gave us. ELMINA.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your article on "Affirming," in your paper of the 8th inst., you say that "Pennsylvania allows Quakers to affirm, but others must swear by kissing the Bible or uplifting the hand."

My experience with the courts has been different from the above statement. I hav been as plaintiff in a criminal case before the court of the magistrate and before the grand jury, and in both places I was permitted to affirm without lifting up my hand, after I objected to being sworn.

The affirmation read to me was from a printed card, viz.: I, ——, do most solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm.

I was also made a citizen of this country before Judge Arnold by the same affirmation. A. ROLLE.

[We quoted the law, which does not always govern the practice. Judges hav great latitude, and we are glad to know that Judge Arnold was once a sensible and liberal official.—ED. T. S.]

GRAND FORKS, D. T., Nov. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.25 to renew my subscription for my bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the "History of Christianity," by Edward Gibbon, Esq.

Sold again. The same vote that elected Cleveland in 1884 by a small majority, elects a Republican president and a Democratic governor, so-called, and a Catholic mayor and city officers for New York city. Mr. Hill makes a good governor; he put a good Catholic for inspector of the port of New York, and all that will come, may come, if they only wear the cross. A few more presidential elections will sell us out. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I think I am safe in saying as Christ did—but I hope I am, like him, a false prophet—there are some standing here that will not taste death till they see the son of man—the pope—coming with power. It makes me shudder to think of it. We will see how many hundreds of thousands of dollars the Catholics will get for their schools to educate the Indian children to use the dynamite when they are called for, and what (the Lord's portion) the Catholics will get of the highest offices in the gift of the government, of army, navy, and post-office department, etc. LEVI BANCROFT.

CHATHAM, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been an interested reader of your paper for four or five years. Nothing has interested me more than the discussion for and against Spiritualism. There seems to be a plan with both the church and Spiritualists to see how much humbug they can add to a little truth and hav the people believe it.

A lecturer came to our village some three months since, and lectured on mesmerism and electricity. He had talked about half an hour when five persons near the front seats became mesmerized. Stopping his lecture, he began showing what he could do with the persons under his control. The first thing they saw was a big ship sailing through the room; then they saw a big dog go up on the stage, etc. Now, what is the difference between this show and a séance circle? The medium sees or thinks of a ghost or spirit, and all the minds under his control in the circle see the same thing. There was no ship nor dog there, nor any ghost.

Giv us facts. The world has been humbugged long enough by not knowing the effect of electricity on mind and matter. The Christians call it the coming down of the Holy Ghost among the people, or the outpouring of God's spirit. The Spiritualists call it the visitation of friends from another world, or materialized ghosts. T. R. BURROWS.

LEXINGTON, KY., Dec. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to allude briefly to Professor Cook's letter in which he adverts to the brutal conduct of Judge Arnold, of Philadelphia, who refused to naturalize a Hungarian because he was an Atheist. I thank the professor for his noble indignation. We are reminded daily of the fact that "we liv in a free country." Is there any cure for monopolism? No; we liv in a free country. Can anything be done to hinder persons from classing women with Chinese, lunatics, and idiots? No, not in this free country. Bribery at elections, selling votes, grants of land to favorits, sitting in judgment upon a man's opinions—are these things allowed in a free country? Was a free country ever known to exist? Not at present. Must we be ostracised if we break the Sabbath, when even the Jews express themselvs in the following manner: "Sunday laws are a violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and are subversiv of the rights of citizenship?"

A conservativ spirit is said to be wanting in our great republic—as if you could rein in public opinion, or chain the sea.

The bolder the demands of the fanatic the sooner will courageous minds assert their independence and cast to the winds all flimsy restrictions.

While the Constitution is a dead letter, our government loosely conducted, justice a tramp without a home, the rights of citizens male and female disregarded, while the maxims of freedom light a bonfire, and the volume of equal rights is clasped and consigned to the blackness and silence of oblivion, then let individuals arouse themselvs and speak with the force and unmistakable grandeur of truth. ALHAZA.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your proclamation of "A Few Things to Be Thankful For" takes precedence of Grover's. But, by a parity of reason, why not be thankful that you had to write an editorial—"Important Notice: There are about a thousand subscribers whose time ran out some months since, and who hav not paid for the papers they hav been reading since then. The political campaign just closed has diverted men's minds from more important matters, and we are not surprised that some of our friends hav forgotten that they owe us a few dollars." "Men's minds hav been diverted"—are there no women in arrears? Those in arrears who are living on the unpaid toil and sweat of their countrymen are perhaps very clamorous for the Nine Secular Demands, while they ignore payment for a paper that takes the lead in keeping those principles before the people. Paul said, "Owe no man anything." He never said a better thing. I always giv the devil his due. How many of those to whom this "Important Notice" was directed are fooling their hard-earned money away in liquor, tobacco, or dress, instead of using a little self-denial to pay an honest obligation? Horace Greeley said: "Avoid pecuniary obligations as you would famin or pestilence. If you hav but fifty cents and can get no more for a week, buy a peck of corn, parch it, and liv on it rather than owe a man a dollar." John G. Saxe wrote:

> Perhaps it is equally a sin to get
> Too deep in love, in liquor, or in debt.

Liberals above all others ought to be out of debt to the paper that givs them the best and most trenchant editorials in the country. My mind has not been diverted, and inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Jan. 1, 1889, to Jan. 1, 1890. Send me "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," by Saladin. All Liberals should read it. Its truths cannot be changed by conditions or circumstances. As—

> Rebel or patriot? Well, heads or tails?
> Define the terms, and that is how it reads:
> A rebel is a patriot who fails;
> A patriot is a rebel who succeeds.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Nov. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Slenker appears to hav opened a new phase of Spiritualistic discussion. I observe in the recent writings of Spiritualists who reply to her a manifest disposition to drop or shirk particular demonstration and rest their case on the overwhelming mass of testimony. I apprehend the new argument is about as weak as the old. The great historian Lecky has shown that up to the restoration of King Charles II. witchcraft, in England, at least, was considered the best established of realities. In 1681 Joseph Glanvil, a divine whom Lecky pronounces "surpassed in genius by few of his successors," and of whom he says that "the predominating characteristic of his mind was an intense skepticism," undertook the defense of Christianity in a book called "Sadducismus Triumphatus, i.e., the Sadducee Conquered." His argument amounted to this—that the existence of witchcraft was a notorious fact attested by thousands of judicial investigations, many of them contemporary, by the consensus of all ages, classes, and nations, by the testimony of learned and skeptical scientists and the finding of the most revered judges. But, if there was witchcraft, there must be a hell and devils, and thus Christianity is vindicated by the objectiv proof of its most unpopular and disagreeable doctrin. That there were already people who ridiculed the belief in witchcraft he was aware, but he contends with much ingenuity that this presumptuous attitude toward the experience of all mankind had nothing better to stand on than a vain conceit of one's own knowledge concerning the invisible world. This is not all. Mr. Lecky shows that though belief in magical and occult powers was common among all nations, that terribly vivid faith in diabolic agency which characterized Christians from about the twelfth century to the eighteenth was not characteristic of civilized pagans, and, in short, was a phase of the Christian reaction against heresy and skepticism which began with the preaching of Dominic. In 1665 this reaction had spent its force; science had furnished physical explanations of thunder, hail, murrain, addled eggs, and other phenomena vulgarly attributed to the devil. Hobbes had shaken the belief in the supernatural. People were ceasing to fear the evil one, and accordingly ceasing to believe in witchery. No great book was written in reply to Glanvil, but the superstition disappeared in spite of him. Probably the last witchcraft trial in England took place in 1712. In 1736 the statutes against witches, already obsolete in practice, were repealed without opposition. The overwhelming testimony in favor of modern Spiritualism is, in like manner, the effect of a prepossession. Repugnance to the idea of annihilation, like the terror once excited by witch stories, predisposes to belief, and "trifles light as air" become, to the willing, "confirmation strong as proofs of holy writ." C. L. JAMES.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After diligent inquiry for some weeks, I discovered yesterday where the meetings of the Secular Union were held, and had the pleasure of listening to an able address by the secretary. The Union has a beautiful hall, which could be filled by advertising the meetings. If the papers would not print notices, I would favor using handbills, and will myself pay for all they will distribute before Mr. Watts comes or any other time. One thing I noticed, every face present was an intellectual one, even that of the Plaindealer reporter. None were of the common, low, ignorant, ill-dressed class, usually found at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association here, and none of the expressionless, putty faces seen at all of the churches were there. I think Infidels just organizing should write their addresses carefully. I think they should avoid shocking the public, at least until they secure a good attendance. I am apt to speak very freely and plainly myself, but too much of it defeats itself. Secularists should be like the Rev. George Thomas Dowling, under whose preaching I can sit without getting angry. At heart I believe him to be a Freethinker, but he clothes his honest liberal thought with such beautiful, flowery, wisely chosen words, which neither affirm nor deny, that the public is captivated. I favor opening the meetings with singing. Don't be afraid to sing gospel songs occasionally. Outsiders will lose their fear when they hear their own church music sung. Invite all at the close to stand around the organ and sing familiar airs. They will thus become acquainted, and will probably come again. Let all hav a chance to speak freely, but wisely, after the address, which should contain one good cannon-ball, but no more, to fire at the audience. It is better to make them think than to blow their heads off. Aim to hav all go away and say they heard nothing shocking, and had a pleasant time, and plenty will attend. There are more Liberal-minded people in this city than real Christians—so-called; I don't mean professors, but the genuin religion-struck class.

MRS. MILDRED HERMANN.

GRAHAMSVILLE, FLA., Nov. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am late in replying to Elmina's suggestiv letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 1st, but not being a subscriber, the paper is sent me "after going the rounds," so I hav but just noticed her reply to me. I don't think Elmina quite "catches on" to the Spiritual philosophy. "These dead painters" need physical bodies through which to exercise their ability; and as to their power to "far excel," to be "superlativly excellent," what is superlativly excellent to one may be "visionary nonsense" to another. Elmina says, "It is not miracle I ask." I think she asks either for miraculous power or for a very simple test, which to me indicates she hasn't learned the ABC of Spiritualism. The credulous may catch on to simple tests, the incredulous require miracles, but as "Spiritualism is a science" the ABC must first be learned. I think Elmina isn't convinced of mind-reading, or of one mind controling another, and probably she is too positiv to experience, as I hav, mesmerization. I hav had a mesmerizer, before an audience, so control my mind that I had to move as he said, and when he said I couldn't move I was powerless, simply because my will seemed paralyzed (I being perfectly conscious), until he said, "You are a good subject; you may take your seat." Then my will was in a moment as fully controling my body as it now is. I understand my will to be my spirit. I hav no faith in a spirit, loosed from the body, manifesting physically, except as it draws from some negativ medium who generates surplus magnetism, or as it can by force, or otherwise, get control of a medium. Then, phrenology teaches me that "dead painters" would be limited by the brain structure of mediums, and "to excel" is not so easy a matter as some suppose, especially if the dead painters fully consider, as wise spirits will, that they are responsible for what the medium does, and should in no way impair the body. It seems to me that spirits are adapted to spirit life, which is as much superior to this sphere as this is to the embryotic, and there must be plenty of work for spirits in their sphere, and why should these dead painters and doctors seek through mediums "to startle the world" enough to "convince the most skeptical," when they and Elmina hav but to consider to realize the fate of those who startle the world? Fines, imprisonments, burning at the stake, or hanging, as in the case of Anarchists, is the fate of those who startle the world. I will say a word of those who are not startled enough to believe it is spirits when a medium, having never studied disease or medicin, appears like a dying person and then instantly seems like another person, and will diagnose disease perfectly and cure patients given up by "regular" physicians, and even do this by holding a lock of hair from the patient's head miles away; the spirit controling the medium sometimes purporting to be an Indian and acting his wild nature, at other times purporting to be a learned physician who once practiced on earth through a body belonging to himself, and then the medium appearing like death as the spirit leaves and the medium's spirit returning claiming to hav been unconscious or in a dreamlike condition, having realized most that was said and done, yet without power to speak or in any way interfere. I say those who do not believe this produced by spirits are too skeptical for spirits to bother with. Let such skeptics hav "one world at a time," and let the dead painters who are "superlativly excellent" go on with their work in a superlativly excellent world. Let Margaret Fox and Mr. Bouton expose the fraud within themselvs and Spiritualism. I am pretty sure Spiritualism can stand it if they can. JENNIE A. DOANE.

PITTSFIELD, ILL., Dec. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Notwithstanding the fact that the crude Materialist and the bigoted Christian unite in asserting a priori the impossibility of spirit phenomena, yet, as McArthur truly says, "All else being equal, the evidence of one who has seen outweighs the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen." Then why will those who hav not seen use such levity toward a subject which they know so little about? I know by the tone of the articles written by the critics of McArthur and Burr that they belong to a class who, I venture to say, never attended one half dozen séances in their lives.

Dr. Beard said that all manifestations occurring in the presence of mediums, or said to occur, did not really occur, but that the unfortunate investigator who attended a séance was suffering under the delusion of tricks of mesmerism; that he was hypnotized by the medium; that he in reality witnessed nothing. This, no doubt, is the thought of these same critics. Your contributor W. H. Burr has stated the facts of his investigations without advancing any theory, and yet some of his critics hav bellowed loudly "forninst" any such trash appearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If these same people had lived in the time of Herschel when he saw in his mental vision a new planet they would no doubt hav said just as sneeringly with his contemporaries, "I will never believe" that there is a new planet, as was claimed by the great astronomer, but Uranus moves on one of the wonderful systems to which our earth belongs. Now, in this day and age, why will our truth-seeking philosophers (?) wallow in the mire of incredulity, and shout, Idiocy, when a respectful attitude without any "reverential calm" or hysteria would be more in keeping? Please let up on poor McArthur and giv him a chance to sing his song to Mrs. Slenker, and when he is done, if you feel that you hav perceived the ludicrous in what he has written of immortalism, criticisms will then be in order. Back in my Materialistic history I can remember how I used to hoot at such an awful thing as spirit phenomena; but when I witnessed it in my own home, where there were no secret wires, and in broad daylight, under strictly test conditions, I was forced, greatly against my preconceived ideas at that time, to acknowledge that there was an unseen force, call it od, odyllic, or what you please. It was there, and it moved my table about the room without any physical contact. It answered questions by tipping up on its side as many times as agreed upon for yes or no. It told me that the force operating was a spirit, and that when in the body it was my brother, and that this was the only means by which it could communicate with me. Is there anything horrible about this, O ye Thomases? Now I am going to suppose a little. Suppose, my truth-seeking brother, we are both dumb—not deaf—and it is before the deaf and dumb alphabet has been invented—I mean that process of the fingers—but we hav a system of rapping upon any hard substance by which we communicate with each other. Now, suppose I am in a railroad wreck and am pinned down under the débris with one arm free to use; you, my dumb brother, are standing unhurt at one side of the track. You cannot see me, but you can hear my rappings with my free arm, by which I tell you how I am situated. Now I want to ask, is there anything awful about this proceeding, my brother? A very devout Catholic says, as he has been taught by the church, it was the devil that operated the table. The Spiritualist says it is what it purported to be, my disembodied brother. The Materialist says it was nothing and that we imagined it all, and that when it comes to dealing with human testimony as evidence in support of occult phenomena our training is seriously at fault and we are incompetent for the task.

Hoping that McArthur will be allowed to finish his controversy with Mrs. Slenker, I will close by wishing success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. EDMUND D. HICKS.

P.S.—Heston's cartoons are looked at eagerly by my neighbors to whom I loan the paper, and I think they are a valuable part of the paper in pointing out the absurdities of the Bible. E. H.

CARROLL, IA., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription. I wish Arthur C. Everett would let us know if his case with the Knights of Labor had a hearing before T. V. Powderly as he was promised, and what the result was. I like the paper and cartoons, also the Editor; he is the right man in the right place. Hav nothing to kick about.

Fraternally, RICHARD CONWAY.

WABASH, IND., Nov. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of so many inquiries as to whether the general assembly of Knights of Labor, convened at Indianapolis, did anything in my case, that I am unable to answer them all, and as they are all, or nearly so, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will ask you the privilege of answering them through its columns.

Monday night, November 12th, I called on Mr. Hayes, general secretary and secretary of the executiv board, at the Grand Hotel, who granted me an interview, and in reply to my question as to whether he had read my pamphlet, said:

"I read your pamphlet clear through, but was not flattered by it. I speak plainly, but business is business, you know."

"Certainly, Mr. Hayes," I said, "but remember one thing, that pamphlet was printed as a plain statement of facts, not to 'flatter,' and to secure, if possible, justice. I hav with me an affidavit by a disinterested person, over a seal of a notary of Michigan, to substantiate my claims, and I wish the privilege to present my case before the assembly, or at least before the executiv board."

"Well, Mr. Everett," said Mr. Hayes, "as to the assembly, that you could not do unless there was open session, but if the executiv board meets, you can come before them. Meet me here to-morrow night at this time, and if they meet, which I expect they will, I will giv you a chance to present your case, and if by your argument you can convince me, it will be all right. If they don't meet, I will giv you the names of the executiv board and where to be found, and you can go and talk with them separately. I am glad to hav met you, Mr. Everett. Good-night!"

The following night I was there at the appointed time. I went to him as he was passing to his room and spoke to him. He replied, "I will see you in a few minutes." It was then a few minutes past 6 P.M. I waited until 9 P.M., and he neither made his appearance or even answered a message sent him by the bell-boy. Expecting such a snub, I had prepared the following, which was placed in his hands by the clerk:

JOHN W. HAYES, General Secretary, Knights of Labor: I wish to place before you in a brief manner the most important points I wish to place before the executiv board in my defense:

First, That I withdrew from Wabash Valley assembly, L. A. 4,204, on Oct. 26, 1885, and that I had at that time my dues paid up to Nov. 1, 1885, and that I had an honorable withdrawal on that account, as per letter from Frederick Turner, general secretary at the time of writing it, now in my possession, and it will be presented to the board, with my receipt, signed by the secretary of L. A. 4,204; and that some time between Oct. 26, 1885, and Jan. 25, 1886, I was expelled, without a citation to trial or a copy of the charges being furnished me, the first I knew of it being a notice of expulsion in the Journal of United Labor, of date Jan. 25, 1886. Further, I hav an affidavit to present, under legal seal, by a disinterested person, proving thereby by the words of the master workman of L. A. 4,204, that it was all done "to make themselvs solid with Wabash." Now, I respectfully urge that I be granted a hearing before the executiv board, in the behalf of justice, man to man.

ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

I also made out something similar and sent it to Terence V. Powderly, but it was entirely ignored. Then I prepared and sent the following, with a marked pamphlet, to the chairman of the committee on appeals and grievances, which received a similar fate:

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPEALS AND GRIEVANCES, Knights of Labor General Assembly, Indianapolis: I am here waiting on the assembly for a chance to present my grievances before them. I saw Mr. Hayes on Monday night, the 12th inst., and he told me to call the next night, when the executiv board was expected to meet, and he would giv me a hearing, or, if they did not meet, he would prepare for me other means. I came and awaited his pleasure until 9 P.M., and he did not show up; therefore, I must conclude that, Jesuit-like, he does not intend that I shall even hav the ghost of a show for the righting of the injustice perpetrated on me by L. A. 4,204, as explained at length in the accompanying pamphlet, "Concern of All is to Injure One." Terence V. Powderly said (see Ex. A, p. 4): "If the case stands as reported by you, then a wrong has been done." Notice Ex. B, p. 3; also, Ex. C, p. 4; also, Ex. D, commencing with the two last words, "master workman," on p. 1, continued to p. 2. In connection with other proofs to substantiate my charges, on this last I hav an affidavit by a disinterested party, over legal seal, proving that L. A. 4,204 did as they did (see Ex. C) so as to "make themselvs solid with Wabash." Now, notice Ex. E, p. 7, of the inclosed pamphlet. And, gentlemen, if you do not giv me a hearing, as is my right, then are you aiders and abettors in the disgraceful acts of L. A. 4,204, in bolstering up a moribund theology by ruining a wage-worker, "whose only fault is his unorthodox belief," that thereby they might "make themselvs solid with Wabash." And, further, it was by and through my efforts that the first assembly was started in Wabash, Ind., and, like the fabled viper, when warmed into life, it turned and stung to death its benefactor. Notice Ex. F, p. 7.

Respectfully, ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I place this matter before you without further comment. I waited for a hearing until no other chance was left me, and then returned home. Since coming home I wrote the executiv board to meet me here with L. A. 4,204, but they hav ignored that request also. Knowing that the general assembly has virtually said by their acts to L. A. 4,204, "Your assembly did right; accept my thanks," I can't but expect that they will, if possible, make Wabash too hot to hold me. Were not my health and finances so depleted, I would start a paper again right here, and I would make it interesting for them until some of them killed me, and there is more than one that would, could they do it and not be caught at it; but, as it is, I will hav to grin and bear it as best I may, though it is terrible to contemplate. I would like the address of some Freethinker reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER at Vienna, Johnson county, Ill., or near there, in that county; also, same at Spring City, east Tenn., on the line of the Cincinnati Southern.

One that has no use for a God, Christ, or any part of that tomfoolery called religion, ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

ROCKFORD, W. VA., Dec. 9, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you that I like THE TRUTH SEEKER best of all Liberal papers, and hope to be able to remain on your list of subscribers till "life's fitful fever is o'er." Every issue is an intellectual feast. I was once a believer in the religion of "Believe or be damned." I read Fowler's "Human Science" and threw away my orthodoxy. Then I reached the "Age of Reason" at seventeen, and ever since hav been an uncompromising foe of orthodoxy and priestcraft.

I attended service at the Methodist Episcopal church of this place last Sunday, and was highly edified by some remarks of the pastor. Rev. Mr. Weiss said: "We are indebted for our social advancement and civilization to this blessed book!" at the same time bringing his clenched hand down on that old relic of barbarous ages, the Bible; "and the light that has emanated from God through the gospels." He further enlightened us by saying that "man cannot do a good act or think a noble thought within himself." Every other remark made by this gospel-sharp was as false as the above. Yet I suppose that every individual present save myself opened his capacious mouth of credulity and gulped down unchewed and untasted the whole mass. The clergy "don't know," or else they lie. But the truth is dawning. She is slowly unfolding herself to the sorrowing gaze of the priests and their ignorant dupes. I am agitating the principles of Freethought and Liberalism wherever I go. And certainly the agitation of thought is the beginning of truth. The hope and interest of the church is centered in the young. Our hope is there also. Our best efforts ought to be exerted in the field of juvenil culture. In that field the church has a decided advantage over us, and she is using it every day. The church has "Young America" "under her thumb," and there will she keep it unless Secularists make her disgorge. As long as the public schools are under the control of the church the church is safe. And that she has control of them who will dispute? Witness the morning prayers, and Bible readings, the hymn-singing, and pious stories in the text-books even in our public schools, to say nothing of parochial schools and endowed institutions of learning. It is the duty of Liberals everywhere to labor to the end that instruction, at least in the public schools, should be reduced to a purely secular basis.

The pious people here will hardly permit a Freethinker to attend strictly to his own business. They recently tried to indict a man in the court of Harrison county for splitting kindling-wood on Sunday, for cutting sprouts off his own apple-tree, and other similar "wicked" and "blasphemous" offenses. I understood his informers were his religious and righteous neighbors, who did the same thing. The judge asked them if they knew almost everybody did similar acts. "Yes," they replied, "but he's a kind of an old Universalian and don't believe in a God nohow, and we thought we'd show him there was a law for sich things in this country." The object of their pious wrath was Wm. Carpenter, an honest, peaceable, and industrious merchant of Bridgeport. Yes, the church still tries to persecute whenever she can. Daily we see need of the enforcement of the Nine Demands. The churches of this state are as bigoted and intolerant as those of Delaware and New Jersey. The motto of our state, "Montani semper liberi," does not mean anything so far as religious liberty is concerned. No government has any right to say that I shall worship this god or that god or no god at all; that I shall "keep" this day or that day or no day at all. It is none of the government's business.

I am doing all the missionary work I can by getting my friends to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and my Liberal books which I loan to them. Four or five hav professed conversion to the religion of humanity, two out of the ranks of the church.

Now, will some kind Liberal giv us a few hints on how to organize a local Secular society out of this scanty "raw material?" Can a society for the promulgation of Freethought do effectiv work with a force of only five or six members, and some of them a little weak-kneed? If not, this county will hav to remain under the galling yoke of ecclesiastical tyranny.

Is that Jamieson–Reynolds affair over? Are they done "crossing swords?" Will Liberalism gain anything by this disgraceful controversy? Are Liberals interested in this war of vile words and opprobrious epithets that these professing Liberals are carrying on? For one, I am not. Messrs. Jamieson and Reynolds can certainly find more important use for their brain and lips and pen than calling each other names and hurling calumnious charges against each other. Surely Liberals cannot afford to war among themselvs while the common enemy are pressing us on all sides. Petty strifes and bickerings among those in our ranks assuredly hav a tendency to weaken the cause which so much needs our concentrated efforts in order to liv and grow. "United we stand; divided we fall." Let us all stand or fall together. For the welfare and success of the cause which they hav espoused, let the combatants hoist the white flag or retire to some monastery and hav it out without insulting the common sense and sentiment of Liberalism. Did any cause ever prosper by the quarreling of its adherents? Did the Andover controversy add strength to the missionary cause? Did the quarreling of Martin Luther and the pope strengthen the Catholic church? Let the house come to order, and Brotherly Love occupy the chair. May the angel of peace hover over the Liberal camp henceforth and evermore. Amen.

Some of my rich Christian neighbors made "dinner" on Thanksgiving day and invited their rich neighbors, while the poor shivered and starved at home. The love of God in the heart of man is a wonderful thing. How it makes them open their hearts! How about their purses? Locked to the poor; but the preachers hav duplicate keys with which they find a way to the Lord's share on contribution-day, which is pretty sure to happen every Sunday. Not much of it ever reaches the Lord, in my opinion. If the Lord has all that has been collected in his name from the days of Moses down to those of Talmage, he is certainly the richest god in the kingdom of gods. No wonder that he is so independent and suffers us poor mortals to "go to pot" on earth and to hell when we die. I always liked to hav good society here, and if I understand the Christian philosophy there will be a better condition of society in the bottomless pit than in their New Jerusalem. Now, the Christians ought not to fly off the handle if I prefer the fiery lake to the golden city. But I suppose all this belongs to the realm of the unknown and the unknowable, and is therefore not a profitable subject for investigation. According to the Confucian philosophy, "To know that we know what we know and to know that we do not know what we do not know, constitutes true wisdom." According to this philosophy there is no true wisdom in Christianity; for she teaches what she does not know and professes ignorance of what she does know, viz., the dark and bloody record which she has made. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Norse Girl's Song.

A little child from the Danish isles
Sang me a little song,
That sweetly soothed me dreary whiles
The winter days were long;
And her song was the voice of a lone little bird
That flew to her window when the tempest was stirred
And the loud wind blew from the sea,
While the bird cried, "Sophia!* Sophia!"

And he said, "Cold, cold is the vin†
On the sea and the shore—
Oh, pray, little girl, let me in!
Hasten swift to the door;
Giv me shelter and rest at your fireside warm
While bitterly blows the fierce ocean-storm;
I am all alone by the sea—
Oh, hear the vin, Sophia! Sophia!"

Straightway I kissed her rosy lips;
Her song had been so sweet;
And she sang of the sea and ships—
White sprays had touched her feet.
Now my sweet little singer has left me alone,
And the vin is so cold and the storm-voices moan—
No song of the bird nor the sea—
At night and morn I mourn, "Sophia."

QUITE FREE FROM RHYMES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS TO READ.

Good boys are kind to all good girls;
Good girls are kind to all good boys—
A rose is sweet, and so are they—
Both good and pure in all they do;
Quick to mind their pa and ma,
No cross word comes from out their lips—
No frown, no lie, no fret.
They go to school and learn to spell,
To read and write and sing;
Thus they grow up, not as the fool,
Who likes to sit and gaze,
Who knows to eat, but not to work—
A dolt void of good sense.
Good boys and girls are still, we know,
When in the house at play.
If near the sick, the sore, and sad
They will not make a noise;
When they walk out in the broad fields
They hear the birds that sing,
But will not rob their cute-made nests
Of eggs or young, for that is wrong.
They see the lambs at play while young,
As they hop and skip and jump—
The dear white lambs so gay,
That nip the grass, to them so sweet;
It is their food, you know.
Oh! do not scare the dear good lambs;
Throw nothing hard at them;
For when their wool is clipped,
And washed and spun and wove,
It makes good clothes to keep you warm;
Then love the snow-white lambs.
The bee that flits from place to place,
To store its hive with sweets so good,
Says, "Take care, lest I giv pain,
My sting is fine and sharp!"
Then do not hurt the bee.
Do not harm the dog or cat;
To them be kind and good;
Good dogs keep watch by day and night—
Bark at the thief or bite his heel,
If in the house to steal he comes.
Then feed the dog and pet him, too,
And he will wag his tail, you see,
In love and thanks to you.
If puss, the cat, should catch a mouse,
And bring it near to you,
Praise him or her for that.
Giv kit some milk to lap;
That is its way to drink.
How cute it is! Just watch it once;
You could not drink that way.
Well, now, good-bye, dear girls and boys!

REVERE, Dec. 15, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter for the Children's Corner.

I am a little girl not quite seven years old. I go to school every day, even when it rains or snows.

I wanted to hear you very badly when you lectured in Paine Hall.

I go up with my papa sometimes, and once I sat on the platform.

When I get to be a woman I think I will be a school-teacher. MABEL F. WASHBURN.

P.S.—I wish you a merry Christmas.

ALLIANCE, O., Dec. 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, for it has been so long since I wrote the other letter. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner.

I was twelve years old October 26th; my sister died November 6th, with typhoid fever. But we are all well now and wish to remain so. I am going to school now, and I am in the Fourth Reader. I will close for this time, hoping to see this in print in the next paper. I may write again, but I am not sure.

Yours truly, H. W. BIRCH.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Dec. 9, 288.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: While I inclose these lines for the Children's Corner I wish to tell the children how pleased and entertained I hav been with the numbers of the Pleasure Boat sent me by good old Father Hacker. It is such a quaint little paper, full of spicy, readable things, and will be quite a curiosity twenty years hence. I hav now in my possession the tattered remains of an old newspaper published in 1818, and prize it as much for its odd sayings as for its age. I hope all the children will send fifty cents to Father Hacker and get the Pleasure Boat while they hav the opportunity. The money will be but little to them, but so much to him and his good wife who has been the partner of his joys and sorrows so many years. I should hav added my mite to the Maud Morrison fund—all honor to th kind-hearted girl—but that I had anticipated her thoughts by several weeks. I am rejoiced to see that Mr. Jamieson is going to giv benefit lectures in behalf of the aged patriarch. This is a veritable proof that the Liberals do do something. When our enemies ask, "What hav the Liberals ever done?" we can cite them to this with other things. Let us send in our dimes, too, to the Caseys, who hav no one to depend upon but a young boy. While we pity and admire the boy, let us do so to the extent of at least ten cents.

Yours for humanity, MARY B. FINCH.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Some of the little folks of the Corner may recollect hearing of Dena Locke—"Mrs. Rosebud"—of Cañon City, Col. What I am about to relate occurred about a year ago, when she was about five years old. The all-absorbing question with her for quite a while was, Who took care of the first baby? Every attempt to get a satisfactory answer proving unavailing, in one of her solemn reveries she decided to submit it to a neighbor, a superannuated minister living near by. She was busily engaged at play when the idea struck her. Said she, "Mamma, I am going over to ask Mr. Hanks who took care of the first baby." Her mother replied that he would only tell her that it was God. "Well," said she, "if he does, I will ask him, Who took care of God?"

Like other children, she has different callings and pursuits in her plays. On one occasion she was playing pedlar. She entered where her mother and an elder sister were, and was busily engaged exhibiting her goods. Her mother bought something of her, and was having quite a familiar conversation with her while she was dilating on the quality of her goods. Her sister interrupted the conversation by telling her that she looked upon pedling as a very low calling and beneath the dignity of a lady, berating her occupation rather rudely for a stranger. Her mother excused the rudeness of her daughter, adding that she had spent a great deal of money in her education, and tried every expedient she could devise to make a good girl of her, but to no effect; wanting to know at the same time if she ever took such girls to educate. She replied that she did sometimes, but at that moment a happy thought struck her, and with all the agony and affectation of hypocritical piety, said she, "Why don't you send her to Sabbath-school?"

The little miss who wrote the following will develop into a brilliant satirist one of these days: "Dear Papa: Mamma wrote me to get my washing done, to get my shoes mended, and to buy some buttons for my dress and a new ribbon for my hat, and she sent me ten cents."

Talk about the precision of the Boston girl! A little East-side school-girl was overheard telling a playmate that she had been seasick. "That is," she added to correct herself, "I hav never been on the sea, you know, but I hav been awfully lakesick."

Mamma: "If you will hav your French lesson absolutely perfect to-night I'll make you a big angel-cake." Ethel: "That will be nice, mamma, and while you're about it you might make a medium-sized one to giv me in case I make one or two little mistakes."

Jimmy had been promised a trip into the country. "Mamma, are you going out to auntie's to-day?" "No, dear; I'm afraid it will rain. Don't you see how black the clouds are?" "Yes," reluctantly; "but I don't think they'll leak!"

A little French Canadian boy in Oldtown is credited with one of the shortest and most comprehensiv compositions on record. The teacher told him to write about anything he could see, and this was the result: "The stove. She be cracked."

Science Column.

Poor Little Fly.

He is a merry little creature this winter morning, dancing in the sunshine on the window pane. Why he left his winter quarters and came into my dining-room I am sure I cannot tell. Hungry, perhaps.

Let us examin this fly and see if there is anything interesting about him.

The fly is an insect, isn't it? All insects hav six feet, three on each side. By this sign we recognize them. In the insect kingdom there may be found a hundred and fifty thousand different kinds, large and small, beautiful and homely.

Look at this fly's lovely wings, will you? See how gauzy and delicate they are and note the little veins in them. Look at its furry legs—no, these legs are smooth, comparativly speaking. It is the buzzing or blow fly that has thick furry legs and a furry back. We are looking now at a common domestic or house fly. This kind are all about the same size, and they are nice, clean-looking creatures.

Just look at its pretty little head; see the two horns projecting from it—antennæ or feelers, and that expresses their use. Now look at its dear little eyes. Under the microscope they present a wonderful appearance and seem as if cut like costly jewels. Naturalists say there are four thousand of these minute points or facets in the two eyes of a fly.

Now let us put some sugar on the table and watch this fly eat. There is a queer little attachment to its head which he carries tucked out of sight, almost, when he is resting. Look at it now. He is paying his respects to the sugar, and the tiny dot or tongue has spread out like two cunning fans, which he is using to lap the sugar after softening it with saliva. It is with these little fans that he tickles our noses in summer time.

Heigho! There he goes. He has finished his lunch, and now he is walking upside-down on the ceiling, after swinging round and round the rooms two or three times. How does he do that? Why, he is a regular circus performer. How can he resist the power of gravitation the way he does? Well, now, there are different opinions as to how flies can walk about with the back of their bodies down and their feet up. Some think it is due to the bristles on their feet acting as suckers, and a vacuum formed underneath, so that the pressure of the atmosphere keeps them from falling. And then again there are those who believe that there is a sticky sort of fluid secreted at the bottom of the foot that enables the fly to walk and cling to any surface with ease. Anyway, he is a curious insect, and seems to hav some intelligence and is really a sociable little fellow. He likes to be where folks are, and wherever you see flies you may know human beings are not far away.

Flies are certainly useful. Why, they are scavenger-carts on a small scale, and gather up lots of offensiv matter. Yes, and it is not unlikely that contagion and disease may be spread broadcast by flies, by carrying poisons from decaying matter. Our common house-fly would not, perhaps, be so apt to do that as some other kinds of flies.

We should be kind even to flies. There is no need to torture them as boys sometimes do, by impaling them upon pins and needles. If we do not want them in our houses it is easy to brush them out of doors, though I am sure I would not turn one out in the dead of winter.

Where do they go in cold weather? Oh, they hide away in nooks and corners! They can liv quite a long while without eating, and in summer they will come out as bright and frisky as you please.

But here comes our fly, alighting on my paper. Perhaps he would thank me, if he could, for my attention to him. He seems to know I would not harm him, and is making himself quite at home. He shall partake of my hospitality as long as he is happy to stay.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—How do we know the fly is an insect? How many kinds of flies are there? Describe the house-fly as you hav seen it. What is the meaning of antennæ? Describe its eye. What is the meaning of facet? How does the fly eat? How can he walk upon the ceiling? What are some of the habits of the fly? How are flies useful? What danger may be feared from flies? Should we be kind even to flies? Where do they hide in cold weather?

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

A Basket of Chips.

AN ACTIV ATHEIST.

Who? James D. Shaw, of Waco, Tex., lecturer, and editor of the Independent Pulpit.

Dr. Shaw is a man whom every honest thinker should delight to honor, both for what he is doing and for not being averse to being called what his avowed philosophy proclaims him to be—an Atheist.

Yes, call him "Doctor" Shaw, for he is certainly a teacher, worthy of his high calling, and though not bigoted enough to be elected a Methodist bishop, he is brainy enough to make his election sure as a magnate of reason. No doctor of divinity is he, but a doctor of duty, an ensign of ethics; one who experiments with what we know, not one who speculates upon what we know not; one who practices the benefits of the life that now is, not one who preaches bombast about that which is to come. May he long proclaim the tidings of intelligence in the temple to the known Good.

WAS GOD ASLEEP?

Mr. Usher is a Universalist reverend, of Medford, Mass. I heard him hold forth his wholesale salvation doctrin, awhile ago, in a hall in Dunstable.

His subject was the story of Solomon and the stolen baby. The handling of the theme was unique, and more suggestiv than satisfying. After an attempt to paint the scene and to work up pathetic sentiment, the sermon went on with an analogical application in this wise:

The bad mother of the dead child had stolen the living child from its sleeping mother's breast, and claimed it as her own, but was indifferent to its welfare when her will was opposed. So Evil (I write it with a big E because the Universalists hav no Satan) stole man away from God and perverted him. But God will not rest while man is lost, but like the wise judge, he will redeem man to his original destiny.

My comment is the critical question: Was God asleep when Evil stole man?

THE ANARCHISTS' PLACE IN APPLIED ETHICS.

I lately heard Mr. Green, pastor of Shattuck street Universalist church, Lowell, lecture on the "Factors of Life." He made the general analysis that man's life or character was governed by two factors—environment and idea. By his environment man is made; by his ideas man makes himself. True manliness is individual morality. The Anarchists are people who are pressed and crippled by their environment; unable to extricate themselvs by their ideas, not developed enough to rise above their conditions, they seek to demolish an oppressiv society. "Do not go and say," he demurred, "that he said he was in sympathy with Anarchists, for he said no such thing; but he said the Anarchists are simply a result of our false political system—responsible for their acts, to be sure, but more answerable is society to them for the conditions that hav contributed to the production of Anarchism." The speaker waxed warm as he proceeded. "One who, according to law and custom, accumulates wealth which he has not earned by rendering an equivalent, is respectable by popular acclaim, whilst one who, without leave, takes a loaf of bread to feed his starving children, is in public esteem an atrocious criminal. The Anarchist is a patriot by the side of a railroad king; he is fit for a saint compared with a member of a trust. The Anarchist has some truth and right on his side; he advocates a theory professedly, however mistaken, for the general welfare, but no one ever heard of a grain speculator pretending to work for anybody's good but his own. Judas Iscariot stands immeasurably above the speculator in wheat, for Iscariot on an impulse betrayed one whom he could not harm, whilst the speculator systematically robs the bread from the mouth of the hungry poor." I hav not quoted quite verbatim, but very ideatim. More such preaching would be useful.

WHAT SHOULD WE KNOW?

Social problems should be treated scientifically. If we knew as much about sociology as we do about geology there would be less discontent in the world. If we knew as much about the social system as we do about the solar system, the regularity in the working of the former would in some degree approach that of the latter. If we were as well versed in the science of rights as we are in other sciences, comparativly speaking, this world would be a paradise. If we knew as much about the laws of social conduct as we do about the laws that govern the action of solar bodies, there would be no wrong except that resulting from personal turpitude of individuals; whereas now the greatest wrongs and sufferings arise, not from the desire of particular persons to do wrong, but from a very imperfect conception of human rights.—Natural Rights.

The above, cut from a column of quotations, requires a comment. Ignorance of astronomy and geology engendered superstition, which built a false social system and abnegated health in anticipation of heaven. It is those who hav revealed the most knowledge of the solar system who hav opened the door to hygiene; it is those who hav delved in geology who hav paved the way for an improved society. An acquaintance with external nature is essential to the formation of the science of man. Apprehension of the universality and unity of law is the cure for religio-mania, and the foundation of ethics and therapeutics.

SECTARIAN SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Considering the great fuss the Catholics hav made about one little sentence in a school-book which doesn't suit them, what ought Freethinkers to do about nearly all the school-books in the country which hav more or less to say of religion in some shape, no sort of which we want any part in? Yet, while we hav as deep interest in education as any class, we hardly raise an objection to teaching which is as powerful as the pulpit to perpetuate superstition. Except Swinton's readers, I do not know of any which are not decidedly dogmatical, and even they crow for Christianity, whilst Lippincott's are filled with gush about God on about every other page. Why must we endure all this? Girard College may be beyond our reach, but from the public school we ought to be able to eliminate all ecclesiasticism.

MAN'S MIGHT.

"Wait till the iron's hot and then strike," said somebody to the old lion, Cromwell. "I'll strike and make it hot," was the terse reply. "If we could hav rain we might whip the Austrians," said a soldier to Napoleon. "Then we'll hav the rain," said the great warrior, and he ordered steady cannonading for six hours. Men tell us that rain followed and the muddy road delayed the Austrians to their defeat.

Man is a lord of nature. He is a prince of the powers of the air as well as a ruler of the land and plower of the sea. Man is no more bound to obey the laws of nature than is nature obliged to conform to the orders of man. Indeed, it takes man and everything else to make all nature, and therefore man's ways are as much nature's course as are other movements. We hav done with the notion that it is defying divinity to erect a lightning-rod; why should we forget ourselvs and go worship a cosmic unity? Why should we praise an abstraction of metaphysics? Are not all the attributes of existence concentrated in each individual mind?

A HEATHEN AT HOME.

The deplorable neglect in which too many city children grow up appears in the following trial incident reported to the Baltimore News:

Edward Nichols, an intelligent-appearing lad of eleven years, was called as a witness in the criminal court, against George McCracken, Jr., under indictment for misdemeanor. Counsel for the accused objected to the witness on account of his youth, whereupon the following colloquy ensued between Judge Pinckney and the boy witness:

"Do you know the nature of an oath?"
"No, sir."
"Hav you ever heard of God?"
"No, sir."
"Hav you a father and mother?"
"Yes, sir."
"Do you go to Sunday-school?"
"No, sir."
"Hav you ever been to church?"
"No, sir."
"Does your father go to church?"
"No, sir."
"Hav your father or mother ever spoken to you about the existence of a God?"
"No, sir."
"Do you ever say your prayers?"
"No, never, sir."
"Do you know what will happen to you if you tell a lie?"
"I'll get a lickin', sir" (laughter).
"Hav you ever heard of heaven?"
"Yes, sir; heaven is where the stars are."
"Well, when you die, where will you go?"
"Don't know, sir."

The court concluded that the witness was incompetent under the law, remarking that such ignorance in a grown person would disqualify him from acting as a witness.

The above dialog, headline and all, is cut from a copy of the Youth's Companion of Jan. 29, 1880. So good a paper ought not to print such trash. Who was the heathen in the case if not the judge himself? Could he tell where he would go when he died any better than could the boy? What did his honor know about God? Did he know of any other heaven than that where the stars are? Would not the boy's fear of a licking for lying impel him to tell the truth as strongly as the judge's fear of the lake of fire and brimstone would him? Shall ignorance of what nobody knows and intelligence disputes much longer disqualify honest people in court?

PIOUS PERVERTS.

In view of the fact that Christian church-members and church-goers are continually advising Secularists to keep a close mouth on their own thoughts and mutter some ecclesiastical shibboleth, what warrant hav we in supposing that any of the religionists believe what they profess? As they counsel others to play the hypocrit for popularity's sake, and thus pocket the plunder, shall we not judge that those who are perverted from Liberalism hav simply left us for fashion and love of money? To such we say, good riddance. The church is welcome to what rubbish we don't want. The more humbugs go, the greater the honor of those that stay.

Obituary.

John Belknap, one of the best-known citizens of St. Johnsbury, Vt., was drowned in the Passumpsic river on the 27th ult., while engaged in clearing obstructions from the river, across which he was building a dam. Mr. Belknap was one of the most skilful civil engineers in Vermont, and had resided for nearly fifty years in St. Johnsbury. His father—whom he succeeded in business—was a mechanic of remarkable ingenuity, and he inherited his skill. The hour of the accident marked the successful completion of an enterprise that had been a pet scheme of his for many years. Living near the Passumpsic river and having a keen eye for such things, he recognized years ago that a valuable water-power was not utilized at that point. Early in the present year he bought the water-privilege, and later, in company with a number of others, organized the Water-Power Company and began the work of carrying out his long-cherished plans. The building of the dam had been greatly hindered by constant rains, and after many vexatious delays the work, to which he had given his personal and daily attention, was brought to a successful finish. The power had been profitably leased and the satisfaction of it all had been his only for an hour when he was called hence.

John Belknap was born in St. Johnsbury in 1840, being forty-eight years old at his death. Though never identified with the public life of the place, he had marked characteristics that gave him a certain prominence. As a skilled mechanic it is doubtful if his superior was to be found in the state. He could construct almost anything from a penknife to an engin, from a bicycle to a rifle, and had in course of construction at the time of his death a steamboat, every part of which, from the hull to the engin, was to hav been of his own construction. Perhaps the best water-motor now in use was his invention; the first one that he ever constructed was made for the Caledonian office. Since then he has made large numbers of them which are in use in various parts of the country. Industrious and of correct habits, he had accumulated a competence. As a citizen and in business affairs he was upright, straightforward, and honest in all his dealings. Though somewhat brusque in manner he was kind-hearted. In all matters concerning religion he was a confirmed skeptic of the Robert Ingersoll type. His wife, and one son, Harry, aged about seventeen, survive him. The son was assisting his father at the time of the accident, and was overwhelmed by it. Mr. Belknap also has two brothers and a sister living—Amos, of this place, and Frank and Mrs. Henry Shumake, of Sherbrooke.

Thus far the Caledonian. Mr. Belknap was a good friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a liberal patron. He has done much good in his neighborhood by spreading Freethought literature, and was perhaps the only man in the town with the courage to do it. He was a powerful factor in both the intellectual and material progress of the town, and will be greatly missed.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America,

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Odds and Ends.

THE luckiest thing about the horseshoe over the door is that it doesn't drop on your head.

BOB TAYLOR: "Gray, lend me something for the offertory, will you?" Gray Tedder: "I've only got a quarter, old man, but 'll chuck it up to see who puts it in the plate!"

"AH!" exclaimed the matter-of-fact man, joyfully, as he saw the heading in the newspaper, "Trials of Authors," "so they've arrested some of those confounded poets at last, hav they? Wouldn't I like to he on the jury!"

SCHOLAR (in Sunday-school class to teacher): "Miss Brown, after the flood and when the waters had dried up, what had Noah and his family to liv on?" Another scholar: "Kin I answer that question, Miss Brown?" Miss Brown (very much relieved): "Yes, Tommy, I wish you would." Tommy: "Dey lived on fish and game."

OLD gentleman (bestowing a trifle): "Poor fellow! What has brought you to this condition of suffering?" Tramp: "Timperance, sor." Old gentleman: "Temperance?" Tramp: "Yis, sor; Oi've done nothing all day but sit in the park and dhrink water; but wid the help av your honor's quarther, Oi'll be a new man in a few minutes."

BREATHLESS the audience sat;
Dozens of women were crying;
The cruel Moor had done his worst,
And Desdemona was dying.

How beautifully she died!
One last fond look at her lover,
Then the blue eyes closed on his swarthy face,
As he wrathfully stood above her.

A silence that could be felt
Followed—it really was freezing!
Then—a ripple of laughter stirred the house,
For Desdemona was sneezing!

The Moor was in earnest now—
His face made a darkness round it;
But no one but Desdemona heard
His low, intense "Confound it!"

MISS BROWN: "Why, what's the matter, Mr. Paulus; you look fatigued—hard work?" Mr. Paulus: "No, not exactly; but I went to church three times last Sunday—at different churches—and 'twas the same old thing at all three." Miss Brown: "Why don't you come over to our church? We hav good music, comfortable pews, and not one word about 'Robert Elsmere.'"

"HAV you read 'Robert——?'" Stop!
In mercy spare me, just this time.
Ask if I've committed any crime
Since last we met—if all are well
At home—speak of the rainy spell,
Election frauds, Lord Sackville's woe—
"Progressiv schemes," perhaps, but, oh!
Pray hesitate ere you begin
The same old query that my kith and kin
Hav uttered fifty times this year,
"Hav you read 'Robert Elsmere?'"

Hav I read "Robert——?" Yes,
Thank heaven, the deed is done!
At last I've read it, though it weighed a ton,
Now, when a friend I chance to meet,
In church, theater, or upon the street,
I shall not rush into a store,
Or turn aside as oft before,
Lest I should hear that everlasting same—
"Hav you read 'Robert—what's his name?'"
But bow, and with eager zest,
"I've read your Robert, and he needs a rest."

THE NIGHT BEFORE BOSTON'S ELECTION.

A manly youth and a maiden fair
By the parlor fire were sitting;
He twirled his thumb with a restless air,
And she was softly knitting.

For a word or a glance from her he pined,
As pine for the sun the grasses,
But far away was the look behind
The maiden's gold-rimmed glasses.

"You are very thoughtful to-night," he said.
The painful silence breaking;
The beautiful damsel raised her head
As if from a dream awaking.

"Excuse me, please;" from her chair she rose,
A smile on the youth bestowing,
Then she murmured, "They open at seven and close
At four—why, you can't be going?"

"Yes, going," he answered in accents stern,
As he strove his grief to smother;
"I am, for I plainly can discern
You are thinking about another.

"If not to another your fancy strays,
You are changed, I can plainly see;
I've heard you mutter—oh, vulgar phrase!—
'Yes, that's the ticket for me!'

"While to-night you hav made me wait,
I hav heard," he hoarsely hissed,
"Such vulgar words as 'taking it straight'
From the lips I hav often kissed.

"Farewell! I'm going," he wildly cried,
As he trembled with agitation;
"You hav made a mistake," the maid replied,
"Pray wait for an explanation.

"To-morrow," she said, as she held him fast,
"Is election day in this city,
And so I was thinking how I should cast
My vote for school committee."

. . . . . .

How changed the scene in the parlor there,
As the golden hours are fleeting!
Two forms in a single rocking-chair,
Two hearts that as one are beating.

—Boston Courier.

Gems of Thought.

RATIONAL agriculture was abandoned to the Moorish Infidels. Christians neglected their fields and sought to avert famin by prayer-meetings. The pursuit of natural science was regarded with suspicion. Inventors were denounced as magicians. Erudition was considered a prima facie evidence of unbelief. Scientific progress decreased with the increase of the belief in the efficacy of prayer. Hence, moral and physical deserts; the desolation of the once fertil shores of the Mediterranean; a thousand years eclipse of common sense and reason; mendicants, pious vagabonds, and monastic drones; blind hatred of progress, mysticism, supernaturalism, and contented ignorance.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Secret of the East.

THE Spanish Christians considered agriculture beneath their dignity. In their judgment, war and religion were the only two avocations worthy of being followed. Some of the richest parts of Valencia and Granada were so neglected that means were wanting to feed even the scanty population remaining there. Whole districts were deserted, and down to the present day hav never been repeopled. All over Spain, the same destitution prevailed. That once rich and prosperous country was covered with a rabble of monks and clergy, whose insatiate rapacity absorbed the little wealth yet to be found. The fields were left uncultivated; vast multitudes died from want and exposure; entire villages were deserted.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THESE economical causes will help to show why it was that the material prosperity of the great Catholic power, Spain, was so transient, and also why no strong industrial spirit was evoked to counteract the prevailing fanaticism. This last fact will be still further elucidated, if we consider the social and religious institutions which Spanish Catholicity encouraged. The monasteries, in numbers and wealth, had reached a point that had scarcely ever been equaled; and besides subtracting many thousand men and a vast amount of wealth from the productiv resources of the country, they produced habits of mind that are altogether incompatible with industry. The spirit that makes men devote themselvs in vast numbers to a monotonous life of asceticism and poverty is so essentially opposed to the spirit that creates the energy and enthusiasm of industry, that their continued co-existence may be regarded as impossible.—Lecky.

I SUPPOSE the Catholic church is more powerful in Spain than in any other nation. The history of this nation demonstrates the result of Catholic supremacy, the result of an acknowledgment by a people that a certain religion is too sacred to be examined. It established the Inquisition within its borders. It imprisoned the honest, it burnt the noble, and succeeded after many years of devotion to the true faith in destroying the industry, the intelligence, the usefulness, the genius, the nobility, and the wealth of a nation. It became a wreck, a jest of the conquered, and excited the pity of its former victims.—Ingersoll.

RELIGION is merely loyalty. When a Christian sins as a man, he makes compensation as a courtier. When he has injured a fellow-creature, he goes to church with more regularity, and believes that he has cleared off the sins that are laid to his account. This, then, is the immorality of religion as it now exists. It creates artificial virtues and sets them off against actual vices.—Winwood Reade.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of justice—that we must reap what we sow. I do not believe in forgivness. If I rob Mr. Smith, and God forgiv me, how does that help Smith? If I by slander cover some poor girl with the leprosy of some imputed crime, and she withers away like a blighted flower, and afterward I get forgivness, how does that help her? If there is another world, we hav got to settle; no bankruptcy court there. Pay down. Among the ancient Jews if you committed a crime you had to kill a sheep; now they say: "Charge it. Put it on the slate." It won't do. For every crime you commit you must answer to yourself and to the one you injure. And if you hav ever clothed another with unhappiness as with a garment of pain, you will never be quite as happy as though you hadn't done that thing. No forgivness; eternal, inexorable, everlasting justice—that is what I believe in. And if it goes hard with me, I will stand it. And I will stick to my logic, and I will bear it like a man.—Ingersoll.

GOD is immutable, or, in other words, not susceptible of a change. Nevertheless, we find among his letters and papers that he has frequently changed his projects, his friends, and even his religion; all these changes are of course without prejudice to his immutability or to that of his immutable priests, who are unchanging and steadfast in their purpose of leading laymen by the nose to the end of all time.—Voltaire.

CHRISTIANITY is to be regarded as a system rather than as a doctrin, for, like Proteus, it changes its forms, and whenever defeated in attack, if policy so dictates, it adopts the proved ideas of its assailants, and thus preserves its organization, which is more essential to its official supporters than are its dogmas. Those are abandoned or changed whenever expediency dictates, making aggressiv effort very difficult; for whenever a point is successfully assailed, it is declared to be "unessential," or else not to belong to true Christianity. Everything is abandoned but natural morality, and still men call themselvs Christians and support the system which has no excuse for continuance unless miracle and revelation are facts. When Rationalists see the duty of consistency, they will cease to uphold a system which has no logical existence apart from supernaturalism.—Robert C. Adams.

THE faith of the modern world is only an ostensible faith, a faith which does not believe that which it fancies it believes, and is only an undecided, pusillanimous unbelief. Christianity has in fact long vanished, not only from the reason but from the life of mankind.—Feuerbach.
